The Great Maſter probably conjecturing, that the Turks would in ſhort time aſſault both the Town and Caſtle of St. Michael, thought good by his preſence to encourage and ſtrengthen the Garriſon; and therefore was about to have gone thither by a Bridge made of Boats from the one point of the Land to the other, between St. Michaels and S. Angelo; but quickly underſtanding the certainty thereof, returned again into his Caſtle. Some there be that think, For him to have ſo done, had been a venturous part, and full of danger, and therefore to have been diſcommended; for that great things are performed, not ſo much by ſtrength of body as of mind, by politique counſel and direction, wherewith a General (although abſent) may yet with his Forces be always preſent; but the General once loſt (which may eaſily happen if he will preſent his Perſon to the danger) we ſee moſt commonly all fall together with him, no otherwiſe than do all parts of the Body when the Soul departeth. But other-ſome are of contrary opinion, That the Generals preſence, eſpecially in great dangers, is both praiſe-worthy and moſt neceſſary; for that he, as the Soul, cannot provide for, or rule the body, except it be preſent, yea placed therein; and that Valetta in ſo doing, followed the Examples of the greateſt Kings and moſt famous Generals; as of Alexder the Great, Julius Cæſar, Themiſtocles, Marius, and others; whoſe words unto their Souldiers were theſe, I my ſelf will be your Conductor in the Field, in the battel partaker of the danger with you, you ſhall be in all things as my ſelf. Beſides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, ſo moſt of all in Martial Affairs, all things are better, more orderly, and more eaſily done when the Maſter is preſent; neither was the learned Poet his meaning any thing elſe, when in the Wars betwixt the Latins and the Rutilians, he ſaith, Urget præſentia Turni? whereupon they concluded, that the Great Maſter in going had done both valiantly, wiſely, and according to his duty. But this we leave for martial men to determine.

The King of Algiers cometh to aid the Turks.

At the ſame time the King of Algiers came to Aid the Turks with ſeven Gallies and ten Galliots, and in them 2200 Souldiers, who ſorry that he was not there at the beginning, and deſirous to do ſome notable Act, and withall to make proof of the Valour of his Souldiers, requeſted the great Baſſa to beſtow upon him the firſt place in the beſieging the Caſtle of St. Michael; which he not only granted, but joyned to his Forces 2000 of his own beſt Souldiers. Theſe things obtained, he commanded ninety ſmall Veſſels by devices to be carried over land out of the Port Marza-Moxet to Aqua Martia, for that he purpoſed on that ſide to beſiege the Caſtle by water. But Valetta perceiving the Enemies purpoſe, both by ſeeing that was done, and alſo advertiſed thereof before by a Chriſtian Fugitive; preſently called unto him two faithful and skilful Ship-Maſters of Malta, and imparting the matter unto them, demanded what they thought beſt to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it ſeemed they purpoſed at the Walls foot. They quickly perceiving the matter, anſwered, That in their opinion, if a Chain were made of Maſts and Sail-yards as Spars joyned together with iron rings, and ſo drawn all alongſt from the corner of the Caſtle of St. Angelo, to that place where the Enemy thought to land, their purpoſe might be ſo defeated. This device ſo pleaſed the Great Maſter, that the night following ſuch a Chain was made, and faſt mored in the appointed place. The Turks ſo ſoon as it was day perceiving this bar, ſtood as men doubtful, not knowing how by any means to land their men, as they had before purpoſed. Whilſt they ſtood ſo abaſhed, a Chriſtian Fugitive a moſt deſperate Villain (in which kind of men fooliſh hardineſs is accounted a vertue, and deſperation, conſtancy) came to the King, and promiſed him to break the Chain, and ſo with a Hatchet in his hand caſt himſelf into the Sea; after whom followed two or three more to help him; who ſwimming to the Chain, got up upon it, and began to hew apace with their Hatchets. Which the Chriſtians beholding, ſuddenly five or ſix of the Maltæſes ſwam thither with their drawn Swords in their hands, and having ſlain two of them, cauſed the other to fly; after which time none of the Turks was ſo hardy as to attempt the ſame. The barbarous King for all that gave not over his purpoſe ſo, but with wonderful diligence prepared for the Siege, which the fifteenth day of July began both by Sea and Land. But the Defendants turning their great Ordnance upon that place from whence the Galliots came, with the fury thereof (in the ſpace of three hours, which the Aſſault endured) ſlew two thouſand Turks, and ſunk twelve of the Galliots; the reſt coming as far as the Chain, when they could get no farther, nor land their men, turned their Prows upon the corner of the Caſtle, but were glad at laſt to retire and leave that they came for, undone. The aſſault by Land alſo endured five hours, wherein many of the Turks were ſlain; and of the Defendants 200, amongſt whom was Fredericus the Vice-Roy of Sicilia his Son, ſtruck in ſunder with a great Shot, Gordius a Frenchman, Franciſcus Sanoghera and his Nephew John, Spaniards, all Knights of the Order: Medina was alſo wounded, whereof he afterward died. But Valetta conſidering into what danger the State of Malta was like to fall, if he ſhould be conſtrained to fight many ſuch fights, where his Souldiers wearied day and night without reſt, were ſtill to incounter with freſh men, and heard nothing of any Aid or new Supply; the 17 day of July he ſent a Meſſenger into Sicilia, who ſwam from the Caſtle to the fartheſt part of the Bay to Aqua Martia, and from thence eſcaped unknown through the midſt of the Enemies, unto the City of Melita, and ſo in a little Frigot came to Meſſana. By him the Great Maſter ſent Letters to the Vice-Roy, requeſting him to ſend him his own two Gallies with thoſe Knights which were at Meſſana, and ſuch other Souldiers as might in them be tranſported; willing them, that as ſoon as they came to the Iſland, they ſhould hover off aloof before the Haven, ready upon a ſign given to thruſt in. The ſame time that this Meſſenger arrived at Meſſana, came thither alſo the Fleet from Spain, wherein were many of the Knights of the Order from divers Nations. The Vice-Roy deſirous to ſend theſe two Gallies to Valetta, ſent Letters before unto him in ſecret Characters by two Frigots, wherein he certified him that he would ſend the Gallies, requiring to have from him ſome ſign whereby they might at their coming know whether they ſhould enter or retire; which Frigots taking divers courſes, one of them laded with Medicines, as was afterwards known, was intercepted by the Enemy; the other although ſhe came in ſafety to Melita, yet for as much as all the paſſages betwixt the Caſtle of St. Michael and the City Melita, were certain days before by the diligence of the Enemy ſhut up, and three which had uſed to paſs too and fro, intercepted and moſt cruelly executed; and beſides that, the Haven ſtraightly kept; the Knights of Meſſana could have no further direction from the Great Maſter, for the ſafe ſending of the two Gallies; yet nevertheleſs becauſe he had requeſted them, and they themſelves were of the ſame opinion (as he had before written) that where all ii in queſtion, the adventure of a little part is leſs to be feared; they thought it good to adventure them, yet with this regard, not to expoſe all thoſe Knights to ſo great a danger, but of them all to ſend only forty, with a convenient number of other Souldiers, and with them Salazar a Spaniſh Captain was ſent by the Vice-Roy to be landed in the Iſland Gaulos, who ſhould afterwards from thence in a Boat (for that purpoſe towed along by the Gallies) paſs over into the Iſland of Malta as a Spy, to take view both of the City and Enemies Camp.

A hard ſhift to carry news

A Bridge made over the Caſtle-Ditch by the Turks.

In the mean time the Turks mindful of the loſs received in the Aſſault of the Caſtle St. Michael, and deſirous of revenge, did ſo violently batter the Caſtle with their great Ordnance, that what the Defendants repaired by night, that they ſtill beat down again by day; and in time of battery made a Bridge, which the 20th day of July before the Sun riſing they laid over the Ditch, that they might as if it had been upon even ground, come to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians. Which ſeen, and quickly perceived what danger it might bring, by and by Pariſot the Great Maſters Nephew, and Agleria, both Knights, with certain mercenary Souldiers ſallied out to have burnt the Bridge, but were ſo received of the Turks, that they were almoſt all ſlain together with Pariſot and Agleria, and yet the Exploit unperformed. The Turks without ceaſing continued their furious battery until the eight and twentieth of July, which day in the Afternoon they in divers places aſſaulted the Caſtle; thrice they with freſh and new Supplies relieved their repulſed and wearied Souldiers, and ſo fiercely maintained the Aſſault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the Caſtle.

But

The Turks repulſed.

A Mine of the Turks defeated.

The Bridge made by the Turks burnt.

But the Defendants with no leſs reſolution withſtood them, repulſing them with their Weapons, with Shot, Fire, and Force, and at length inforced them with no ſmall loſs of their men to retire from the Walls. This Victory ſo incouraged the beſieged, that now they made ſmall reckoning of the Enemy; but foraſmuch as our men always ſpared their great Ordance but in time of fight, and ſallied not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the Garriſon was but weak, and that Shot and Power grew ſcarce in the Caſtle. Yet deceived in both, for that it was rather of purpoſe, than for want, ſo commanded by the Great Maſter; who hearing nothing of the coming of any Aid, and ſeeing the Enemy to give daily more fierce Aſſaults, would not vainly ſpend his moſt neceſſary helps. The Turks perceiving what little good they had done with their often Aſſaults, determined now to prove what might be done by undermining the Caſtle; and had almoſt brought one of their Mines to perfection before it was by the Chriſtians diſcovered; and to the intent they ſhould the leſs mark it, they cauſed two Gallies to come as near as they could to the Walls, and to batter that place; in hope that whilſt our men gazed upon that was done openly, they ſhould the leſs regard what they were working in ſecret, that ſo they might in the mean time more eaſily get into the Caſtle. But the beſieged careful of all that was to be cared for, perceiving their purpoſe, with a countermine defeated their Mine, and by the couragiouſneſs of certain of their Souldiers, but eſpecially of one Ancient, drave out the Enemy, who having caſt certain pots of Wild-fire before him into the Mine, and following preſently after with a piece of Fire-work in his hand, forced him out. For which good Service he was by the Great Maſter rewarded with a Chain of Gold of five pound weight. And becauſe of vertue ſpringeth vertue, which ſtill reſteth upon Difficulties, the next day, which was the firſt of Auguſt, the Bridge which we ſaid the Enemy had made over the Ditch, was by a ſally made by the Defendants burnt down with Fire and Gunpowder caſt upon it; which was in good time done; for the next day, the Sun now declining, the Turks again aſſailing that part of the Caſtle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulſed. This aſſault endured three hours, in which time 300 of the Turks were there ſlain; and of the Knights, Rufus himſelf and Bareſus, with certain mercenary Souldiers. At this time the Chriſtians were by the Enemy ſo ſhut in with the multitude of great Ordnance, that they could not ſo much as look into the Ditch or ſhew themſelves, much leſs ſally out, but they were preſently ſet off. Yet did they not for all that make ſpare of their lives when occaſion was given them to perform any notable Exploit; as appeared by Calderonius a Spaniard, who ſeeing ſome viewing that part of the Wall which the Enemy had moſt battered and ſhaken at the Caſtle Bulwark, doubted not to ſally out, but was preſently taken with a Bullet and ſlain; which miſchance when it might ſeem of right to have terrified the reſt from attempting the like, did indeed the more incenſe them; ſo that when they ſaw the Enemy exceeding buſie in filling the Ditch, they, reſolutely ſet down to offer themſelves to moſt aſſured death, rather than to fall into the hands of the mercileſs Enemy, agreed to ſally out by night, and to meet with his deſigns. Whereupon an hundred, part Knights, part other Souldiers, ſallying forth, cauſed the Enemy to forſake the Ditch and betake himſelf to flight, of whom they ſlew about fourſcore, and loſt of their own, ten men; amongſt whom were Joannes and Manicrinus two Knights, whoſe heads the Turks the next day ſet up upon two Spears upon their Trenches, that they might be ſeen by the Chriſtians.

The ſame day, they of the City of Melita at night made at one inſtant a number of fires, and as if it were in triumph diſcharged great Vollies of ſmall Shot, with many other tokens of joy; which as well the beſieged as the Turks thought verily to have been done upon diſcovery of the Chriſtian Fleet, or elſe the landing of ſuch Forces as were come to remove the Siege; whereas indeed it was neither, but done only to ſhew their chearfulneſs, and to keep the Turks in ſuſpence with the novelty of the matter; who for all that were not ſlack in their buſineſs, but with Earth filled up the Ditch at the Caſtle Bulwark; whereby it came to paſs that they could not be hurt by the Flankers made in that place to ſcour the Ditch, but might thereby, as upon plain ground, without ſtay paſs unto the Wall, now opened and overthrown with their continual battery, and with two great Pieces (which they had planted upon a high Mount which they had newly caſt up on the right hand the Bulwark Savoire) they began to play upon the Caſtle, and at the firſt ſhot, ſhot into the Loupe where Franciſcus Caſtilia commanded. Joannes Bernardus Godinetius a Spaniſh Knight was there ſlain with a ſmall ſhot. The ſame day Franciſcus Aquilates a Spaniard, one of the Garriſon-Souldiers, perſwaded by fear and hope (in dangers two evil Counſellors) fled out of the Town St. Michael to the Enemy; perſwading the Turks Colonels to give a freſh Aſſault, aſſuring them that they ſhould without doubt win the Town, becauſe there was but 400 Souldiers left alive in it, and they (as he ſaid) almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds, all the reſt being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and ſeeing fair breaches both in the Walls of the new City and of the Caſtle of St. Michael, wide enough for Carts to go through, they determined with all their Forces to aſſault both places at once, and to prove if there were yet ſo much ſtrength left in thoſe Holds, as again to repulſe them; ſo the 7th day of Auguſt at one inſtant they aſſaulted the new City at the Caſtle Bulwark, and the Caſtle St. Michael at the breach, with ſuch a multitude, that all the Earth ſeemed to be covered with men round about. The thundring of the great Ordnance, the noiſe of the ſmall ſhot, with the clattering of Armor, and noiſe of Trumpets, Drums, and other War-like Inſtruments, with the cry of men on both ſides was ſo confuſed and great, as if Heaven and Earth ſhould have been confounded together. Which when the Knights in the City Melita heard, and ſaw the Heavens obſcured with ſmoke, fearing that the Turks (as at the Caſtle St. Elmo) would never give over the Aſſault until they had won both the Town and the Caſtle; preſently all the Garriſon-Horſemen iſſued out of the City, and to avert the Turks from the Aſſault, ſet upon thoſe Turks which lay at Aqua Martia; who all ſurpriſed with ſudden fear, fled, the Chriſtian Horſemen hardly purſuing them with bloody Execution, and they in their flight pitiouſly crying out upon their Fellows for help. Whereby it came to paſs, that they which were aſſailing the City and Caſtle, to reſcue their diſcomfited Fellows, were glad to give over the Aſſault; ſo with great ſlaughter foiled on both ſides by the Chriſtians, they returned to their Trenches, when they had loſt about fifteen hundred at the Aſſault, beſide them which were ſlain in the chaſe by the Horſemen of Melita. Of the Defendants of both places were ſlain above an hundred, and almoſt as many wounded. This fight endured about five hours. Valetta delivered of ſo great a danger, that day and certain others, cauſed publique Prayers to be made, and went himſelf with the multitude of the Citizens to the Church, to give Thanks to Almighty God for that Victory.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Garzias the Vice-Roy was advertiſed from Calabria, that certain Ships laded with Men, Victual, and other proviſion neceſſary for the Wars, were coming from Conſtantinople to Malta; wherefore he forthwith ſent Altamira and Gildandrada two Noblemen, with five Gallies to meet them; who being come within thirty miles of Malta, met with no ſuch Ships, but only one Frigot and a Galliot; the Frigot they took, but the Galliot eſcaped to the Enemies Fleet at Malta.

Muſtapha the Turks General now thinking no man ſo ſtrong which might not with continual labour and watching be wearied and overcome, reſolved not to give unto the beſieged any time of reſt, but commanded his Souldiers again to aſſault the breach at the Caſtle of St. Michael; where they were by the valour of the Defendants, with no ſmall ſlaughter quickly repulſed; neither did the Baſſa give ſo many aſſaults, for the hope he had to win thoſe places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant General, and to ſatisfie Solymans pleaſure, who had expreſly commanded, either to win that Iſland, or there all to loſe their lives. He alſo ſent a Galliot in haſt with Letters to Solyman; wherein he ſhewed him the ſtate of the Fleet, with what difficulties the Army was diſtreſſed, what ſmall hope there was of winning the places beſieged, how well the Chriſtians were provided, with many other ſuch things.

Muſtapha ſendeth a Meſſenger to Solyman.

In the mean time thoſe two Gallies of Malta (which we have before ſpoken of) departing from Meſſana, came to Syracuſa, where they ſtayed a day. The next day after, in going out of the Haven, they met with one of Malta in a ſmall Boat coming from Pozalo ſore wounded; he being demanded how he was ſo hurt; told them, That landing by night with his Boat and one Companion, he was requeſted by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to reſt there that night; which they doing, about midnight five Turks brake into the houſe upon them, killed his Companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly eſcaped by the benefit of the night; moreover he ſaid, That the Sicilians had told the Turks, that two Gallies were come into that Port, with Souldiers and other War-like Proviſion bound for Malta. Whereby the Knights perceived, that their coming would be diſcovered unto the Enemy, and that it was a moſt dangerous thing, or rather impoſſible to get into the Haven of Malta, as they had before purpoſed; nevertheleſs, to conduct Salazar with his little Boat, they kept on their courſe. But as they were ſailing, they deſcried two Gallies and one Galliot going before them, who ſeeing the Gallies coming after them, made with all ſpeed to Malta; and were no doubt thoſe Gallies, from whence thoſe five Turks came, which had done thoſe things which the wounded Maltaſe reported. For all that, theſe Gallies kept on their courſe as far as Pozalo, from whence they certified the Vice-Roy by Letters, all that had happened; and not daring to put to Sea, the South-wind blowing with a ſtiff gale againſt them, they returned back again to Syracuſa, expecting there farther direction from the Vice-Roy. For which cauſe, they forthwith ſent one of the Knights to him to Meſſana; by whom they received anſwer, That they ſhould go on farther, but to ſtay for the coming of the whole Fleet, ready in ſhort time to paſs over to Malta. But Salazar brought by the Gallies to Pozalo, reſolved with his little Boat to go on; and although the day he departed thence, the Air was troubled with great Wind, Thunder and Rain, yet the day following proving more calm, he in ſhort time arrived in the Iſland of Malta, and came in ſafety to the City Melita; and there diſguiſed himſelf in Turkiſh Apparel, and taking with him one Companion, who could alſo ſpeak the Turkiſh Language, by night got into the Enemies Camp; where diligently marking all things, they perceived that there was in all the Turks Army of Land-Souldiers ſcarce 14000, and of them many wounded and ſick; and that the reſt was but an unſerviceable and feeble multitude, for that the courſe of Wars had (as commonly it doth) conſumed their beſt Souldiers. When they had thus viewed the Camp, they returned again to the City; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certain place near unto the Watch-Tower of Maleca; which when they had curiouſly viewed, Paccius was there left, that obſerving the ſigns from the Iſland of Gaulos and the City of Melita, he might give knowledge of all things to the Vice-Roy at his approach, as he was by Salazar inſtructed. As for Salazar himſelf, he in his little Boat (which at his coming into the Iſle he had there left) happily returned to Meſſana, and there declared unto the Vice-Roy all that he had ſeen; conſtantly affirming amongſt other things, That the Turks Fleet was but weak, lame, and diſfurniſhed both of Men and Munition, far unable to encounter with 10000 Chriſtians. About which time alſo, one of the two Frigots which were before ſent to Malta, returned with another Spaniard, and a Fugitive from the Turks Camp; and four Gallies before gone from Meſſana, were alſo come in with fourteen Turks taken about the Iſland of Malta, who all confirmed the ſame that was by Salazar reported; Which was, That the Turks Army was with often aſſaults wonderfully weakned, both in number and ſtrength; ſo that they could not with ſtripes be enforced to the aſſault, for which the Baſſa had with his own hands ſlain divers of them; and that which more encreaſed their fear, they ſaw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Beſides that, they ſaw the Chriſtians with invincible courage to defend their ſtrong places, and not to ſpend one ſhot in vain: Wherefore they were ſorry, and repented that they ever took in hand that Expedition; they deteſted ſuch a War, ſhrinking as much as they could from the Aſſault, and as they might, ſtealing quite away, which many of them did, ſpecially ſuch as before abjured the Chriſtian Faith. For which cauſe diligent Watch and Ward was kept, and Commandment given by the great Baſſa, that they ſhould reſolve with themſelves either to win the Town, or there all to lay up their bones, for that the great Sultan Solyman had ſo commanded, whom to gainſay, was in it ſelf death. Theſe and ſuch like perſwaſions, cauſed the Vice-Roy ſomewhat the ſooner to think of the bringing forth of his Fleet; the beſieged in the mean time did what men might for defence of the place and themſelves. There was in the Caſtle one Franciſcus Ginara Captain of the Vauntgard, a noble and valiant valiant Gentleman, of a great conceit; he about ten foot from the Town Wall, which the Enemy had with their great Ordnance beaten down, cauſed a Curtain to be drawn 50 foot long, and five foot thick, with Flankers at both ends, which in two nights was brought to perfection, and was afterwards a great help to the beſieged. The Enemy in the mean time began a Mine under the corner of the Town-Ditch, where Boningſegna a Spaniard and a moſt valiant Knight had the Charge; which the beſieged perceiving, by a countermine defeated the ſame. It hapned in the mean time, that a Fugitive was ſwimming to the Town, he was taken by the Enemy, which much grieved the beſieged, deſirous to have underſtood ſomething of the ſtate of the Enemies Camp, and of their purpoſes. Now when the former Mine had taken ſo evil ſucceſs, part of the Turks aſſailed the Caſtle of St. Michael, and part with Gunpowder thought to have blown up the Caſtle-Bulwark; but by the carefulneſs and courage of the Defendants, all their Attempts were diſappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places ſlain, and certain bags of Powder taken from them in the Mine. With theſe and other ſuch difficulties, Muſtapha and Piall the Turks Generals diſappointed of their hope, conſulted with the other great Captains of the Army, Whether they ſhould there ſtill continue that deſperate Siege, or depart? Where moſt were clear of opinion, That it was beſt betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Baſſa ſaid, He would there ſtay, until the Galliot which he had before ſent to Conſtantinople, were returned with anſwer from Solyman, and in the mean time both by force and policy to ſeek after Victory; which thing he oftner did, than ſtood with the broken eſtate of his Army, or of the beſieged; neither reſting himſelf nor ſuffering others to take reſt; for one while he battered the Walls, another while he wrought Mines or elſe made Bridges; ſometime he caſt up Mounds, and then again filled the Ditches; and ever and anon gave one aſſault or another. In all which doing he uſed ſuch induſtry, that whatſoever he took in hand, was in ſhort time brought to ſuch perfection as might have carried a ſtronger place, had not the valour of the Defendants far exceeded all his ſtrong and politique devices.

Robles Governor of the Caſtle of St. Michael, ſlain.

It fortuned, that as Robles the Camp-Maſter, and Governor of the Caſtle St. Michael, was by night viewing the ruines of the Wall, he was ſtruck in the head with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlain; leaving behind him to his Fellows, the great deſire of himſelf; for why, he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times ſtood the Defendants in great ſtead) worthily beloved. In whoſe ſtead the Great Maſter ſent one of the Colonels that was with himſelf, a moſt expert and reſolute Captain, to take charge of St. Michaels Caſtle; who by his valiant care and providence ſo well diſcharged the charge committed unto him, that as often as the Turks attempted the place, ſo often they were with loſs repulſed.

The two Gallies with the Galliot, deſcribed by the Gallies of Malta (as we have before ſaid) told Piall Baſſa the Admiral, that the Chriſtian Fleet was ready to come forth; wherefore he fearing the ſudden coming thereof, cauſed ſeventy Gallies to be in readineſs; beſides which forty others lay in the Haven Marza Moxet unſerviceable, as wanting both Men and other Equipages; for that was ſpent in making Bridges, Mines, and other ſuch things neceſſary for the Siege; as for the Men, they were part with ſickneſs, and part with often aſſaults conſumed. Wherefore Piall for certain days kept himſelf by day in the Port Major near the ſhore, and by night put forth to Sea, expecting the coming of the Fleet. But after long looking, when he ſaw no man appear, he again landed his Souldiers; and becauſe at Land the Baſſa began to want Powder, of every thirty Barrels of Powder in every Gally, he took out twenty, and of ſome twenty five, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turks began with greater fury than at any time before, to batter the Walls of both Towns, eſpecially with thoſe great Pieces which they call Baſilisks, whoſe ſhot of two hundred pound weight was ſeven hands about; whereby the Walls of the Caſtle of St. Michael, were beaten flat. And at the ſame time, the Baſſa at the Caſtle St. Angelo, had with continual battery ſo ſhaken the Caſtle Bulwark, that it was almoſt fallen quite down. Theſe breaches thus made, when the Turks ſaw both Towns barred of Walls and other Defendants, and laid ſo open, that nothing ſeemed now to let them to look upon their Enemies, they made no longer ſtay, but the 18th day of Auguſt (the Sun being now at the higheſt) with all their Power fiercely aſſaulted both the Towns. Thrice they were repulſed, and ſtill came on afreſh; yet at length beaten down on every ſide with greater ſlaughter, they were glad ſhamefully to give over the aſſault, and again to retire to their Trenches. In this moſt cruel fight (which endured five hours) the invincible courage of the Great Maſter notably appeared, who armed with a Pike in his hand, and dreadful to behold, was ſtill valiantly fighting in the face of the Breach; whoſe preſence incouraged not the Souldiers only, but even Boys and Women to fight; for ſo it is, that men are more moved with example, than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turks, part ſtood ſtill in the Town-Ditch, and to ſave themſelves from the ſhot of the Caſtle Bulwark, had with wonderful celerity caſt up a defence of Earth, Fagots, and other like matter, which they did of purpoſe to approach and to undermine the Walls, and had therefore incloſed the ſpace of fifteen Elns; which when the beſieged perceived, they bent certain Pieces of Artillery upon it, and ſlew many of them, and with fire conſumed what was left. The next day the aſſault was at the ſame places by the Enemy renewed, who by reaſon of his number of Souldiers might eaſily ſend freſh men in ſtead of them which were wounded or weary; and firſt, after their wonted manner they battered both the Towns all that day until night; afterwards the Moon ariſing, about midnight with a horrible cry they began a moſt terrible aſſault, which at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians, who yet ſtill mindful of their wonted valour, did ſo much with their Weapons and Fire-Works, that the Enemy evil intreated, was glad after three hours fight to retire to his Trenches. The ſame day a Mine was by the Defendants perceived, at the Caſtle Bulwark, wherein a hundred Turks there found, were almoſt all ſlain, and the Mine deſtroyed. Yet for all this did not the Enemy reſt at all, but the next day ſeven times aſſaulted the ſame Breaches, uſing now not Weapons only, but Fire-Works alſo; wherewith Boſninſegna had his face ſo burnt, that he loſt one of his eyes. At the ſame time alſo, the Turks at a place called The Spur, laboured mightily to have gotten into the Caſtle; where Centius a Knight of an invincible courage, got up upon the Rampier, and with a Pike couragiouſly thruſt them down that were climing up, up, and thruſting through one, diſcouraged the reſt; but was himſelf wounded in the Arm with a ſmall ſhot; yet when he had a little withdrawn himſelf to have his Wound bound up, he came again to the Rampier, and never departed from the fight, until he had (as a valiant Conqueror) preſerved the place. So the Turks with great ſlaughter on every ſide repulſed, left the Victory to the Chriſtians, of whom were ſlain almoſt an hundred, and moſt of them (as at other times) with ſhot; amongſt whom were theſe moſt valiant Knights; at the Caſtle St. Angelo, Fragus; at the Caſtle of St. Michael, Scipio Piatus, Joh. Baptiſta Soderinus, Paulus Bomportus, Marius Fagianus, Ruffinus, and certain others, men worthy of longer life. The Turks had alſo at the ſame time wrought a Mine at the Caſtle St. Michael, which was at once both diſcovered and deſtroyed.

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter.

The Turks aſſault both the Towns the fourth time.

The Turks enter the new City.

The comfortable Speech of the Great Maſter when the Turks were entred.

The Turks with great ſlaughter again repulſed.

With theſe ſo many and ſo great Aſſaults, certain of the Knights (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) fearing leſt that which was ſo often attempted by the Enemy, ſhould at length be effected; told the Great Maſter, That they thought it convenient and neceſſary, to remove all the Records, all the Pictures and Reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the Caſtle St. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more ſtrength and aſſurance. The Great Maſter, although he well knew that they which thus ſaid, ſpake it of a good mind, was for all that with that ſpeech exceedingly moved; wherefore he ſhortly anſwered them, That ſo to do, were nothing elſe but to appaul and diſcourage the minds, not of the Maltæſes only, who had hitherto valiantly behaved themſelves, and done more than any man could have hoped for; but alſo of the mercenary Souldiers, if they ſhould perceive it; wherefore he was reſolved, either together to keep all, or loſe all; and becauſe none ſhould from thenceforth repoſe any hope in the ſtrength of the Caſtle St. Angelo, he ſaid he would bring all the Garriſon out of the Caſtle into the Town, that there they might together with others withſtand the Enemy; and that he would leave in the Caſtle none but Gunners, who ſhould as need required ſhoot at the Enemy; an anſwer truly well beſeeming a man of his place, and to be to all Poſterity commended; for how can the Souldier hope, which ſeeth his Captain deſpair? or adventure, where the Chieftain ſeems to be ſtruck with fear? Whilſt the Grand Maſter with this anſwer doth both aſhame them and alſo encourage their quailing minds; the Turks (that this day as the other three before ſhould not paſs without aſſault) with the dawning of the day aſſailed the very ſame places with the greateſt fury poſſible, eſpecially at the ruines of the Caſtle; where San Romanus an Avergnois, which had the charge of that place, loſt this ſhort and tranſitory life, winning thereby immortal Fame; and at St. Michaels, Adurnius one of the Knights, and Fagio with certain others, were grievouſly wounded; for the Enemy ſuddenly retiring from the Aſſault, preſently ſo thundred into the Breaches with their great and ſmall ſhot, that all the Iſland ſeemed to tremble, the Heavens to burn, and the Air to be darkned with ſmoke. In the mean time Valetta throughly wearied with the mornings fight, had withdrawn himſelf a little to breath himſelf; when ſuddenly a Spaniſh Prieſt, with his hands caſt up to Heaven, came running to him, roaring and crying out, That all was loſt and forlorn, and that three or four Enſigns of the Enemies were by the Caſtle breach broken into the Town. Which the great Maſter hearing, ſuddenly clapt his Helmet upon his head, and with a Pike in his hand, ſaid unto them that were about him, Lo, Fellow-Souldiers, the hour is come wherein you may ſhew your ſelves the moſt valiant Champions of the Chriſtian Religion, if it be ſo, that you now alſo retain the ſame valour which you have in other battels ſhewed. There is no cauſe wherefore you ſhould doubt of this laſt; for the Enemy is the ſame; and the ſame God which hath hitherto preſerved us, will not now forſake us; wherefore follow me, valiant hearts. This ſaid, he haſted to the place where moſt danger was, and with him all the Souldiers, all the Citizens Men and Women, old and young, yea the very Children, all againſt the Common Enemy. There was fought a moſt dreadful and dangerous battel; ſome kept the Enemy from entring, ſome ſet upon them that were already entred, whom they wounded, chaſed, and ſlew, although they notably reſiſted. Within, without, all was covered with Weapons, Darts, dead Bodies, and Blood. The Great Maſter was careful of all, and in every place preſent, commending, exhorting, directing, as occaſion required, performing at once all the duties of a moſt valiant Souldier and worthy General. At length the Turks with the ſetting of the Sun retired, and ſo the Aſſault ceaſed. Thus was the Great Maſter the undoubted Victor, but not without much blood of his people, conſidering his ſmall number; for in this fight he loſt above 200 Men, whereas of the Enemies, beſide them which were entred, whereof not one eſcaped, were ſlain above 2000. Theſe are thoſe four terrible Aſſaults, preſently given one after another unto the beſieged.

Garzias the Vice-Roy in the mean time tarried for nothing elſe to tranſport his Army to Malta, but for the coming of Jo. Cardona, who with twelve Gallies was gone to Panormo, to conduct thence four Ships laded with proviſion; but when he ſaw him ſtay long, he ſent to him in poſt, That if he could not with ſuch ſpeed as was required tow forth thoſe Ships, he ſhould ſpend no longer time, but take out the proviſion into his Gallies, and with ſpeed to come away. So the Vice-Roy with a Fleet of 72 Gallies the twentieth day of Auguſt ſet forward from Meſſana to Syracuſa, wherein he carried ten thouſand ſelect Souldiers, amongſt whom were above two hundred Knights of the Order of St. John, and above forty of the Order of St. Stephen, which is an Order of Knights inſtituted by Coſmos Medices, Duke of Florence, to the imitation of the Knights of Malta, in the year 1561. and have their reſidence at Coſmopolis, a new built City in the Iſland of Elba in the Tuſcan-Sea, over againſt Piombino. Beſides theſe Knights, in this Fleet were divers noble and valiant Gentlemen of Italy, Sicily, and other Countries. The Fleet being arrived at Syracuſa, the Vice-Roy ſent Auria with one Gally and a Boat to Malta, to land a man, to know of Paccius (left, as we have before ſaid, for a Watch in the Iſland at Maleca) what News, or what he had ſeen. By whom it was underſtood, That no Ship was ſeen at Sea, but one Galliot, which the one and twentieth day of Auguſt in the morning made towards Gaulos, and the ſame day towards night as he was informed by the Watchmen of Maleca, ſixteen Gallies came to water at Saline, but what became of them afterwards, by reaſon of the coming on of the night could not be deſcried.

In this while the beſieged had notably repaired the Breach at the Caſtle Bulwark, and had in ſundry places aptly placed certain great Pieces to Flanker the Ditches, and to beat the Mount caſt up by the Enemy at the Bulwark of Boninſegna, that they might from thence annoy all the plain of the Caſtle with their ſmall ſhot. But the Turks having determined with all their Forces at once to aſſault both the Towns as before, brought an Engine made of Spars and Boards, able to cover thirty Men, under the Breach at St. Michaels; whereby it came to paſs, that none of the Defendants could without danger ſhew themſelves in the Breach; which when they could by no means endure, they ſuddenly ſallied out, and putting them to flight which were there covered, ſet fire on the Engine and burnt it. In like manner, they which beſieged the new City, were repulſed at the Caſtle breach, and another like Engin burnt. The next night, certain of the Watch of the Caſtle iſſued out, and having deſtroyed the Turks Engins prepared for the aſſailing of that place, and ſlain them that were ſet for the keeping thereof, returned in ſafety into the Caſtle. But when the Enemies both that day and others following reſted not, but repairing their Mines, Mounts, and Engins, laboured in both places to have beaten the Chriſtians from the Walls; all their endeavour and labour was by the induſtry and valour of the Defendants made fruſtrate. The beſieged had at the Caſtle breach made a Mine, and laid in it eight Barrels of Powder, that if the Enemy ſhould again aſſault that place, he might there be blown up; but whilſt the Turks were for like purpoſe working a Mine in the ſame place, they chanced upon the Mine before made, which they ſpoiled, and carried away all the Powder. Thus whilſt they labour both on the one ſide and the other, Muſtapha the General, a moſt expert and famous Commander, conſidering that Summer now ſo far ſpent, he was not to uſe longer delay; and withall, that reſolute perſeverance oftentimes in War findeth out a way to Victory; determined with all his Power once again to aſſault the Caſtle St. Michael. Wherefore diſplaying the ſtately Standard of the Turkiſh Emperor, upon the point whereof was faſtned a Globe of Gold, he commanded his Souldiers to enter the Breach; who now like deſperate men attempted to have performed his Command, and were by the Chriſtians valiantly encountred; ſo that in the Breach was made a moſt terrible and doubtful fight. But when the Turks had now been twice rejected and beaten down; Muſtapha perceiving his Souldiers as men half-diſcouraged, but faintly to maintain the Aſſault, came himſelf to the places, praying and exhorting them not to be diſcouraged, but that day to confirm their former Labours and Victories; and not to ſuffer their vanquiſhed Enemies to triumph over them; he told them that the Enemy had now no defence left wherewith to cover himſelf, that all was beaten down flat, and and that there remained only a few weary and maimed Bodies, which were not able long to indure the edge of their Swords; that with ſuch reſolution they had before won the Caſtle St. Elmo; laſt of all, he by promiſing to ſome Money, to ſome Honour and Preferment; threatning ſome, and requeſting others, incouraged ſome one way, ſome another, every one according to his quality and diſpoſition; who moved either with their Generals preſence, promiſes, or threats, gave a freſh and fierce aſſault. The fight was on both ſides terrible, yet at length the Turks were again inforced to retire; for the Defendants had caſt up a Rampier, whereon they had fitly placed two Field Pieces, wherewith they ſore troubled the Enemy, and at the firſt ſhot ſtruck in ſunder one of thoſe wooden Engins, which the Enemy had made ſtronger than the reſt, covered with raw Hides to keep from burning, and rent in pieces forty Souldiers which were under it; and the ſame night they which were in the other Town and the Caſtle Bulwark, ſallying couragiouſly out, deſtroyed all the Enemies defences, and drave them from a Mount which they had made upon the Fortifications of the Chriſtians; whereby they perceived plainly, what ſmall courage the Turks had to fight, for upon that Mount they were almoſt 300, whereas of our men was but 25, with which ſmall number for all that, they had no mind to deal. The Defendants had for like purpoſe as before, made another Mine at the Caſtle Bulwark, but perceiving that it was in danger to be found by the Enemy in repairing his Fortifications without, they ſuddenly put fire unto it, by force whereof threeſcore Turks which were within the danger of the place, were blown up and ſlain.

A Mine of the Chriſtians found by the Turks.

The Turks deſperately aſſault the Town of St. Michael.

The Turks forced to retire.

Garzias the Vice-Roy, in the mean while that theſe things were in doing, departing with his Fleet from Syracuſa, with a proſperous Wind kept on his courſe tward Pachynum, where they deſcried a tall Ship at Sea, driven thither (as was afterward known) by Tempeſt; ſhe out of the Iſland Meninx was carrying a great ſupply of Shot and Powder unto the Turks Camp at Malta; but now overtaken by the Chriſtian Fleet, eaſily yielded, and was by the Vice-Roy ſent by other Mariners to Syracuſa. And now the Chriſtian Fleet carried with a fair gale towards Malta, ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a Tempeſt from the Eaſt, that they were driven to the Iſland Æguſa, two hundred and twenty miles Weſt of Malta, from whence the firſt of September Letters were brought from the Vice-Roy to the Great Maſter, certifying him, That he would in ſhort time come with his Fleet and relieve him. The ſame day alſo a Chriſtian fled out of the Turks Gallies, wherein he was Captive, to the City St. Angelo; who reported, That in the Turks Camp were few men able to fight, moſt of the Army being with Wounds, Famine, Sickneſs, and other Miſeries brought to extream weakneſs; and beſides that, that infinite numbers of them died daily; yet for all that he ſaid moreover, that they were determined to beſiege the City of Melita, and had already for that purpoſe mounted five great Pieces of Artillery for battery; and that they had but a few days before taken twelve, and the laſt day of all fourteen Horſemen of the Garriſon-Souldiers of that City. In the mean while the Fleet which was driven (as we ſaid) to Æguſa, the rage of the Sea being now well appeaſed, came to Drepanum, and from thence toward Gaulos, as was before intended; where by the way the two Gallies of Malta light upon two of the Turks Galliots, and took them.

The Chriſtian Fleet driven by Tempeſt to the Iſland Æguſa.

The fifth day of September the Chriſtian Fleet came to Gaulos, where the Vice-Roy perceiving not the appointed ſigns from Malta, whereby he might ſafely land, returned forthwith back again to Pozalo, whither Auria immediately following him, told him, That he had ſeen the ſigns, and aſſured him of ſafe landing in the Iſland of Malta; wherewith the Vice-Roy encouraged, the next day towards night returned again to Gaulos.

The Chriſtian Fleet cometh to Gaulos.

The ſame day a Chriſtian Captive fled from the Turks to St. Angelo, and told the Great Maſter, That he was come to bring him good News, how that the Turks had determined to prove their laſt Fortune in aſſaulting the Caſtle St. Michael, which they would do the next day, where if the ſucceſs were anſwerable to their deſire, they would then tarry, but if not, then forthwith to be gone; and that Muſtapha the more to encourage his Souldiers, had promiſed five Talents of Gold to the Enſign-bearers, that ſhould firſt advance their Enſigns upon the Walls and farther to promote them to greater places of Honour; as for the reſt, he would reward every one of them according to their deſert, either with Money or Preferment. Valetta thinking all theſe things to be by Gods appointment diſcovered unto him by ſuch men, as they had from time to time been; firſt gave thanks unto Almighty God; and after that, with all diligence prepared ſuch things as he thought moſt neceſſary for the repulſing of the Enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great Ordnance battered the new City, and the Shipping in the Haven, in ſuch ſort that one of the great Ships was there ſunk.

The Vice-Roy arriveth at Malta, and landeth his Forces.

In the morning Garzias the Vice-Roy with his Fleet arrived at the Iſland of Malta, and there quickly and quietly landed his Forces, and whilſt his Gallies watered at Gaulos, went forward with the Army about half a mile, inſtructing the Generals and Colonels, what he thought needful to be done, commanding all Proclamations and Commands to be made in the name of the King of Spain, until they came to the Great Maſter, and then in all things to obey him as their Sovereign; and charged Aſcanius Cornia the General, in all his actions to follow the counſel of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men, he left them marching towards Melita. About noon he retired to his Gallies, and ſailing Eaſtward, came with all his Fleet within the ſight of the City of Melita, about three miles diſtant from the South ſhore. They of the City upon ſight of the Fleet, in token of joy diſcharged all the great Artillery, which was anſwered from the Fleet, by diſcharging all their great Ordance twice. After that, he returned as he had before determined into Sicilia, to take into his Gallies the Duke of Urbins Companies, which were come to Meſſana, and certain Bands of Spaniards at Syracuſa, and ſo forthwith to return to Malta, to attend the departing of the Turks Fleet, being now evil appointed, and already as good as half overthrown.

The Turks, who (as is before ſaid) had purpoſed to prove their laſt Fortune upon the Town of St. Michael, had now certain days before the coming of the Fleet, begun to truſs up their Baggage; but as ſoon as they heard that the Fleet was come, and the Army landed, there ſuddenly aroſe a wonderful tumultuous confuſion amongſt them, ſome cried, Arm, arm, and otherſome as faſt to be gone; and being generally all afraid, every one according to his diſpoſition, betook himſelf to his Weapons or to his heels; the greateſt number thruſt together into their Trenches as near as they could unto the great Ordnance; and ſo burning the Engins and Fortifications, with all the ſpeed they could imbarked their great Ordnance and Baggage. Which they in the Town of St. Angelo perceiving, not expecting the Commandment of the Great Maſter in ſo ſudden an opportunity, couragiouſly ſallied out to Burmolo, where certain Turks kept a huge great Piece of Ordnance; who now having no mind to fight, betook themſelves to flight, and forſook the Piece; which they of the Town preſently drew within their Walls; and if the new-come Forces had that day charged the Enemy as they diſorderly ran to their Gallies, happily they had either found an occaſion of Victory, or at leaſtwiſe taken from them the greateſt part of their Artillery. But it may be, that they followed the old Military ſaying, That unto the flying Enemy a man ſhould make a Bridge of Silver. Beſides that, they thinking it not convenient to depart from the proviſion and things which they had brought for the relief of the beſieged; which for the roughneſs of the way and want of Horſes were hardly carried, would not provoke the Enemy with any Skirmiſh; whereby it came to paſs, that the Turks without let imbarked their great Ordnance, their Baggage, and moſt part of their Army. The 11th of September, whilſt the Turks Fleet was brought out of the Haven Marza-Moxet, a Fugitive of Genoa came in haſt to the Great Maſter, and told him, that 10000 Turks were marching toward Melita, to meet with the Chriſtians upon the Way. Which thing the Great Maſter hearing, preſently ſent a ſufficient number of good Souldiers to the Caſtle St. Elmo there to ſet up one of the Enſigns of the ſacred Order; who coming thither, found there four and twenty great Pieces, ſome for battery, ſome for the field, which they could not in ſo great haſt remove thence.

The Turks forſake the Siege.

The Turks Fleet departing out of the Haven Marza-Moxet to the Port of St. Paul, there landed ſeven thouſand men, with Muſtapha their General, who was falſly informed, That the Chriſtians were not above three thouſand ſtrong; and from thence incouraged with the ſmall number of the Enemies (as they ſuppoſed) they marched directly toward Melita. The Chriſtians alſo marching orderly and ready to give battel, held on their way to meet them; and at the riſing of an hill both Armies meeting together, they gave a great ſhout, and withall the formoſt began the battel, where ſome few were at the firſt ſlain on both ſides. But the Chriſtians ſtill growing upon them both in number and ſtrength, the Turks finding themſelves overcharged, fled, the Chriſtians purſuing them and killing them until they came to their Gallies; where in ſtriving who ſhould get in firſt, about four hundred of them were drowned in the Sea, beſides eighteen hundred ſlain in the battel at land; and had the Chriſtian Souldiers well known the Country, they had ſlain them every Mothers Son. The Turks thus driven to their Gallies, lay there in the Haven all the next day, and moſt part of the night following, but little before day, upon the ſhooting off of a great Piece, the ſign of their departure, they all hoiſed Sail for Gertia, leaving the Iſland of Malta ſore impoveriſhed and waſted. In this Siege the Turks loſt about four and twenty thouſand, whereof moſt part were of their beſt Souldiers; and of the Chriſtians were ſlain about five thouſand, beſides two hundred and forty Knights of the Order, Men of divers Nations, but all worthy eternal Fame, whoſe dead Bodies the Great Maſter cauſed to be honourably buried. The Turks in their battery during the Siege, ſpent as is accounted, threeſcore and eighteen thouſand great ſhot.

The Turks overthrown by the Chriſtians, fly to their Gallies.

The Turks depart from Malta.

If a man do well conſider the difficulties and dangers the beſieged paſſed through in this five months Siege, the manifold labours and perils they indured in ſo many and ſo terrible aſſaults, the ſmall Relief to them ſent in ſo great diſtreſs, with the deſperate obſtinacy of ſo puiſſant an Enemy; he ſhall hardly find any place theſe many years more mightily impugned, or with greater valour and reſolution defended. The late beſieged, and now Victorious Prince, honourably acquitted of ſo great an Enemy, firſt commanded Publique Prayers with Thankſgiving to be made unto the Giver of all Victory; after that, he rewarded the Valiant, commended the reſt, and gave thanks to all, he charitably relieved the ſick and wounded, bewailed the ſpoil of the Iſland, and carefully provided for the repairing of the Breaches and Places battered; and yet in all this doing, diligently inquired after the Enemies courſe

The carefulneſs of the Great Maſter.

Courſe and purpoſe, and was not in any thing remiſs or ſecure, as in Victory moſt Men are. But becauſe ſo great harms could not without great helps in ſhort time be repaired, and the return of the proud Enemy, not without cauſe the next year feared; he by Letters to divers great Princes, and eſpecially to the Grand Priors of the Order, in divers Countries, requeſted help; amongſt whom George, Grand Prior of Germany, and Founder of the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, was one of the chiefeſt. The Copy of which Letters, becauſe they briefly contain what we have before in this Hiſtory at large written, I have thought good here to ſet down, that the ſame may in ſuch order be read, as it was by the Great Maſter himſelf reported.

Brother Valetta, Maſter of the Hoſpital of Jeruſalem, to the Reverend and Religious our well beloved Brother in Chriſt George of Hohenheim, called Bombaſt, Prior of our Priory in Almaine, Greeting.

The Great Maſters Letters to the Grand Prior of Almaine, concerning the manner of the Turks proceedings in the Siege of Malta.

Although we doubt not but that by the Letters and Relation of many, you already underſtand of the coming of the Turks to invade theſe Iſlands, or rather utterly to ſubvert our Society; and the happily and heavenly Victory by us obtained of it; yet if the ſame things ſhall by our Letters alſo be brought unto you, we have thought the ſame will be unto you a thing much more pleaſing. For ſeeing that we are certainly perſwaded, that you in this no leſs happy than wholeſome ſucceſs will give moſt hearty thanks to Almighty God, and that the fruit of this good ſhall moſt of all redound unto you, for the honour which you bear in our Order; we have willingly determined to participate this our joy with you, and plainly and openly to proteſt, that we attribute this ſo notable and wonderful a Victory to our Lord Chriſt Jeſus, the greateſt King of all Kings, and Author of all good things. Which that you may the more worthily and willingly do, we will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an Hiſtory) but briefly and in few words. Sultan Solyman the moſt mortal Enemy of the Chriſtian Name, and eſpecially of our Society, not contented to have ſpoyled us of the moſt famous Iſland of the Rhodes, the Caſtle of Tripolis, and almoſt whatſoever we had elſe; commanded a great and ſtrong Fleet to be made ready againſt us; which departing from Conſtantinople the one and twentieth day of March, arrived here the eighteenth day of May; Which Fleet conſiſted of almoſt two hundred and fifty Gallies, Galliots, and other Ships. The number of the Enemies that bear Arms, according to the truth, was about forty thouſand more or leſs: General of the Land Forces, was Muſtapha Baſſa; and of the Fleet, Pial Baſſa was Admiral; who having ſpent a few days in landing their Forces, viewing the places, pitching their Tents, and ſetting things in order (as the manner of War is) they began firſt to aſſail the Caſtle of Saint Elmo (ſituate in the mouth of the Haven) with great Force and moſt furious Battery. Which when they had many days done without intermiſſion, and had opened a great part of the Wall, and with all kind of Weapons aſſaulted the Breach; yet was it by the Valour and Prowes of our Knights, and other worthy Souldiers, kept and defended by the ſpace of thirty five days with the great loſs and ſlaughter of the Enemy; although the Caſtle it ſelf, in the Judgment of many, ſeemed not poſſible to be but a few days defended againſt ſo great a Force. At length the four and twentieth day of June, when our Men could no longer endure the multitude and fury of the Enemy, environed and ſhut up both by Sea and Land, and deſtitute of all help, the Caſtle was taken by the Turks; thoſe few of our Men which were left, being all ſlain. Of which Victory they being proud, began to beſiege the Caſtle and Town of Saint Michael, and this new City, eſpecially at the Caſtle and Portugal Bulwark; and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great Artillery and Warlike Engins, they began in divers places at once to batter and beat down the Walls. Which Siege, the dreadful Army of the Turks by Sea and Land, made to be moſt fearful and terrible, with ſuch huge great Ordnance, as the like for bigneſs and force was in no place to be ſeen; day and night thundring out their Iron and Stone Shot, five and ſeven hands about; wherewith not the thickeſt Walls, but even the very Mountains themſelves might have been beaten down and overthrown; by fury whereof, the Walls in many places were ſo battered, that a Man might eaſily have entred as on plain ground. Where, when the barbarous Enemies had with wonderful Force and hideous Outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, ſo often were they with great Slaughter and Diſhonour repulſed and beaten back, many of their Men ſlain or wounded. Their Generals, as well at Sea as Land, after that they had in ſo many places, with all their Forces in almoſt four months Siege and Aſſault, with exceeding fury in vain attempted the Breaches, and loſt the greateſt part of their old Souldiers, eſpecially Winter now coming on, wherein all Wars by Law of Nations ought to ceaſe; thought of nothing elſe but of departure, or rather of flight; which the coming of Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admiral of the King of Spain his Fleet, with ten thouſand ſelect Souldiers (amongſt whom were at the leaſt two hundred and fourteen of our Knights, and many other noble and valiant Gentlemen; which only with a Chriſtian Zeal, voluntarily met together from divers parts of the World to help and relieve us) cauſed them to haſten. So have you ſummarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turks Fleet, and the Victory by us (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It ſhall be your part to conſider and conjecture, in what ſtate our Order and this Iſland now ſtandeth, into what poor eſtate we are brought, how many things we want; wherein except we be relieved by the help and aid of our Brethren, eſpecially ſuch as you are, as we well hope, and aſſuredly believe we ſhall, our State will quickly take end. Fare you well. From Malta the ninth of October, 1565.

The Great Maſter thus delivered of ſo great a Siege, and bountifully relieved by the Chriſtian Princes, and the great Commanders of his Order; ſpeedily repaired the Breaches and places battered, and with new Fortifications ſtrengthned thoſe places as he had by the late paſſed dangers perceived to be moſt ſubject to the Enemies Force.

After the return of the Turks Fleet to Conſtantinople, Solyman being exceeding angry with the Governor of the Iſland of Chios his Tributary, as well for that he had during the late Siege of Malta, had intelligence with the Great Maſter, and revealed unto him many of the Turks Deſigns; as alſo for detaining of two years Tribute, which was yearly ten thouſand Ducats; and had alſo neglected to ſend his wonted Preſents to the great Baſſaes, who therefore the more incenſed the Tyrant; commanded Pial Baſſa his Admiral to make ready his Fleet, and by Force or Policy to take that fruitful and pleaſant Iſland wholly into his own hand. Who without delay, with a Fleet of eighty Gallies the fifteenth day of April in the year 1566, being then Eaſter day, 1566 arrived at Chios. The chief Men of the Iſland upon ſight of the Fleet, forthwith ſent Embaſſadors to the Baſſa with Preſents, courteouſly offering unto him the Haven, and whatſoever elſe he ſhould require. Pial with great kindneſs accepted their offer, and preſently poſſeſſed himſelf of the Haven in three places; and afterward landing, ſent for the Governor of the City and twelve of the chief Citizens to come unto him, as if he had ſome ſpecial matter to confer with him about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for Malta or Italy. Who having a little conferred together, went to him with great fear; and that not without cauſe; for as ſoon as they were come before him, he commanded them to be laid hold upon and caſt faſt into Irons; which done, the Souldiers forthwith took the Town Hall, and without reſiſtance pulling down the Towns Enſign, (wherein was the Picture of Saint George with a red Croſs) inſtead thereof ſet up one of the Turks; the like whereof was done with great rejoycing of the Turks through the whole Iſland. After that, they rifled the Churches, and again conſecrated them after their Mahometan manner. The Governor of the City, and the Senators, with their Families, the Baſſa ſent in five Ships to Conſtantinople; as for the Vulgar People, they were at choice, either there to tarry ſtill, or depart, as beſt ſtood with their liking. And ſo the Baſſa, when he had there placed a new Governor, one of the Turks, with a ſtrong Garriſon, and ſet up the Mahometan Superſtition in that moſt fertile Iſland, departed thence for Italy; where ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Apulia, he did exceeding much harm in burning and deſtroying the Country Villages, and carrying away of the poor People into Captivity; and ſo returned.

The Iſland of Chios taken by the Turks.

At this time the Kingdom of Hungary was moſt miſerably rent in pieces by the Lieutenants and Captains of Solyman and Maximilian the Emperor, and John the Vayvod of Tranſylvania Solymans Vaſſal; who grieved with the harms done unto him by the Emperors Captains, whereof himſelf was the cauſe, and vainly hoping to have obtained at Solymans Hands the greateſt part of the Kingdom of Hungary, as had ſometime King John; ceaſed not continually to ſollicite him to come himſelf in Perſon to make a full Conqueſt of the Reliques of Hungary, yet holden by the Emperor and ſome of the Hungarian Nobility; and flattering himſelf in that vain hope, called himſelf the King of Hungary; and increaſing his ſtrength by Favour unto the Nobility and Burgeſſes of the Cities of Hungary, ſummoned them, as if it had been by the appointment of Solyman his great Patron, that they ſhould all the ninth of March meet together at Thorda, to determine with him of Matters concerning their common good. Which thing as ſoon as Lazarus Suendi the Emperors Lieutenant underſtood, he forthwith by other Letters countermanded thoſe of the Vayvods; perſwading the Hungarians not to liſten to Charms of the Vayvod and the Turk, tending to their deſtruction, but rather to yield their Obedience to Maximilian the Chriſtian Emperor, whoſe purpoſe was by the aid of the Chriſtian Princes, to protect and preſerve them in Peace. And hereby it came to paſs, that the remainder of this ſore ſhaken Kingdom, divided into Factions, and diverſly carried, according to their Affection, ſome to the one ſide, ſome to the other, began afreſh to work one anothers confuſion, which fitly ſerved the Turks to incroach more and more upon them; Who at the ſame time ſurpriſed the Town of Ainaſch (the Captain whereof, with certain of the Garriſon Souldiers being gon about their buſineſs to Agria) and put to the Sword all them that they found in the Town. They thought alſo to have taken the ſtrong Town of Sigeth, but were by the valiant Count Nicholaus Serinus Governor thereof, couragiouſly encountred, and after four hours hard Fight overthrown and put to Flight. Not long after, they ranged up and down the Country, and ſet in Booties as far as Jula and Rab, and did the Country People much harm. For which cauſe, Maximilian the Emperor about the later end of May brake up the Aſſembly of the Empire then holden at Auguſta, and began carefully to proviſe things needful for the War; appointing his Captains for the raiſing of ſuch Forces in Germany, as were but a little before granted unto him by the Princes and States of the Empire, in their late Aſſembly; but went himſelf to Vienna. For it was told him (as the truth was) that Solyman now in his extream Age was with a mighty Army ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and marching through Bulgaria and Servia, was come directly to Belgrade; where John the Vayvod of Tranſylvania met him, and kiſſing his Hand, had commended himſelf and all his ſtate unto his Protection. At which time Suendi the Emperors Lieutenant laid hard Siege to the Town of Huſth in the Borders of Tranſylvania. The Baſſa of Buda at the ſame time on the other ſide, by commandment of Solyman, with eight thouſand Turks and five and twenty Pieces of great Ordnance beſieging Palotta (a ſtrong Town about eight miles from Rab) had with continual Battery by the ſpace of eight days brought the ſame into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thariger. But hearing of the approach of George Count of Helffenſtein, ſent by the Emperor with certain Companies of Germans to relieve the ſame, he roſe in ſuch haſte from the Siege, that he left certain of his great Ordnance and a great part of his Baggage behind him, and retired towards Alba Regalis. The Count having relieved the Town, cauſed the Breaches to be forthwith repaired, and with a new Supply ſtrengthned the old Garriſon. Thus was a moſt lamentable War at once begun in divers places of Hungary. After that, the Count of Helffenſtein, ſtrengthned by the coming of the Count Salma with certain Companies from Rab, departed from Palotta, and came to Veſprinium a City about two miles off, then holden by the Turks; which City he took by force the laſt of June, and left not a Turk alive therein, becauſe that they a few days before had cruelly ſlain certain Chriſtians whom they had taken Priſoners. So leaving ſtrong Garriſons both in Veſprinium and Palotta, they returned to Rab. Shortly after, the Count Salma laid Siege to Tatta a ſtrong Town, otherwiſe called Dotis, betwixt Rab and Comara, which at length he took by Aſſault the eight and twentieth day of July, and ſlew all the Turks, except fifty, which flying into one of the Towers of the Caſtle, yielded upon compoſition; amongſt whom was the late Governor of Veſprinium, and the Governor of this place, with the Baſſa of Buda his nigh Kinſman, who were all preſently ſent Priſoners to Vienna. So the Count following the Courſe of his Victory (the terror of his former good Fortune running before him into the Turks ſtrongeſt Holds) was on his way to have beſieged Geſtes a Town near to Palotta; when the Turks there in Garriſon upon the firſt ſight of his Army, left all and fled out at the farther ſide of the Town, to Strigonium. After whoſe example other of the Turks Garriſons in Wirba, Tſchokika, and Sambok, Caſtles thereabouts, ſet fire on that they could not carry, and followed their Fellows to Strigonium alſo. The Emperor underſtanding of the good ſucceſs of his Captains, cauſed publique Prayers with thankſgiving to Almighty God to be made through all the Churches thereabouts.

Count Serinus Governor of the ſtrong Town of Sigeth and the Country thereabout, certainly advertiſed of the coming of Solyman, ſent Caſparus Alapianus and Nicholas Cobach, two of his Captains, with a thouſand Foot and five hundred Horſe, to lie in wait for the Forerunners of the Turks Army; who drawing near unto the place where theſe Turks lay, not far from Quinque Eccleſiæ, ſuddainly in the ſhutting in of the next day ſet upon them, doubting no ſuch matter, and put them in ſuch fear, that they diſorderly fled, ſome one way, ſome another, and were moſt of them ſlain or wounded by the Hungarians in their Flight. Hali Beg one of the Turks great Sanzacks and Leader of that Company, ſore wounded, and ſeeking to ſave himſelf by Flight in the Mariſhes, there periſhed; his Son and many other notable Men amongſt the Turks, were there taken and carried Priſoners to Sigeth. The Spoil the Hungarians there took was exceeding great; for beſides Plate and Coin, whereof they found good ſtore, they took eight Camels, five Mules, threeſcore Horſes, and ſix Carts laden with all manner of Spoil, and many Garments of great price; wherein the Gentlemen attired, returned to Sigeth in great Bravery, with two fair red Enſigns of the Enemies.

A great Prey.

Maximilian the Emperor long before advertiſed of Solymans purpoſe for the Conqueſt of the remainder of Hungary; to withſtand ſo mighty an Enemy, had beſide the Forces raiſed in his own Dominions, procured great Aid both of the States of the Empire and other Chriſtian Princes, which about this time met together at Rab. Firſt there repaired thither four Legions of German Footmen, and upwards of twenty thouſand Horſemen, with four thouſand Hungarians; the Duke of Savoy ſent thither four hundred Argoletiers; and many noble Gentlemen out of divers parts of Europe reſorted thither, to ſerve the Emperor in thoſe Wars, of their own Charge; eſpecially the Knights of Malta; and out of Italy, Proſper Columna and Angelus Cæſius; out of France, Guiſe the Grand Prior, Briſſack, and Lanſack, who but a little before were going to Malta, of purpoſe to have ſerved there if the Turks Fleet had come thither again, as it was reported it would; but underſtanding that it came not, returned directly into Hungary, with certain other Knights of the Order. Many alſo of the Princes and free Cities of Italy declared their good Will toward the Emperor in this War; ſome ſending him Men, as did Coſmus Medices Duke of Florence, who ſent thither of his own Charge three thouſand Footmen; ſome Mony, as Mantua, Genoa and Luca. Thither came alſo Alphonſus Duke of Ferrara with a gallant Company of noble Gentlemen, and other his Followers. Beſides which Land Forces, the Emperor had alſo provided upon the River of Danubius twelve Gallies, and thirty other Ships for Burthen, ſo made, as that the Men could not be hurt with the Turks Arrows; wherein were embarqued three thouſand Souldiers, moſt part Italians, under the Conduct of Philippus Flachius a German and one of the Knights of Malta, who was afterward received into the number of the Princes of the Empire.

The Turks with much labour make a Bridge over the great River of Dravus.

Solyman coming to the River Dravus, commanded a Bridge to be made over that great River, and the deep Fens on the farther ſide of the River towards Sigeth, for the tranſporting of his great Army; a Work of ſuch difficulty, that being thrice unfortunately begun, it was again given over, as a thing almoſt impoſſible. Wherewith Solyman was ſo moved, that in his rage he ſwore to hang up the Baſſa that had the charge of that work, if he did not with as much ſpeed as was poſſible, bring it to perfection. Whereupon the Work was again begun, all the Boats that were to be found in the River taken up, and Timber for the purpoſe brought from far, for the making of that Bridge. In this Work were imployed not the Vulgar People only, of the Country which was Tributary to the Turks, but the Gentlemen themſelves alſo, were by the imperious Turk (now commanding for his Life) enforced to lay their Fingers to work day and night without ceaſing, until the Bridge (which before was thought ſcarce poſſible to have been made) was by the reſtleſs induſtry and labour of ſuch a multitude of Men, in the ſpace of ten days brought to perfection. Wherein the ſeverity the barbarous Tyrant uſeth towards his Subjects, is worth noting; whereby he extorteth from them more than is almoſt poſſible for Men to perform; ſo that it is not to be marvelled, that he hath ſo good ſucceſs in whatſoever he taketh in hand. Over this Bridge (a mile in length) paſſed Solyman, and encamped at a place called Muhatchz, where he ſtayed certain days, until his Army was all come over. The laſt of July, ninety thouſand Turks (the Vantguard of Solymans Army) came before Sigeth, and encamped within a mile of the Town; after whom ſhortly after followed a hundred thouſand more out of Solymans Camp; of whom many in approaching the Town, were ſlain with great Shot out of the Caſtle; the reſt for all that encamped themſelves as near unto the Town as they could, and began the Siege.

The Turks encamp before Sigeth.

The Town of Sigeth is ſtrongly ſituate in a Mariſh on the North ſide of Dravus upon the Frontiers of Dalmatia, commanding all the Country round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a ſtrong Bulwark againſt the Turks, for entring farther into the Country that way toward Stiria. In this Town was Governor Nicholaus Serinus, commonly called the Count, a valiant Man, and a mortal Enemy of the Turks, with a Garriſon of two thouſand three hundred good Souldiers; who ſeeing the huge Army of the Turks, called together into the Caſtle, the Captains of the Garriſon, and the chief of the Citizens; where ſtanding in the midſt of them, he ſpake unto them as followeth;

Count Serinus his comfortable and reſolute ſpeech to his Souldiers.

You ſee (ſaid he) how we are on every ſide beſet with the Multitude of our Enemies, wherein reſteth their chief hope; but let not us be thereof afraid or diſcouraged; for that Victory dependeth not on a confuſed Multitude of heartleſs Men, but on the Power of our God, who hath by a few at his pleaſure many times overthrown the mighty Armies of the Proud, and will not in the midſt of theſe dangers now forſake us, if we putting our Truſt and Confidence in him, do what beſeemeth valiant and couragious Men. Beſides that, our juſt Cauſe, with the ſtrength of the place we hold, our own Valour, and the help of our Friends, who I aſſure my ſelf will not fail us at our need, countervaileth their confuſed Multitude, forced together by their imperious

Commanders out of far Countries, and whatſoever elſe the proud Tyrant hath brought with him into the Field. Wherefore let us all as becometh valiant Men, for the truth of our Religion, and for the honour of our Prince and Country, live and die together; knowing whatſoever befals, that to a Life ſo loſt, beſide never dying Fame, belongeth a moſt aſſured hope of Joy and Felicity. As for my ſelf, I am reſolved, and ſo I hope are you alſo, that as I am a Chriſtian, and free born, ſo will I (by the Grace of God) in the ſame Faith and Freedom end my days. Neither ſhall the proud Turk, ſo long as I am able to hold up this hand, have ever power to command over me, or the ground whereon I ſtand.

This ſaid, he firſt took himſelf a ſolemn Oath to perform what he had promiſed, and perſwaded the reſt to take the like; which done, every Man returned to the place of his charge.

Solyman cometh into the Camp at Sigeth.

The fifth of Auguſt Solyman encamped within a mile of the Town, and the next day after came himſelf into the Camp, at whoſe coming the great Ordnance and ſmall Shot ſo thundred out of the Turks Camp, as if Heaven and Earth ſhould have gon together, the Turks after their wonted manner crying aloud their Alla, Alla, Alla, and the Chriſtians anſwering them with the Name of Jeſus. The ſeventh of Auguſt the Turks caſt up a great Mount, and thereon planted certain great Pieces of Ordnance. The next day following they began moſt terribly to batter the new Town in three places, and with incredible Labor caſt up a Mount in the midſt of the Mariſh, as it were in the Town Ditch, from whence they the next day with certain Pieces of great Artillery day and night battered the inner Caſtle of the Town without any intermiſſion, and did great harm both to the Caſtle and the Defendants. The Count perceiving the new City to be now ſo laid open with the fury of the Turks Battery, as that it was not poſſible to be defended, cauſed his Souldiers to ſet it all on fire, and to retire into the old. The tenth of Auguſt the Turks furiouſly battered the old Town in three places, and brought their Ordnance into the new Town; and with Timber, Earth and Rubbiſh made a Bridge, the more commodiouſly to go over the Mariſh. For the ſpeedier accompliſhment whereof, all the Turks were compelled to lay to their Hands, and to carry Wood, Fagots, Earth, and ſuch like things without ceaſing. There might a Man have ſeen all the Fields full of Camels, Horſes, and of the Turks themſelves, like Emmets, carrying Wood, Earth, Stones, or one thing or other to fill up the Mariſh; ſo was there with wonderful Labour two plain ways made through the deep Fen, from the Town to the Caſtle; where the Janizaries, defended from the great Shot with Sacks of Wool and ſuch like things, did with the Multitude of their ſmall Shot ſo overwhelm the Defendants, that they could not againſt thoſe places without moſt manifeſt danger ſhew themſelves upon the Walls. So that what by their vigilant Induſtry, and the fury of the great Artillery, the Turks (though not without great loſs) by force entred the old Town the nineteenth of Auguſt, uſing in their Victory ſuch celerity, that they ſlew many of the moſt valiant Defendants before they were able to recover the ſafeguard of the Caſtle. Both the Towns thus loſt, and ſo many worthy Men ſlain, not without cauſe brought great heavineſs upon the reſt which were in the Caſtle with the Count. The Turks poſſeſſed of the old Town, the next day planted their Battery againſt the Caſtle in four places, and with Fagots, Rubbiſh, and Earth, made two plain ways unto it, ſtill filling up the Mariſh; and having with continual Battery made it aſſaultable, the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt they began fiercely to aſſail the Breaches; but when they had loſt many of their Men, and done what they could, they were enforced with ſhame to retire. In this Aſſault, amongſt many other of their beſt Souldiers, was loſt one of their great Baſſaes alſo.

The defendants burn the new Town.

The Turks win the old Town.

Solyman dieth of the bloody Flux.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Solyman far ſpent with years, and diſtempered with his long travel, fell ſick of a Looſneſs in his Belly, and for the better recovery of his Health, retired himſelf (the Siege yet continuing) to Quinque Eccleſiæ a City near to Sigeth, where ſhortly after he died of the Bloody Flux the fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord 1566, when he had lived ſeventy ſix years, and thereof reigned forty ſix. He was of Stature tall, of Feature ſlender, long Necked, his Colour pale and wan, his Noſe long and hooked, of Nature ambitious and bountiful, more faithful of his Word and Promiſe than were for moſt part the Mahometan Kings his Progenitors, wanting nothing worthy of ſo great an Empire, but that wherein all happineſs is contained, Faith in Chriſt Jeſus. Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa (who commanded all in Solymans abſence) fearing the inſolency of the Janizaries, and leſt ſome Tumult ſhould ariſe in the Camp, if his death ſhould be known, concealed it by all means, and to be ſure of them that were of others beſt able to make certain report thereof, cauſed his Phyſicians and Apothecaries to be ſecretly ſtrangled, and by a truſty Meſſenger, ſent in Poſt, certified Selymus (Solymans only Son, and his Father in Law, then lying in Magneſia) of the death of his Father, willing him in haſte to repair to Conſtantinople, to take poſſeſſion of the Empire; and that done, forthwith to come to the Army in Hungary. But this could not be ſo ſecretly done, but that the Janizaries began to miſtruſt the matter; which Muhamet Baſſa quickly perceiving, cauſed the dead Body of Solyman in his wonted Apparel to be brought into his Tent ſitting upright in his Horſe-Litter, as if he had been ſick of the Gout, his wonted diſeaſe, and ſo ſhewing him to the Janizaries, both deceived and contented them, and ſo went forward with the Siege.

Muhamet Baſſa concealeth the death of Solyman.

The great Bulwark undermined and ſet on fire by the Janizaries.

The Janizaries having in the laſt Aſſault loſt many of their Fellows, began now to undermine the greateſt Bulwark of the Caſtle, from which the Defendants with their great Ordnance did moſt annoy them; wherein they uſed ſuch diligence, that the fifth of September they with Gunpowder and other light matter provided for that purpoſe, had ſet all the Bulwark on a light fire; and by that means poſſeſſed thereof, with all their force aſſailed the Bulwark next unto the Caſtle Gate, from whence they were with great ſlaughter twice repulſed by the Count. But the raging Fire ſtill increaſing, he was enforced with thoſe which were yet left alive, to retire into the inner Caſtle, wherein were but two great Pieces, and fourteen others of ſmall force. Thus the Turks ſtill prevailing, and taking one place after another, the ſeventh of September they furiouſly aſſaulted the little Caſtle, whereinto they caſt ſuch abundance of Fire, that in ſhort time it caught hold on the Buildings, and ſet all on fire. The Count thus aſſailed by the Enemy without, and worſe diſtreſſed with the Fire within, which ſtill increaſing, left no place for him in ſafety to retire unto, went went into his Chamber, where putting on a rich new Suit of Apparel, came preſently out again with his Sword and Targuet in his hand; and finding his Souldiers with chearful Countenance and their Weapons in their hands, attending his coming, ſpake unto them theſe few his laſt words: The hard Fortune of this ſinful Kingdom hath together with our own overtaken us; but let us, noble Hearts, with patience endure what is to us by God aſſigned. You know what we have before promiſed, which hitherto God be thanked we have accordingly performed, and now let us with like reſolution perform this laſt. The place you ſee is not longer to be kept, the devouring Fire groweth ſo ſtill upon us and we in number are but few; wherefore let us as becometh valiant Men break out into the utter Caſtle, there to die in the midſt of our Enemies, to live afterwards with God for ever; I will be the firſt that will go out, follow you me like Men. This ſaid, with his Sword and Targuet in his Hand, without any other Armor, calling thrice upon the Name of Jeſus, he iſſued out at the Caſtle Gate, with the reſt following him; where valiantly fighting with the Janizaries upon the Bridge; and having ſlain ſome of them, he was firſt wounded in two places of his Body with ſmall Shot, and at laſt ſtruck in the Head with an unlucky ſhot, fell down dead; the Turk for joy crying out their wonted word Alla. The reſt of the Souldiers in flying back again into the Caſtle, were all ſlain by the Turks, except ſome few, whom ſome of the Janizaries in regard of their Valour, by putting their Caps upon their Heads, ſaved from the fury of the reſt. In this Siege, the Turks (as they themſelves reported) loſt ſeven thouſand Janizaries, and twenty eight thouſand other Souldiers, beſide many voluntary Men not enrolled in their Muſter-Books, and three of their great Baſſaes. Serinus his Head was preſently cut off, and the next day (with the Heads of the other ſlain Chriſtians) ſet upon a Pole, for all the Army to gaze upon. After that it was taken down, and by Muhamet the great Baſſa ſent to Muſtapha the Baſſa of Buda his Kinſman, who by two Country Men, ſent it wrapped in a red Scarf covered with a fair linnen Cloth, to Count Salma in the Emperors Camp at Rab, with this taunting Letter thus directed.

Muhamet Baſſa to Eccius Salma, Greeting.

The Baſſats quipping Letter to Count Salma.

IN token of my love, behold, here I ſend thee the Head of a moſt reſolute and valiant Captain thy Friend, the remainder of his Body I have honeſtly buried, as became ſuch a Man. Sigeth biddeth thee farwell for ever.

The death of this noble and valiant Captain was much lamented of all the Chriſtian Army, and his Head with many tears by his Son Balthaſar honourably buried amongſt his Anceſtors in Tſchacaturna, his own Caſtle. Solyman at his coming with this mighty Army into Hungary, had purpoſed before his return, if he had not been by death prevented, to have conquered both the remainder of the Kingdom of Hungary, and to have again attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accompliſhing of which his Deſigns, he at his firſt coming ſent Parthaus Baſſa, with forty thouſand Turks to help the Baſſa of Temeſware and the Tartars, in the behalf of the Vayvod, to beſiege the ſtrong Town of Gyula, ſituate upon the Lake Zarkad in the Confines of Tranſylvania, not far from whence Suendi had but in Auguſt before overthrown the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the aid of the Vayvod, and ſlain of them ten thouſand. And at the ſame time he ſent Muſtapha Baſſa of Boſna, and Carambeius, with a great Power to Alba Regalis; who joyning with the Baſſa of Buda, ſhould keep the Emperor Maximilian buſie, whilſt he in the mean time beſiegeth Sigeth, as is before declared. Parthaus Baſſa coming to Gyula, and laying hard Siege to the Town, was ſtill notably repulſed by Nicholaus Keretſchen, Governor of the Town; inſomuch, that in a ſally he had certain Pieces of his great Ordnance taken from him by the Defendants, and the reſt cloied. But this brave Captain, not to have been conſtrained by all that the Baſſa could do, was at laſt perſwaded by his Kinſman George Bebicus (from whom Suendi had a little before taken certain Caſtles, for revolting from the Emperor to the Vayvod) for a great ſum of Mony to deliver up the Town to the Baſſa; which he did, covenanting beſide his Reward, That the Souldiers ſhould with Bag and Baggage in ſafety depart; all which was frankly granted; who were not gon paſt a mile out of the Town, but they were ſet upon by the Turks, and all ſlain except ſome few which crept into the Reeds growing in the Mariſh faſt by, and ſo eſcaped. The Traitor himſelf expecting his Reward, was carried in Bonds to Conſtantinople; where afterward, upon complaint made how hardly he had uſed certain Turks whom he had ſometime taken Priſoners, he was by the commandment of Selymus, who ſucceeded Solyman, thruſt into an Hogſhead ſtruck full of Nails with the Points inward, with this inſcription upon it, Here receive the Reward of thy Avarice and Treaſon. Gyula thou ſoldſt for Gold; if thou be not faithful to Maximilian thy Lord, neither wilt thou be to me; and ſo the Hogſhead cloſed faſt up, he was therein rolled up and down until he therein miſerably died.

A Traitor well rewarded.

The Governor of Alba Regalis taken.

The Turks ſharp anſwer to the Spaniard.

The Emperors Camp then lying at Rab, and the Baſſa of Buda and Boſna with thirty thouſand Turks not far off at Alba Regalis, and many hot skirmiſhes paſſing between them; it fortuned that the fifth of September the Turks in hope to have done ſome great piece of ſervice upon the Chriſtians, came forth of the Camp in great number, and by chance light upon a few Forragers of the Army, of whom they ſlew ſome; the reſt flying, raiſed an Alarm in the Camp; whereupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with ſome others iſſuing out, purſuing the Turks, ſlew divers of them; in which purſuit George Thuriger deſcrying the Governor of Alba Regalis, a Man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilſt he lived, fiercely purſued him in the midſt of the flying Enemies, and never left him until he had taken him Priſoner; and at his return preſenting him to the Emperor, was for that good ſervice Knighted, and rewarded with a Chain of Gold. There was by chance then preſent a Spaniard, who had heard him ſay openly at Conſtantinople, That he alone with his own power was able to vanquiſh the German King (by which name the Turks commonly term the Emperor;) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the preſence of the Emperor, ſtill urging him as it were to ſay ſomething for himſelf, the Turk anſwered him in theſe few words following: Such is the chance of War, thou ſeeſt me now a Priſoner, and able to do nothing.

All theſe troubles, with many more like in ſhort time to have enſued, were by the death of Solyman within a while after well appeaſed. Muhamet Baſſa after he had repaired the Breaches, and placed a Turk Governor of Sigeth, with a ſtrong Garriſon for the defence of the place and commanding of the Country, called back the diſperſed Forces, and riſing with the Army, retired toward Belgrade, carrying Solymans dead Body all the way ſitting upright in his Horſe-litter carried by Mules, giving it out that he was ſick of the Gout; which thing the Janizaries eaſily believed, knowing that he had been many years ſo carried; yet ſtill wiſhing his preſence, as always unto them fortunate, although that he were able for to do nothing.

Diſsimilis patri, Selymus regalia Sceptra
Corripit, et dira concutit arma manu.
Fœdus cum Venetis frangit (quid fœdera prosunt?)
Armataque manu Cypria regna rapit.
Inſtravit tumidum numerosis claſsibus Æquor,
Ut Naupactiacas nobilitaret aquas.

Muldavum fœda mulctavit morte Dynasten:
Et magni fines prorogat imperij.
Obruit Hispanos multa vi: Punica regna
Destruit, et regnis adijcit illa suis.
Sed nimis in venerem pronus, vinoque sepultus,
Extremum properat præcipitare diem.

Unlike his Father, Selymus fills the Throne
Breathing where ére he march't, Destruction:
His sacred League with Venice basely brakes,
And (arm'd with power) the Syrian kingdomes takes;
With a stupendious Fleet covers the Sea,
To be a Witneſs to his Infamy.

And to his Throne to add Moldavia
Their noble Vayvod butcherly do's slay:
And when the Spanish powers were overthrown,
They, and the Tunis Scepters were his owne:
But spent with wine, with women, and with play
Th'effeminate Prince spur'd on his fatall day.

The LIFE of

SELYMUS,

The Second of that NAME,

Fifth Emperor of the Turks.

SElymus, the only Son of Solyman, then left alive, by Letters from Mahomet Baſſa underſtanding of the death of his Father, haſted from Cutai, a City of Galatia not far from Ancyra, towards Conſtantinople; and coming to Scutary, was from thence by Boſtanges Baſſa of the Court, conducted over the Strait to Conſtantinople; where by him and Scander Baſſa (Selymus his Son in law, and then Solymans Vicegerent) he was conveyed into the Imperial Palace the three and twentieth of September, in the year 1566. and there poſſeſſed of his Fathers Seat, was by the Janizaries there preſent, ſaluted Emperor. He was about the age of forty two years when he began to Reign, a man of an unconſtant and haſty diſpoſition, wholly given to wantonneſs and exceſs; ſo that he never went to Wars himſelf, but performed them altogether by his Lieutenants, contrary to the charge of Selymus his Grandfather, given by him to his Father Solyman, whereof he was never unmindful. The next day he came abroad, and ſhewed himſelf in his Majeſty; and in the Temple of Sophia, after the manner of the Turkiſh Superſtition, cauſed ſolemn Prayers and Sacrifices to be made for his Father; which done, he gave unto the Janizaries a Larges of 100000 Sultanines, with promiſe to augment their Wages. And all things being now in readineſs for his intended Journey, he with a goodly Retinue ſet forward from Conſtantinople the ſeven and twentieth of September; and the twentieth of October a little from Belgrade met the Army coming from Sigeth, gallantly marching under their Enſigns, with the dead Body of Solyman, whom the Souldiers generally ſuppoſed to have been yet living, but troubled with the Gout, to have kept his Horſe-litter, as his manner was to travel. Selymus alighting, came in his Mourning Attire to the Horſe-litter, looked upon the dead Body of his Father, kiſſed it, and wept over it, as did all the other great Baſſaes alſo. And that the death of Solyman might then be made known to all men, the Enſigns were preſently let fall, and trailed upon the ground, a dead March ſounded, and heavy ſilence commanded to be kept through all the Camp. Shortly after, Selymus was with the great applauſe of the whole Army proclaimed Emperor, his Enſigns advanced, and every one of the great Commanders of the Army, in their degree admitted to kiſs his hand. So marching forward, he returned again to Conſtantinople the two and twentieth of November; but thinking to have entred his Palace (which they commonly call The Seraglio) he was by the diſcontented Janizaries, but now come from the Wars, prohibited ſo to do; they with great Inſolency demanding of him a greater Donative, together with the confirmation both of their antient and new Priviledges, before they would ſuffer him to enter. Againſt which their great preſumption, the Viſier Baſſaes, together with the Aga, oppoſing themſelves, and ſeeking by all means to appeaſe them, were by them foully entreated, and well rapped about the Pates with the ſtocks of their Calivers; but eſpecially the two great Baſſaes, Mahomet and Pertau, as the chief Authors that their Lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which ſo ſudden and unexpected a Mutiny of his new Souldiers, Selymus not a little troubled, and calling unto him the Aga (or Captain of the Janizaries) demanded of him the cauſe thereof; who with tears trickling down his cheeks for grief, told him, That it was for mony. Which by Selymus now promiſed unto them, together with the confirmation of their Liberties; and the Aga with his words and heavy countenance moſt earneſtly intreating them, not to blemiſh the ancient Reputation of their wonted Loyalty with ſo foul a diſorder, nor to oppoſe the life of him their loving Captain, unto the heavy diſpleaſure of their angry Sultan; and farther aſſuring them, that he would not fail them in the leaſt of his promiſes, but content them to the full of their deſires; the Mutiny was at length appeaſed, the inſolent Janizaries again quieted, and Selymus into the Seraglio received. Howbeit Mahomet, chief of the Viſier Baſſaes, for certain days after went not out of his Palace, neither came (as he was wont) into the Divans, but kept himſelf cloſe, for fear of ſome greater miſchief from them. This Tumult thus overpaſſed, and all again well quieted, Selymus with all Royal Solemnity buried his Father in a Chappel, which he after the manner of the Mahometan Kings, had in his life time moſt ſtately built, with a Colledge and an Hoſpital. Where alſo by his ſide is to be ſeen the Tomb of Roxolana his beſt beloved Wife, and of certain others his murthered Children; and by him hangeth his Scimitar, in token that he died in Wars; an honour not commonly granted to the Mahometan Princes. The Revenues aſſigned of the Country about Sigeth, as that which from the Chriſtians, at the time of his death, were given to the maintenance of his Houſe by him built of devotion; which for the Magnificence thereof, exceed all the reſt before built by the Mahometan Kings and Emperors, except thoſe which were the Buildings of Mahomet the Great, and Bajazet the Second. It was by many thought that Solyman was in good time by death cut off, as as purpoſing that year to have wintred in Hungary, and the year following to have done great matters againſt the Chriſtians both by Sea and Land.

Troubles in Hungary.

The Baſſa of Buda deſirous to farther the Peace.

1567. The great Army of the Turks thus drawn out of Hungary by the death of Solyman, in ſome part aſſwaged, but altogether appeaſed not the endleſs Troubles of that unfortunate Kingdom. Maximilian the Emperor on the one ſide, and John the Vayvod of Tranſylvania with the Turks Captains on the other, renting it in pieces, as if they had ſworn the deſtruction thereof. The Vayvod deſiring to recover the ſtrong Caſtle of Tockay, in the Frontiers of his Country, but lately taken from him by Suendi the Emperors Lieutenant, laid hard ſiege to it, and had brought it to great extremity, although it was notably defended by James Raminger the Captain thereof; when ſuddenly News was brought unto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into his Country to have aided him againſt the Emperor) did with all Hoſtility after their barbarous manner, burn and deſtroy his Country before them, making havock of all things, ſo that the Country-people were glad in defence of themſelves, to take up Arms againſt them. Whereupon he forthwith left the Siege, and went to Aid his diſtreſſed Subjects againſt the Tartars, with whom he had many an hot Skirmiſh; and after much bloodſhed, at laſt overcame them, and with much ado rid himſelf of ſuch bad Gueſts. Now in the mean time, Suendi ſtrengthened with new Supplies ſent unto him from the Emperor, had taken the Caſtle of Zackmar in the Borders of Tranſylvania, and with like good Fortune had the Caſtle of Mungatz yielded unto him, and after that beſieged the Town of Huſth; ſo that the Vayvod was glad to crave Aid of the Turkiſh Emperor Selymus, under whoſe Protection he was; who preſently commanded Partau one of his chief Baſſaes, and then his great Lieutenant in Romania, to go with his Forces into Tranſylvania, to relieve them. But hearing that Embaſſadors were coming from Maximilian the Emperor, he called him back again, until he had heard the effect of that Embaſſage. At which time alſo the Baſſa of Buda enclining unto Peace, ſent Preſents to the Emperor, requeſting him to remove certain Hungarian Captains from off the Frontiers, leſt happily they ſhould interrupt the Treaty of Peace, then on both ſides purpoſed; promiſing for his part, to puniſh with death all ſuch Turks as ſhould make any further Invaſion, or raiſe any new Troubles. He writ Letters alſo to Count Salma, That he could not but marvel, to what end Maximilian the Emperor was about to intreat with his Lord and Maſter of Peace, whilſt Suendi in the mean time was raging in Tranſylvania, then under the Turks Protection; which if he proceeded ſtill to do, Selymus would thereof take occaſion (as he ſaid) to turn all his Forces that way; wherefore he requeſted him to perſwade the Emperor to take ſome more eaſie courſe in that behalf; promiſing alſo, that he would for his part effectually travel with his Maſter, to have better liking of Peace than of Wars, wiſhing him alſo to do the like. Which thing as ſoon as the Emperor underſtood, he commanded Suendi to give over the Siege of Huſth, and to keep himſelf quiet until he might by his Embaſſadors underſtand what the Great Turk purpoſed, and how he was affected towards Peace.

Maximilian and Selymus both deſirous of Peace.

Now indeed theſe two great Princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably diſſembled the matter) were both of them in heart deſirous of Peace, and that for divers great and urgent conſiderations. Maximilian for want of mony ſaw it was not poſſible for him to ſend into the field ſuch an Army the next year as he had the year before. And Selymus, beſide his other Troubles, was to take order for the appeaſing of a great and dangerous Rebellion in the fartheſt part of his Dominions in Arabia Fœlix; where the people riſing up in Arms, and having ſlain the Baſſaes and Sanzacks their Governors, were ready to have caſt off the Turkiſh Obedience; neither was he out of fear of the Perſians, ready (as was reported) to make War upon him. For which cauſes he wiſhed rather for Peace with the Emperor Maximilian, than Wars; and ſo much the more, for that it was impoſſible for him to ſend an Army of any puiſſance into Hungary, for want of many neceſſary Proviſions for the maintenance thereof, in a Country ſo much impoveriſhed by reaſon of his late Wars, wherein no Victuals were to be found for the relief of ſuch a multitude of men as he was to ſend, if he would do any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themſelves afterward reported) that Maximilian with half the Power he had in field the laſt year, might have eaſily recovered the greateſt part of that Kingdom before loſt; but well knowing his own wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether inclining to Peace; and by Count Salma advertiſed from the Baſſa of Buda, That if he would ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, with the Tribute wont to be there paid for Hungary, a Peace upon reaſonable conditions might be eaſily obtained; he reſolved upon that point. And ſo certain Meſſengers being ſent up and down to Conſtantinople to the ſame effect, it was concluded, That if the Emperor would ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople with the Tribute yet behind, and a large Commiſſion for the treaty of Peace, Selymus ſhould give them his ſafe conduct, with liberty at their pleaſure to return in caſe either of Peace or War. Which agreed upon and faithfully promiſed on both ſides, Selymus ſet at liberty the Lord Albert de Vuis, who ſix years Lieger in Conſtantinople, firſt for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now been ſtraitly impriſoned in his own houſe by the ſpace of 22 months, in ſuch ſort that neither he nor any of his houſhold could go abroad, Watch and Ward being kept both day and night about his Houſe, and his Windows alſo boorded up, to the end that he ſhould not ſo much as look out into the City or any whither elſe more than the Court of his Houſe only. So the Emperor Maximilian now reſolved to ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople with the Tribute-mony and divers other rich Gifts and Preſents, as well to the Great Turk himſelf, as the Viſier Baſſaes his Counſellors; and conſidering with himſelf, whom to be moſt fit, with Wiſdom and Honour to bring this ſo weighty a matter about, having to do with ſo barbarous, covetous, and mighty a people, made choice of the Lord Anthonius Varantius of Agria (of his Council for the Kingdom of Hungary) a Prelate of great Eſtimation, who being a man of 63 years old, beſide his great Learning, had the experience of 27 Embaſſages; wherein he always ſo diſcreetly bare himſelf, as well contented his Prince, and purchaſed unto himſelf the Reputation of a moſt grave and wiſe man; and about ten years before this Embaſſage, being ſent by the Emperor Ferdinand Embaſſador to Solyman, and now by Maximilian, to Selymus at Conſtantinople, returning with good Succeſs, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Biſhop of Agria. Unto which ſo honourable a Perſonage, having the the charge of this ſo weighty a Matter, the Emperor the more to ennoble this Embaſſage, as alſo to purchaſe the greater Credit to his Embaſſador, joyned unto him a moſt honourable Baron, called the Lord Chriſtopher Teufenbatch of Stiria, one of his Counſellors alſo for the Wars; who with full Inſtructions both taking their leave of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Presburgh) departed, and being attended upon with a great and honourable Retinue, ſet forward the firſt of July, 1567. and ſo came to Comara a ſtrong Town in Hungary, not paſt a League from the Turks Frontiers. In which place the Embaſſadors ſtayed until the ſeventh of July; and in the mean time gave knowledge of their coming unto the Governor of Strigonium, demanding for their ſecurity in the Enemies Country, to be met and received by ſome of his Garriſon; which granted, they took their Barks brought from Vienna and Poſſonium, ſufficient for their greatneſs to have carried them down the River to Belgrade, with Horſe and Waggon and their whole Furniture; and ſo entring upon the Turks Dominion about a League or a little more from Comara, being ſo far waſted by the Souldiers and Gallies of Comara, they were met by an Aga of the Turks, with a Chiaus called Becram (ſent by the Baſſa of Buda) in certain Gallies armed with Turkiſh Souldiers. To whom the Embaſſador at his landing delivered his Mind, and afterward his Perſon, giving them to underſtand, that they were with all ſafety to conduct both him and all his to the Baſſa of Buda; which they anſwered they were ready to accompliſh; and ſo courteouſly invited by the Embaſſadors, they came aboord their Bark, and there dined together. Here they that were ſent with them, leaving them in the hands of the Turks, having Licence to depart, returned to Comara; and they that day after five Leagues ſailing arrived at Strigonium, where they were by the Governor of the City denied landing; for which ſo diſhonourable a part he was afterward ſharply rebuked by the Baſſa of Buda. Yet as they lay that night upon the water, certain Turkiſh Minſtrels, to do them Honour, and to get a Largeſs, with their barbarous bawling Inſtruments played them up many a homely fit of mirth; and divers others with ſundry ſorts of vaulting and tumbling, ſometime leaping one upon anothers ſhoulders, and ſometime doing their Tricks on the Earth, all the Evening ſhewed them great ſport and paſtime. From Strigonium they with five Leagues ſailing came to Buda, leaving behind them the Caſtle of Vicegrade, two Leagues diſtant from Strigonium. In this City of Buda lieth the great Baſſa by whom all Hungary, with the Provinces thereto belonging (in the Turks Power) is governed. This City, ſometime the Regal Seat of the Hungarian Kings, is ſituate upon a little Hill on the South ſide of Danubius, having in the South point thereof a Caſtle, much higher than the City, and of a moſt brave Proſpect; in which Caſtle lieth a Captain with a Garriſon of five hundred Souldiers (as the Turks ſay) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogether ſo many; it is the loſs of his Head to ſtir out of his Charge; and beſide, he hath Commiſſion to deny the Baſſa himſelf Entrance, unleſs he come very ſlightly accompanied; ſo jealous are the Turks of that Caſtle, as if the State of Hungary depended thereon. Herein ſtandeth the Kings Palace, which taketh up moſt part of the place, greatly beautified by Matthias, and ſhewing outwardly to have been a very ſtately thing; for there are in it both large Halls and fair Galleries and Chambers built in moſt Royal manner; where amongſt other Rooms, the Embaſſadors found a decayed Library full of Pictures and Latin Titles of Books; all which things when they preſent themſelves to the Eyes of the Chriſtian beholders, offer a juſt conſideration of noble and reverend Antiquity, and withall, ſtrike into their hearts a certain compaſſion joyned with Horrour, to ſee the Renowned Glory of ſo many great Kings all waſted and brought to nothing. The next morning the Embaſſadors went to ſpeak with the Baſſa; whoſe Houſe was reaſonable fair (conſidering their guiſe and cuſtom, not much delighting in the beauty of their private buildings) ſituate upon the River ſide at the bottom of the Hill whereon the City ſtandeth. Unto this Baſſa the Embaſſadors preſented two great gilt Cups, a Clock all curiouſly wrought in Gold, and a thouſand Dollars; which Preſent the Baſſa received in his Divano (being a large Hall) where he ſate with his Counſellors, Officers, and other Turks in their places and order; ſome on his right hand, and ſome on his left, all richly attired in Garments of Silk of divers colours and faſhions, reaching down to their Anckles after their manner; their Heads covered with their paſſing-white and well made Turbants; in which Aſſembly nothing being then to be ſeen but goodly order and grave ſilence, they ſeemed to the ſtrange beholders ſo many Counſellors of exceeding gravity and Reputation. Round about the Hall wherein the Embaſſadors had Audience, were many Seats covered with Turky-Carpets; the reſt of the Room being all vacant. The Baſſa in a place more apparent than the reſt, ſitting in great Majeſty; before whom was ſet two little Chairs, on which (after he had ſtood up a while and embraced the Embaſſadors) he cauſed them both to ſit down. Whoſe Speech delivered in the Italian Tongue, after they had diſcharged themſelves of the Emperors Letters and Greetings, was to this effect, viz. That his Imperial Majeſty (for the common benefit of their Subjects in Hungary) requeſted him to continue in his good purpoſe and dealing for Peace; and further, to give ſafe Conduct unto them his Embaſſadors with their Retinue, until they were come unto the Turks Court, where they were to entreat and conclude a Peace, to the ending of all Troubles, and the Publique Benefit of their Subjects in general. Which Speech with chearful and friendly countenance ended, many of the Embaſſadors Followers were admitted to kiſs the Baſſaes hand, accounted no ſmall Favour amongſt thoſe Barbarians. The Interpreter of theſe things was a Jew of Padua, who declared all that was ſpoken, in the Turkiſh Language unto the Baſſa, and in the Italian unto the Embaſſadors. And although (if it had been their pleaſure) they might have told their mind each to other in the Croation Tongue without an Interpreter; yet the Baſſa ſtanding more upon his Reputation, and for ſome other reſpects beſide, would have the matter propounded and likewiſe anſwered in the Turkiſh. In which ſort they alſo conferred continually afterward with the Baſſaes at Conſtantinople, unleſs it were in ſome particular and private talk of ſmall Importance, or elſe in ſome point beſide the matter; for then the Interpreter ſpake in the Croatian or Sclavonian Tongue, which is familiar to moſt of the Turks, but eſpecially to the men of War. Before this Hall where the Embaſſadors were entertained by the Baſſa, in the baſe Court ſtood all the Janizaries in goodly Array, and his Slaves with their red Zarcul on their Heads, and other Souldiers with high and long Plumes of Feathers ſtanding upright; all which made a beautiful ſhew, and gave all great grace to the Baſſaes Court. Theſe men ſtir not one foot in their ſtandings, and if the Conſultation do laſt four hours long, ſo long are they to continue ſtanding without moving. The Embaſſadors having ſtayed two days at Buda, were by the Baſſa diſmiſſed, ſending with them his Checai (the Steward or Governor of his Houſe) a man of great Reputation, and Becram the Chiaus (the ſame that came to meet them at Comara) with a ſufficient Guard and certain Janizaries, ſent for their more ſafe travelling,and to provide for them from place to place, all things neceſſary for their Diet, as alſo for their Horſes, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they imbarqued the tenth day of the aforeſaid month, towed up the Turks Gallies, which holpen by the ſwiftneſs of the River, carried them down in eight days to Belgrade, where they arrived the eighteenth of July. So having ſtaid at Belgrade, and there leaving their Boats, and taking their Coaches, they ſet forward by Land the twentieth of the ſaid month, and with great pains travelling through Raſcia, Bulgaria, and Thracia, and paſſing a part of the great Mountain Scardus, and after that, the Mountain Rhodope, ſo by the way of Philippolis and Hadrianople, the two and twentieth of Auguſt gathered faſt upon Conſtantinople; where many of the Spahies and Chiauſes of the Court, with a number of the Janizaries and other Souldiers, for their greater Honour came to meet them a great way without the City. By whom the Embaſſadors honourably mounted on Horſeback, were by them conducted to their Lodging appointed for them about the midſt of the City; where the Lord Albert de Vus the Emperors Embaſſador Lieger (not long before inlarged) having long looked for their coming, now moſt joyfully received them. It was then Friday the Turks Sabbath, and a day of them above all other days in the week regarded, and about ten of the Clock two hours before Noon; at which time the Embaſſadors were no ſooner alighted, but that Selymus going to hear the Ceremonies of his Religion, in the Moſchy of his Father Solyman (as his manner was ſometime to do) paſſed along before the Gate where the Embaſſadors lay, with the whole Train of his Court; and peradventure ſomewhat more than ordinary, to ſhew the Magnificence of his Power and State, to the end that the Embaſſadors (above the former opinion by them conceived) might hold him in the Reputation of a moſt puiſſant and mighty Monarch. He paſſing by, vouchſafed not once to give them a regard, or ſo much as to caſt his eye aſide upon them, although they were ſtrangers, and but even then arrived; but with a Countenance as if he had known not ſo much as any thing of their coming, held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chief Viſier Baſſa, with the other Baſſaes and great Courtiers, in moſt gracious manner as they paſſed by caſt their eyes upon them; all the courteſie they could then ſhew them. Six days after, being the eight and twentieth of Auguſt, the Embaſſadors all three went to viſit and ſalute Muhamet (or as the Turks call him Mehemet) the chief Viſier Baſſa, as the manner was, preſenting him from the Emperor, with four Cups of Silver all gilt, of moſt fair and curious Workmanſhip; of which, two of them being greater than the other, were three ſpans high, the other two being not ſo high by a ſpan, but having in them two thouſand Ducats of Gold; beſide which, they gave him alſo a Clock, being a moſt curious piece of Work, and all over double gilt. After which Greetings and Preſents delivered, beſides the contents of his Majeſties Letters, they declared unto him in general points, the cauſe of their coming, and the mind of the Emperor well diſpoſed to a Peace; and what great benefit would ariſe thereby to both Parties; and laſtly turning over the blame of the late Wars, and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others, ſweetned thereby the ſower of their former dealings. Neither was the Baſſa likewiſe for his part to ſeek for goods words, but anſwered them in Turkiſh by the mouth of Hibraim the chief Dragoman, who delivered his mind to them in Latin or Italian, according as the Embaſſadors had before uttered theirs; which Parle ſo ended, certain of the chief of the Embaſſadors Followers were admitted into the Divano to kiſs the proud Baſſaes hand. The ſame day the Embaſſadors alſo ſaluted Partau the ſecond Baſſa, and Ferat the third in Order and Authority. To Partau they preſented two Cups of Silver all gilt, beſide a Clock of the ſame making with the afore named, and two thouſand Dollars; and the like to Ferat. The next day they went to viſit the other three Baſſaes, Achomat, Pial, and Muhamet, preſenting every one of them with two fair Cups and a thouſand Dollars. Theſe were the ſix Viſier Baſſaes to Selymus, then lying at Court with him, men that for Wealth and Authority went before all other in the Turkiſh Empire, as in the courſe of this Hiſtory may appear. And ſo having viſited them in general, the Embaſſadors to ſet their Affairs on foot, the fourth of September cloſed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Eſtate-matters was eſpecially committed. Yet after this firſt Conference, becauſe it was neceſſary before ſo weighty Affairs were broached, firſt to do the Turk Reverence, and to deliver the Preſents, with the Emperors Letters to him written; for ſome few days there was not any Point at all of the Embaſſadors buſineſs handled.

The Emperors Embaſſadors honourably received by the Turks at Conſtantinople.

Preſents given by the Emperors Embaſſadors to the great Baſſaes.

Selymus not long after the Embaſſadors were arrived, went out for his diſport and pleaſure on hunting; ſo that in the mean time, after the Preſents were given to the Baſſaes, matters ſtood ſtill altogether unadvanced, until the 21 of September; and that day (Selymus being now returned from his Diſport) it was appointed that the Embaſſadors ſhould have Audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their Followers, of thoſe that ſhould attend upon them, which were not in all above twelve perſons; for they to whom this Charge was committed, ſaid it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great Train ſhould come before ſo great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them above that number; whereupon they appointed but ſix a piece to attend them; and of fifteen Cups of Silver and gilt, being moſt curiouſly and cunningly engraven, one of the faireſt among the reſt was given to each of thoſe twelve to carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the reſt that came after in order with the reſt of the Preſents; which was two exceeding precious Clocks, like in bigneſs to them before given to the Baſſaes, but far above them in value; and 45000 Dollars for the Tribute behind and yet unpaid. The greateſt of thoſe Cups was ſix Spans and a half, and the leaſt two Spans in height; ſome of them being double Cups, after the High-Dutch manner. The Embaſſadors (whoſe coming a great multitude of Janizaries attended below at the Gate of their Lodging; beſides made of the Spahies and Chiauſies, and others of good ſort (which were come to to honour them with their Preſence to the Palace) putting themſelves in readineſs betimes in the Morning, and taking Horſe ſet forward toward the Court. The formoſt were they that did bear the Preſent in their hands, the people of the City in every Street flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they paſſed; and verily there had been ſeldom times ſeen the like Embaſſage in thoſe parts; for beſides the Fame that was blown abroad in every quarter, That they were Men ſent from one of the greateſt Princes in Chriſtendom; the diverſity of their Attire (ſo few as they were) more than any thing beſide, did repreſent the Majeſty of the Chriſtian Emperor to them that gazed upon his Embaſſadors and their Train, the people conceiving thereby, that he was Lord and Ruler over many Provinces and Countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Biſhop of Agria (the chief Embaſſador) being attired in long and ſober Garments of very fine Purple-Cloth, having their Shoos pieced over the ſoles with Iron-Plates, and half their Heads ſhaven, ſeemed to differ from them but little; but on the other ſide, the High-Dutch attired in black, with their Velvet Caps, and ſhort Clokes laid with Silver Lace, and long Breeches little leſs than Rutter-wiſe, and Chains of Gold about their Necks, appeared very ſtrange and uncouth to the Turkiſh people; ſo accompanied in this honourable wiſe, the Embaſſadors entred the firſt Gate of the Great Turks Palace.

The firſt Gate of the Great Turks Palace.

This Gate is built of Marble in moſt ſumptuous manner, and of a ſtately height, with certain words of their Language in the front thereof ingraven and gilt in Marble. So paſſing through the baſe Court, which hath on the right ſide very fair Gardens, and on the left, divers Buildings ſerving for other Offices, with a little Moſchy, they came to the ſecond Gate, where all ſuch as come in riding, muſt of neceſſity alight;

The ſecond Gate.

here ſo ſoon as they were entred in at this ſecond Gate, they came into a very large Square Court, with Buildings and Galleries round about it, the Kitchins ſtanding on the right hand, with other Lodgings for ſuch as belonged to the Court, and on the left hand likewiſe Rooms deputed to like Services. There are moreover many Halls and other Rooms for reſort, where they ſit in Council, handling and executing the Publick Affairs either of the Court or of the Empire, with other matters, where the Baſſaes and other Officers aſſemble together. Entring in at this ſecond Gate, in one part of the Court, which ſeem'd rather ſome large Street, they ſaw the whole Company of the Solaches ſet in a goodly rank, which are Archers keeping always near unto the Perſon of the Great Turk, and ſerving as his Footmen when he rideth; they uſe high Plumes of Feathers, which are ſet bolt upright over their Foreheads. In another place there ſtood the Capitzi in like Array, with black Staves of Indian Canes in their hands; they are the Porters and Warders of the Gates of the Palace, not much differing in their Attire from the Janizaries; who ſtood in rank likewiſe in another quarter. And beſide all thoſe, with many more that were out of order, as well of the Court as of the common people, thoſe Knights of the Court which accompanied the Embaſſadors thither, with other great Ones alſo of like degree, were Marſhalled all in their ſeveral Companies. And among the reſt, the Mutfarachaes, Men of all Nations and all Religions (for their Valour the only free men which live at their own liberty in the Turkiſh Empire) ſtood there apparelled in Damask Velvet and Cloth of Gold, and Garments of Silk of ſundry kinds and colours; their Pomp was great, and the greater, for the Turbants that they wore upon their Heads, being as white as whiteneſs it ſelf, made a moſt brave and goodly ſhew well worth the beholding. In brief, whether they were to be conſidered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their ſumptuous preſence, altogether without noiſe or rumor; they made the Embaſſadors and the reſt of their Followers there preſent, eye-witneſſes both of their Obedience, and of the great State and Royalty of the Othoman Court. Paſſing through them, the Embaſſadors were led into the Hall, where the Baſſaes and other great Men of the Court were all ready to give them Entertainment; they of their Train being at the ſame time brought into a Room that ſtood apart under one of the aforeſaid Lodgings all hung with Turky-Carpets.

A homely Feaſt given to the Embaſſadors Followers in the Turks Court.

Soon after (as their uſe and manner is) they brought in their Dinner, covering the ground with Table-Cloths of a great length ſpread upon Carpets, and afterward ſcattering upon them a marvelous number of wooden Spoons, with ſo great ſtore of Bread, as if they had been to feed 300 perſons; then they ſet on Meat in order, which was ſerved in 42 great Platters of Earth, full of Rice-pottage of three or four kinds, differing one from another, ſome of them ſeaſoned with Honey, and of the colour of Honey; ſome with ſour Milk, and white of colour; and ſome with Sugar; they had Fritters alſo, which were made of like Batter; and Mutton beſide, or rather a dainty and toothſome morſel of an old ſodden Ewe. The Table (if there had any ſuch been) thus furniſhed, the Gueſts without any Ceremony of waſhing, ſate down on the ground (for Stools there were none) and fell to their Victual, and drank out of great earthen Diſhes, Water prepared with Sugar, which kind of Drink they call Zerbet. But ſo having made a ſhort repaſt, they were no ſooner riſen up, but certain young Men, whom they call Giamoglans, with others that ſtood round about them, ſnatcht it haſtily up as their Fees, and like greedy Harpies ravened it down in a moment. The Embaſſadors in the mean time dined in the Hall with the Baſſaes. And after dinner certain of the Capitzies were ſent for, and twelve of the Embaſſadors Followers, before appointed to do the Great Sultan Reverence; by whom (their Preſents being already conveyed away) they were removed out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an under Room, from whence there was an aſcent into the Hall, where the Baſſaes were ſtaying for the Embaſſadors; who ſoon after came forth, and for their eaſe ſat them down upon the Benches, whilſt the Baſſaes went in to Selymus; who before this time had made an end of Dinner, and was removed in all his Royalty, into one of his Chambers, expecting the coming of the Embaſſadors. All things now in readineſs, and the Embaſſadors ſent for, they ſet forward with their Train, and came to the third Gate, which leadeth into the Privy-Palace of the Turkiſh Emperor, where none but himſelf, his Eunuchs, and the young Pages his Minions, being in the Eunuchs cuſtody, have continual abiding; into which inward part of the Palace none entreth but the Capitzi Baſſa (who hath the keeping of this third Gate) and the Ceſigniers (that ſerve in the Turks Meat) with the Baſſaes and ſome few other great Men; and that only when they have occaſion ſo to do by reaſon of ſome great buſineſs, or ſent for by the Sultan. Being entred in at this Gate, which is of a Stately and Royal Building, the Capitzi by whom they were conducted ſuddenly cauſed them to ſtay, and ſet them one from another about five Paces, in a little Room, which neverthelesſ was paſſing-delicate, all curiouſly painted over with divers colours, and ſtood between the Gate and the more inner Lodgings. On both ſides of which Room, when all things elſe were whiſt and in a deep ſilence, certain little Birds only were heard to warble out their ſweet Notes, and to flicker up and down the green Trees of the Gardens (which all along caſt a pleaſant ſhadow from them) as if they alone had obtained Licence to make a noiſe. Selymus himſelf was in great Majeſty ſet in an under Chamber, parted only with a Wall from the Room wherein the Embaſſadors Followers attended, whereinto he might look through a little Window, the Portal of his ſaid Chamber ſtanding in counterpoint with the third Gate above mentioned. The Embaſſadors entring in, were led ſingle, and one after another, to make their Reverence unto the Great Turk. And in the mean time certain of the Capitzi with the Preſents in their hands fetching a compaſs about before the Window, muſtered them in his ſight. All this while not the leaſt ſound in the World being raiſed, but a ſacred ſilence kept in every corner, as if men had been going to viſit the holieſt place in Jeruſalem. Yet for all that, the Embaſſadors Followers placed one from another (as is aforeſaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was ſo near, looking ſtill when they ſhould have been led on forwards all together; howbeit they were ſet in one after another, neither did they that were ſo ſet out, return again into the Room, but having ſeverally done their Reverence, were all (except the Embaſſadors, that ſtill ſtaid in the Chamber) by one and one ſent out another way into the Court; neither could he that came after, ſee his Fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his Reverence; but ſuddenly as the former was let out, the next was advanced forward to the door, where Iſman the Capitzi-Baſſa and the Odda-Baſſa, taking him by both Arms and by the Neck, the one at the right hand, and the other at the left, and ſo leading him apace, by the way ſoftly felt his wriſts with their hands, leſt peradventure he might have ſome ſhort Weapon in his ſleeve. Yet were they not all thus groped, as Marc. Antonio Pigafetta (the Reporter of this Negotiation) ſaith of himſelf and ſome others alſo. Howbeit this hath been, and yet is the manner of giving of Acceſs unto the Perſon of the Great Turk, ever ſince that Amurath the Firſt was after the battel of Caſſova murdered by one of Lazarus the Deſpots men; who admitted to his Preſence, in revenge of the wrong done unto his Maſter, with a ſhort Poniard that he had cloſely hidden about him, ſo ſtabbed him in the Belly, that he preſently died. And thus like men rather carried to priſon by Sergeants, than to the Preſence of ſo mighty a Monarch, they were preſented unto his Majeſty; he ſitting upon a Pallat, which the Turks call Maſtabe, uſed by them in their Chambers to ſleep and to feed upon, covered with Carpets of Silk, as was the whole floor of the Chamber alſo. The Chamber it ſelf being not very great, was but dark, altogether without Windows, excepting that one whereof we have before ſpoken, and having the Walls painted and ſet out in moſt freſh and lively Colours by great cunning, and with a moſt delicate grace; yet uſe they neither Pictures nor the Image of any thing in their painting. The ſix Viſier Baſſaes before mentioned, were ſtanding at the left hand as they entred in at the Chamber door, one by another in one ſide of the Chamber, and the Embaſſadors on the right hand on the other ſide ſtanding likewiſe, and uncovered. The Dragomans were in another part of the Chamber, near the place where the Sultan ſat gorgeouſly attired in a Robe of Cloth of Gold all embroidered with Jewels; when as the Embaſſadors Followers by one and one brought before him, (as is aforeſaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turk ſtanding on his right hand, with all Reverence taking up the Hem of his Garment, gave it them in their hands to kiſs. Selymus himſelf all this while ſitting like an Image without moving, and with a great State and Majeſty keeping his countenance, dained not to give them one of his looks. This done, they were led back again, never turning their backs towards him, but going ſtill backwards until they were out of his Preſence. So after they had all thus made their Reverence, and were departed out of the Chamber, the Embaſſadors delivered unto Selymus the Emperors Letters, and briefly declared unto him their Meſſage; whom he anſwering in four words, as, That they were to confer with his Baſſaes; preſently they were diſmiſſed. And ſo coming out of the two inner Gates, they mounted on Horſeback, and took the way leading towards their Lodging, being at their return accompanied with the whole order of the Janizaries, with their Aga and other Captains; among whom were certain of their Religious Men called Haagi (which uſe to follow the Janizaries) who continually turning about, and in their going, ſinging or rather howling out certain Pſalms and Prayers for the Welfare of their Great Sultan; gave the Embaſſadors and their Followers occaſion to wonder, that they either left not for wearineſs, or fell not down like Noddies for giddineſs. All theſe were ſent, the more honourably to accompany the Embaſſadors to their Lodging; and beſide theſe, many more on Horſeback than attended them at their coming forth; in regard whereof, the Embaſſadors when they were come to their Lodging, to requite their greedy courteſie, frankly diſtributed amongſt them above four thouſand Dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The principal Point whereupon the Embaſſadors differed from the Turks in the Treaty of Peace.

The Embaſſadors after this Entertainment at Court, had divers times Conference with the great Baſſaes concerning Peace, as Selymus had commanded; wherein by reaſon of the Turks unreaſonable Demands (as their manner is at their firſt meetings) nothing could be as then concluded; ſo that Selymus himſelf being ſhortly after to depart for Hadrianople, where he was to continue for ſome months (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree upon a Point of great Conſequence) the Treaty for Peace was intermitted, until ſuch time as a Meſſenger diſpatched in Poſt, might return unto the Turks Court, with ſome reſolute Anſwer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the Reign of the late Emperor Ferdinand, that the Turk his Subjects in Hungary payed all their Taxes and Tributes unto their old Lords and Maſters, abiding and living in the Emperors Juriſdiction, as did the Subjects of Ferdinand, to their Lords that dwelt in the Turks Dominion and Territories; now in this Treaty for Peace, the Turks (amongſt other their unreaſonable Requeſts) demanded to have their Subjects freed, and yet the Subjects of the Emperor to pay as they were before accuſtomed. Which as it was a requeſt nothing indifferent, ſo was it no leſs prejudicial and hurtful unto the Emperor his Subjects in Hungary; for which cauſe the Embaſſadors would not by any means conſent thereunto, before they knew the Emperors farther Pleaſure concerning the ſame. Whereupon they diſpatched one Sig. Odoardo a Gentleman of Mantua, very skilful in the Turkiſh-Language and in ſuch like affairs, by reaſon that as well about this buſineſs as at divers times before about other the like, he had been employed from Vienna to Conſtantinople in the Emperors Service. So Selymus ſhortly after, viz. the twentieth of October, departing from Conſtantinople, in great Magnificence paſſed by the Gate where the Embaſſadors lay, with his whole Court in Arms, and in the ſame order that is uſually kept when he goeth to War, or taketh any great Journey. After whoſe departure the Embaſſadors having ſufficiently viewed the City of Conſtantinople, and then at good leiſure, to paſs the time and to ſee the Countries they had ſo often both heard and read of, together with the Ports and Havens on both ſides that narrow Sea which divideth Europe from Aſia, embarking themſelves, and croſſing the mouth of the Haven betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, paſſed all alongſt the Coaſt on Europe ſide, unto the Euxin or Black-Sea, and ſo back again by the other ſide of that Straight Sea; curiouſly noting the great ruines of the ancient Cities of Bithynia, with ſome others alongſt the Aſian ſhore, together with the pleaſant ſituation they in former times had, whilſt they yet flouriſhed in their glory, but now for moſt part (or rather for altogether) laid in the Duſt and brought to nought; and ſo returned again to Conſtantinople. But whilſt they thus deceived the time, and lay long expecting the return, as well of their own Meſſenger unto the Emperor, as of Selymus himſelf; they were advertiſed in all haſt to repair unto him to Hadrianople, whether the aforeſaid Meſſenger was now come with full Inſtructions of all things concerning the Treaty for Peace. For which cauſe they with great ſpeed making themſelves ready, and taking their leave of Pial Baſſa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admiral, then lay at Conſtantinople) ſet forward the firſt of January, in the year, 1568. and ſo after nine days travel, at length arrived at Hadrianople, about an hundred fifty three Italian miles diſtant from Conſtantinople. Here they ſtayed until the Peace was concluded, which was the ſeventeenth of February; the chief Capitulations whereof were, That either of thoſe great Princes ſhould ſtill hold what they had got each from the other in the late Wars: That the Emperor ſhould yearly pay thirty thouſand Ducats to the Turkiſh Sultan, as a Tribute for Hungary, the Tribute to begin in the beginning of January laſt paſt this year 1568. That the Subjects of the Turk ſhould pay nothing to the Subjects of the Emperor, neither the Emperors any thing to the Turks, but to be both of thoſe Payments free. And that upon theſe Conditions there ſhould be a firm and ſure Peace betwixt theſe two great Monarchs for eight years next following; wherein the Vayvod of Tranſylvania was (as the Turks Tributary) to be alſo comprehended. Nevertheleſs, all things at this time thus agreed upon, the Turks after their ſubtil manner finding ſundry Cavillations, and raiſing many doubts about the aforeſaid Capitulations, did what they might to have in ſome ſort altered what they had before agreed upon, to the bettering of themſelves and the hurt of the Chriſtians; and ſo with many their unreaſonable Demands ſtayed the departure of the Embaſſadors until the twentieth of March following. At which time having their Diſpatch, and taking their leave of the Great Turk and the Baſſaes, accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his Embaſſador unto the Emperor) they by Land returned towards Vienna; where they with the joyful News of Peace the tenth of May arrived, being there two days after at the Court moſt honourably received. And five days after, Audience was given unto the Turks Embaſſador, who well heard and better rewarded, ſhortly after returned with a full concluſion of Peace from the Emperor, to Conſtantinople.

The chief Capitulations whereon a Peace was concluded betwixt Maximilian the Emperor and Selymus.

But whilſt this Peace was thus in concluding, and the Embaſſadors yet reſident at Hadrianople, the ſixteenth of February came an honourable Embaſſage from Shach Tamas the Perſian King, unto the Great Sultan Selymus, to intreat a Peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the ſame, being before agreed upon the Controverſies, for which they afterwards fell to open War. Which Embaſſage for that it is no leſs truly than plainly ſet down in a Letter ſent from Erzirum (a City then in the Confines of the Turks Dominions towards the Perſians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet Chief of the Viſier Baſſaes; which Chiaus was of purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople, to meet the ſaid Perſian Embaſſador: I thought it not amiſs for the better underſtanding thereof, to ſet down the effect of the ſame Letter as it was tranſlated out of the Turkiſh into the Italian by the Emperors Embaſſadors Interpreter.

The effect of the Letter written to Muhamet Baſſa, the Chief Viſier, by a Chiaus ſent of purpoſe to meet the Perſian Embaſſador.

After due Salutations, this is the effect of that which we thought good to make known unto your Lordſhip. Now at this preſent (to wit in the beginning of the month Giuma Sulacchir*) is in good health arrived the Embaſſador of* Perſia*, the Kings Chief Counſellor, called* * Schach Culi Soltan, attended upon with a hundred and twenty Gentlemen, with gilt Turbants on their Heads, and well furniſhed with ſpare Horſes led in Mens hands. Beſides whom he was accompanied alſo with two hundred Knights all apparelled in Cloth of Gold, with four hundred Perſian Merchants, in all above ſeven hundred Perſons; with a thouſand nine hundred Beaſts, Camels, Mules, and Horſes, five couple of Drums, every couple being placed upon a ſeveral Camel, five Nacars, three Trumpets, five Flutes, and other Inſtruments, in all about thirty Muſicians, playing upon theſe Inſtruments: There were alſo two Queriſters or Chaunters of the Alcoran, one Organiſt, one playing upon a Turkiſh Inſtrument like a Lute, two Players upon Sagbuts, with two other Muſicians, eight in all. There were alſo four Bondwomen ſerving in the Embaſſadors own Chamber. Who when he was with all this Magnificent Pomp come within one days journey of Erzirum, the * Sayms and Spahies aſſembling themſelves together to the number of eight thouſand Men, went to meet him; amongſt whom were an hundred and more, all apparelled in Cloth of Gold and Sattin; two thouſand Men with gilt Morrions on their Heads; in which bravery we marching forward, the Perſian Embaſſador amazed to ſee ſo great Majeſty and Pomp, ſaid that all the Army of Conſtantinople was come to meet him; and ſo being come unto the City, cauſed all the Inſtruments to be played upon, even from morning until night. The next morning, the Embaſſador invited the Baſſa with all the Lords and Officers; who being come, he entreated them to hear his Muſick; and in like manner the Lord Baſſa invited the Perſians. But as the Embaſſador was going to the Banquet, came another Sultan of the Kings, who brought unto the ſame Embaſſador a gilt Turbant, and a rich Gown wrought with Gold, which

* Schach Culi Soltan, was not the proper name of this Embaſſador, but a Title of Honour, and ſignifieth as much as a Prince, Servant to the King.

which he cauſed him to put on by the way. By this Embaſſador the Perſian King hath ſent all the Armor of Sultan Bajazet, with all his Camels and other Wealth. The cauſes of the long ſtay of this Embaſſador were eſpecially two; the one for that the Perſian King *had cauſed to be made two Pavilions of one Piece, the Curtains being interlaced with Gold, and the Supporters imbroidred with the ſame: Beſides this, he ſent two Books of Hiſtories, and two Pearls, which in weight weighed ten * Meſcali; one Balaſſo as big as a little Pearl; fourſcore and two times an hundred † Tumenlich of Stuff, amounting to fourſcore and two ſums of Aſpers, and forty Falcons; all which the* Perſian King hath ſent unto the Great Sultan, as to the only Monarch and Patron of the World. This Schach Culi is the next in Authority to the King, and ſo was in the time of great King Hyſmael. Theſe two Perſian Sultans are the Kings chief Sultans and Courtiers, and therefore ſet themſelves forth with all the Pomp they can. Yet notwithſtanding all their Bravery, being come to Erzirum within the view of our Army, the Perſians were amazed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of theſe Perſians are returned again into Perſia. And if it pleaſe God, at the coming of my Meſſenger unto you, your Lordſhip ſhall underſtand of what Condition and State theſe two Princes and Sultans are. They have each of them yearly ſix Tumoni; which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, ſix thouſand Aſpers. Your Lordſhip after this account may judge of the reſt. The other cauſe of the long ſtay of this Embaſſador, was for that in Syruan the people were up in Rebellion, wherein many of them were ſlain; to the appeaſing of which Sedition, this Schach Culi was ſent, and now at laſt is come. From Erzirum *in the beginning of the month of * Giuma Sulacchir, in the year of the Prophet* Mahomet, 975.

The Perſian Embaſſador honourably entertained by the Turks, at Hadrianople.

This Perſian Embaſſador was with the greateſt Pomp that might be entertained by the Turks at his firſt coming to Hadrianople, all the brave Courtiers with the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court going forth in moſt ſeemly order to meet him. Who now entred the City, and come before the houſe where the Emperors Embaſſadors then lay, and ſeeing certain of their Retinue before the door, asked of Iſnam the Capitzi Baſſa, what people they were; who told them that they were the Followers of an Embaſſador that there lay, ſent from one of the greateſt Princes of the Chriſtians, namely the Emperor, who was deſirous to make Peace with the Great Sultan his Maſter. Whereunto the Embaſſador replied, That he would willingly ſalute them; which Iſnam hearing, ſtraight way turned his Horſe towards the place where they ſtood. Now the Emperors Embaſſador being ſecret within a Lattice, and ſeeing him come towards them, went forth and ſtood upon the Door-threſhold, and ſo with ſigns and words ſaluted one another. Among the others the Perſian Embaſſador ſaid unto the Emperors, That he would gladly talk with him, if it might ſo pleaſe the Grand Seignior: Hebrahim the Dragoman who then was with the Emperors Embaſſadors, being Interpreter. So having courteouſly ſaluted one the other, they departed, but never after came together. Two days after, the Perſian Embaſſadors (according to the manner of thoſe barbarous Nations, who with empty hands ſalute not one another) by his Checaia or Steward of his Houſhold, preſented all the Viſier Baſſaes with divers rich Gifts and Preſents every one of them according to their degrees and places; and the day after went himſelf to viſit them; where by the way fell out a ſtrange matter, like enough to have coſt him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the Embaſſador was going to viſit Muhamet the chief of the Viſier Baſſaes for the firſt) meeting him, ſhot at him with an Harquebuſh, with purpoſe to have ſlain him; but as God would, miſſed him, and hurt but one of his chief Followers in the Arm. Wherewith the Embaſſador not a little diſmaid, as ſuppoſing himſelf to have been betrayed, turning his Horſe, was about to have gone to his Lodging; but the great Baſſa in the mean time having knowledge thereof, preſently ſent out men to Guard him, and to excuſe himſelf of the Fact. Whereof the Embaſſador being aſſured, held on his way. In the mean ſpace, the Fellow who ſhot the Harquebuſh, being apprehended, was brought before the Embaſſador and the Baſſa; who asking him for what cauſe he diſcharged the ſhot againſt the Embaſſador? he without change of countenance boldly anſwered, That he did it for no other cauſe but for that the Embaſſador was an Heretick, and ſent from an Heretical King, and an Enemy to their Religion; and therefore that it was not convenient he ſhould come to intreat of Peace with his Lord; adding further, that he was not worthy of any Peace. Which the Baſſa hearing, adjudged the deſperate Villain the next day to be drawn at an Horſe-tail through the City, and then to have his right Hand cut off, and afterward his Head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this, the Perſian Embaſſador the 22*th* of the ſame month went to deliver the Preſents ſent from his Maſter unto the Grand Seignior, and to kiſs his Hand; ſending firſt before him the Preſents upon 44 Camels, whereof 34 were the Kings of Perſia, and the other ten his own. The Kings Preſent was an Alcoran, with the Authority of Ali, as they hold. For this is their Cuſtom, always to preſent one ſuch Alcoran unto the Princes to whom they ſend their Embaſſadors. It was covered with Gold, and garniſhed with moſt precious Stones. He preſented alſo a Book or Hiſtories, covered as the other; he gave alſo a Box, wherein was a very fair precious Stone called Balaſſo, and two Pearls of a wonderful greatneſs, with two Purſes of an handful long, full of Jewels. Beſides theſe, he preſented alſo eight Firuari or Porcellane Diſhes (which we call China-Diſhes) made of moſt pure Earth, kept above fifty years buried under the ground, to the end ſo to be fined and purified, which (as ſome ſay) will melt and diſſolve if any Poiſon be put into them. He gave alſo two moſt ſtately Pavilions, twenty great Carpets of Silk, and many other leſſer of Silk and Gold; alſo nine fair Canopies to hang over the Ports of their Pavilions, things not uſed among the Chriſtians. He gave alſo nine very fair Carpets of Camels hair, nine Saddles ſet with Stones after the Perſian faſhion, ſeven Staves of Silver, ſeven Scimiters with red Scabberts, ſeven Bows with Arrows and Quivers, all wrought with Gold and precious Stones; he preſented alſo many other Carpets called Teſtich, made of the fineſt Lawn, and ſo large, that ſeven Men could ſcarcely carry one of them. All the Faulcons were dead by the way. The Preſents which the Embaſſador gave unto the Great Turk in his own Name, were alſo theſe; An Alcoran, a Pavilion fair and large, certain Scimiters, Bows and Arrows richly garniſhed, with certain Carpets of Silk, and Camels hair. After which Preſents ſo delivered, and Reverence done unto the Great Sultan by the Embaſſador, and thirty of his Followers all in Cloth of Gold, he returned to his Lodging, very honourably accompanied, as well by the Turks as them of his own Retinue. Firſt, beſides many others, there there were a great Company of the Spahies and Chiauſes, and other Courtiers mounted upon goodly Horſes, well furniſhed and in decent order; here might a Man have ſeen ſtore of Cloth of Gold, Velvet, Damask, and other kinds of Silk. After theſe, there followed about three hundred Perſian Horſemen, apparelled after their manner, ſome with Gowns made of divers little pieces of Taffata of ſundry Colours, repreſenting the Pictures of Men, Women, Horſes, and other Beaſts; and ſome of them embroidred with Flowers and Fruits of ſundry ſorts; ſome had alſo Gowns of Cloth of Gold, but not ſo fair as the Turks; and ſome of Velvet, but very few of Cloth; for that the Perſians have no great plenty either of Velvet or yet of Cloth, except ſuch as they have from the Portugals that travel into thoſe Eaſtern Countries; yet of Silk and Wool it appeareth they have great plenty, moſt part of their Gowns being of Wool quilted with Bombaſt. After theſe Horſemen followed many Perſian Footmen, peradventure all Servants; after whom came the Turkiſh Horſemen; and laſt of all came a Horſe of the Embaſſadors led by a Perſian; after which Horſe followed two hundred Janizaries; and in the Rearward of all came the Embaſſador alone, gorgeouſly attired both himſelf and his Horſe. He himſelf was inveſted with crimſon Velvet, mingled with ſome other Colours; his Saddle and Bridle were all bedeckt with Jewels; the Capariſon of his Horſe, was all embroidred with Turquoies and other precious Stones; the Horn upon the top of his Turbant (which the Turks call Metevenchia) was altogether wrought with Gold, and ſet with precious Stones; in brief, upon every part of his Body hanged Jewels of great price. After the Embaſſador, followed about an hundred and forty Perſian Horſemen, and others of his Court apparelled as before, ſome well, ſome ill, according to their Ability. Now although the Perſians (as is to be thought) ſhewed all their Pomp, yet they made nothing ſo fair a ſhew as did the Turks; neither are they ſo fair Men of complexion, being for the moſt part of a ſwarſt and brown Colour, and rather little Men than otherwiſe, not much unlike to the Spaniards. The Embaſſador being departed, the Preſents were all brought and ſhewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary Charges five hundred Ducats a day, for that indeed their number was great, and their Beaſts many. Theſe Expences beſtowed upon the Embaſſadors, do preſently begin as ſoon as any of them enter into his Dominions; and end, ſo ſoon as the buſineſs for which they come is finiſhed. But long it was not, but that this Embaſſador having concluded a Peace betwixt the two great Princes, Tamas and Selymus, and diſpatched ſuch matters as he came for, returned home again into Perſia. The Venetians alſo now at this ſame time, by their Embaſſadors ſought to renew the League they had made with the great Turk, now expired; which as it was eaſily obtained, ſo was it of ſmall aſſurance; Selymus the next year quarelling with them, and raiſing new Wars, to the great hurt and diſturbance of that State, as ſhall forthwith appear.

The Embaſſadors Preſent to Selymus.

An honourable allowance.

1569. Selymus now at Peace with all the World (a thing of the Turks not much deſired) began to think of Works of Charity; and purpoſing to build a magnificent Temple at Hadrianople for his own Sepulture, with a Monaſtery, a Colledge, and an Alms-Houſe (as had his Father and other his Anceſtors before him at Pruſa and Conſtantinople, led thereunto with a vain and ſuperſtitious Devotion) was troubled with nothing more, than how to endow the ſame with Lands and Revenues ſufficient for the maintenance of ſo great a Charge; for that the Mahometan Kings, are by their Superſtition prohibited to convert any Lands or Poſſeſſions to ſuch holy uſes, other than ſuch as they have with their own Sword won from the Enemies of their Religion, which they may (as they are perſwaded) as a moſt acceptable Sacrifice, offer to their great Prophet; which Deviliſh perſwaſion, ſerveth as a Spur to prick forward every of thoſe ambitious Princes to add ſomething to their Empire. This his devout purpoſe once known, wanted not the furtherance of many ripe Heads, deviſing ſome one thing, ſome another, as they thought beſt fitted his humor. But amongſt many things to him preſented, none pleaſed him ſo well, as the Plot laid for the taking of the rich Iſland of Cyprus from the Venetians; a Conqueſt of it ſelf ſufficient, both for the eternizing of his Name, and performance of his own charitable Works intended; with a large overplus, for the ſupplying of whatſoever wanted in his Fathers like devout Works at Conſtantinople. But that which moved him moſt of all, was the glory of ſuch a Conqueſt, which as his Flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equal with any his Predeceſſors; who in the beginning of their Reign, had uſually done or attempted ſome notable thing againſt the Chriſtians. Hereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Baſſaes to be conſidered of; without whoſe Advice and Counſel, the Turkiſh Emperors ſeldom or never take any great Wars in hand. Amongſt theſe grave Counſellors, Muhamet the chief Viſier Baſſa, a Man of greateſt Authority (unto whom Selymus was beholden, that he had ſo quietly obtained the Empire) and a ſecret Friend unto the Venetians, ſeemed much to miſlike of that motion, perſwading Selymus not to yield thereunto; alledging beſide the danger and uncertainty of the expedition, that his Father Solyman at the time of his death had charged him ſtraily, that the League with the Venetians ſhould be religiouſly kept, and that he could not with his Honour without juſt cauſe ſo quickly break the League, which he himſelf had but a little before moſt ſolemnly confirmed. But Muſtapha the ſecond Baſſa, ſometime Selymus his Tutor, and therefore of him much honoured, with Pial Baſſa the Admiral (both envying at the great honour of the Viſier Baſſa) ſo mightily impugned that he had before ſaid, and ſo importuned Selymus with the ſhew both of Honour and Profit attending that action, as alſo with the eaſineſs thereof (a great part of the Venetian Arſenal being but a little before burnt, and their Forces much weakned) that he rejected the Counſel of Muhamet, calling him in his Choler, Chriſtian (which among the Mahometans is a Word of no ſmall diſgrace;) and yielding wholly to the perſwaſion of Muſtapha and Pial, preſently cauſed preparation to be made both by Sea and Land, for the performance of that his reſolution. Which was not ſo covertly carried in the Turks Court, but that it was diſcovered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embaſſador; and not without cauſe ſuſpected by the Venetian Merchants, whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut ſhort in their Traffick, looking big upon them, as Men ſuddainly changed, and evil intreating them with hard ſpeeches, the undoubted ſigns of greater troubles to enſue. The Venetian Embaſſador now out of doubt of the Turks purpoſe for the invaſion of Cyprus, came unto Muhamet the chief Baſſa, complaining of the breach of the League; and putting him in mind of the Fidelity of the Venetian State towards the Turkiſh

Emperor; requeſting him that Selymus might not make too much haſte to begin that War, which would ſet all Europe on a broil; but rather by his Embaſſadors firſt to declare his mind to the Senate, for that ſo it might haply come to paſs, that all might be quieted, to the good of both parties without War. Which the politick Embaſſador requeſted not of the Baſſa for any hope he had to avert the War, for which the Turk had now all things in a readineſs, but only by ſuch an hope of compoſition, to hinder the Turks endeavours, and to win time, until that the State (being fully certified of all theſe matters) might make ready their Fleet and Forces, and ſo in Arms be ready to anſwer their armed Foes; Neither did he ever leave the Baſſa, until he had by his means procured, That one Cubates ſhould be ſent Embaſſador to Venice, to prove the minds of the Senators, whether they would willingly deliver the Iſland, or adventure to have it taken from them by Force. Theſe things and ſuch like as were then done at Conſtantinople, being by Letters ſent in Poſt from the Embaſſador, made known at Venice, brought a general heavineſs upon the City; for why, that underſtanding and provident State, warned by their former harms, of all others moſt dread the Turks Forces. Cubates the Embaſſador accompanied with Aloyſius Barbarus the Embaſſadors Son, and Bonricius his Secretary, departing from Conſtantinople, came by long journeys to Raguſium, where Angelus Surjanus ſent from Venice to meet him, was ready to receive him, who being taken into his Gally, brought him to Venice.

Selymus ſendeth Cubates his Embaſſador to Venice.

In the mean time the Senators ſitting oftentimes in Counſel, were divided in opinions concerning the chief matter they conſulted upon; ſome there were, that thought it not good to wage War againſt ſuch an invincible Enemy, nor to truſt upon a vain and idle hope, neither to commit all unto the hazard of ſuch Fortune as was unto them in that War by the Enemy propounded; they alledged, That they had always unfortunately taken up Arms againſt the Turks, and that therefore they ſhould ſet before their Eyes, what harms they had ſuffered, and how that beſide the loſſes already ſuſtained, they had always in the winding up of the Wars loſt ſomething more; that it were better to depart with Cyprus, ſo that they might quietly enjoy the reſt, rather than enter into Arms; Time they ſaid, would at length give them ſome one fit occaſion or other to recover that they had loſt, and to reſtore their State unto their former Honour; which for the preſent, was above their power to maintain; To put their truſt in their Confederates (they ſaid) was but to deceive themſelves; they ſhould remember how often even ſmall cauſes of falſe ſuſpition, or hope of profit, or fear of harm, had utterly fruſtrated and broken in ſunder the moſt ſolemn Capitulations of the ſtrongeſt Leagues; how often deſtruction had come thence from whence aid was always to have been hoped for, they needed not to ſeek farther for examples, than from their own Domeſtical Affairs. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the Iſland was by force of Arms to be defended; ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonorable, than without fight to depart with ſo notable a part of their Seigniory; neither any thing more commendable, than to prove all things for defence of their Honour; neither would the proud Turks, with whom no aſſured League could be made (as they ſaid) hold themſelves content with this yielding up of the Iſland, but by intreating of them and giving them way, become more inſolent; and when they had taken Cyprus from them, would alſo ſeek after Creet and Corcyra, and ſo yielding them one thing after another, ſpoil themſelves of all together; ambitious and greedy Princes (they ſaid) grew more bold and inſolent by other Mens fear; and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger; that hard beginnings had oftentimes merry endings; that the Favour and good Will of that inſatiable and greedy Nation, was not to be gained but with ſo great loſs and charge as that ſuch a coſtly Peace would be much more hurtful than War it ſelf; beſide that, it much concerned other Chriſtian Princes to have the Venetian State preſerved, and that therfore it was to be hoped, that they would to the uttermoſt of their power give them aid. The matter thus debated to and fro, it was in the end reſolved upon, to take up Arms in defence of their Honour, and by plain force to withſtand the Turk.

n to truſt upon Confederations.

So when Cubates the Turks Embaſſador came to Venice, neither did any Man of Courteſie meet him, neither was any Honour done unto him, or ſo much as common Courteſie ſhewed unto him, but being afterward admitted into the Senate Houſe with his two Interpreters only, he delivered Selymus his Letters, incloſed in a little Bag wrought with Silk and Gold; and ſo whilſt the ſame Letters were in breaking up, and tranſlating out of the Turkiſh Language into Italian, delivered alſo his Meſſage by word of mouth, as followeth:

The Turks Embaſſador homely entertained at Venice.

What great account the mighty Sultan my dread Soveraign hath always made of your moſt honourable Friendſhip, is therein right well declared; That in the very entrance of himſelf into his Empire, he forthwith and without any hard or new Conditions renewed his League with you; which he hath on his part always kept moſt faithfully and unviolate; worthily grieving the like kindneſs not to be ſhewed on your behalf, neither the like care of keeping your Faith to appear in you; who by harboring of Pyrats in your Havens, and murthering of his Subjects, have oftentimes broken the League. Which injuries, although they were by War to have been revenged; yet hath he, ſo mighty a Monarch, hitherto been always more mindful of your Honour and Friendſhip, than of his own Majeſty and Profit. But forſomuch as there is no end of theſe Injuries and Wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, that longer to forbear, might be imputed unto him rather for Cowardiſe than Courteſie, as alſo that it much more concerneth your State than him, and that therfore you ought no leſs than he to deſire, that all cauſes of unkindneſs might be cut off, and order taken, that in ſo great and mutual goodwil, there ſhould be no falling out by new quarrels dayly ariſing; the only remedy whereof is, if you ſhall deliver unto him the Iſland of Cyprus, the cauſe of all theſe grievances. Now it beſeemeth you for your great Wiſdom, to make ſmall reckoning of ſo ſmall a matter, in compariſon of the Favour of ſo great a Prince; which if you willingly of your ſelves yield unto him, you ſhall right wiſely provide for your Affairs, and have him ſo great a Monarch always your Friend and Confederate; whereas if you ſhall ſhew your ſelves obſtinate, and not to yield to this his ſo ſmall a requeſt, his purpoſe is by ſtrong hand not only to take from you the Iſland, the cauſe of the War, but alſo to proſecute you with moſt cruel War both by Sea and Land. And thereupon I take God to witneſs, all the blame of the calamities to enſue of ſo mortal a War, to be imputed unto your ſelves, as the worthy reward of your wilfulneſs and breach of Faith.

Cubates the Turks Embaſſadors ſpeech in the Senate at Venice.

Which ſaid, he in the name of Mahamet the Viſier Baſſa told the Senators, That he was right ſorry that this breach was fallen out betwixt the Emperor Selymus and them; and that although he doubted not but that they would right wiſely conſider of all things; yet he could not for the good Will he bare unto them, but admoniſh them of ſuch things as he deemed for them both profitable and wholeſome; and therefore did moſt inſtantly requeſt them, and withal adviſe them, not to enter into Arms againſt ſo mighty a Prince, neither wilfully to plunge themſelves into ſuch dangers, as they could hardly or never find the way out; for that their ſtrength was nothing anſwerable unto his, and that the event of that War would be unto them deadly; and therefore he took God and the love he bare unto them to witneſs, that he had in friendly ſort forewarned them of their harms, and adviſed them for their good. Giving them further to underſtand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out moſt cruel Threats againſt their State; which his indignation was raiſed of the manifold complaints brought againſt them to his Court at Conſtantinople.

The effect of Selymus his Letters to the Venetians.

Selymus his Letters anſwerable to his Embaſſadors Speech, was alſo full of falſe ſurmiſed grievances; he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike manner entred into the Frontiers of his Empire in Dalmatia, and there had done great harm; that they had put to death certain Turkiſh Pyrates whom they had taken alive; that their Iſland of Cyprus was an Harbor for the Pyrates of the Weſt; and that from thence they robbed his peaceable Countries, and ſurpriſed his Subjects travelling that way for Devotion unto the Temple of Mecha, or otherwiſe about their Affairs. And that therefore thoſe cauſes of diſcord might be taken away, and the hindrance of Traffique removed, he required them to yield unto him the Iſland of Cyprus; which if they refuſed to do, he would by force of Arms take it from them; and by force of ſtrong hand cauſe them to do that which they might the better have done frankly and of their own accord; and further to make them underſtand how far the Turks did excel all othet Men in Martial proweſs. As for the League before made betwixt his Father and them, he ſaid he had renewed the ſame, not becauſe he had any liking thereunto, but becauſe he had as then ſet down with himſelf, for a while in the beginning of his Empire peceably to endure all things.

The anſwer of the Venetians to the Turks Demands.

The Venetians, for that they knew the Embaſſadors errand before his coming, having now read his Letters, gave him ſuch anſwer as they had before reſolved upon; which was, That the Venetians had at all times inviolably kept their Leagues with the Othoman Emperors, and had in regard thereof let ſlip many opportunities and fit occaſions for them to have augmented their Dominions in; That they could without any danger to themſelves, have deſtroyed the Turks Fleet both at the Rhodes and Malta, and other places alſo; but that they more regarded their Honour; and alwaies thought, that nothing better became great and magnificent Princes, than to perform their Faith once given, and in all their actions to be like themſelves. And therefore had diſſembled and put up many grievous and bitter indignities, leſt they might be thought to have firſt broken the League; That they had never paſſed their own Bounds, or invaded the Turks; only to have taken order, that no Pyrates ſhould at their pleaſure roam up and down the Seas. Now whereas all Duties being on their part ſincerely and moſt religiouſly kept, Selymus complained himſelf to be wronged, whereas he himſelf had done the wrong, and had contrary to the League, denounced War againſt them, expecting nothing leſs; ſiththence that they could not by the power of the League, they would by force of Arms defend that Kingdom, which they by ancient and lawful right poſſeſſed, delivered unto them by their Anceſtors. That God, in whoſe help they truſted, would weigh in indifferent Balance, all Mens Words and Deeds; whom they took to witneſs, that they were the Authors of Peace, and Selymus the cauſe of War; and that the ſame God would be now preſent unto their juſt complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take revenge on them, which falſifying their Faith and Promiſe given, and violating the ſacred League, had enforced them to take up moſt juſt and neceſſary Arms, which they would with the ſame Courage mannage, that they had taken them in hand.

The Turks Embaſſador ſent away in ſecret from Venice.

With this anſwer the Embaſſador departed, let out by a ſecret Poſtern, for fear of the People; who having got knowledge of the matter, were in great number aſſembled to the Court-Gate, muttering among themſelves, that it were well done to rend in pieces that accurſed Turk, the Meſſenger of his faithleſs Maſter. Which outrage it was thought they would in their fury have performed, had not ſuch as by the commandment of the Magiſtrates guarded him, better aſſured him of his ſafety, than either regard of Duty or the Law of Nations; he by the way as he went ſtill ſtorming, and ſwearing by his Mahomet to be of that ſo great an indignity revenged. This anſwer of the Senate unto the Turks Embaſſador concerning War, was of ſome well liked and highly commended, as full of Honour and Valour. Others deemed it too ſharp, liking of nothing that was ſaid or done to the further incenſing of the Turkiſh Emperor; being of opinion, that they might have of him obtained a more indifferent Peace by Courteſie, than by Rigor. As for the decreed War, they utterly diſliked, foraſmuch as all Wars were woful, but eſpecially thoſe that were to be maintained againſt them that are too ſtrong for us. In ſuch diverſity of opinions it appeared, That the Senate ſhould of that ſo honourable a Decree reap ſuch commendation, as the Event thereof ſhould afford (than which nothing is more unreaſonable;) if things fell out well, then it was wiſely and worthily done; if otherwiſe, than was it like to be reputed a fooliſh, raſh, and woful reſolution.

The reſolution of the Senate for War diverſly liked and diſliked of others.

The greater the danger was now feared from the angry Turk, the more careful were the Venetians of their State; wherefore they forthwith ſent Meſſengers with Letters unto the Governors of Cyprus; charging them with all carefulneſs and diligence to make themſelves ready to withſtand the Turk, and to raiſe what power they were able in the Iſland, not omitting any thing that might concern the good of the State; and at the ſame time made choiſe of their moſt valiant and expert Captains both by Sea and Land, unto whom they committed the defence of their diſperſed Seigniory, with the leading of their Forces. Hieronimus Zanias was appointed Admiral, Lucas Michael was ſent into Crete, Franſciſcus Barbarus into Dalmatia, Sebaſtianus Venerius into Corcyra, all Men of great Honour, Experience and Valour. Other meaner Captains were alſo ſent with leſs charge into the aforeſaid places, as Eugenius Singliticus a noble Gentleman with a thouſand Footmen into Cyprus, who had alſo the leading of all the Horſemen in the Iſland; after whom Count Martinengus promiſed to follow with two thouſand Footmen more. The ſtrong Cities were now by the Venetians in all places new fortified, Armor, Ordnance, and Victual provided, and whatſoever elſe they thought needful for defence of their State. And foraſmuch as they well knew they had to do with too mighty an Enemy, they by their Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, earneſtly ſolicited moſt of the Chriſtian Princes to joyn with them in League, and to give them aid againſt the common Enemy, who as he was too ſtrong for any one of them, ſo was he not able to ſtand againſt their united Forces. But the Emperor Maximilian excuſed himſelf by the League he had not long before made with the Turk for eight years, which he ſaid he might not break; yet he had before his Eyes a moſt pregnant example, what ſmall reckoning the Turk maketh of his Faith and League, which he without any juſt cauſe had broken with the Venetians. The like excuſe uſed alſo Charles the French King, and Sigiſmund King of Polonia; who both ſeemed to be very ſorry for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turk, but could not help them, for that they were in League with the Turkiſh Emperor. Nevertheleſs the French did them the Courteſie, to offer himſelf to be a Mediator, if they ſo pleaſed, betwixt them and Selymus. The young King of Portugal Don Sebaſtian pretended alſo for his excuſe the great Plague which had but a little before raged in his Kingdom, and much diminiſhed his People; as alſo that he was to maintain Wars by Sea againſt the Turks in the Eaſt-Indies, to the no leſs benefit of the Chriſtian Common-weal, than if he ſhould aid the Venetians in the Mediterranean. Only Pius Quintus then Pope, and Philip King of Spain, with certain of the Princes of Italy; namely Philibert Duke of Savoy, Guido Udebaldus Duke of Urbin, Coſmus Medices Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, promiſed them aid, which they afterward moſt honourably performed.

The Emperor, the French King, and the King of Polonia entangled with their Leagues, refuſed to aid the Venetians againſt the Turks.

What Chriſtian Princes promiſed to aid the Venetians.

Selymus of himſelf angry with the Venetians, and firm in his reſolution for the Conqueſt of Cyprus, was upon the report of Cubates his Embaſſadors bad entertainment at Venice, further enraged; he deemed the Maieſty of the Turkiſh Emperor contemned, and himſelf in the perſon of his Embaſſador diſgraced; ſeeing that they whom he had thought would have yielded unto any thing, rather than the League ſhould have been broken, had ſent him ſuch a ſhort anſwer, and ſo contemptuouſly uſed his Embaſſador, unto whom they had not afforded ſo much as common Courteſie. It did not a little move him alſo, that the Venetians had in their Letters ſent by his Embaſſador, omitted the glorious Titles uſually given the Turkiſh Emperors; wherefore in ſome part to ſatisfie his angry mood, he cauſed Marcus Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embaſſador, and all the Chriſtian Merchants of the Weſt throughout his Empire, to be clapt up in priſon, and their Ships ſtaied under an arreſt. And ſetting all other things apart, ſet himſelf wholly for the preparing of ſuch things as ſhould be needful for the intended War.

But foraſmuch as the Iſland of Cyprus was the Prey whereafter the greedy Tyrant ſo much gaped, and for which the bloody Wars betwixt the Turk and the Venetians with their Chriſtian Confederats, preſently enſued; it ſhall not be from our purpoſe to ſpend a few words in the deſcribing thereof, as the Stage whereon the bloody Tragedy following was as it were acted; as alſo how it came firſt into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them ſo long poſſeſſed (although it be in ſome part before declared) until it was now by Selymus the great Turk, againſt all right injuriouſly demanded, and at length by ſtrong hand by him wreſted from them. This Iſland lieth in the fartheſt part of the Cilician Sea; it hath on the Eaſt Syria, on the Weſt Pamphilia, Southward it regardeth Egypt, and Northward Cilicia, now called Caramania. It is worthyly accounted amongſt the greateſt Iſlands of the Mediterranean, containing in circuit four hundred and twenty ſeven miles, and is in length (after the deſcription of Strabo) an hundred and ſeventy five miles, and in breadth not above ſixty five. It aboundeth with Corn, Wine, Oyl, Cotton-Wool, Saffron, Hony, Roſin, Turpentine, Sugar-Canes, and whatſoever elſe is needful for the ſuſtentation of Man, whereof it ſends forth great abundance to other Countries, of whom it craveth no help again. It was in ancient time called Macaria, that is to ſay, Bleſſed. The People therein generally lived ſo at eaſe and pleaſure, that thereof the Iſland was dedicated to Venus, who was there eſpecially worſhipped, and thereof cally Cypria. Marcellinus to ſhew the Fertility thereof, ſaith, That Cyprus aboundeth with ſuch plenty of all things, that without the help of any Forraign Country, it is of it ſelf able to build a tall Ship from the Keel to the top Sail, and ſo put it to Sea furniſhed of all things needful. And Sextus Rufus writing thereof, ſaith, Cyprus famoſa divitiis, paupertatem populi Romani, ut occuparetur ſolicitavit, ita ut jus ejus Inſulæ avarius magis quam injuſtius aſſecuti, ſcil. Cyprus famous for Wealth, allured the Poverty of the People of Rome to lay hold upon it, ſo that we have rather covetouſly than juſtly got the rule thereof. In the heart of the Iſland ſtandeth Nicoſia, ſometime the Regal and late Metropolitical City thereof. And in the Eaſt end thereof Famaguſta, ſometime called Tamaſſus, a famous rich City, the chief and only Port of all that moſt pleaſant Iſland. Other fair Cities there be alſo, as Paphos, Amathus (now called Limiſſo) and Cyrene. This Iſland of it ſelf long time maintained the Majeſty of a Kingdom, as then when Richard the Firſt, King of England, paſſing that way with his Fleet for the relief of the Chriſtians then diſtreſſed in the Holy Land about the year 1191, was prohibited there to land; and certain of his People by force of Tempeſt there caſt on Shore, were by the Cypriots either cruelly ſlain or taken Priſoners; which barbarous violence King Richard took in ſo evil part, that he there by force landed his Army, and reſted not until he had taken Iſaac the King Priſoner, and ſubdued the Iſland. The King he ſent in Chains of Silver to Tripolis, there to be kept in cloſe Priſon; the Kingdom he kept a while in his own hand, which not long after he gave, or as ſome ſay, exchanged with Guido the titular King of Jeruſalem, for which cauſe the Kings of England for a certain time afterwards were honoured with the Title of the Kings of Jeruſalem. This Kingdom by many deſcents came at length to Janus Son of King Peter, who in the year 1423, was by Melechel a Sultan of Egypt taken Priſoner; but afterwards for the ranſom of an hundred and fifteen thouſand Sultanins was ſet at liberty and reſtored to his Kingdom, paying unto the Sultan and his Succeſſors a yearly Tribute of forty thouſand Crowns. This Janus left a Son called John, who after the death of his Father married the Daughter of the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat; after whoſe death he married one Helena of the moſt noble Houſe of the Paleologi in Grecia, by whom he had one only Daughter called Carlotte; but by another Woman a baſe Son called James. This King John was a Man of no Courage, altogether given to pleaſure, and according to the manner of his effeminate education, ſhewed himſelf in all things more like a Woman than a Man; which Helena his Wife, a Woman of a great Spirit, quickly perceiving, took upon her the Soveraignty and whole Government of the Realm, gracing and diſgracing whom ſhe pleaſed, and promoting to the Eccleſiaſtical Dignities ſuch as ſhe beſt liked; aboliſhing the Latin Ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greeks, and took ſuch further order as pleaſed her ſelf in matters of State concerning both Peace and War; her Husband in the mean time regarding nothing but his vain pleaſure; whereby it came to paſs that all was brought into the power of the Greeks the Queens Friends. Now the Queen her ſelf was much ruled by the Counſel of her Nurſe, and the Nurſe by her Daughter; ſo that the People would commonly ſay, The Daughter ruled the Nurſe, the Nurſe the Queen, and the Queen the King. The Nobility aſhamed and weary of this manner of Government, by general conſent of the People, ſent for John the King of Portugals Couſin-German (whom ſome call the King of Portugal) to whom they gave Carlotte the Kings Daughter in marriage, with full power to ſupply that want of Government which was in King John his Father in Law. He taking the Authority into his Hands, quickly reformed the diſordered Kingdom, as well in matters concerning Religion, as civil Policy. The Latin Ceremonies were again reſtored, and the Government of the Daughter, the Nurſe, and the Queen, brought to an end. But the miſchievous Daughter doubting the Countenance of the young King, perſwaded her Mother, as ſhe tendred her own Life, to poiſon the King. Which thing the wretched Woman (by the conſent of the Queen Mother, as was reported) in ſhort time performed, and ſo brought that noble Prince, well worthy longer life, unto his untimely end; whereby the Government was again reſtored unto the Greek Queen, who in the name of her weak Husband commanded again at her pleaſure. But above all, the Nurſe and her Daughter inſulted upon the young Queen Carlotte; which ſhe not well brooking, grievouſly complained thereof to James her baſe Brother, requiring his help for redreſs thereof; who not long after ſlew the Nurſes Daughter, not ſo much in revenge of the wrong by her done unto his Siſter, as to prepare a way for himſelf for the obtaining of the Kingdom; grieving inwardly, that ſhe or her Husband ſhould be preferred before himſelf. Which thing Helena the Queen quickly perceiving, perſwaded the King her Husband to cauſe his baſe Son to enter into the orders of Prieſthood, and ſo to become a Churchman, thereby to cut off all his hope of aſpiring unto the Kingdom; which the King at her inſtance did, and made him Archbiſhop of Nicoſia. In the mean time Carlotte by the perſwaſion of her Mother and the Nobility of the Country, married Lewis Son to the Duke of Savoy; who being for that purpoſe ſent for, came with all ſpeed to Cyprus. After that, the Queen-Mother and the old Nurſe (deſiring nothing more, than to revenge the death of the Nurſes Daughter upon James now Archbiſhop) deviſed firſt how to thruſt him out of all his ſpiritual Promotions, which were great, and afterward quite baniſh him the Kingdom. Hereupon the Queen wrote Letters againſt him to the Pope, to have him diſgraded, for that he being a Man baſe born, with his hands imbrued with innocent Blood, was unworthy of holy Orders. Which Letters by chance came to James his hands; who inraged therewith, accompanied with a number of his Friends and Favorites, ſuddenly entred the Court, ſlew ſuch of his Enemies as he found there, divided their Goods amongſt his Followers, and as King poſſeſſed himſelf of the Regal City. In this Broil the Greek Queen Helena died, and ſhortly after her Husband alſo. All things being thus in an hurly and out of order, certain of the Nobility for redreſs thereof, ſent for Lewis the Husband of Carlotte, as for him to whom that Kingdom in the right of his Wife moſt juſtly belonged; who upon his arrival was of all ſorts of Men joyfully received and welcomed as their King. James the Uſurper underſtanding before of the coming of Lewis, and perceiving the inclination of the People towards him, fled with divers of his Friends to Alexandria to crave aid of the Egyptian Sultan; in whoſe Court he found ſuch Favour, as that he was by the Sultans commandment Royally apparelled, and honoured with the Title of the King of Cyprus, which he promiſed for ever to hold of the Sultans of Egypt as their Vaſſal and Tributary. At which time the Sultan alſo by his Embaſſadors commanded Lewis to depart the Iſle, who by all means ſought to have pacified the Sultan, declaring unto him his rightful Title, yet offering to pay unto him the wonted Tribute, and to allow unto James a yearly Penſion of ten thouſand Ducats during his life. But all in vain, for James ſtill preſent in the Sultans Court, and wiſely following his own ſuit, at laſt concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a King, than to confirm a King) and receiving of him a great Army, returned into Cyprus; where in ſhort time he ſo diſtreſſed Lewis, that he was glad to forſake the Iſland, with his Wife, and to return into his Country; leaving the Kingdom of Cyprus again to James; who now by the ſupportation of the Egyptian Sultan poſſeſſed thereof, yet lived not without care of Carlotte and her Husband Lewis, whom he knew the Cypriots wonderfully affected. Wherefore for the more aſſurance of his Eſtate, he thought it beſt to joyn in League and Friendſhip with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at Sea, and of all other fitteſt to croſs whatſoever Lewis ſhould in the right of his Wife attempt againſt him. Which League he afterwards made, and the better to confirm the ſame, took to Wife Catharine Cornelia, the Daughter of Marcus Cornelius a Magnifico of Venice, being before adopted to the Senate, and ever after their reputed Daughter. Not long after this marriage, James died in the year 1470. leaving the Queen great with Child, who in due time was delivered of a fair Son; unto whom with the Mother the Venetian State became Tutors, as their adoptive Fathers, and in their behalf took upon them the Government of the Realm. This Child ſhortly after died alſo, not without ſome ſuſpicion of Poiſon, after whoſe death great Troubles aroſe in the Kingdom, inſomuch that Andreas Cornelius the Queens Uncle, a moſt grave Counſellor, and Governor of the Realm under the Queen, was by the Conſpiracy of certain Noblemen ſlain, and all the Iſland ready to revolt from the Queen. For appeaſing of which Troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to ſend their Admirals with their Gallies into Cyprus, to take order in the matter, and to aid the Queen; who at length perſwaded by George Cornelius her Brother, whilſt it was yet in her power, as a loving Daugter to yield up the Kingdom unto her adoptive Fathers, which ſhe deſtitute both of Counſel and Power, could not long hold ſo far from her Friends, beſet on one ſide with the great Turk, and on the other with the mighty Sultan of Egypt. She I ſay thus perſwaded by her Brother, came to Venice, where ſhe was with the greateſt Honour that could be deviſed, received by the Duke and whole State at Sea in their great and goodly Ship the Beucentaure, and ſo with all Royal Triumph brought through the midſt of the City unto the place moſt richly for the time appointed for the receiving of her; where ſhortly after attired in all her Royal Habiliments ſhe came in great Majeſty unto the Senate Houſe, and there before the Tribunal Seat of Auguſtinus Barbadicus then Duke of Venice, laid down her Crown and Scepter, and as a moſt loving Daughter reſigned up her Kingdom, to the great honour and profit of her Country. Thus the Kingdom of Cyprus was delivered into the hands of the Venetians in the year 1473; which they peaceable held from that time, paying unto the Sultans of Egypt ſuch Tribute as had the late King James: which yearly Tribute they in like manner paid unto the Turkiſh Emperors, after that the Kingdom of Egypt was by Selymus the firſt conquered in the year 1517, as due unto him by Law of Arms; with which yearly Tribute both Selymus himſelf and Solyman after him, held themſelves well contented. But now this Turkiſh Emperor Selymus the Second, of whom we ſpeak, deſirous both of the honour of ſuch a Conqueſt, and of ſo rich a Prey, made no account of the accuſtomed Tribute, but of the fruitful Iſland it ſelf; whereof he, as is before declared, hath by his Embaſſador made a proud demand, but is thereof denied by the Senate.

Pial Baſſa ſent againſt the Venetians.

Selymus throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſary for the Invaſion of Cyprus, in the beginning of February ſent a great power both of Horſe and Foot into Epirus, and the Frontiers of Dalmatia, to forrage the Venetian Territory, eſpecially about Jadera; of purpoſe by that War ſo near at home, to withdraw them from the defence of Cyprus ſo far off. About the middle of April following he ſent Pial Baſſa with fourſcore Gallies and thirty Galliots to keep the Venetians from ſending aid into Cyprus. This Pial was an Hungarian, born of baſe Parents, but turning Turk, and giving himſelf to Arms, was firſt preferred for his Valour ſhewed againſt the Chriſtians at Zerbi, and afterwards by many degrees roſe to the honour of one of the greateſt Baſſaes. He departing from Conſtantinople, and cutting through Peloponneſus and Heleſpontus, came to Eubœa, and there for certain days lay in ſuch order, as if he ſhould have preſently given the Enemy Battel; but underſtanding by his Eſpials, that the Venetians grievouſly viſited with the Plague, and ſlowly relieved by their Friends, were not like in haſte to come out, he took his Courſe to Tenos an Iſland of the Venetians, to have taken it from them. This Iſland is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature ſtrong, but ſtronger by the induſtry of the Defendants; who living far from the Chriſtian Countries, and compaſſed about with ſuch cruel and warlike Enemies, as people far diſtant ſtood in dread of, could never for any fear or danger be removed from the Chriſtian Religion, or induced to ſubmit themſelves to the Turks Government, as moſt of the other Iſlands had. Pial here landing his Forces, ſought both by fair means and foul to have perſwaded the Inhabitants to have yielded up their Town; but when he could get nothing of them but foul words again, he began by force to aſſault the ſame. Two days the Town was valiantly both aſſaulted and defended; but at length the Turks perceiving how little they prevailed, and that the Defendants were reſolutely ſet down for the defence of themſelves and their Country; ſhamefully gave over the Aſſault, and abandoning the Iſland, directed their Courſe toward Cyprus. For Muſtapha Author of that Expedition (for his ancient hatred againſt the Chriſtians made General by Selymus) had before appointed Pial Baſſa at a time prefixed to meet him at the Rhodes, and that he that came firſt ſhould tarry for the other, that ſo they might together ſail into Cyprus.

Muſtapha having before ſent a great part of his Army by Land into Pamphilia, embarqued the reſt with Haly Baſſa General of the Forces at Sea, who yet ſtaid for him with the reſt of the Fleet at Conſtantinople. This Haly was one of the chief Baſſaes, a man of great account, and ſometime an eſpecial and noted Follower of Muhamet Baſſa; but now (as it is oftentimes elſewhere ſeen, that Men together with the change of Fortune, change their Minds and Affections alſo) was become a great Favorite of Muſtapha. Now to colour ſo manifeſt a wrong and breach of the Turks Faith, Muſtapha the General, according to the Turkiſh manner, a little before his arrival in Cyprus, gave the Venetians there to underſtand by Letters of his coming, as alſo of his purpoſe for the taking of that Iſland from them; for that without ſome ſuch ſlender denouncing of War unto them againſt whom it is intended, the Turks generally account their Expeditions not to be altogether ſo lawful or fortunate as otherwiſe; and therefore writ unto them in this ſort:

Muſtapha Baſſa unto the Venetians:

Muſtapha Baſſa his Letters unto the Venetians.

That the Kingdom of Cyprus by ancient right belongeth unto the Kingdom of Egypt, you are not ignorant; which being conquered by the Turks, is together with it become of right a part alſo of the Othoman Empire; that Iſland we come to challenge, leading after us two hundred thouſand valiant Souldiers; unto which power, and the Wealth of the Othoman Kingdoms (all which, the moſt mighty Emperor is about, if need ſhall be, to ſend thither, and to bend his whole ſtrength thereon) all the united Forces of the Chriſtian Kings are not comparable; much leſs the Venetians, ſo ſmall a part of Europe, forſaken of their Friends, can ſuffice. Wherefore we will and exhort you, for the ancient amity which hath been betwixt your State and the victorious Othoman Family, to yield this Kingdom unto the moſt puiſſant Emperor, whoſe very name is become dreadful unto all the Nations of the World; and quietly and without reſiſtance to leave the Iſland, with the Love and Friendſhip of ſo great a Monarch to be for ever inviolably kept betwixt him and you. Whereas if you ſhall before ſuch wholſome Counſel, fondly prefer your vain hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of War, with ſuch dreadful examples as the angry Conquerors uſe to make of their vanquiſhed Enemies. For reſolution whereof, we yet give you half a months ſpace to bethink your ſelves in: and ſo fare you well.

Muſtapha Baſſa goeth for Cyprus.

All this being now in readineſs, and a moſt Royal Gally of wonderful greatneſs and beauty by the appointment of Selymus prepared for the great Baſſa the General; he together with Haly Baſſa and the reſt of the Fleet departed from Conſtantinople the ſix and twentieth of May, and at the Rhodes met with Pial, as he had befor appointed. The whole Fleet at that time conſiſted of two hundred Gallies, amongſt whom were divers Galliots, and ſmall Men of War, with divers other Veſſels prepared for the tranſportation of Horſes; with this Fleet Muſtapha kept on his Courſe for Cyprus. They of the Iſland in the mean time carefully attending the Enemies coming, from their Watch-Towers firſt diſcovered their Fleet at the Weſt end of the Iſland, not far from Paphos; from whence the Turks turning upon the right hand, and paſſing the Promontory Curia, now called Del Le Gate, landed divers of their Men, who burnt and ſpoiled certain Villages, and with with ſuch Spoil and Priſoners as they had taken, returned again unto the Fleet; which holding on their former Courſe, came at length to a place called Salinæ (of the abundance of Salt there made) where they knew was beſt landing, and there in an open Road came to an Anchor, where the Baſſa's without any reſiſtance upon a plain Shore landed their Army.

The Turks Fleet deſcried in Cyprus.

The Turks land in Cyprus.

Now all the hope of the Chriſtians, was to have kept the Turks from landing, which they ſhould with all their ſtrength and power have done; neither was it a matter of any great difficultie, for had the Defendants but kept the Shore; and from the dry and firm Land valiantly repulſed their Enemies, they might undoubtedly with their Shot and Weapons have kept them from landing, or elſe have done them greater harm; knowing in the mean time, that in all the Iſland was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open Road ſubject to all Wind and Weather, they could not long without danger of Shipwrack ride it out; but they either terrified with the greatneſs of the Fleet, or prevented by the celerity of the Enemy, to their great hurt omitted ſo fair an opportunity, as the woful ſequel of the matter declared. It exceedingly incouraged the Turks that they had ſo eaſily footed the Iſland, which they thought they ſhould not have not done without a bloody Fight.

The Baſſa now landed, preſently intrenched his Army, and forthwith ſent the Fleet to tranſport the reſt of his Forces out of Pamphilia into the Iſland. And at the ſame time ſent out certain Scouts to take ſome Priſoners, of whom they might learn the ſituation of the Country, the beſt ways to paſs them with his Army, the ſtrength of his Enemies, and what they did, and many other ſuch like things which it concerned him to know. But the greateſt queſtion among the Turks themſelves was, Whether they ſhould firſt ſet upon Famaguſta or Nicoſia? Famaguſta ſtandeth low, altogether ſubject to the ſcorching Heat, which was then great, according as the time of the year, and nature of the Country required; wherefore the Baſſa for fear of diſeaſes to ariſe in his Army of the immoderate heat and unwholeſome ſituation of the place, thought it better to begin his Wars with the Siege of Nicoſia, and to make that City the ſeat of the War, for the conqueſt of the reſt of the Iſland. So having put all things in order, and well viewed the Country, and finding nothing he need to ſtand in doubt of, he ſet forward with his Army toward Nicoſia, which was about thirty miles diſtant, being the chief and richeſt City of all the Iſland. Which way ſoever the Army marched, it ſpread a great deal of ground; and the nearer it came, the greater was the ſlaughter of the Country people, and the number of Priſoners taken of all ſorts. But when news of the Enemies approach was brought unto the City, a general fear preſaging future miſery poſſeſſed the hearts of all Men. There was not in the City any valiant or renowned Captain, who as the danger of the time required, ſhould have taken upon him the charge; neither any ſtrong Army in the Iſland to oppoſe againſt the Enemy; the Governour of the City was one Nicholaus Dandulus, a Man too weak for ſo great a burthen; who always brought up in Civil Affairs, was to ſeek how to defend a Siege. Of the Citiſens and Country people he had taken up four thouſand Footmen, and a thouſand Horſemen, all raw Souldiers, commanded by the Gentlemen of the Country, Men of all others moſt courteous; but as well the Captains as the Souldiers, as Men brought up in a plentiful Country, fitter for Pleaſure than for War. The greateſt hope and ſtrength of the City, was repoſed in twelve hundred Italian Footmen, and ſix hundred Horſemen. The whole number of the Souldiers in Garriſon for defence of the City, was deemed about 8000 Horſe and Foot; too weak a Company againſt ſo fierce and ſtrong an Enemy; and the more, for that the Baſſa an old and moſt expert General was there in perſon himſelf preſent, a moſt ſevere and abſolute Commander, whom it would have been a hard matter to have withſtood with equal power. The Venetians had ever had great care of the Iſland of Cyprus, as lying far from them, in the midſt of the ſworn Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to have fortified the ſame; yet fearing thereby to ſeem to diſtruſt or dread the Turks, and ſo give them occaſion of offence, left it ſtill undone. This City of Nicoſia ſtandeth in the midſt of the Iſland, in a plain and champain Country, compaſſed round with a Wall, as if it had been drawn with a compaſs, and is in circuit about five miles; for the manner of the ſituation, and magnificent buildings, as well publick as private, many have compared it unto the beautiful City of Florence in Italy; and was for the wholeſome and commodious ſituation thereof notably peopled. This City had the Venetians of late fortified with new Walls, thick Rampiers, and eleven ſtrong Bulwarks, according to the manner of the fortification of our time, and had raiſed three great Fortreſſes for defence of the Wall, which they furniſhed with a ſtrong Garriſon, great ſtore of Artillery, and other warlike proviſion. Nevertheleſs, they found by experience in this War, That Fortifications are ſtrengthned by the Defendants, rather than the Defendants by the Fortifications.

Muſtapha Baſſa marcheth towards Nicoſia.

Nicholaus Dandulus Governour of Nicoſia.

The deſcription of Nicoſia.

The Turks before Nicoſia.

The 22 of July, the Baſſa with his Army encamped within a mile and a half of the City, when preſently the Turks by Troops iſſuing out of the Camp, rid contemptuouſly before the Walls and Gates of the City, and with often and loud outcries upbraided the Defendants; which by them being anſwered with ſilence, was taken as a token of their fear. And Muſtapha himſelf coming as near as he might without danger, took full view of the Walls and ſituation of the City. Shortly after, the Enemy drew nearer unto the City into a more open plain, and with their Tents filled the lower part of the Hill, which they called Mandia; but the Baſſaes Tent they ſet aloft upon the Hill, to the terror of the Defendants and encouragment of the Turks. The Camp being fortified, the Turks with incredible labour and celerity brought their Trenches from far, and at the firſt caſt up ſome few Forts, but afterwards, as their Army encreaſed, many more; which they raiſed ſo high, that they overtopped the Walls of the City, and made the place more dangerous for the Chriſtians to defend. There having placed ſeventy great Pieces of Battery, they began to batter the City both day and night without intermiſſion; with ſuch an horrible thundring, that the Earth trembled, the Houſes ſhook as if they would have faln down; at which time many were ſlain; both with the deadly Shot, and the broken pieces of Stones beaten out of the Walls; never was ſuch a fear as then within the City of Nicoſia; every day the Enemy brought his Trenches nearer and nearer, and reſted not until he had with reſtleſs labour brought them unto the very brim of the Town-Ditch, which the Citiſons before the coming of the Turks had not well ſcoured. Being come ſo nigh, they firſt skirmiſhed a far off with their ſmall Pieces; but afterwards, they not only battered the Walls with their great Artillery, but with with ſmall Shot, Arrows, and Stones, overwhelmed the Defendants, as if it had been a ſhower of Hail; ſo to have driven them from off the Wall and Rampiers. In few days, not only all the Curtains betwixt three of the Bulwarks, was by the fury of the great Ordnance beaten down, but all places thereabout lay full of the dead Bodies of the aſſailants and defendants. For although the Chriſtians fought at great diſadvantage, both for the number of Men, and indifferency of the place; yet deſperation joyned with exteam neceſſity, of all other the greateſt Weapon, gave them ſuch courage, as with Shot, Stones, Timber, and ſuch like, to keep down their Enemies, and defend their Walls; and oftentimes to make great ſlaughter of them, with their Atillery and murthering Pieces, bent upon them as at a certain mark, who the thicker they ſtood the greater was their harm. They alſo oftentimes diſmounted many of the great Pieces and made them unſerviceable; and with Feather-beds and Sacks of Cotten-wool, made up their Breaches; which the Turks laboured again to burn with Pich-barrels, and Earthen-pots full of Wild-fire. After long fight the Turks entring the Ditch, made themſelves two ways to the Walls, which they fortified on both ſides with Fagots and Earth; in ſuch ſort, as that they were ſafe from the loops of the Bulwarks which flankered the Ditch. All this quickly performed, ſome preſently ſet up ſcaling Ladders; others filled the Ditches with Rubbiſh, Wood, Fagots, and Earth; and others in the mean time with Mattocks and Leavers were digging down the Foundations of the Bulwarks Conſtance and Podocatera, taking name of them that had the chief charge in the building thereof. The Chriſtians right valiantly endured the firſt Aſſault of the Enemy, and ſtruck down dead into the Ditches many of them that were climbing up the Ladders; and had in ſhort time ſlain more than they were themſelves in number, and inforced the reſt to give over the Aſſault. Theſe things were done in the beginning of the Siege, whilſt yet both parties were ſtrong; in which hard conflicts a great number of Souldiers were loſt and moſt of the Canoniers ſlain. After this Aſſault, both parties for a while buſied themſelves and ſpent the time in their ingenious devices; wherein it appeared, that the Turks were much cunninger in deviſing of means to take Cities, than were thoſe Chriſtians in defending the ſame.

Now had the Venetians in the firſt motions of theſe Wars, prayed aid of divers Chriſtian Princes, from moſt part of whom they received but cold comfort, as is before declared; yet now at length (though ſomewhat late) they had drawn into the confederation of this War, the Pope and the King of Spain; by whoſe example ſome other Princes of Italy moved, put to alſo their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter moſt concerned, had in good time put their Fleet to Sea; but knowing themſelves too weak to incounter the Turks, they lay ſtill upon the Coaſt of Dalmatia, about Jadera, expecting the coming of the Spaniſh Admiral with his Gallies. Two Months (wherein much might have been done) were now paſt in this expedition, and yet no news of his coming; ſo that what the ſpeed and induſtry of the Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingring of the Spaniard, marred. Beſides that, the Plague began to ariſe in the Fleet, lying ſo long in one place; which at length grew ſo hot, that many of the Gallies had neither Mariner nor Souldier left in them; neither did this Mortality ſo ceaſe, until there were twenty thouſand dead thereof; amongſt whom were many Noble Gentlemen of great account, which might have done their Country good ſervice, had they been in time imployed.

The Venetian Fleet of an hundred and ſeventeen Sail at Corcyra.

Summer now almoſt half ſpent, and the Plague well ceaſed, the Venetian Admiral weary of expecting of the coming of Auria the Spaniſh Admiral; gathering together his Fleet which he had before diſperſed to avoid the Infection, ſailed to Corcyra, where he met with Venerius, another of the Venetian Commanders, who there ſtaid for him, having but a little before taken from the Turks Ceſtria, now called Suppoto, a Town upon the Sea Coaſt over againſt Corcyra. The whole Fleet of the Venetians being aſſembled together, was an hundred and ſeventeen Sail, amongſt which were twelve great Galeaſſes; but all too weak to give Battel to the Turks, as being themſelves ſtronger in Shipping than in Men. Nevertheleſs, the Admiral ſorry and weary to ſee the ſpoil of the Venetian Territory, and moved with the diſtreſs of the beſieged in Nicoſia, rather than for any hope he had with that ſtrength to do any good againſt the Turks Eleet, departed from Corcyra towards Crete, and the twelfth of Auguſt landed at Suda, a Port of that Iſland. In the later end of this month, Columnius the Popes Admiral, and Auria Admiral for the King of Spain, arrived there alſo, whom the Venetian Admiral welcomed with great joy and triumph. The whole Fleet of the Confederate Princes now at length met together, conſiſted of an hundred ninety two Gallies, and twelve Galeaſſes, beſide Victualers and other ſmall Veſſels, laded with Munition and other neceſſary proviſion for the Fleet. Of theſe Gallies the Pope had ſet forth twelve, the King of Spain forty two, the reſt with the Galeaſſes were the Venetians. In this Fleet were embarked thirteen thouſand ſix hundred threeſcore Souldiers; of whom the Pope ſent eleven hundred, the King of Spain three thouſand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty. Theſe three great Commanders entring into counſel, what courſe to take in their proceedings in this War, after long diſcourſe too and fro, at length by the perſwaſion of Zanius the Venetian Admiral, reſolved to go directly for Cyprus, and to give the Turks Battel, in hope thereby to raiſe them from the Siege of Nicoſia. About the midſt of September, this great Fleet furniſhed with all things needful for ſuch an expedition, looſed from Crete, and with a fair gale of Wind ſet forward for Cyprus; in all their Courſe keeping ſuch order, as if they ſhould preſently have met with the Enemy. In the midſt of theſe troubles died Petrus Loredanus, Duke of Venice, leaving the reſt of the care of that War to Aloyſius Mocenicus, who ſucceeded him in the Dukedom.

The Chriſtian Fleet ſetteth forward toward Cyprus.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus ſlowly proceed in their ſo weighty Affairs, Muſtapha in the mean time laid hard Siege to Nicoſia; and dividing his Army into four parts, aſſaulted four of the Bulwarks of the City, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the Siege. The Aſſault was both long and terrible; Fury, and the very ſight of the warlike General, who was there a preſent witneſs, and beholder of every mans forwardneſs or cowardiſe (a matter of great moment) beſides their natural fierceneſs, carried the Turks headlong without any peril or danger. And on the other ſide, the greatneſs of the danger, the fear to loſe both life and liberty, with the hope of relief, encouraged the Defendants to dare any thing; ſo that the Turks could not approach the Walls, or mount the ſcaling Ladders, but they were preſently ſlain, or together with the Ladders thrown to the ground.

Many of the Turks were there ſlain, but eſpecially ſuch as were moſt forward; and of the Defendants were alſo more loſt than ſtood with the ſafety of ſo ſmall a number; and foraſmuch as few or none eſcaped out of that fight unwounded, the poor Defendants were brought unto a ſmall number. Many ſkilful men were of opinion, that the City might have been that day taken, if the aſſault had by the Baſſa been longer maintained, by bringing ſtill on freſh men; but ſuch was his loſs, as that he was glad for that time to give over the aſſault, and ſo with diſhonour to retire.

The Chriſtians ſally out of the City upon the Turks.

After this Aſſault, it was by ſome of the Captains thought good, that they ſhould (whilſt they were yet of ſome reaſonable ſtrength in the City) ſally forth upon the Enemy; ſo to make ſhew, that they had yet ſome good hope in themſelves, and withall by ſo ſudden an eruption to perform ſomething upon the ſecure Enemy. Of which motion, Dandulus the Governor in no caſe liked, as loth by ſuch a dangerous piece of Service to diminiſh the number of the Defendants, and ſo to give the Enemy an eaſier means to take the City. Yet ſeeing all the Captains generally of another mind, he yielded unto their deſire. So in the hoteſt time of the day, when as the Turks leaſt thought that the Chriſtians would have ſallied out, certain Italian Companies under the Conduct of Cæſar Plovianus of Vincentia, and Albertus Scotus, iſſued out by the Gate that leadeth to Famaguſta, and upon the ſudden brake into the Enemies Trenches; where they found the Turks, ſome playing, ſome ſleeping, but fearing nothing leſs than that the Chriſtians, whom they daily braved, durſt to have adventured to come forth. At the firſt entrance the Italians prevailed, and brought a great fear upon that quarter of the Turks Army, and ſlew many. But when the Turks, awaked with the Alarm, came running in on every ſide, the Italians oppreſſed with the multitude, were glad to retire; in which retreat divers of them were ſlain, and amongſt them their two Leaders Cæſar and Albertus; ſo that this ſally ſerved to no other purpoſe than to weaken the Defendants themſelves, and to cauſe the Turks to keep better Watch and Ward againſt ſuch ſudden Eruptions.

Scouts ſent out of the City, taken by the Turks and executed.

All hope of long defending the City now almoſt loſt, and that the Defendants could hardly ſtand upon the Walls, or ſhew their Heads without preſent danger; they for want of better Counſel, rather than for any hope of good Succeſs, ſent out certain Scouts, Men ſkilful of the Ways and Paſſages of the Country (whom they had for great Reward induced to undertake the matter) to crave Aid of the Country-people, that were in great multitude fled into the ſafety of the Mountains; and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their Relief, their Wives and Children, whom they had before ſent into the City, muſt needs in ſhort time fall into the Enemies hand, or periſh with hunger; but theſe Meſſengers were by the vigilant Enemy intercepted, and in the ſight of the beſieged tortured to death.

Letters ſhot into the City.

About the ſame time divers Letters were ſhot with Arrows into the City, to perſwade the beſieged Chriſtians to yield themſelves; for that in ſo doing they ſhould find the Baſſa a mild and merciful Conqueror; whereas otherwiſe if they ſhould by wilful holding out delay his Victory, they were ſure to indure whatſoever could be indured or ſuffered. But when Muſtapha had thus in vain with hope and fear tried the minds of the Defendants, he called forth to Parley certain Souldiers that were ſtanding upon the Bulwark called Conſtantius, of whom ſome were by the conſent of the Governor ſent forth unto him; unto whom Muſtapha by his Interpreter complained, That no anſwer was given unto his Letters; he ſet forth unto them the Glory, Power, and Greatneſs of the Turkiſh Empire; and debaſed the ſtrength of the Venetians; then he perſwaded them to yield, propounding unto them the miſeries that would fall upon them if the City ſhould by force be taken; which he threatned would be far greater than the danger the Turks were to undertake for the winning thereof; and that therefore it concerned none ſo much as themſelves, whether the City were given up by Compoſition, or elſe won by ſtrong hand; he ſhewed unto them the profit that ſhould ariſe unto them by yielding of it up, and offered to them large Entertainment, if they would ſerve him; and to conclude, told them, that they ſhould never afterwards find at his Hands ſo great Grace as was at that inſtant offered them. The crafty Baſſa did what he might to haſten the winning of the City, both for that he doubted the coming of the Chriſtian Fleet, and that his great Army was exceedingly troubled with contagious and grievous Diſeaſes, ariſing of the immoderate heat and drought in that ſo hot a Country. But the Souldiers thinking any thing more aſſured than the Turkiſh Faith; anſwered him. That they did not as yet doubt their own ſtrength, and that they were ready to indure any thing that could happen, rather than to prefer the uncertain Friendſhip of an unknown Prince, before the gracious Favour of ſuch worthy Princes as they had ſo good experience of.

Muſtapha Baſſa in vain perſwadeth them of Nicoſia to yield.

This Anſwer cut off all the Baſſaes hope for taking of the City by Compoſition; wherewith being both grieved and enraged, he commanded all things to be made ready for the Aſſault; and the more to encourage his Souldiers, promiſed unto them great Rewards and Honours that ſhould firſt or ſecond mount the Walls. After that, he gave a general aſſault unto the City, with all his Power; wherein both he as a moſt worthy Captain, and his Souldiers, fought moſt fiercely. You have to do (ſaid he) with the ſmall and laſt remainders of your Enemies; which are ſcarce able to ſtand or hold their Weapons in their Hands, rather than with Enemies indeed; ſhall you not then eaſily overcome them, being both few and feeble, that have vanquiſhed them when they were many and luſty? The end of all your Labours is at hand, your hoped Rewards approach; only play you the men, and faint not in this Aſſault; the Spoil of this rich City ſhall be the worthy reward of your Labours, the fruit of all your Travel conſiſteth in this one moment. Whilſt he thus incourageth ſome, and reproveth others, they mindful of his Promiſes, and theſe of the diſgrace, altogether with their thick ſhot ſuffer no Man to ſtand in ſafety upon the Walls, and out of their Forts alſo with their great Ordnance greatly annoyed the Defendants. This done, they attempted by the ruines of the Wall, and in other places by Scaling-Ladders to have entred the City. Which terrible Aſſault was by the cruel Enemy maintained, not for ſome few hours, but for divers days together without any intermiſſion, freſh men ſtill coming on in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlain. Yet did the Defendants valiantly endure all that Storm, and in ſuch weak caſe as they were, worthily performed what was poſſible for ſo few to do; yet ſtill in hope (the poor comfort of men in miſery) miſery) that Relief might come by the approach of the Chriſtian Fleet. At length, when the matter was brought to this Point, that the Turks were in great hope to have gained the Walls, and Muſtapha himſelf probably gueſſed, That the Chriſtians were now weary of the long Aſſault, and ſore weakned with Wounds and other infinite Miſeries, not to ſeek in a City ſo hardly diſtreſſed, and was in that his opinion alſo confirmed by certain Fugitive Chriſtians; he nevertheleſs upon the ſudden cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and ſo retiring into his Trenches, lay ſtill all the next day without any thing doing. The Defendants thinking that he had given over the Aſſault, becauſe of ſome Aid that was coming to their Relief, became more careleſs of the Enemy, and upon the vain hope of ſuch Aid, with leſs diligence repaired their Breaches, and provided for the repulſing of their Enemies. But the Baſſa in the mean time had choſen out of his whole Army about 200 of his beſt Captains and Souldiers, all Men of approved valour and agility of Body, whom the next day after, he ſent early in the Morning, to make proof if they could with Scaling-Ladders ſecretly and without any noiſe ſet up, get into the four Bulwarks which he had before ſore ſhaken with his great Ordnance. Theſe reſolute Men leading the way, got firſt up, after whom followed divers others, and ſo took the aforeſaid Bulwarks; when preſently after, other Companies of their Fellows which ſtood ready for the purpoſe, coming on forward, did with their Scaling-Ladders in divers places recover the top of the Walls; for now the matter was not done by ſecret ſurpriſe, but by open force. In every one of theſe Bulwarks were 70 Italians and as many Epirots, who there kept Watch and Ward; theſe Men part aſleep, as fearing no ſuch danger, and part lying laſily upon the ground, were there ſurpriſed on the ſudden and ſlain; other-ſome of them awaked with the ſtrange and uncouth noiſe, betook not themſelves luſtily to their Weapons, but forſaking their ſtations leapt down out of the Bulwarks at ſuch places as were next unto them, ſome for fear ran unawares into the midſt of their Enemies. Upon this Alarm ſome of the Chriſtian Captains came ſpeedily to the Walls with their Companies, as did Eugenius, who whilſt he in vain crieth out to ſuch fearful Souldiers as he met, that they ſhould not ſo cowardly fly, and ſtayeth others that were flying, was himſelf ſhot through with a ſmall ſhot and ſlain. Other Captains in other places likewiſe laboured in vain to have ſtaid the flying Souldiers, whoſe Perſwaſions, Requeſts, and Authority in ſo general a fear, nothing at that time prevailed.

Nicoſia moſt terribly aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Turks gain the Bulwarks and Walls of Nicoſia

Nicoſia taken by the Turks.

The Defendants thus beaten from the Walls and Bulwarks, gathered themſelves into the Market place; but the Citizens ſtealing home to their own Houſes, there ſtood in the Entrances of the ſame, fearfully expecting the deſtruction of the Country, together were their own. In the mean time the Governor of Aleppo with his Regiment ſcoured the Walls of the City round about, as he had in charge from the General; and without reſpect put to Sword all that he met armed or unarmed. At the Bulwark called Barbarus, it fortuned him to light upon a Company of Italians, who for a while fought deſperately, but were in the end overthrown and ſlain. When he had thus cleared the Walls, and left ſuch Companies as he thought good in places convenient for the keeping of them, he came down into the more open places of the City; and ſeeing them that were gathered together into the Market place to have caſt themſelves into a Ring, and to fight as Men altogether deſperate, he cauſed certain murthering Pieces to be bent upon them; which they perceiving, laid down their Weapons, and yielded themſelves unto the mercy of the Enemy. By and by all the Gates of the City were ſtrongly guarded by the Enemy, to the intent that no Man ſhould go in or out. Dandulus the Governor, and Contarenus the Biſhop of Paphos, with the reſt of the Nobility, and better ſort of the Citizens, had got themſelves into the Town-Hall, and there ſtood upon their Guard; unto whom Muſtapha ſent word, that he would take them all to mercy, if they would without further reſiſtance yield themſelves. But while Meſſengers run to and fro, the Turks violently brake in upon them, and there ſlew them every man. After the death of theſe Noblemen, the crued Enemy ſpared none; and having ſlain ſuch as they found abroad in the Streets, brake into the Houſes, where they made havock of all things; young Babes were violently taken out of the Arms of their Mothers, Virgins were ſhamefully raviſhed, and honeſt Matrons before their Husbands faces deſpightfully abuſed, Churches were ſpoiled, and all places filled with mourning and dead Bodies; the Streets were in all places ſtained with blood, for in the City was ſlain that day fourteen thouſand eight hundred threeſcore and ſix perſons. Neither was there any end of the ſpoil, until the greedy Enemy had carried away all the Wealth that long Peace had heaped up. It is reported, that the Prey there taken, amounted to twenty hundred thouſand millions of Ducats; 200 of the moſt goodly and beautiful Youths were choſen out of purpoſe to be ſent to Conſtantinople for a Preſent for Selymus. In the City were taken alſo 250 Pieces of great Ordnance; whereof ſome were by the Enemy carried away, and the reſt left for defence of the City. Thus the famous City of Nicoſia, ſometime the Regal Seat of the Kings of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September, in the year, 1570. in whoſe Power it ſtill remaineth.

A great ſlaughter.

Muſtapha having as he thought beſt diſpoſed of all things in Nicoſia, with the very terror of his name, rather than by any force, brought moſt part of the reſt of the Towns in the Iſland under his Obeiſance; and by fair intreaty and promiſe of good uſage, brought back again unto their wonted dwellings the rude Country-people, who upon the coming of the Turks were fled with all they had into the Mountains; them as Men not to be feared, he commanded to till and ſow their Land as they were wont. The City of Cyrene is ſtrongly ſituated, not far from the Sea, and was then well furniſhed of all things needful for the induring of a long Siege. Hither the Baſſa ſent one of the Sanzacks to Summon the City, more to prove the courage of the Defendants, than for any hope he had to have the City delivered unto him. But Alphonſus Palacius then Governor of the City, terrified with the loſs of Nicoſia, no ſooner ſaw the Enemy, but that without any further deliberation or force uſed againſt him, he delivered up the Town unto the Sanzack; covenanting only in reward of his cowardiſe, That he might in ſafety depart from thence with all his Garriſon-Souldiers; which was eaſily granted, and the City ſurrendred.

Not long after, Muſtapha leaving a thouſand Horſemen, and three thouſand Foot in Garriſon in Nicoſia, marched with the reſt of his Army to beſiege Famaguſta. And the more to terrifie them of the City, he by a poor Country-fellow, whom he had for that purpoſe ſet at liberty, ſent unto them in a Basket the Head of Nicholaus Dandulus, late Governour of Nicoſia, and at the ſame time ſent before him divers Horſemen, who upon their Horſemens ſtaves carried the Heads of many of the Noblemen ſlain at Nicoſia, wherewith they rid as in Triumph about the Walls of the City. Which thing he did, in hope that they of Famaguſta terrified with ſuch a ſpectacle, and the late overthrow of Nicoſia, would for fear of like miſery yield themſelves. But deceived in this his expectation, he encamped his Army about three miles from them City. Afterwards having taken view of the City, and well conſidered of the ſituation thereof, he with wonderful celerity caſt up divers Mounts againſt the ſame, and at the ſame time cauſed Battery to be laid againſt the great Tower which defended the Haven; he himſelf alſo in the mean while battering the Gate that leadeth to Amathus. But perceiving by the deſperate ſallies of the Defendants, their great courage, and that he was like to have much more to do in this Siege than he had in the winning of Nicoſia, and Winter alſo now drawing faſt on (being about the later end of September) he thought it beſt betime to provide, that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with ſo much labour and danger before gained; and the rather, for that it was commonly reported, that the Chriſtian Fleet was at hand; wherefore he roſe with his Army, and retired himſelf further off into the Country, where he ſhortly after bilited his Souldiers in the Villages round about for that Winter.

Muſtapha raiſeth his Siege.

The Turks at Sea advertiſed of the coming of the Chriſtian Fleet, prepare themſelves for Battel.

The Baſſaes at Sea, Haly and Pial, lying before Famaguſta, doubting the coming of the Chriſtian Fleet, which then lay at Crete, ſent out ſix Galliots to diſcover the doings of the Chriſtians; who returning with certain Priſoners taken in the Iſland of Crete, declared unto the Baſſaes what they had learned concerning the Chriſtian Fleet, and that it was already upon the way to Cyprus. Upon which intelligence the Baſſaes put their Fleet into the order of Battel, and ſet forwards towards Limiſſo to have met with the Chriſtians; who with a proſperous Wind were coming betwixt the Iſland of Caprathos and the Rhodes; but there underſtanding by their Eſpials, that Nicoſia was loſt, and that the Turks were come to beſiege Famaguſta; they called a Council of all the chief Commanders in the Fleet, to conſult what were beſt to do in ſo dangerous a caſe. Columnius the Popes Admiral, and then chief Commander in the Fleet, with Zanius the Venetian Admiral, were of opinion, That it were beſt to hold on their courſe for Cyprus, and to relieve Famaguſta; for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late Victory, were for deſire of prey, for moſt part gon aſhore into the Iſland, and ſo left their Fleet but ſlenderly manned. Beſide that, they alledged, That the Venetian Senate had expreſly decreed, That they ſhould give the Turks Battel. But Auria the Spaniſh Admiral thinking it, as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficulty and danger, was quite of another mind, ſaying, That he could not but marvel, how the Venetian Senators ſitting at their eaſe in Counſel, could before they knew their own ſtrength, and power of the Enemy, the nature of the Country, and purpoſe of their Foes, determine what were fit for Martial Men to do; unto whoſe actions no certain rule could be preſcribed. All the Shoars (he ſaid) were kept with the Enemies Garriſons; ſo that what need ſoever they ſhould have, they could neither come by Water or Wood, or put into any Harbor. Beſides that, the Enemy would give them Battel at his own pleaſure, and not at theirs; for that they were not of ſo much power, as to enforce him to fight: And that if the Senate, which uſed to do all things warily, and with great adviſement, did but ſee the weakneſs of their Gallies; wanting both Souldiers and Mariners, they would be of another mind. He alledged further, That they were to wage War in the Enemies Country, where there was no Port to receive their Fleet, no peaceable place, no confederate City, nor King to friend; whereas the time of the year grew every day worſe and worſe, when as they had neither Harbour to put into, neither were able to abide the Sea. And now that Nicoſia was loſt, for the relief whereof they were come ſo far, there was no reaſon longer for them to ſtay, the Enemy ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſing the Iſland with his great Army, as that there was not any hope to do any good againſt him. And that to keep him from Victual, and ſo to diſtreſs him, was not poſſible, lying in a moſt fertil Iſland, and in the midſt of his own Dominions; whereas they, who were to be ſtill relieved from far, ſhould ſooner feel the want than the Enemy. He was victualled (as he ſaid) when he came from home, but for three months, in hope to have made a ſhort diſpatch, and had now two thouſand miles home. He ſaid moreover, that he had expreſs commandment from the King, to return to Meſſina before Winter, and that therefore ſo ſoon as the month was out he would depart. The Venetian Admiral deſiring nothing more, than by Battel at Sea to overthrow the Turks, and ſo to relieve the diſtreſſed Cypriots, urged the Spaniſh Admiral to proceed in the Voyage; ſaying, That ſo great aid was not ſent from the Pope and the King, only for the relief of Nicoſia, but to deliver the whole Iſland from the danger of the Turk. Of the ſame opinion with the Spaniſh Admiral were divers other great Captains in the Fleet; namely Sfortia; who ſaid, That nothing was to be ſo done, as might raſhly expoſe unto caſualty or power of the Enemy, the publick Fortune and Majeſty of the Chriſtian Commonweal, which was in that Fleet greatly hazarded: That longer ſtay might bring further danger; that in that Fleet conſiſted the whole welfare of the Commonweal, wherein more might be loſt, if any miſhap ſhould chance thereunto, than was good to be gained by the relieving of Famaguſta. The great Commanders thus differing in opinions, the Council was in a heat diſſolved, and nothing concluded. Upon which ſo foul a diſagreement the Fleet began now to return back again, but ſo, that it was not now as before, one, but three Fleets, every Admiral by himſelf drawing after him his Fleet. Auria the Spaniſh Admiral, who firſt returned, after he had been two days wonderfully with Tempeſt toſſed at Sea, came at laſt to Carpathos, and departing thence, with much ado arived with his Fleet in the Iſland of Crete; from whence he by a Meſſenger ſent of purpoſe, requeſted leave of Columnius the Popes Admiral, that he might with his good will preſently return home. Whereunto Columnius anſwered, That he would give him no ſuch leave; but rather charged him, in the duty he ought to the good of the Chriſtian Commonweal, not to depart, but to keep company with the reſt of the Fleet until it were paſt Zacynthus, that ſo with their united Forces they might more ſafely paſs by the Enemies Countries; whereas otherwiſe, if any thing ſhould by his haſty departure fall out otherwiſe than well, it ſhould be imputed to the diſhonour of him that had forſaken his Friends, and not of them that were ſo by him forforſaken. But unto this Auria anſwered, That the welfare of the Kingdoms of Sicilie and Naples conſiſted in the ſafety of this Fleet; and that therefore having haſt home, he could not ſtay to keep company with their heavy Galleaſſes and other Ships of burthen, which muſt oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended for his departure; yet ſecretly ſought (as it was deemed) to find an occaſion whereby to withdraw himſelf (being as he accounted the better Man at Sea) from the command of Columnius, whereunto he was full ſore againſt his will ſubject.

After they had thus a while ſpent the time with reaſoning the matter to and fro, Auria of himſelf without further leave hoiſed Sail, and ſo at length came to Meſſina in Sicily; neither did Columnius and Zanius ſtay in thoſe Quarters long after him, but having endured much trouble at Sea, arrived at laſt, Columnius in Italy, and Zanius at Corcyra. Thus this mighty Fleet, which had all this Summer filled the Mediterranean with all the Countries thereabout, with the expectation of ſome great matter, was by the diſcord of the Generals diſſolved, having done nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thouſands of right valiant Men loſt their lives, being dead of divers Diſeaſes proceeding of change of Diet, and unſeaſonableneſs of the Weather in that hot Climat; amongſt whom was the valiant Count Hieronimus Martinengus, ſent by the Senate with three thouſand Souldiers for the defence of Famaguſta; who alſo moſt of them periſhed in that Voyage. The Venetian Fleet was no ſooner arrived at Corcyra, but Auguſtinus Barbadicus was ſent from the Senate to diſcharge Zanius the Admiral of his Office, and to ſend him Priſoner to Venice; in whoſe room was placed Sebaſtianus Venerius Governour of that Iſland.

Zanius the Venetian Admiral diſcharged of his Office, and ſent in bonds to Venice.

The Turks Baſſaes at Sea certainly advertiſed of the departure of the Chriſtian Fleet, were not a little proud thereof, as by the confeſſion of their Enemies, their Betters. Yet foraſmuch as the Seas began then to grow rough, and no Enemy appeared, they thought it to no purpoſe to keep the Seas with ſo great a Fleet, and therefore reſolved to leave Muſtapha with his Army in Cyprus, the next year to make an end of his Conqueſt ſo happily begun; and ſeven Gallies at Sea before Famaguſta, that no relief ſhould that way be brought into the City, and ſo to depart themſelves with the reſt of the Fleet to Winter in more ſafer Harbours; Pial with the greater part of the Fleet to Conſtantinople, and Haly with the reſt to the Rhodes. And becauſe they would for their greater credit prepare ſome worthy Preſent for their great Lord and Maſter Selymus, they fraughted a great Gallion of Mahometes the chief Baſſaes, and two other tall Ships, with the richeſt of the Spoil of Nicoſia, and the choice of the Priſoners there taken. But when they were now ready to hoiſe Sail and depart, as they were carrying out of the Gallion, certain Barrels of Gunpowder which Muſtapha the General had commanded for his better proviſion to be landed, a noble Gentlewoman Captive in the Gallion, wiſhing rather to die with honour, than to live diſhonoured, ſecretly fired the Powder; by force whereof the ſaid Gallion with the other two Ships, were ſuddainly rent in pieces; and all that was therein blown up into the Air. Of all that were in thoſe three Veſſels, none eſcaped with life but the Maſter of the Gallion, and two Chriſtian Captives, but there periſhed together with the rich Spoil. But the Baſſaes following their former reſolution, departed from Cyprus, and afterwards in ſafety arrived at Conſtantinople; where both then and all the Winter following, ſuch preparation was in making, as if Selymus had the next year purpoſed ſome far greater matter than the Conqueſt of Cyprus.

A deſperate Fact of a Woman.

Whilſt Sebaſtianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admiral) yet lay at Corcyra, the rude Acroceraunian people, more famous for nothing than for their Theft and want of all things, by truſty Meſſengers promiſed to deliver into his power the ſtrong Caſtle of Chymera, kept by a Garriſon of three hundred Turks, if he himſelf with a few Gallies and a convenient number of Footmen, would come into the Bay of Ambracia; offering him good Hoſtages for the better aſſurance of their promiſe. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a Company of Horſemen, three thouſand Footmen, and certain Gallies; who were no ſooner landed, but that preſently a thouſand of thoſe rough Mountain people came unto them; with which power taking the Hill, and repulſing the Turks Garriſon coming to the relief of the Caſtle, he ſo diſcouraged them that were in the Hold, that the next night they let themſelves down with Ropes into the Valley below; but being deſcried, were there all either taken or ſlain. And ſo in a very ſhort time was that ſtrong Caſtle taken by the Admiral, and a ſtrong Garriſon of Chriſtians put into it in ſtead of the Turks.

The ſtrong Caſtle of Chymera taken by Venerius.

Not long after, Quirinus the Viceadmiral, a Man of great Courage, landed with twenty four Gallies in Peloponneſus near the Bay of Maine, and there upon the ſuddain both by Sea and Land beſieged a ſtrong Caſtle, which the Turks but two years before had built to trouble the Chriſtians paſſing that way. Which Caſtle he took in five hours, and put to the Sword five hundred Turks which lay there in Garriſon; and razing it down to the ground, carried away with him four and twenty great Pieces of Artillery into the Iſland of Zacynthus.

Quirinus taketh a Caſtle of the Turks in Peloponneſus.

At ſuch time as Muſtapha before lay at the Siege of Famaguſta, Bragadinus Governor of the Town, and Baleonius a moſt expert Captain, from out of the high places of the City beholding the great Army of the Turks (which covered the ground almoſt as far as they could ſee,) with the cunning manner of their Fortification, were therewith much moved; and therefore thought it good betime to give the Senate knowledge thereof, and in ſo great a danger to crave their aid. And that their requeſt might be of more weight, and have the better hearing, they intreated Hieronimus Ragazonius Biſhop of the City, a reverend and devout Man, to take upon him that charge; unto whom they joyned Nicholas Donatus a noble Gentleman of Cyprus. The Biſhop at the firſt was very unwilling to go, as loath in ſo great danger to leave his Flock; but at length overcome with the entreaty of the Governor, and Tears of the beſieged, ſuffered himſelf to be entreated; and embarked in a Gally about the going down of the Sun, looſing out of the Haven, and hoiſing Sail, with a fair gale of Wind paſſed through the Turks Fleet, which then lay at Anchor before the City; and by the coming on of the night, and by the great way he made, got him quickly out of ſight. After four days ſailing he came to Crete, and ſo at laſt to Venice; where, as he had before unto the Admiral, ſo there unto the Senate he declared the dangerous eſtate of the City, the ſtrength of the Enemy, the weakneſs of the Defendants againſt ſo great a multitude, and the want of many things needful for the holding out of the Siege; and to be brief, that except they ſent ſpeedy relief, the City could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admiral, careful for the beſieged, cauſed four tall Ships to be laded with all manner of Victual and a great quantity of Gunpowder, and put into them ſeventeen hundred ſelect Souldiers, all which he ſent from Crete to the relief of them of Famaguſta; appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelve of the beſt Gallies in all the Fleet, to conduct the ſame thither. This Quirinus was a moſt valiant and expert Captain, meanly deſcended, but by ſervice grown to be a Man both of great reputation and wealth; and therefore Zanius at his departure to Venice although he knew the matter required haſte, yet preſuming upon his wiſdom and carefulneſs, left it to his diſcretion, when and how to perform that piece of ſervice. Quirinus (not without cauſe) doubting to ſet forward, the Seas as then full of the Turks 1571. Gallies, ſtaied until Winter was well ſpent, and then ſetting forward the ſeventeenth of January, kept aloof from the Ships, which with a proſperous Wind came directly before Famaguſta; in hope that the Turks Gallies which lay in the mouth of the Haven, might ſo be drawn farther into the Sea, in hope of ſome good Booty, he himſelf ſtaying with his Gallies in place convenient out of ſight. Neither had the event deceived his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindred the ſame; for the Turks upon the dawning of the day deſcrying the Ships, made haſtily toward them; but Quirinus not able longer to ſtay himſelf, and before deſirous to fight with them, ſhewed himſelf too ſoon in the open Sea, before the Enemy was come near the Ships; whom as ſoon as the Turks had ſeen, and that there was no hope to withſtand him, they ſtaied their Oars, and with all ſpeed retired. But Quirinus following faſter upon them, they were glad for ſafegard of their lives, with all the power they could to run three of their Gallies aground, and to run to ſhoar themſelves; which three Gallies, Quirinus did with his great Ordnance beat all to pieces, and ſore gauled the other four. The Haven thus cleered, he returned again unto the Ships, and brought them with the ſupply in ſafety to Famaguſta; upon whoſe arrival was great rejoycing both amongſt the Garriſon Souldiers and the Citiſens; for the Turks thought nothing leſs, than that the Chriſtian Gallies durſt at that time of the year have put into thoſe dangerous Seas; which Quirinus well knowing, came forth again with his Gallies, and roaming up and down at his pleaſure, took two of the Enemies Ships richly laded coming to the Camp; with which Booty he enriched his Souldiers; and further incited by occaſion, landed his Men in divers places alongſt the Sea Coaſt in Pamphilia, and there did great harm. So having filled the Country with the terror and fame of his Name, he returned again to Famaguſta; where he notably encouraged the Garriſon Souldiers, perſwading them to remember their wonted Valour; and filling them with hope that the Chriſtian Fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next Summer, to deliver them from their Enemies, and to raiſe the Siege. So having in twenty days diſpatched that he came for, and done what good ſervice elſe he could, he departed from Famaguſta, and within five days after arrived at Crete.

Negligence ſeverely puniſhed by Selymus.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late ſupply put into Famaguſta, and of the harms done by Quirinus; wherewith he was ſo highly diſpleaſed, that he commanded the Governor of Chios his Head to be ſtruck off, and the Governor of the Rhodes to be diſgraced, whoſe charge it was to have kept thoſe Seas, ſo that nothing ſhould have been conveied into Famaguſta. Neither ſpared he Pial Baſſa, but deprived him of his Admiralty, and placed Partau Baſſa Admiral in his ſtead, for that he had not the year before diſcomfited the Chriſtian Fleet at the Iſland of Crete, as it was ſuppoſed he might have done.

From the beginning of this War, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope, who greatly favoured their cauſe, had moſt earneſtly from time to time ſolicited Philip King of Spain, to enter with them into the participation and fellowſhip of this War; which their requeſt ſtanding indeed with the good of his State, he ſeemed eaſily to yield unto; and therefore ſent Auria, his Admiral the laſt year, with his Fleet to aid them, but with ſuch ſucceſs as is before declared. As for to joyn with them in perpetual League and Confederation (as it was termed) againſt the common Enemy, that he referred unto the diſcreet conſideration of the two Cardinals, Granvellan and Pace, and Jo. Zunica his Embaſſador, ſent for that purpoſe to Rome; promiſing to perform whatſoever they ſhould on his behalf agree upon or conſent unto. At the ſame time, and for the ſame purpoſe lay alſo Surianus the Venetian Embaſſador at Rome; unto whom the Pope joyned Cardinal Morone, Aldobrandinus, and Ruſticucius, with certain other of the chief Cardinals, as Men indifferent to both parties, to moderate and compoſe ſuch differences and difficulties as ſhould ariſe betwixt the aforeſaid Commiſſioners for the King and the Venetians, concerning the intended League. But theſe grave Men, ſent from ſo great Princes about ſo great a matter (as well there could not be a greater) were no ſooner met together and ſet in conſultation, but that forthwith they began to jar about the Capitulations of the League. Neceſſary it was thought that a League ſhould be agreed upon againſt ſo puiſſant and dangerous an Enemy, but to find the way how the ſame might be concluded to the contentment of all parties, ſeemed a matter almoſt impoſſible. Oftentimes theſe Commiſſioners ſat, but the oftner the farther off; if one difficulty were by the diſcretion of ſome appeaſed, in ſtead thereof at the next meeting ariſe three others. The chief command of the Army to be raiſed, the proportion of the Forces, the manner of the War, with many other like circumſtances incident to ſo great Actions, made great differences among them; but moſt of all, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spaniſh Commiſſioners ſeeking to turn the greateſt part thereof upon the Venetians, and the Venetians upon them; which was done with ſuch earneſtneſs and ſtudy of every Man towards his own part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular State from which they were ſent, rather than for the Common good; For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keep the Frontiers of his large Dominions in Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corſica, Majorca, Minorca, yea and of Spain it ſelf, with ſtrong Garriſons for fear of the Turk; now that the War was riſen betwixt the Venetians and him, and the danger thereof tranſlated far off into other Mens Territories; enjoyed now in his own an unwonted quietneſs, to the great content of his Subjects and eaſing of his own Charge in maintaining of ſo many Garriſons as before; whereof many were now thought needleſs. Beſides that, he by the Indulgence of the Pope raiſed ſuch great Sums of Mony upon his Clergy, as was thought by many, ſufficient to diſcharge the Charge of the War: For which cauſes he cared not for entring in any further League with the Venetians, but as it were in courteſie to ſend them a yearly Aid, to maintain a defenſive lingering War, and ſo to keep the Turks buſied upon the Venetian, a far off from his own Territories. But the Venetians, in whoſe Dominions the fierce Enemy daily raged, as well in Dalmatia as in Cyprus, were even for the ſame reaſons moved to haſten and ſhorten the War, that the Spaniard was to protract it; for beſide the nearneſs of the danger, and the infinite calamities by them ſuſtained, their yearly revenues ariſing for moſt part of their Cuſtoms, were greatly impaired, and their Traffick (the maintenance of their State) almoſt quite cut off; which cauſed them more earneſtly to confederate themſelves with the Spaniard. But hard it was to joyn in one, States ſo far differing in reſpect of their particular profit, and almoſt by nature contrary. Thus was all the laſt year, and a great part of this alſo, ſpent by the aforeſaid Commiſſioners in turbulent and fruitleſs Conferences, but nothing was as yet concluded concerning the League; which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themſelves too weak for ſo mighty an Enemy as was Selymus, and yet no other certain ſtrength from their Friends to reſt upon. But whilſt they ſtood thus doubtful of the League with Spain, and quite out of hope of any attonement with Selymus; upon the ſuddain when they leaſt expected, it was by good Fortune laid as it were in their Laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before moſt earneſtly deſired) joyn in League with the Pope and the King of Spain, or elſe fall to agreement with Selymus; and that by this means.

Muhamet Baſſa a ſecret friend unto the Venetians, puts them in hope of Peace.

Muhamet the chief Baſſa, a ſecret friend unto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long time honoured, had no great liking of the proſperous ſucceſs of Muſtapha in Cyprus, and therefore deviſed night and day, how to croſs the riſing of him, the Competitor of his Honour; and with all to help the Venetians, unto whom he was much beholden. He by ſecret Meſſengers had before oftentimes ſounded the mind of the Venetian Embaſſador, and put him in hope, that if ſuit were made unto Selymus for Peace, it would undoubtedly be granted; and further promiſed, to be himſelf a helper and interceſſor for the ſame. But finding the Embaſſador to caſt many perils, and to give ſmall credit unto their talk, who had before by truſting them deceived him; he did not ſo give over the matter, but referring the further tempering with him unto a more fit time, for the preſent he took opportunity to enter into diſcourſe with Selymus himſelf concerning the Venetians, and told him that it was reported, That they weary of the long altercation they had had with the Spaniards concerning the League, and now deſtitute of all hope and aid, would now haply of their own accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiving him not unwillingly to hear ſo of them, he proceeded further in the matter, to know his pleaſure what he would have done therein; cunningly by the way of good Counſel perſwading him unto that which he moſt wiſhed himſelf to be done. Immediately after, he ſecretly advertiſed M. Antonius the Venetian Embaſſador, That there was great hope of Peace, and that therefore the Senate ſhould under the colour of exchanging of Priſoners, and redeeming of Merchants Good, ſend ſome fit Men to Conſtantinople, with whom he would in ſecret confer of all ſuch matters as might farther the pacification. This unexpected news from the Embaſſador brought to Venice, was well heard of the Senate; for they thought it much to concern their State, to have a way opened whereby upon tolerable conditions to make Peace with the mighty Tyrant, if that the League betwixt them and the King of Spain could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Jacobus Ragazonius to go about the matter to Conſtantinople. This Ragazonius was a Man of great ſpirit and dexterity of Wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deep judgment in the managing thereof; and withal exceeding rich, and of ſo good carriage of himſelf, as that he was therefore famous; all which things were thought of great moment to win the favour of that covetous and barbarous Nation. The Senate, although they had not yet made proof what Men thought of the matter, yet doubted they not, but that upon the report of the ſending of this notable Man, Men would thereof diverſly divine, every Man according to his own fantaſie; and that many of the wiſer ſort would indeed ſurmiſe, as the truth was, that he was ſent for to entreat of Peace, although the exchange of Priſoners, and redemption of Merchants Goods, were the only things were openly pretended; and the Senate, although they thought it not amiſs to have it ſo underſtood, becauſe ſuch a ſuſpicion was like enough to ſtir up both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of ſuch conditions of the deſired League, as they had before rejected; yet leſt the hope of the League (which they for many cauſes thought good to cheriſh) thereby cut off, might cauſe the Pope and the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Chriſtian Princes, of the ſending of Ragazonius; yet of purpoſe concealing the ſecret drift of his going. Ragazonius throughly inſtructed by the Senate, was in a Gally conducted to Raguſium; which Caſſan-Beg (the great Baſſa Muhametes Son, Governor of Liburnia) underſtanding, met him upon the Frontiers, and told him, That he was ſent by his Father, both to meet him and ſafe conduct him; which the Martial Man, contrary to the manner of the Turks, courteouſly performed, honourably entertaining him, and afterward ſending him with a ſafe Convoy until he was out of all danger. Ragazonius coming to Conſtantinople, was there by night ſecretly received into the City, and at firſt brought into a little baſe Inn, and a Guard ſet over him that he ſhould ſpeak with no Man. But after three days he was removed to a much better place, and preſented with divers kinds of dainty Diſhes of ſundry kinds of Meats. The effect of his Meſſage was, to try the Turks minds, and after conference had with the Embaſſador, to entreat of Peace. At length having acceſs to the great Baſſa Muhamet, after he had delivered unto him (as he had in charge) his Meſſage concerning the exchange of Priſoners and Merchants Goods; Muhamet asked him, If he had nothing in charge from the Senate concerning a pacification to be made? Whereunto he anſwered, That he had, but that he muſt firſt ſpeak with the Embaſſador, without whoſe Advice and Counſel he was not of himſelf to do any thing. At that firſt encounter, the Baſſa to terrifie the Meſſenger, declared unto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks Horſemen and Footmen, which no Nation (as he vainly boaſted) was able by force or policy to withſtand: Alſo his great and invincible Fleets at Sea, with whom all the power of the Chriſtians joyned together, was not able to encounter; and much other ſuch like ſtrength and wealth of his; And that the Venetians were now no more able to withſtand Selymus, than they were in times paſt to reſiſt his Father and his Anceſtors. Yet he diſcourſed of this matter in Ragazonius the Venetian Embaſſador cometh to Conſtantinople.

The conſerence betwixt Muhamet the great Baſſa, and Ragazonius.

in ſuch ſort, as not thereby to cut off the hope of the pacification; but ſaid, That the Venetians ſhould beſt have provided for the ſafety of their State, if at the firſt they had liſtned unto him, friendly and faithfully adviſing them not to have entred into Arms, in which doing they ſhewed more courage than power; and that yet, as the caſe now ſtood, and that Selymus was in a moſt aſſured hope, in ſhort time to become Lord and Maſter of the whole Iſland, it ſhould be to their great good, to prefer the favour and good will of the Turks before War, and by the voluntary yielding up of Cyprus, gain unto themſelves perpetual Peace and Tranquility. As for the Iſle it ſelf, it was not now worth the hazarding of ſo many dangers, being deſtitute of Inhabitants, which were almoſt all either ſlain or fled, the Cattel driven away, the Towns ranſackt and burnt, and the whole Country, of late moſt pleaſant and beautiful, now ſo ſpoiled and unpeopled, that it could not of long time yield unto him that ſhould have it, any profit or commodity. Ragazonius being a cool and adviſed Man, and withal perceiving that the Baſſa was not to be contradicted in his talk, ſo tempered his anſwer, as that he ſhewed no token of fear, neither let any word fall that might offend his ears, ſaying, That he was right glad that he had found ſo much favour in his ſight, as to have acceſs and leave to talk with ſo great a Prince, who for wiſdom and gravity excelled all the reſt of the Princes of the great Emperors Court; who ſo far as he might with his Loyalty towards his Sovereign, had always moſt graciouſly favoured the Venetian State; who alſo not ignorant of the uncertainty of worldly things, knew of all others beſt, that on both ſides were both Men and Arms, and that moſt mighty Princes had oftentimes with ſmall forces been overthrown, the event of things never deceiving Men more than in matters of War; no power upon Earth being ſure, which could not within ſome bounds contain the ſtrength of it ſelf; and that therefore he was in good hope, that he ſo worthy a Man knowing beſt what belongeth both to Peace and War, would deviſe ſome ſuch courſe as might ſort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian State and Turkiſh Empire; in which doing he ſhould find ſufficient matter for his eternal praiſe and glory, if by his diſcreet wiſdom a pacification might be made. Such talk having paſſed at their firſt meeting, Ragazonius had leave to ſpeak with the Embaſſador, who then lay at Pera under ſafe keeping. In paſſing over to Pera, Ragazonius might ſee a Fleet of Turkiſh Gallies encountring one with another in manner of a Fight at Sea, which the Turks had of purpoſe provided to ſhew unto him as a ſtrange ſight. Whereat Ragazonius ſmiling, ſaid unto the Turks that were preſent with him, That it was a pretty Childiſh Sport for him that had never ſeen the like before; but not to the Venetians, who were acquainted with theſe matters in earneſt; as the Turks ſhould well know whenſoever they had a mind to make proof what they were able to do at Sea. Ragazonius coming to the Embaſſador, had conference with him at large, and reſolved with him what to do in his negotiation. And ſo returning to Muhamet, eaſily diſpatched with him for the exchange of Priſoners and Merchants Goods; but when they came to talk of the Capitulations of a pacification to be made, at the firſt they were ſo far off, as if they would never have met; but after much and often Conference, ſometime the one yielding, and ſometime the other, the matter was brought to ſome conformity, ſo that there was no ſuch great difference betwixt them, but that they were like enough to have agreed. Pius the Pope, and Philip the King of Spain, advertiſed of the ſending of Ragazonius to Conſtantinople, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was ſent about ſome treaty of Peace, what colour ſoever the Senate pretended to cover the ſame. And therefore doubting leſt the Turkiſh Emperor having once made Peace with the Venetians, ſhould turn his great Forces already prepared, upon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that Peace, now with all ſpeed to haſten the League, which they had ſo long before delayed. For which purpoſe the Pope ſent the noble Columnius to Venice; who admitted unto the Senate, declared at large how matters had paſſed at Rome concerning the League; and afterwards, what profit might ariſe of ſuch a League concluded, and what harms might enſue of the ſame, neglected. And to haſten the matter, ſet as it were before their Eies, how much it concerned the Common good, but them eſpecially, to have the ſame with ſpeed confirmed. As for to give any truſt unto the Turks, was (as he ſaid) not beſeeming their deep wiſdom and judgment, ſeeing they ſo often had been by them rather deceived than vanquiſhed. In concluſion, he requeſted them, That for his Holineſs ſake, moderating in ſome part their hard demands, they would with ſpeed joyn with him and the King in a moſt firm and Chriſtian League. Although this Speech of Columnius had much moved the minds of the Venetians, ſo that many inclined to the League, yet were there many doubtful thereof, and could not be reſolved whether it were better to embrace Peace with the Turk, or the League with the Pope and the King. Peace pleaſed them, neither did the League diſpleaſe them; it ſeemed a matter moſt difficult, whether to reſolve upon. They were fearful of the Leagne either received, or rejected; The hope of Victory, the inconſtancy of the Turks, their own ſtrength at Sea, the large promiſes of the Chriſtian Princes, the certain hope of the League, and uncertainty of the Peace, perſwaded them to embrace the League. On the other ſide, the bad ſucceſs of the year before, their Forces ſhaken, and almoſt ſpent in Cyprus, the ſuſpected and doubtful faith of their Confederates, with the uncertainty of the ſucceſs, induced them to prefer the hoped Peace before the League. So the Venetians in ſuſpence betwixt both, gave the Embaſſador dayly more doubtful Anſwers than other; neither by promiſe binding themſelves, neither by flat denial cutting off the hope of the League, by Examples and Arguments rather refelling what was by others alledged, than any way declaring what they themſelves thought. Sometime they alledged ſuch things as might make a Man believe, that they were willing to joyn in League, and by and by again they would ſeem neither to reject nor accept of the ſame. In which doubtfulneſs many days paſſed. At length the matter being propounded in the Senate, there found not unlike diſpoſition of minds that it had among the meaner ſort; for ſome of the Senators inclined to the League, whoſe reaſons were grounded not upon profit only, but upon credit and honour alſo, which they wiſhed to be chiefly regarded; declaring alſo, what great ſecurity, honour and glory, ſhould redound unto them, by entring into ſuch an honourable League. But the remembrance of former loſſes, the ſtrength of the Turk poſſeſſing a great part of the World, compared unto their own, the terror of the Enemies Name, the fear of the evil ſucceſs, the ſmall hope of prevailing, induced others to like better of Peace,

The Pope and the King of Spain fearing leſt the Venetians ſhould make Peace with the Turk, haſten the confederation.

whoſe opinion was alſo confirmed by this, That the Confederation with thoſe Chriſtians, was of no more aſſurance or continuance than the Turks Peace; Beſide that, they alledged, That Leagues were therefore of leſs aſſurance, for that Confederations and Amities were ſeldom or never ſincerely and faithfully kept on both ſides, every Man commonly ſerving his own turn without care of other Men. They alſo ſet as it were before their Eies what great occaſions, even ſmall ſuſpicions might give Princes to break their Leagues, what ſtrange effects the fear of the loſs of Goods, or ſome part of their Territory might work. After this ſo weighty a matter had been thus with great contention throughly debated on both ſides in the Senate, it was at laſt put to voices; and ſo by the conſent of the greater part, the League was as more honourable received, and the Turks Peace rejected; and a Decree of the Senate to that effect made. Ragazonius by ſecret Letters form the Senate underſtanding of all theſe matters, began to deal more warily with Muhamet the great Baſſa in matter concerning the pacification, and more hardly to yield to his demands; and propounding many difficulties of purpoſe deviſed, requeſted of him, That he might by his good leave return to Venice, to be reſolved of many things by the Senate, whereof he was not able himſelf to judge, and ſo to return to him again with more certain inſtructions; aſſuring him, that the Senate would upon knowledge of the conditions of the Peace do and deviſe many things for the furtherance of the ſame; which could not ſo well be done by Letters, as if he were there himſelf preſent to reſolve them upon every particular. This his requeſt obtained, he with great ſpeed got him out of Conſtantinople; but was ſcarcely got out of the Gates, when report of the League which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the King of Spain, was brought unto the Court, and had in ſhort time filled the City; which made all the way as he travelled more troubleſome, and fruſtrated that alſo which was before concluded concerning the exchange of Priſoners and Merchants Goods. Ragazonius being come to Venice, declared at large in the Senate the drift and purpoſe of the Turk, and what conference he had had with the great Baſſa, and in what forwardneſs the Peace was; for which his diſcreet carriage of the matter, his wiſdom was highly by the whole Senate commended, and he himſelf afterward honourably rewarded.

The Venetians reſolve to accept of the League with the Pope and the King.

A perpetual League concluded betwixt the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Venetians.

In the mean time the Commiſſioners at Rome after long conſultation concluded a League, which they would have to be perpetual, as well for invaſive as defenſive Wars againſt the Turks; and was by ſolemn Oath confirmed by the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Venetian Senate the 24 day of May, in the year 1571. For the execution of which League, it was agreed upon, That the Sea and Land Forces ſhould conſiſt of two hundred Gallies, an hundred Ships, fifty thouſand Footmen, and four thouſand five hundred Horſemen; with a proportionate quantity of great Artillery, Victuals, and other things neceſſary, to be every year ready in March, or at fartheſt in April, to meet together at ſuch a place in the Eaſt, as ſhould be unto them for that purpoſe appointed; to be imployed as the Admirals ſaw cauſe, and as the preſent ſtate of things ſhould require. For maintenance of which charge it was agreed, That the King of Spain ſhould defray the one half and the other half to be divided into three equal parts; whereof the Venetians ſhould bear two parts, and the Pope the third; which if it ſhould be too heavy for him, then that remained by him undiſcharged, to be divided into five parts; whereof the King was to diſcharge three, and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they took order alſo for the proviſion of Victuals, to be at a reaſonable price taken up in any the Confederates Dominions, where the Army or Fleet ſhould chance to ſtay; yet ſo, that it ſhould be at the King of Spain his diſcretion, out of his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, firſt to take his proviſion for the victualling of Guletta, Malta, and his own Navy. It was alſo agreed, That if the King of Spain ſhould at any time, when as the Confederates had no common War, invade Algiers, Tripolis, or Tunes, that then the Venetians ſhould of their own charge, aid him with fifty Gallies well appointed; as alſo, That the King ſhould in like manner and with like forces aid them as oft as they ſhould by the Turks be invaded. But if it ſhould fortune the Roman Territory to be invaded, that then the aforeſaid Princes ſhould be bound with all their Forces, to the uttermoſt of their power, to defend thoſe places, and the perſon of the Pope. And that in managing of the Confederate War, the three Admirals ſhould confer together of all matters, and whatſoever the greater part ſhould agree upon, that to be reputed as agreed upon by them all: That Don John of Auſtria, Charles the Fifth his natural Son, and Brother to the King, ſhould have the chief command of the Forces both at Sea and Land; but not to diſplay his own Enſign, but the common Enſign of the Confederates: Alſo, that ſuch places as ſhould be gained from the Turk by the Confederate Army, ſhould be divided amongſt the Confederate Princes, excepting Tunes, Algiers, and Tripolis, which ſhould remain only to the King of Spain: That all controverſies ariſing amongſt the Generals ſhould be decided by the Pope, unto whom the Venetians ſhould lend twelve Gallies, furniſhed of all things ſaving Men and Victuals, which the Pope ſhould of his own charge ſupply: Which Gallies at the end of the War he ſhould again deliver, in ſuch caſe as they then were: That an honourable place ſhould be left for Maximilian the Emperor, the French King, the King of Polonia, and the King of Portugal to enter into this League, whom with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, it ſhould beſeem the Pope to ſtir up in ſo good a Quarrel; and that it ſhould not be lawful for any the aforeſaid Confederate Princes to entreat of Peace, or enter into League, without the knowledge and conſent of the other Confederates. And for the better proceeding of all things, it was agreed, That ever in Autumn the Confederate Princes ſhould by their Embaſſadors at Rome conſult of the next years Wars, and according as the time and occurents ſhould require, to determine whether their Forces were to be encreaſed or diminiſhed. This League thus at length with much ado concluded, was not long after in June with great Pomp and Triumph openly proclaimed in Rome, Venice, and Spain, to the great joy of the greateſt part of Chriſtendom.

The proportioning of the charge of the Wars againſt the Turk; and the other Capitulations of the League.

The League proclaimed.

The Venetians the more to trouble the Turk, ſeek to ſtir up Tamas the Perſian King to take up Arms againſt him.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, the Venetians the more to intangle the Turk, thought it good to make proof, if they might by any means ſtir up Tamas the Perſian King to take up Arms againſt him; who as he was a Prince of great power, ſo did he exceedingly hate the Turks, as well for the difference betwixt the Perſians and them about matters of their vain Superſtition, as for the manifold injuries he had oftentimes ſuſtained. There was one Vincent Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the State, who having eſcaped out of Priſon at Conſtantinople, was but a little before come to Venice, a wary wiſe Man, and of great experience, who for his dexterity of Wit, and ſkilfulneſs in the Turkiſh Language, was thought of all others moſt fit to take in hand ſo great a matter. He having received Letters and Inſtructions for the Senate, and furniſhed with all things neceſſary, travelling through Germany, Polonia, and the Foreſts of Mœſia, in Turkiſh attire, came to Moncaſtron, a Port Town upon the ſide of the Euxine or Black-Sea, at the mouth of the great River Boriſthenes; where he embarked himſelf for Trapezond, but was by a contrary Wind driven to Sinope, a City of great Traffick; from whence he travelled by rough and broken Ways to Cutay, keeping ſtill upon the left hand, becauſe he would not fall upon any part of the Turks Army (which was then marching towards Cyprus through all thoſe Countries) nevertheleſs he fell upon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himſelf, being taken for a Turk, and by blind and troubleſome Ways, through Rocks and Foreſts, arrived at length at Erzirum, a ſtrong City of the Turks, then upon the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions toward the Georgians. This Journey of Alexanders was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was vented at Conſtantinople by a Spy, who under the colour of friendſhip, haunting the Venetian Embaſſadors Houſe at Pera, had got certain knowledge of the going of Alexander into Perſia. Whereupon certain Curriers were ſent out with all ſpeed to beſet the three ſtraight Paſſages into Perſia, whereby it was ſuppoſed he muſt of neceſſity paſs, with certain Notes alſo of the favour of the Man, of his Stature, and other Marks, whereby he was beſt to be known. But he in ſo dangerous a Country doubting all things, and fearing ſuch a matter, leaving his Company behind him, with incredible celerity poſted from Erzirum to Tauris, and was a great way gon before the Turks Curriers came into thoſe Quarters; who yet hearing of him, followed after as far as they durſt, but could not overtake him. Alexander coming to Tauris, underſtood that the Court lay at Casbin, about twelve days Journey farther up into the Country; coming thither, the fourteenth of Auguſt of this year 1571. he chanced to meet with certain Engliſh Merchants, with whom he had before been acquainted; by whoſe help he not only got to ſpeak with Ayder Tamas the Kings third Son, but learned of them all the Manners and Faſhions of the Perſian Court, and how to bear himſelf therein. The Perſians by reaſon of the intollerable Heat do moſt of their Buſineſs at that time of the year by night. Wherefore Alexander about midnight brought in to Ayder, declared unto him the cauſe of his coming; and the next night admitted unto the ſpeech of his aged Father, delivered his Letters of Credence, and in the name of the Senate declared unto him, with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkiſh Emperor was about to take away Cyprus from the Venetians, with what greedineſs and pride he had ſet upon the Chriſtians, and that diſcharged of that War, he would of all likelihood ſet upon the Perſians; having the ſelf ſame Quarrel unto the Perſians that he had unto the Venetians, that is, An ardent and inſatiable deſire of Sovereignty; a ſufficient cauſe for the greedy Turk to repute every King the richer that he was, the more his Enemy. After that, ſetting forth to the full the Proweſs of the Chriſtians, the wonderful preparation they had made both at Sea and Land, he perſwaded the King with all his power to invade the Turk, now altogether buſied in the Wars of Cyprus; and to recover again ſuch parts of his Kingdom as Solyman the Father of Selymus had taken from him. Wars he ſaid were more happily managed abroad than at home; That ſithence he alone (the Chriſtian Princes all then at quiet) had withſtood the Turks whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his moſt proſperous ſucceſs, the Chriſtian Princes now joyning with him. That he was much unmindful of his former loſſes and wrongs, if he thought he enjoyed an aſſured Peace; which he ſhould find to be nothing elſe but a deferring of War unto more cruel times; and that the Turk if he ſhould overrun Cyprus, would forthwith turn his victorious Arms upon him: The end of one War was (as he ſaid) but the beginning of another; and that the Turkiſh Empire could never ſtay in one ſtate; and that he would obſerve not the Turks Words, but his Deeds; and how that the Othoman Emperors according to the opportunity of the times, uſed by turns, ſometime force, ſometime deceit, as beſt ſerved their purpoſes: That no Princes had at all times by diſſembled Peace and uncertain Leagues more deluded ſome, until they had oppreſſed others. He wiſhed alſo, that at length this his cunning dealing might appear unto the World; and that Princes would think, that being combined together, they might more eaſily overcome the Turk, than being ſeparated, defend their own: That in former times ſometime will, ſometime occaſion, was wanting to them to unite their Forces; And that therefore they ſhould now combine themſelves for their Common good againſt the common Enemy: That it concerned no leſs the Perſians than the Chriſtians, to have the power of the Turk abated; And that this taking up of Arms, ſhould be for the good of the Perſian King howſoever things ſhould fall out; if well, he ſhould then recover what he had before loſt, with much more that was the Turks; if otherwiſe, yet by voluntary entring into Arms to countenance himſelf, and to give the Turks occaſion to think that he feared him not; which was (as he ſaid) the only way to preſerve their common ſafety, which would be unto all the Confederate Princes eaſie enough, if they themſelves made it not more difficult than the power of the Enemy. The Speech of the Embaſſador was willingly heard; whereunto the King anſwered, That he would conſider thereupon what he had to do, and in the mean while, a fair Houſe was appointed for the Embaſſador and his Followers, and bountiful allowance appointed of the Kings charge. He was alſo many times ſumptuouſly feaſted by the Noblemen, whom he ſtill requeſted to be mediators to the King, to take that honourable War in hand. The King had at that time a Son called Iſmael, a Man of a great Spirit, whom he then kept in durance, for that he with too much inſolency made Roads into the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, to the diſturbance of the League his Father had before made with the late Turkiſh Emperor Solyman; unto him Alexander having acceſs, was of him courteouſly heard; who fretting and languiſhing for very grief of revenge upon the Turks, wiſhed, that either the King his Father had his mind, or he himſelf the power of a King; and ſaid, That if ever it were his good Fortune to obtain the Kingdom, he would indeed ſhew what he then in mind thought. But of him more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Whilſt this matter went more ſlowly forward in the Perſian Court than the Embaſſador would have had it, news was brought unto the Court, of the great Victory which the Chriſtians had much about that time obtained of the Turks at Sea; upon which which occaſion the Embaſſador ſolicited Tamas more earneſtly than before, to make him partaker of the Victory of the Chriſtians, by entring into Confederation with them, and by taking up of Arms, rather than to hold uncertain friendſhip with the Turks in their miſeries, by whom he had been ſo often wronged. This he ſaid was the only time for the Perſian King to recover his former Glory, the like offer whereof would neither often chance, neither long ſtay; and that if he ſuffered ſo fit an opportunity to ſlip away, he ſhould afterwards in vain wiſh for the ſame, when it were too late. This ſo wholſome Counſel was well heard, but prevailed nothing to ſtir up the aged King; who then troubled with Rebellion in Media, or weary of the former Wars he had had with the Turk, and glad of ſuch Peace as he had then with him; anſwered the Embaſſador, That foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Princes had made a perpetual League amongſt themſelves, he would for two years expect the event, and afterward as occaſion ſerved, ſo to reſolve upon Peace and War. This improvident reſolution of the King, brought afterward unprofitable and too late repentance unto the whole Perſian Kingdom; when as within a few years after, all the calamities which the Senate had by their Embaſſador (as true Prophets) foretold, redounded unto the great ſhaking thereof. The Cyprian War once ended, and Peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the Son of Selymus, ſucceeding his Father in the Turkiſh Empire, invading the Perſian King, took from him the great Country of Media, now called Silvan, with a great part of Armenia the Great, and the regal City of Tauris, as ſhall be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Perſian, who now refuſed to take up Arms, or joyn in League with the Chriſtian Princes, repented that he had not before hearkned unto the wholſome Counſel of the Venetians; and taught by his own harms, wiſhed in vain, that the Chriſtian Princes would again take up Arms and joyn with him againſt the Turk.

Muſtapha Baſſa returneth to the Siege of Famaguſta.

Muſtapha the great Baſſa and General of the Turks Army, furniſhed of all things that could be deſired for maintenance of his Siege; and Souldiers in great number daily repairing unto him out of Cilicia, Syria, the Leſſer Aſia, and the Countries thereabout, beſide great Supplies brought unto him by Haly Baſſa from Conſtantinople; inſomuch, that it was thought he had in his Army two hundred thouſand Men; began now that Winter was paſt, in the later end of April, to draw nearer unto Famaguſta, and with incredible labour to caſt up Trenches and Mounts againſt the City, of ſuch height, that the Defendants from the higheſt places of the City could ſcarcely ſee the points of the Turks Spears, or tops of their Tents, as they lay encamped; which was no great matter for the Baſſa to perform, having in his Camp forty thouſand Pioneers always ready at his command.

The deſcription of Famaguſta.

The City of Famaguſta is ſituate in the Eaſt end of the Iſland, in a plain and low ground betwixt two Promontories, the one called St. Andrews Head, and the other the Head of Græcia. It is in circuit two miles, and in form four-ſquare; but that the ſide toward the Eaſt, longer and more winding than the reſt, doth much deform the exact figure of a Quadrant; It is almoſt on two parts beaten upon with the Sea, the other parts toward the Land are defended with a Ditch not above fifteen Foot broad, a Stone-wall, and certain Bulwarks and Parapets. Upon the Gate that leadeth to Amathus ſtandeth a ſix cornered Tower; other Towers ſtand out alſo in the Wall, every of them ſcarce able to contain ſix Pieces of Artillery. It hath a Haven opening toward the South-Eaſt, defended from the injury of the Weather by two great Rocks, betwixt which the Sea cometh in by a narrow Paſſage about forty Paces over, but after opening wider giveth a convenient Harbor to Ships, whereof it cannot contain any great number, and was now ſhut up with a ſtrong Chain. Near unto the Haven ſtandeth an old Caſtle with four Towers, after the ancient manner of building. There was in the City one ſtrong Bulwark, built after the manner of the Fortification of our time, with Paliſadoes, Curtains, Caſemets, and ſuch like, in ſuch manner, as that it ſeemed almoſt impregnable. All which, although they made ſhew of a ſtrong and well fortified City, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weak long to hold out againſt the great power of the Turk; but what wanted by reaſon of the ſituation and weak fortification, that the Governor and other noble Captains ſupplied in beſt ſort they might, with a ſtrong Garriſon of moſt valiant Souldiers, the ſureſt defence of ſtrong places. There was in the City two thouſand and five hundred Italians, two hundred Albanois Horſemen, before entertained by the Governour; and of the Cypriots themſelves were muſtred two thouſand and five hundred more, all Men reſolutely ſet down to ſpend their Lives in defence of their Country.

The number of the Defendants of Famaguſta.

Muſtapha with wonderful celerity having brought to perfection his Fortifications, planted his Battery of ſixty four great Pieces; amongſt which were four great Baſiliſks of exceeding bigneſs, wherewith he continually without intermiſſion battered the Walls of the City in five places, but eſpecially that part of the Wall that was between the Haven and the Gate that leadeth to Amathus. And with great Morter-pieces caſt up hugh Stones, which from high falling into the City, with their weight brake down the Houſes they light upon, and fell oftentimes through their Vaults, even in the bottom of their Cellars, to the great terror of the beſieged. The Walls in divers places ſore ſhaken, and the Houſes beaten down, he began to aſſault the City; which the Defendants (their Forces yet whole) valiantly repulſed, and not only defended their Walls and drave the Turks from the Breaches, but furiouſly ſallied out upon them, and having ſlain and wounded many, wonderfully diſturbed their Fortifications, and abated their Courage; neither did the Enemy with greater fury maintain the battery or aſſault, than did the Chriſtians the defence of the City, ſtill ſending their deadly Shot into the thickeſt of that great Multitude; inſomuch that in few days the Baſſa had loſt thirty thouſand of his Men; and the Captains themſelves wondering at the Valour of the Defendants, as if they had not now to do with ſuch Chriſtians as they had before ſo oftentimes overthrown, but with ſome other ſtrange people, began to deſpair of the winning of the City. The Turks thus doubting, and almoſt at a ſtand, the Chriſtians in the mean time made up their Breaches with Earth, Baskets, Wool-ſacks, and ſuch like, not ſparing their very Beds and Bed-clothes, Cheſts, Carpets, and whatſoever elſe might ſerve to fill up the Breach. Among many wants they feared, the greateſt was the want of Powder, which with continual ſhooting began greatly to be diminiſhed; wherefore to reſerve ſome part thereof againſt all extremities, they thought it beſt whilſt yet ſome ſtore was left, to uſe the ſame more ſparingly, and to ſhoot more ſeldom. But the Turks ſtill drawing nearer and nearer the City, and and caſting up Mounts higher than the Walls of the City, with Earth and Faggots filled up the Ditch; which done, they of the broken Stones made Walls on either ſide, to ſave themſelves from the flankering Shot of the Chriſtians; then giving a freſh Aſſault, they uſed not only their Shot and other miſſive Weapons, but came foot to foot, and notably fought in the Breach hand to hand. Which manner of fight (as if it had been ſo agreed upon) they every day maintained for the ſpace of ſix hours. And although the Turks by reaſon of their multitude were divided into many parts, and freſh Men ſtill ſucceeded them that were weary; yet ſuch was the Courage of the Defendants, that every Man requeſted to have the places of moſt danger, and from thence with couragious hand repulſed the Turks with exceeding great ſlaughter. But for all that, the furious Enemy maintaining the Aſſault, not only by day, but by often Alarms in the night alſo, kept the Chriſtians continually in doubtful ſuſpence and readineſs, as if they ſhould have received a preſent Aſſault; and as ſoon as it was day, with freſh Men that had ſlept their fill, deſperately aſſailed the Chriſtians almoſt ſpent and meager for lack of ſleep and reſt. Force not prevailing, the reſtleſs Enemy leaving nothing unattempted, by a queint device was like to have taken one of the Gates of the City: There was growing in the Iſland great plenty of a kind of Wood much of the nature of a Firre or Pitch-Tree, eaſie to be ſet on fire, but hardly to be quenched, but differing in this, that in burning it gave forth ſuch a noiſome ſmell, as was not by any Man well to be endured; of this kind of Wood the Turks brought a wonderful quantity to one of the Gates called Limoſina, which once ſet on fire, could not by the Defendants by any means be quenched, although they caſt whole Pipes and Tuns of Water at once into it, but moſt terribly burning cloſe unto the Gate by the ſpace of four days, with the vehemency of the heat and loathſomeneſs of the ſmell, ſo troubled the Defendants, that ſcarce any of them could endure to ſtand upon the Wall, but forſaking the ſame, were ever and anon like to have given the Enemy leave to enter.

Bragadinus encourageth the defendants

Bragadinus the Governor, more careful of the common ſafety than of his own danger, ceaſed not ſtill to be going about from one place to another; telling the Italians, That now was given the fitteſt occaſion they could deſire, for them to ſhew their Valour in, and to gain great Honour of their barbarous Enemies; that it would be to their eternal Glory, if by their only means without any other help, the City ſo far off from the relief of the Chriſtians might be defended, and the great power of the Turks defeated: This (he ſaid) was the only time wherein it ſtood them moſt upon to play the Men; for if they could keep that little was left, the reſt of the Iſland would be eaſily recovered: And although the Turks Army exceeded far in number, yet did they excel them in Proweſs and Valour; whereby a few, and as it were but an handful of Men, had oftentimes prevailed againſt moſt infinite multitudes; now all the eies of the World, as well Friends as Foes to be fixed upon them, ſo that if they held out againſt ſo great a power, both their Enemies would admire their Valour, and all Chriſtendom extol their invincible Courage and Proweſs; and that they themſelves ſhould thereby reap both great Profit and honour; neither that any thing could be alledged, why they ſhould not be compared with the worthy Knights of Malta, who to their eternal Fame had delivered themſelves out of the mouth of the Turk, and left unto the World a moſt fair example for Men valiantly to ſtand in ſo good a Quarrel upon their own defence: Nicoſia (he ſaid) was loſt rather by the Cowardiſe of the Defendants, than by the Valour of the Enemy. He alſo praiſed the fidelity and courage of the Græcians, who for any fear or danger could never be removed from the Venetians, or induced to ſubmit themſelves unto the Turks Government; and perſwaded them, with the ſame reſolution to defend their own City, that they ſaw in the Venetian Souldiers, fighting for them, and for their own honour to ſtrive with the Italians, in defence of their State, their Country, their Wives, and Children, againſt the Tyranny of the Turks; foraſmuch as Aid would in ſhort time come, and ſet them free from all danger. The Senate alſo in like manner had ſent Letters to Famaguſta, willing them to be of good cheer, and yet a while to hold out the Siege, and that they ſhould be in ſhort time relieved. Baleonius alſo General of the Garriſon Souldiers, himſelf in Arms was preſent at every Skirmiſh, carefully foreſeeing what was in every place and at all times to be done; and by encouraging of his Souldiers, and adventuring of his Perſon, ſhewed himſelf to be both a worthy Commander, and valiant Souldier. Neither did the Souldiers alone, but even the Women alſo what they might, ſtriving above the power of the ſtrength both of their minds and bodies; ſome bringing Meat, ſome Weapons unto the Defendants, and other Stones, Beds, Cheſts, and ſuch like ſtuff to make up the Breaches. But Victuals beginning now to wax ſcant, eight thouſand of the vulgar ſort of People were turned out of the City, who all in ſafety were ſuffered to paſs through the midſt of the Turks Army, to ſeek their living in the Country.

Baleonius a valiant Captain.

The Turks ſeek to undermine the City.

Thus whilſt open force prevailed not according to the Turks deſire, they began in four places to undermine the City, in hope to have found entrance; but the Defendants doubting ſuch a matter, by diligent liſtening, and great Veſſels ſet full of Water near unto the Walls, and Drums laid upon the ground, by the moving thereof diſcovered their Works, and with Countermines fruſtrated thoſe of the Enemy; yet in ſo great a ſtir and hurly-burly all things were not poſſibly to be diſcovered; whereby it came to paſs, that whilſt the Defendants were altogether buſied in defending the Walls, a Mine not perceived was ſuddainly blown up near unto the Tower ſtanding upon the Haven, by force whereof a great part of the Wall thereabout was in a moment with a moſt horrible noiſe overthrown. With the fall thereof the Turks thinking the City as good as taken, with an horrible ſhout and outcry mounted the Wall, and in the Breach ſet up their Enſigns; Count Peter, who had the charge of that part of the Wall, being not now able to defend the ſame, ſo ſuddainly overthrown; which Neſtor Martinengus quickly perceiving, came ſpeedily from his own Station, to repulſe the Enemy now ready to have entred. The Fight became there moſt fierce and terrible, on the one ſide hope, on the other deſperation, enraged their minds; the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themſelves but a little they ſhould forthwith win the City; and the Defendants propounding nothing unto themſelves but ſhameful death and torture, fought as Men altogether deſperate. The Turks truſted to their multitude, and the Chriſtians to their valour: In the mean time Andreas Bragadinus with certain great Pieces aptly placed, out of the Caſtle ſlew a number of the Turks as they were coming to the Breach. Baleonius leonius hearing of the danger, came in haſte with a Company of couragious Souldiers, to relieve them that were fighting at the Breach, and cheering up his Followers, thruſt himſelf with the formoſt into the face of the Breach; and there not only appointed what was to be done, and with chearful countenance encouraged his Souldiers, but with his own hand having ſlain many, took one of the Turks Enſigns, when as he had before ſlain the bearer thereof, and tumbled him headlong into the Ditch. With the ſight whereof others encouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable Battel, as Men fighting for their laſt hope. In fine the Turks were glad to retire, leaving behind them four thouſand Carkaſes of their ſlain Fellows in the Town-dith, with fourteen of their Enſigns, which were brought into the City. Neither was this Victory gained without ſome loſs of the Chriſtians; about a hundred were ſlain, among whom were Robertus Malvetius, David Nocius, Celſus Feto, Eraſmus Firmo, all Captains.

The breaches notably defended.

They of Famagusta blow up one of their own battered Bulwarks, with ſix hundred Turks thereon.

For all this, they in the City took ſmall reſt, the Turks great Shot ſtill thundring in amongſt them; and in ſuch furious ſort, as that in one day (which was the eighth of June) were numbered about five thouſand great Shot, ſhot into the City. With which continual battery, one of the round Bulwarks of the Town was ſo ſhaken, as that a part of the Front thereof was fallen down into the Ditch, and another part ſtood leaning ready to fall, in ſuch ſort as that it was not longer to be defended; which the Chriſtians perceiving, preſently undermined the ſame Bulwark, and in the Mine placed certain Barrels of Gunpowder. The Turks coming to aſſault the place they had ſo ſore battered, the Defendants after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, faigned themſelves to retire for fear, ſo to draw the Enemy the faſter on; who was no ſooner come to the place deſired, but that fire being put to the Mine, blew up the Bulwark with all them that ſtood thereon; of whom ſome were overwhelmed with the earth it ſelf, other ſome were blown up into the Air, and falling down again, miſerably periſhed; and other ſome, ſhot as it were out of a Gun, fell down a great way off, and ſo were rent in pieces; which was unto the Defendants a moſt pleaſant ſight. About ſix hundred of the Turks periſhed at this Aſſault, amongſt whom were Muſtapha General of the voluntary Souldiers, and Feregates a Man of great mark amongſt the Turks. But by the haſty firing of the Mine, there periſhed alſo about an hundred of the Chriſtians, overtaken in their own device, amongſt whom were alſo ſome of great account.

Famagusta hardly aſſaulted.

The Turks inflamed with their loſſes, were more inraged with the ſpeeches and perſwaſions of Muſtapha their General; who moſt earneſtly exhorted them, with one conſent to aſſail their Enemies, now driven into a Corner of the Iſland, ſpoiled of all their Country, truſting more unto the ſtrength of the place, than of themſelves, entreating for nothing more, than with their lives to depart thence. But what place (ſaid he) is there impregnable for the Turks? Nicoſia, Zigeth, and ſuch other ſtrong Towns won, what are they but the monuments and teſtimonies of the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians, and the proweſs of the Turks? This day (ſaid he) will confirm your former Labours and Victories; which you before undertook for Honour, but here you ſhall have Honour mixt with Gold, and prey ſufficient to make you all rich. The Turks encouraged with this Speech of their General, as Men forgetful of all dangers, began a more terrible Siege than ever before; and having with incredible labour made three great Mines, and blowing them up, overthrew a great part with the Wall of the Caſtle, the notable defence of the Haven; which done, they with all their force oftentimes aſſailed the City, as if it ſhould have been their laſt labour; neither ceaſed they ſo to do day or night. At which time alſo that part of the City which is beaten upon with the Sea, was aſſaulted by them in the Gallies alſo.

The Citiſens of Famagusta requeſt the Governor in time to yield up the City.

The poor Chriſtians ſpent with deadly wounds, continual labour, perpetual watching both night and day, and now brought to ſmall number, hardly withſtood the furious Enemy, aſſailing them in ſo many places at once, and held out that Tempeſt rather with courage than ſtrength. In the mean time the Enemies Army encreaſed daily, the Turks in hope of the like ſpoil they had at Nicoſia, continually repairing out of the Countries round about, unto the Camp. The Chriſtian Captains ſeeing their Men with continual Aſſaults ſore ſpent, (inſomuch, that how many ſoever they ſeemed to be, there was not above three hundred ſound Men left) but ſeven Barrels of Powder remaining, want of all things daily encreaſing, hope of Aid ſtill decreaſing, and the Venetians (their only comfort) ſo far from them; the Captains (I ſay) themſelves began to quail in courage; and the rather, for that ſuch relief as was ſent from Venice, could not poſſibly be brought unto them, but ſtaied at Crete; the Turks Gallies ſtill lying before Famaguſta, ſo that nothing could in ſafety be brought thither. This fear of the Captains themſelves could not long be hid or diſſembled, but that it was by the Citiſens perceived; who having neither power to hold out the Siege, neither place left to flie unto, overcome with neceſſity, came flocking to the Governor, craving of him aid and comfort, and with aboundance of tears beſought him in this common deſperation to take compaſſion on them, their Wives, and Children, a People that had always ſo well deſerved of the Venetian State. Their Walls (they ſaid) were beaten down, their Bulwarks overthrown, the few Souldiers that remained, ſpent with wounds, watching, and famine; the Enemies ſtrength encreaſing daily, ſo that they muſt needs in ſhort time all periſh with the Sword, if the City were by force taken; wherefore they beſought him, that yielding to neceſſity, which no power was ever able to withſtand, he would at laſt, while time yet ſerved, provide for the ſafety of ſo faithful and kind a People, and not to refuſe any conditions, how hard ſoever.

A parly betwixt them of Famagusta and the Turks.

The requeſts and tears of the Citiſens of Famaguſta, with the due conſideration of the deſparate ſtate of the City, moved Bragadinus to compaſſion, who comforting them in beſt ſort he could, perſwaded them to be of good chear, for that he had care both of them and their State, and would ſo provide for them, as that they ſhould never repent themſelves of their Fidelity and Loyalty to the Venetian State. He in the mean time conſidering the greatneſs of the danger which preſently hung over all their heads, propounded the matter in a general Counſel called together for the ſame purpoſe; wherein after a little debating of the matter, they all agreed to yield; only Baleonius at the firſt diſſenting, as doubtful of the Turks Faith; but afterwards yielding unto the opinion of the reſt. So an Herauld being ſent unto the Baſſa, a Truce was taken for certain days to parley in, and Hoſtages on both ſides given, during which time not ſo much as a Dart was thrown, or an Arrow ſhot from either ſide. After a few days parley the conditions were agreed upon, whereupon the City ſhould be yielded into the power of the Baſſa, which were theſe; Firſt, That the Inhabitants of the City yet alive, ſhould in ſafety enjoy their Lives, Liberty, and Goods, with the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian Religion; That the Governor with the reſt of the Captains and Souldiers might in ſafety depart with Bag and Baggage,and at their departure to take with them five great Pieces of Ordnance, and three Horſes, which ſoever it ſhould pleaſe them to make choice of, and that the Turks ſhould ſafely conduct them into Crete, finding them both Victual and Shipping. All which things were with more kindneſs promiſed, than with fidelity performed. Yet all theſe matters agreed upon, and conceived into writing; as alſo by ſolemn Oath on both ſides confirmed; the Governor ſending a Meſſenger before, requeſted that he might have leave to come to ſee the Baſſa, and to deliver unto him the Keys of the City. Leave being granted, Bragadinus the Governor, Baleonius, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Theupolus Earl of Paphos, Jo. Antonius Quirinus, Aloyſius Martinengus, with a great ſort of other Captains came into the Camp; but before they entred into the Baſſaes Pavilion, they were commanded to deliver their Weapons, which they all did. At the firſt meeting Muſtapha entertained them courteouſly, and with many glorious words, as if it had been in admiration, extolled their worthy valour and courage; ſaying, that he was glad now to know them by face, whoſe valiant minds he had before known by their moſt valiant deeds. Now proweſs and valour ſeemed not only in ſafety, but alſo honoured of the Enemy; When after a long diſcourſe the falſe Baſſa revolved unto the miſchief and treachery he had before reſolved upon; complaining that certain of his Men taken at the Siege, had been afterward againſt all reaſon and order ſlain. Which the Governor and the reſt utterly denying, he ſtarted up as in a rage,and with high words and ſtern countenance urging the fact, commanded them all to be forthwith caſt into bonds; and ſo bringing them out of his Pavilion, in the ſight of the Army, contrary to his Oath and Promiſe, cauſed them all to be ſlain. At which time Bragadinus and Theupolus were oftentimes commanded to lay down their Heads, to have had them ſtruck off; yet was this execution deferred, and their lives reſerved, not to ſave them, but with more exquiſit puniſhment and torture to ſatisfie the barbarous Cruelty of the faithleſs and unmerciful Tyrant. The next day after, Bragadinus having his Ears before cut off in deſpight, was brought forth to be wondred at, and tortured with the moſt extremeſt kind of Torture that Tyranny it ſelf could have deviſed; for diſpoiled of Jewels and Attire, and a Basket laid upon his Shoulders filled with Earth, he was enforced oftentimes to carry the ſame, to repair the Rampiers that were overthrown; and ever as he paſſed by, the proud Baſſa inſulting upon him to fall down and to kiſs the ground at his feet; and ſo buffeted with the Turks Fiſts, and ſpurned as a Dog with their Feet, was in great deriſion and deſpight asked, Whether he hoped that Chriſt his God would come to help him or not? Which indignity of it ſelf bitter and miſerable, the dignity of the Man made much more miſerable; whoſe comely and ſtately Countenance, with his long and reverend Beard, even in that extream miſery added unto him a certain Majeſty and Grace. In this ſo foul a ſight of vertue troden under foot, the poor Chriſtians could neither well ſtay their Tears, nor let them fall, for fear of the diſpleaſure of the Turks. But the forſworn Baſſa, not only forgetful of all Humanity, but inraged rather with extream Cruelty, cauſed that noble and worthy Bragadinus to be ſet in a Chair, and his Skin to be flain off from him quick; a puniſhment unworthy of him that ſuffered it, but moſt worthy him that inflicted the ſame. Yet in ſo great and horrible a Torture he was not heard to let fall any word not beſeeming a faithful Chriſtian and the honour of his Country; only he called upon God for mercy, and deteſted the Turks perfideous Treachery, and ſo breathed out his life. But the Tyrant, worthy of eternal Infamy, not ſatisfied with the Torture of the living Man, cauſed the Head to be cut off from the dead Body, and upon the point of a Spear to be ſet up on a high place for all Men to look upon. His Skin alſo ſtuffed with Chaff, he cauſed to be hanged up at the Yards-arm, and ſo to be carried about; not ſo true a Trophy of his Victory, as a Teſtimony of his perfideous and Turkiſh Cruelty. Two days after, Count Theupolus after he had been moſt ſhamefully entreated, full of the marks of the Turks Cruelty, was (to make an end withal) ſhamefully hanged in the Market-place. With what Cruelty the Baſſa had tyranniſed upon the Nobility, with the ſame he alſo raged upon the meaner ſort of the Citiſens, of whom ſome he ſlew,ſome he chained in the Gallies, and carried away the reſt into Bondage. Three hundred Chriſtians, ſome Souldiers, ſome Citiſens, which came forth with the Governor to ſee the Turks Camp, were there alſo all ſlain. Neſtor Martinengus a famous Captain eſcaped the Tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Baſſaes Eunuchs, who by the help of a Greek Fiſherman got to Leptis, and from thence to Crete, and ſo afterwards to Venice, where he faithfully reported to Aloyſius Moſenicus the Duke, the whole proceſs of that War, with the loſs of the City; and that in the ſpace of threeſcore and ten days there was above a hundred and forty thouſand great Shot diſcharged againſt the City. Such Noblemen and Gentlemen as eſcaped out of this ſo general a ſlaughter, baniſhed their Country, and in miſery, diſperſed without hope of return, led afterward a miſerable and vagrant life; though ſome of them even at this day (as I have been credibly enformed) are by the Venetian State right well maintained. The Country people and Artificers were generally by the Turks ſpared, for the peopling of the Country. This was the fatal ruine of Cyprus, one of the moſt fruitful and beautiful Iſlands of the Mediterranean; The loſs whereof, not without cauſe, grieved many Chriſtian Princes, as ſometime a Kingdom of it ſelf, but now a Province of the Turkiſh Empire, our Sins, or the evil agreement of Chriſtian Princes, or both, the cauſe thereof, I know not; neither if I did, durſt I ſo ſay.

Whilſt Muſtapha yet lay at the Siege of Famaguſta, the other two great Baſſaes, Partau and Haly, the one the Admiral, and the other General of the Souldiers (appointed by Selymus for the keeping of the Sea, that no relief ſhould be ſent by the Venetians to Famaguſta, and further as occaſion ſerved to infeſt their Dominions) about the midſt of May arrived in Eubœa with two hundred and thirty Gallies; whether Uluzales Viceroy of Algiers, with divers other the Turks notable Pyrates, reſorted unto them with their Gallies. With this Fleet departing from Eubœa, and ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Myſia, Ionia, Caria, and ſo directly toward the Rhodes, they were met with thirty Gallies more of the Turks adventurers. After that, having left certain Gallies for to lie before Famaguſta, they directed their Courſe for the Iſland of Crete, and the 13 of June put into the Bay of Amphimalea, now called Suda, and there landed 12000 Men.

The deſcription of Crete.

The Iſland of Crete, now called Candia, is greater than Cyprus, but leſſer than Sicilia or Sardinia; but for fertilty comparable with any of the Iſlands of the Mediterranean. It was in ancient time famous for many things, but eſpecially for an hundred Cities which therein ſtood, as witneſſeth amongſt others, Seneca; (Urbibus centum ſpecioſa Cretæ) but at this time it hath only three; Candia a Colony of the Venetians, whereof the Iſland now taketh name, Canea, and Rhetimo. The circuit of the Iſland is five hundred and twenty miles, full of Hills; for which cauſe the people of the Country are much delighted in hunting. In it is no navigable River, or venomous Beaſt. It is now moſt famous through a great part of the World, for the good Malmſey which there groweth, and is from thence in great abundance ſent into many far Countries. Therein alſo grows great plenty of Cypreſs-Trees, ſerving for the uſe of ſhipping. It is at this day ſubject to the Venetians. The Turks being landed, and ranging up and down the Country, did what harm they poſſibly could, burning and ſpoiling all as they went; until that at laſt they were upon the ſuddain encountred by Franciſcus Juſtinianus, who but a little before their landing, was come into the Iſland with a thouſand Souldiers; and now joyning with the Iſland people, notably charged them, being altogether diſperſed and ſeeking after prey; and having ſlain many of them, enforced the reſt to retire to their Gallies. The next day the Turks landing again in great number, burnt divers Towns, and ranſacked Setia and Rhetimo, where they took a rich prey, and carried away many Priſoners; but loaded with their Booty, diſperſed and fearing nothing leſs than to be at that time ſet upon, they were aſſailed by Lucas Michael a valiant Captain, two thouſand of them ſlain, and with the loſs of their Booty and Priſoners, glad to retire unto their Gallies. Thus repulſed from Crete, they took their Courſe to Cythera, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Iſlands ſubject to the Venetians; where beſide other harms by them done, they carried away with them ſix thouſand poor Chriſtians into moſt miſerable Captivity.

The Turks driven out of Crete.

Departing thence, and ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Epirus, they came to Suppolo an Haven Town in Epirus, which Venerius in the beginning of theſe Wars had taken from the Turks, but was now again by them again recovered. After that, they came to Dulcigno, which the Turks had but a little before beſieged by Land, for that the Governor thereof, and of Antivari (another Town of the Venetians upon the Frontiers of Dalmatia) had compacted with three hundred Epirots, to ſtir up the Country to rebellion, and to revolt to the Venetians; for the effecting whereof, the Epirots requeſted of the Venetians ſix thouſand Souldiers to make head, which the Venetians promiſed to ſend them. Whereupon the aforeſaid Epirots forthwith took Arms, and raiſed moſt part of Epirus into Rebellion; unto whom was ſent at the firſt one Captain with a hundred Italians from Catora. But when the Epirots vainly expecting the promiſed Aid, ſaw themſelves on every ſide hardly beſet with their Enemies; deſpairing of any good ſucceſs, they yielded themſelves to the mercy of Achmetes Baſſa, Selymus his great Lieutenant in Græcia (who to repreſs that ſo dangerous a Rebellion, was come thither with an Army of fourſcore thouſand Turks;) ſo was a moſt fair occaſion loſt, when as the reſt of the Epirots, enflamed with the hope of liberty, were ready to to have come unto their Friends, already in Arms, and by their example like enough to have raiſed all Græcia into Rebellion. But now deceived of their expectation, bewailed their miſery, and truſting to the promiſes of the Venetians, they had caſt themſelves and all theirs into moſt manifeſt danger. They of Dulcigno ſeeing themſelves hardly beſet both by Sea and Land, ſent to Partau Baſſa, and covenanting with him, that they might in ſafety depart, delivered unto him the Town; and ſo Sara Martinengus Governor of the Town, which the Garriſon Souldiers, were in four Ships conveied in ſafety to Raguſium; as for the Citiſens, promiſe was kept with them after the Turkiſh manner. In the ſame hurley the Turks took alſo the Towns of Antivary and Budua. Antivari was both by ſituation and fortification ſtrong, and furniſhed with a good Garriſon: Nevertheleſs Alexander Donatus Governor thereof, a Man of no experience in Martial Affairs, overcome with the preſent fear, and deſpairing to be able to hold the Town, cowardly yielded the ſame unto the Enemy. Which his beaſtly Cowardiſe the Senate ſuffered not unpuniſhed, but confiſcating his Goods, and removing him from the Senate, caſt him into exile. From Antivari, the Turks following their good Fortune, departed with their Fleet into the Bay called Rizonicus, but now the Bay of Catharo, and both by Sea and Land laid hard Siege unto the ſtrong Town of Catharo, called in ancient time Aſcrivium; againſt which they caſt up two great Bulwarks, and planted thereon nine great Pieces of Artillery, wherewith to have battered the Town and the Caſtle; but the Defendants as reſolute Men ſallying out, put them from their Ordnance, and enforced them again unto their Gallies.

Cowardiſe puniſhed.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Uluzales and Caracoza, both Men of great account and name among the Turks, got leave for ten days of the Admiral, with ſixty Gallies to ſpoil the Iſlands near thereabouts ſubject to the Venetians. Who coming to the Iſland of Curzola, about eighty miles Eaſtward from Raguſium, landed their Men, with purpoſe to aſſault the Town of Curzola, of the ſame name with the Iſland. Which Anthonius Contarenus the Governor thereof perceiving, in the dead time of the night fled for fear out of the Town, into the Rocks and places of more ſafety, after whom the Townſmen followed alſo; ſo that in the Town were not left above twenty Men, and about eighty Women, who with Weapons in their hands, after the reſt were fled, came to the Walls, as wiſhing rather there to die, than to fall into the hands of the barbarous Enemy. But at ſuch time as the Turks began to approach the Town, and the Women with Stones, Fire, and ſuch Weapons as they had were beating them off, and with greater courage defending the place, than was to have been in their Sex expected, by the goodneſs of God a great Tempeſt aroſe ſuddainly out of the North, which ſo outragiouſly toſſed the Gallies, that Uluzales and Caracoza were glad to give over the Aſſault, and to get them thence into a place of more ſafety. Sailing alongſt the Coaſt, they by the way ſpoiled Lyſna, Bracia, and Liſſa, little Iſlands upon the Coaſt of Dalmatia, out of which they carried away with them ſixteen hundred poor Chriſtians into Captivity. Theſe arch Pyrats at their pleaſure roaming up and down the Sea, fortuned to light upon a Ship of the Chriſtians, bound from Meſſina to Corcyra; which they took, and in rifling thereof found certain Letters directed to the Governor of Corcyra, certifying him of the League, then but lately concluded among the Chriſtian Princes; which Letters they ſent in poſt to Selymus, to give him knowledge thereof; who thereupon writ to his

Admirals, with all hoſtility to infeſt any of the Dominions of the Chriſtian Confederates.

The Turks Fleet thus raging and reigning in the Adriatick, brought a great fear, not only upon the Coaſts of Dalmatia, Iſtria, and the Iſlands thereabouts, which were by them moſt afflicted; but alſo upon the Sea Coaſt of Apulia, and all alongſt that ſide of Italy; yea and upon the City of Venice it ſelf; inſomuch that they were glad to fortifie as well the City as the Frontiers of their Dominions, with new Fortifications and Garriſons; as did alſo the King and the Pope in Italy; for why, no Ship or Gally could now look out of any Port, but it was preſently ſurpriſed and taken by the Turks; which with the ſundry calamities before received, ſo confounded the Venetians, that they in their Aſſemblies and Conſultations ſeemed rather to quake for fear, than after their wonted manner, gravely to conſult how the Enemy was to be repulſed, Yet for the more ſafety of their City, and for fear leſt the Turks Fleet ſhould forcibly break in upon them, they ſtrongly fortified the Paſſages through the Rock or Bank which defended the City from the Sea, and kept continually twelve thouſand Men in readineſs in the City for the more aſſurance thereof.

The Turks put into the Bay of Lepanto.

All the Turks Fleet being again met together, Partau and Haly departed from Aulona the twenty ſixth of Auguſt, and ſailed directly to Corcyra; which little Iſland ſeemed to be compaſſed in round with the great Enemies Fleet. Partau Baſſa at his firſt arrival there, landed eight hundred Horſemen and a thouſand Foot, who ranging up and down the Iſland, did great hurt and burnt the very Suburbs of the City; At which time the Garriſon Souldiers ſailing out upon them with a thouſand Horſemen and five hunded Foot ſlew a great number of them, and amongſt the reſt one Paphus Rays a Man of great name. Thus the Turks Fleet having done wonderful harm in the Venetian Territory, as well in the Iſlands, as upon the Frontiers of Dalmatia, enriched with the ſpoil of thoſe Countries, and carrying away with them fifteen thouſand moſt miſerable Captives; departing from Corcyra, arrived all in the Bay of Corinth (now called the Gulf of Lepanto,) where we will for a while leave them to ride in ſafety.

The Forces of the confederate Princes meet together at Meſſina.

At ſuch time as this great Fleet (the terror of that part of Chriſtendom) firſt put into the Adriatick, Venerius the Venetian Admiral then lying with fifty Gallies at Corcyra, and fearing if he ſtaied there longer, to be enforced with ſo ſmall a power to fight againſt ſo ſtrong an Enemy, or elſe ſo to be ſhut up, that he could not joyn his Forces with the Spaniſh Fleet, which was daily expected; upon the coming of the Fleet departed thence to Meſſina, there more commodiouſly and more ſafely to attend the coming of Don John of Auſtria General of the Spaniſh Forces. At his coming, Columnius met him with twelve Gallies (which the Great Duke of Florence had ſent in the aid of the Confederates) and three Gallies of Malta, who only were yet come thither, and with great honour received him. Not long after, M. Antonius Quirinus and Antonius Canalis came thither alſo with ſixty and two Gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the relief of Famaguſta, but now called back again to joyn with the reſt of the Fleet; and in ſhort time the Gallies of Sicily arrived there alſo.

Don John of Auſtria.

At laſt after long expectation, in the later end of Auguſt came Don John with the Spaniſh Fleet, a Man then about four and twenty years old, in whom wanted no honourable parts, his Mothers blemiſh only excepted; who although he was moſt dear unto his Father Charles the Fifth, yet left he him nothing by his Will, but only at his death commended him unto his Son Philip, as his Brother. The Venetian and the Popes Admirals hearing of his coming, went to meet him, and that with ſuch triumph and joy, that all the former heavineſs before conceived of his long ſtaying, was turned into gladneſs, with moſt aſſured hope of triumphant Victory; Their doubled Forces, and two great Fleets joyned in one, encouraged them above meaſure, filling all the Weſt with the expectation of ſome great matter. The Venetian Fleet conſiſted of an hundred and eight Gallies, ſix Galleaſſes, two tall Ships, and a great number of ſmall Galliots. Unto them were joyned twelve Gallies of the Popes, of whom Columnius was Admiral. And with Don John the General, and Auria the Spaniſh Admiral, came fourſcore and one Gallies, of whom three were from the Knights of Malta. In this Fleet, beſide Mariners, were reckoned to be twenty thouſand fighting Men; an Army not only beautiful for ſhew, as conſiſting of moſt choice Bodies; but indeed moſt ſtrong and puiſſant, old beaten Souldiers almoſt throughout it, in every place intermixed with others of leſs skill; many known to be Men of great experience, rich and luſty Bodies, were by name called forth to this ſo honourable ſervice; and divers other of great Nobility, as well old Men, as young and luſty Gallants, for the natural hatred they bear unto the common Enemy, came, and as voluntary Men chearfully thruſt themſelves into that religious War; every of which Noblemen, as they were greater by birth or power, ſo had they drawn after them a greater number of their Favourits and Followers, ſtrong and able Bodies, of their own charge bravely armed; who fought for no other pay for their pains and danger, but by ſome notable Victory to eterniſe their names, or honourably to ſpend their lives in ſo juſt a quarrel, as for the defence of the Chriſtian Faith and Religion. Amongſt theſe moſt honourable and reſolute Men were three of greateſt mark, Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma, in time to be the honour and glory of Italy his native Country, whoſe untimely death in the Low Countries even his honourable Enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cauſe and worthy deſert accounted amongſt the moſt politick and famous Leaders of our age. The ſecond was Franciſcus Maria Prince of Urbin, a young Man honourably deſcended, and of an invincible courage; And the third Paul Jordanus Urſinus, an honourable Gentleman of the Family of the Urſini in Rome.

Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma.

All the power of the confederate Princes thus met together at Meſſina, and all things now in readineſs, a Counſel was called by the General, to reſolve what courſe to take in thoſe moſt dangerous Wars againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy; unto which Counſel were admitted only Don John the General himſelf, and Aloyſius Rechezenes, of ſome called Requiſenius, great Commander of Caſtile, the General Lieutenant, or rather director of his actions; Sebaſtianus Venerius the Venetian Admiral; and Auguſtinus Barbadicus General provedditor, of equal authority and reputation with the Admiral; and one Secretary; Marcus Antonius Columnius the Popes Admiral, with Pompeius Colonna his Kinſman. The chief point whereon theſe great Commanders were to reſolve, was Whether they ſhould adventure the general fortune of a Battel againſt ſo ſtrong an Enemy, or only ſeek to defend the Frontiers of their own Dominions? Which queſtion (as all other of like ſort) was of divers diverſly phantaſied; every Man pleaſing himſelf with his own reaſons. Requiſenius quiſcnius (Don John his chief Counſellor; without whom he willingly did nothing, and undoubtedly a Man of great valour and experience) ſpeaking firſt, ſaid, That the Enemies ſtrength was neceſſarily to be known, before they committed all to the fortune of a Battel; and that therefore delay was to be uſed, leſt improvident haſt overthrow all. Matters of War that were to be decided by the Sword, were (as he ſaid) with great and ſound adviſe to be adminiſtred, for that the errors of Battel, whereby all was to be put in hazard, were not to be again amended. He highly commended the adviſe of Scipio Africanus, who counſelled great Commanders, not to fight with the Enemy but upon ſome great advantage, or elſe thereunto forced by neceſſity. But as things now ſtood, what opportunity could be miniſtred, or advantage taken; the Enemy keeping himſelf cloſe within the Bay of Corinth, and no apparent means how to draw him out from thence? Neither that he for his part was of ſo great ſpirit, as within the Harbor in place of diſadvantage, without hope, to ſet upon an Enemy in common eſtimation ſtronger than himſelf; for what diſhonour ſhould they incur, if having received ſome notable loſs, they ſhould be enforced with ſhame to give over the enterpriſe begun? And to beſiege Oricus, Dirrachium, or Caſtrum Novum, frontier Towns of the Turks, ſo to draw them out to Battel; what were this other than to ſhew a certain fear and diſtruſt in themſelves, and to diſcourage the minds of the Souldiers? For as well the Enemy, as the common Souldier, would forthwith deem ſuch a poor attempt to proceed of a meer fear, as to make a vain ſhew of ſomething doing, when as they durſt not encounter the Enemy in his full ſtrength. As for the other reaſon drawn from neceſſity; what neceſſity had they, ſo deſperately to ſet upon the Enemy; who upon the approach of Winter muſt needs in ſhort time lay up his Gallies; and being already in ſafe Habor, would never be drawn to the hazard of a Battel, eſpecially like hope, like ſtrength, and like danger appearing on both ſides? Wherefore, it were beſt (in his opinion) only to make a great ſhew of their Forces, ſo to terrifie the barbarous Enemy; but in no caſe to hazard the hope of the whole Chriſtian Common-weal, upon the fortune of a Battel. He farther alſo propounded unto them, the uncertain events of things, the common chance of War, the ſtrength of the Enemy, as well by Sea as by Land; with whom they themſelves were not (as he ſaid) indeed comparable; then, what an infinite heap of miſeries was like to overwhelm the Chriſtian Common-weal, if they ſhould in any thing miſcarry; and that therefore, ſafe adviſe was in this caſe to be preferred before that which was attended upon with greater danger.

The Venetians urge Battel.

On the other ſide, the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State, were far of another opinion. Wherefore Venerius and Barbadicus not only vehemently perſwaded, but moſt inſtantly requeſted the General and the reſt of the great Commanders, that ſo ſoon as opportunity ſerved, they would commit the matter to the trial of a Battel, and not to make that Counſel, which their couragious minds might make moſt glorious and fortunate, by declining of Battel to become diſhonourable or fruſtrate. If deſire of honour (ſaid they) move us not, ſhall neither theſe things move us? The loſs of ſo great and chargeable a preparation, the ſpoiling of our Frontiers, and the inſolency of our Enemies, which we encreaſe by delay? We defend our ſelves and ours, we invade not them; we go not about to drive the Turk out of his Empire; but that we our ſelves be not by him driven out of our own Countries. Wherefore we ought ſo much the more readily & ſpeedily to think of Battel, by how much the neceſſity of him is greater that repulſeth a danger, than of him that offereth the ſame. What, are our Weapons blunt, or our hands benummed? Shall the Turks ſo often provoke us, and we ſtill be unrevenged? Shall we always ſhew our Weapons, and never fight? One fortunate Battel is able to blot out the infamy of former time, and to fill us with the hope of future happineſs; if nothing elſe, let the very indignity of the matter ſtir us up to battel. And what doubt is there, but that the Enemy ſwelling with pride, will come forth with his Fleet, and give us Battel? Think you that a ſmall diſcredit will enſue to our honour and reputation, if contented with a vain brag, having not once skirmiſhed with the Enemy, or ſo much as ſeen him, we ſhall return home, to the general ſhame of all Chriſtendom? See how many peſtilent inconveniences will enſue, if we ſhall take this courſe. This manner of proceeding will fill all Mens minds with deſpair; the people will murmure, That they are to no purpoſe oppreſſed with exactions and tributes; The confederate Princes (careful of this War) will ſay, that they have in vain wearied themſelves with often embaſſages and care thereof: The proud Enemy will account our departure, or declining of Battel, for a manifeſt Victory. The next year we may look for him again with a greater and a ſtronger Fleet, which will not only make a more heavy War, but deſtroy and bear down all before it; at which time, who can aſſure us that the Chriſtians ſhall have the like preparation, if we ſhall now delay to fight? What labour is to be taken, what coſt to be beſtowed, to ſet forth again ſo great a Fleet? Unto theſe cauſes which impoſe upon us a neceſſity and force to fight, is adjoyned not only a ſingular regard of our honour, but a moſt notable opportunity alſo offered; we never had a greater Fleet, nor better furniſhed with Men, Munition, and all things elſe to be required for the gaining of a notable Victory; and who knoweth not, that the Chriſtian Gallies are far ſtronger than the Turks? Beſides that, the greateſt part of their beſt Souldiers are in hope of prey gon into Cyprus, who there ſeeking after the ſpoil, and forgetful of the Enemy, without controlment glut themſelves with the pleaſures of that rich Iſland; whereby their Fleet is ſo much the weaker. All which things, as they promiſe no hard Victory, ſo do they propound unto us Honour, Glory, Fame, and moſt honourable Rewards; and open unto us the way both for the defence of the preſent, and recovery of that hath been before loſt. What then ſtand we ſtill looking for? Or why do we not in Gods Name joyn that Battel, which is unto us, not only neceſſary, but profitable alſo?

Cornea, and Serbellio perſwade the giving of Battel.

Thus much ſaid, they began to entreat and beſeech the General and the reſt, not longer to ſuffer the Chriſtian Common-weal to receive loſs upon loſs, but to repoſe their only hope in the good ſucceſs of one worthy Battel, and never to look for the like opportunity, if they let ſlip the preſent. This matter of ſo great conſequence, thus throughly debated amongſt the greateſt Commanders, they thought it good to hear alſo the opinions of other notable Captains, of no leſs experience than themſelves (then in the Fleet) before they would conclude any thing. Amongſt the reſt, Anthonius Cornea, and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, and for their great wiſdom and valour had in general reputation of all Men; being demanded their opinions, with moſt ſubſtantial reaſons, declared the neceſſity of giving Battel, and that it was not ſo dangerous, as to be therefore ſhunned or delaied; forſomuch as that violent Enemy was far eaſier to be dealt withall at Sea than by Land; where he muſt fight without his hugh multitude of Men, the Turks chief hope, and only means whereby they have obtained ſo many Victories againſt the Chriſtians. And ſo concluded their opinions, with an effectual perſwaſion to ſet forward to Corcyra, and without delay as occaſion ſerved to give the Enemy Battel. Which their opinion being generally well liked, was ſhortly after by the General and the reſt approved, and a reſolution ſet down for the giving of Battel; which was no ſooner known, but there was general rejoycing through the Army, every Man chearfully preparing himſelf to lay down his life in the publick defence of the Chriſtian Common-weal, and that with ſuch an earneſt deſire of Battel, that every day ſeemed now nothing alſo, but a delay of a moſt aſſured Victory.

The confederates put their Fleet in order of Battel.

Yet before they ſhould come into the ſight of the Enemy, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the Fleet into the Sea, and there to martial the ſame, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould even then preſently have joyned Battel; to the intent, that by ſuch orderly diſpoſing of their Fleet, and by appointing unto every Man his place he was to keep, they might ſo acquaint them with the order of the Battel, as that they ſhould when time ſerved, of themſelves without farther direction, martial themſelves, and ſo more readily enter into Battel. The next day the Admirals brought forth their Fleets into the open Sea; in the right Wing (which conſiſted of three and fifty Gallies) was Auria placed; In the left Wing was Auguſtinus Barbadicus with the like number of Gallies alſo; And in the middle Battel ſtood the General with ſeventy Gallies; On the right hand of the General ſtood Columnius, and on the left Venerius, his Aſſociates. Thus with equal front the Fleet ſet forward, as if they ſhould even preſently have joyned Battel. Betwixt the Wings and the middle Battel, was left no more ſpace but for three Gallies to row; In the Rereward behind the General, followed Requiſenius, the great Commander of Caſtile, with his Gallies; after Columnius followed the Admiral Gally of Genoa, wherein was Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma; and behind Venerius came the Admiral Gally of Savoy, and in her the Prince of Urbin; in the ſpace betwixt the middle Battel and the left Wing, was placed Paulus Jordanus; and betwixt the middle Battel and the right Wing, was Petrus Juſtinianus with the Gallies of Malta; Upon the left Wing attended Anthonius Canalis; and Quirinus on the right. About half a mile behind all the reſt, followed Alvarus Bacianus Marqueſs of Sancrace, and Admiral of the Neapolitan Fleet, with thirty Gallies; a Man of great experience in matters at Sea; and now ſo placed, to be at all times ready to relieve this or that part of the Fleet, as the fortune of the Battel, or impreſſion of the Enemy ſhould require. The Chriſtians had repoſed great hope in ſix Galeaſſes; which furniſhed with great ſtore of Ordnance and certain ſelect Companies of moſt reſolute Souldiers, ſeemed rather like Caſtles than Ships. Theſe Galeaſſes conducted by Franciſcus Dodus, a moſt expert Captain, were placed about a mile before the Fleet; two of them before each Wing, and the other two before the middle Battel; ſo far diſtant one from another, as that with equal ſpace they anſwered the whole breadth of the front of the Fleet, which was almoſt the ſpace of five miles, and ſerved the ſame in ſtead of moſt ſtrong Bulwarks. The Gallies throughout the Fleet kept not cloſe together, but ſuch a convenient diſtance one from another, as might ſerve for them at liberty to diſcharge their Ordnance when time ſhould require. In the Wings, as alſo in the main Battel, were the Popes, the Kings, and the Venetian Gallies indifferently intermixed; that by the equality of the danger they ſhould have more care to relieve one another, than if they had ſerved apart. Joannes Cardonius, a moſt valiant Captain, with eight Gallies of Sicily and two Galliots, was appointed to go ten miles before the Fleet to deſcry what he might, of the Enemies doings, and in his return to joyn the one half of his Gallies to the one Wing, and the other half to the other.

Six Galeaſſes.

The Chriſtian Fleet departeth from Meſſina, to give the Turks Battel.

In this ſort they departed from Meſſina, with purpoſe to ſeek out the Enemy; and not long after came to Paxo, where, of a ſmall broil at the firſt, was like to have riſen a great miſchief; for the next day, whilſt Don John ſtaied there to take a view of the Venetian Gallies, and how they were furniſhed both of Men and Munition, he finding them but weakly manned, for ſupplying of that want, appointed four thouſand Spaniards, and a thouſand Italians to be put aboord into the Venetian Gallies, where moſt need was.

Mutius Tortona a Spaniard, raiſeth a Mutiny in the Fleet at Paxo.

Amongſt theſe Souldiers, was one Company under the command of Mutius Tortona their Captain, a Man of an unquiet and furious Nature; who going aboord the Gally of Andreas Calergus, firſt fell to words with the Captain of the Gally, and after much ſtir, into plain fight; ſo that in a trice they were altogether by the Ears, as well the Souldiers as the Captains; of all which ſtir, Mutius was the only author. Venerius being not far off, and hearing of the matter, ſent the Captain of his own Gally to appeaſe the tumult, who thruſting himſelf into the midſt of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his fury fouly entreated, and divers of them that came with him ſhrewdly beaten. Which thing Venerius (himſelf alſo of an hot nature) taking as done in diſgrace of the Venetians, and therewith exceedly moved; to the terror of others, cauſed Mutius and his Enſign-bearer to be hanged up at the Yards-arm of the ſame Gally, to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The General alſo taking this execution in evil part, full of choler and indignation, grievouſly complained, That he himſelf as General, was therein not a little wronged; and that it became every Commander, to know what belonged to his place, and not to encroach upon his betters; ſo ſhould the conditions of the League be the better kept, if every Commander could keep himſelf within the bounds of his own Authority. Venerius he ſaid, (whoſe authority was inferior unto his) could not of right without his command determine any thing againſt Mutius a Spaniſh Captain; And that therein his honour was empaired; for which if he had not a publick and honourable amends, he threatned by force of Arms to redreſs his wrong, and the League being broken, to carry away with him the Kings Gallies. Neither wanted there ſome, who favouring Don John his quarrel, and angry with the Venetians, laied ſtill more Coals on the fire that was already too great. Hereunto Venerius ſent word unto the General, That he ſhould do well to moderate his anger, and at leiſure to adviſe himſelf, and better to underſtand the matter, ſo ſhould he plainly ſee, that there was never more juſt or wholſome execution done upon any, than upon thoſe mutinous tinous perſons : But if he, carried away with the heat of youth, ſhould attempt any more violent courſe than ſtood with the common quiet, it were not to be marvelled if he afterward repented. He (as he ſaid) was alſo in Arms, and ready to ſhew himſelf a Man. The matter was grown to that heat, that it was not only not far from the breaking off of the League ; but even at the point to have ſet all on a broil, and to have put the whole Fleet in danger ; had not Columnius the Popes Admiral, againſt this Tempeſt oppoſed himſelf; he with all his power laboured to cure the wounded mind of the General, and to appeaſe his anger ; telling him, That the common Enemy would hardly be withſtood by them all, being at unity and concord amongſt themſelves ; but if unto the foreign danger were alſo joyned domeſtical Diſcord, then were the Chriſtian Common-weath undone. But if he would moderate his anger, and more regard the honour and credit of the Venetian Admiral, than the puniſhment of a ſedicious Man, even they which were unto him Friends, and Enemies unto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation and ſtayedneſs; yea, that howſoever the matter was done, it could not be now undone. But whatſoever Venerius had done, was in his opinion juſtly done ; That it was always ſo accounted and obſerved, that when many Princes joyned their Forces together in matters that concerned the common managing of the War, nothing was to be done without the command of the General ; but in matters belonging to the private Government of every Mans Regiment, every General had power of life and death over them that were under his command ; which to be ſo, was as he ſaid hereby to be underſtood. King Philip was King of many Kingdoms, and that he might long ſo be, he heartily wiſhed ; now if any Millanoies had committed any capital Crime worthy death in the Kingdom of Naples, ſhould the judgment of that crime be of right to be referred unto the King himſelf, as the chief Sovereign ? Or unto the Governour of Mallain, where the offender was born ? Or rather to the civil Magiſtrate of Naples, in whoſe juriſdiction the fault was committed, and ſo of right there to be executed ? What difference was there then, but that Mutius might rightly ſeem to have been juſtly puniſhed by Venerius, who although he were a Spaniſh Captain, had yet raiſed a Mutiny in a Venetian Gally, which was under the command of the Venetian Admiral ? Beſide that, the diſcipline of War ſometime required a ſevere and exemplary kind of puniſhment : For which cauſe it was both notably and truly ſaid of Clearchus, That a General ought to be more feared of his Souldiers, than the Enemy ; and that amongſt the ancient Romans it had been the cuſtom, even for private Men with more ſevere puniſhment to reſtrain the factious Citiſen, than the moſt cruel Enemy : That the fact was not ſo much to be regarded, as the intention of him that did it : That it was the duty of Commanders to withſtand the madneſs of the mutinous. The author of ſedition and tumult he ſaid had ſuffered but condign puniſhment to his fact ; who if he had eſcaped unpuniſhed, would but have been the more diſordered ; but now by his exemplary puniſhment, would deter others from the like inſolency. Beſides that, the external danger was ſuch, as ought to reconcile them, were they never ſo much Enemies : That ſuch Men as they were, ſhould above all things regard what might profit or hurt the common cauſe ; in contemplation whereof all private injuries were to be remitted ; and the rather, for that the honour and diſhonour of the good or bad ſucceſs of ſuch an important action ſhould redound unto themſelves, but eſpecially unto the General. His own duty he had as he ſaid diſcharged, in dealing ſo plainly and faithfully with him, and could no more but pray unto God, with merciful eye to behold the troubled Chriſtian Common-weal in ſuch a moſt dangerous time.

Don John ſtill beareth a Grudge againſt Venerius.

Barbadicus the Venetian Proveditor a notable Man.

Thus was the mutiny at Paxo by the great labour of Columnius hardly appeaſed : Nevertheleſs Don John could not afterwards endure to participate unto Venerius his Counſels, or ſo much as to come in his company ; all was done by Barbadicus the Venetian Proveditor. This Barbadicus was not inferior to Venerius in courage and valour, but far beyond him in diſcretion ; a tall and goodly perſonage, well coloured, his Beard grizly, though not for age, for why he was not above fifty years old : Beſide that, in his eies and countenance appeared a vivacity or livelineſs of ſpirit ; in his very gate and comely motion of his body, he carried a certain grace and majeſty ; His talk and ſpeech was always calm and temperate, his counſel grave and ſound ; ſo that he was both greatly honoured and beloved of all Men ; His chief endeavor alſo was, to further the hope of attonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo well begun by Columnius. And ſo all things brought into ſome reaſonable tearms, they departed from Paxo, and came to Corcyra ; the ſpoil whereof well declared the Enemies late being there. From thence they departed to Cephalenia ; where they by Letters from Pau. Contarenus, Governour of Zacynthus, were advertiſed, That the Turks Fleet of three hundred and three and thirty Sail, of one ſort and other, lay in the Gulf of Corinth, now called the Gulf of Lepanto. Whereupon they ſhortly after removed, with purpoſe to have gone to Petala, an Haven oppoſite over againſt the Iſlands (or rather Rocks) called Echinades, but now Corzulares, and ſo to the Bay of Corinth, to draw the Enemy forth to Battel ; but ſtaied with contrary Winds, they put back again into the Valley of Alexandria, another Port in the Iſland of Cephalenia ; from whence they afterward departed to the Iſlands Corzulares, where by the way they underſtood by Letters out of Crete, That Famaguſta was loſt ; with which bad news they were no whit diſcouraged, but rather enflamed with the deſire of revenge. From the Iſlands they went to Galanga, a good Harbor, where they ſtaied one night, purpoſing the next day to have gone to the mouth of the Gulf of Lepanto, there to dare the Turks to battel.

The Chriſtian Fleet at Cephalenia.

The Turks Baſſaes Partau and Haly, who then lay in good ſafety within the Gulf, hearing of the approach of the Chriſtian Fleet, began to conſult with the reſt of their moſt expert Captains, Whether to give the Chriſtians Battel, or to keep themſelves ſtill within their ſafe Harbor ; upon which doubt they were amongſt themſelves of divers opinions. Amongſt the reſt Chirocbe a Man of great years and authority, and withal a moſt noble Captain, exhorted the Baſſaes, in no caſe, when no need was, upon a vain glory to adventure all to the fortune of an uncertain Battel ; it was (as he ſaid) the part of wiſe and worthy Commanders, to moderate with reaſon their happy fortunes, for that thereunto were incident many accidents whereby their former felicity might be diſgraced; they had already run alongſt the Enemies Coaſts, ſpoiled the Frontiers of his Countries, and were with much honour and great ſpoil in ſafety returned, having encreaſed the Turkiſh Empire with many ſtrong ſtrong Towns of the Enemies; the Iſland of Cyprus was with wonderful good fortune brought under the Turks obeiſance, the Enemies great proviſion at Sea fruſtrated, in ſuch ſort, as that having loſt divers of their Gallies, they were never yet able to draw their Swords; they had with their Fleet at their pleaſure roamed up and down the Adriatick, and diſplayed their victorious Enſigns almoſt unto the very City of Venice. What could they then deviſe or wiſh for more honourable or glorious, than with the ſafety of their Fleet, yea without any loſs at all, to have performed ſo great matters? Now the three general Commanders of the Enemies Fleet to be ſo at diſcord among themſelves, as that they were ready to fall in ſunder of themſelves; who now upon the approach of Winter, and for want of Victual, muſt needs in few days return home with their Fleet, never after to meet again with the like ſtrength at Sea; and therefore to what purpoſe were it, by force of Arms and uncertain Battel, with danger to ſeek for the ſoveraignty and command of the Sea, which would forthwith of it ſelf without any danger fall unto them. Neither ſhould they by the doubtful Victory ſo much encreaſe their Honour, as by the uncertain event of a Battel blemiſh the ſame, if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well. And that therefore they ſhould do well to take heed, that in ſeeking to augment their former Victories, they hazarded not their Honour already gained; but wholſomely delay the War, and keep themſelves in ſafety with their Fleet within the Gulf, and not to go out at the Enemies pleaſure, but when they ſhould ſee good themſelves, at ſuch time as the Enemy was not ſo well provided; ſo ſhould they (as he ſaid) without any great labour or danger attain to the full of their own deſires.

Partau Baſſa ſtandeth indiffrent for giving or not giving Battel.

Partau Baſſa was of opinion, That the Chriſtians would not at all offer him Battel; which opinion the Chriſtians had alſo of him; and in this queſtion, for giving or not giving of Battel, ſeemed neither to approve nor diſlike that Chiroche had ſo gravely ſpoken, but as a Man indifferent and loath to encur any blame, ſhewed himſelf ready either to ſtay or to ſet forward, as ſhould be thought beſt by the greateſt part. But Haly Baſſa, a Man of an hotter ſpirit, and the great Champion of the Turks, could not endure to hear of any delay, but of preſent Battel. The pleaſure of Selymus, the hope of Victory, the remembrance of the diſpleaſure Pial Baſſa had the laſt year incurred, for not giving the Chriſtians Battel, enduced him now in no caſe to refuſe Battel, but forthwith to go out of the Gulf, and to accept thereof, if it were offered. In which his opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous Pyrat, and of great account among the Turks; who in a ſwift Galliot taking view of the Chriſtian Fleet, had reported it to be much leſs than indeed it was; deceived as was afterward thought, by not taking full view thereof, by reaſon of his poſting haſte; or elſe blinded by the Iſland, which lying behind the Fleet, ſuffered him not perfectly to deſcry the ſame. Upon which report there was great rejoycing amongſt the Turks, who now after their accuſtomed manner dreamed of nothing but Victory and Spoil. So that Haly, vainly perſwaded that his Fleet was both the greater and ſtronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Chriſtians upon firſt ſight of the Turks Fleet would either retire and ſave themſelves by ſhameful flight; or elſe in adventuring Battel at ſo great ods, by their fooliſh hardineſs receive a notable overthrow. This opinion of the Baſſa was alſo not a little confirmed by the perſwaſion of Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa his Son, Uluzales, and Chair-Beg, Governour of Smyrna, all Men of great mark and experience, eſpecially in matters at Sea. And although Partau the other Baſſa ſtood wavering as a Man in doubt, and Chiroche Governour of Alexandria, with Carabuzes Governour of Silicia, and Mechmet Governour of Eubœa, Men of no leſs worth than the other, upon better conſideration, were of a quite contrary mind, for not giving the Chriſtians Battel; yet ſuch was the authority of Haly, or rather his opportunity, forced to his own Deſtiny, that his opinion prevailed; ſo that now out they needs muſt, and fight. Albeit that two other Eſpials ſent out after Caracoza, and having more perfectly viewed the Fleet, returning with ſpeed, told the Baſſaes, as truth was, That the Chriſtians very ſtrong and well appointed, were coming with Enſigns diſplayed of purpoſe to fight; and that their Fleet was in number much greater than was before ſuppoſed. With which news ſo far contrary to their expectation, the Baſſaes were exceedingly troubled; and demanding whether the formoſt Gallies were all Venetians or not; and being anſwered, that they were intermixt, ſome Venetians, ſome Spaniſh, and of the other Weſtern Countries; they began to doubt the worſt, and became exceeding penſive. Nevertheleſs knowing themſelves to be of all things well furniſhed, having now victualled in the Bay of Corinth, and there alſo taken in twelve thouſand Janizaries and Spahies, drawn out of the Garriſons of Ætolia, Acarnania, Peloponneſus, and the other Countries thereby, all reſolute Men, and four thouſand other common Souldiers, and that they could not now with their honour ſhrink back, they held it ſtill for the beſt, to hold on their former reſolution for the giving of the Chriſtians Battel. Yet before their ſetting forward, calling together the Captains and chief Commanders of the Fleet, Partau the more to encourage them, ſpake unto them as followeth.

The Turks reſolve to give the Chriſtians Battel.

Partau Baſſa encourageth the Turks.

We are to fight (ſaid he) Fellows in Arms, with that kind of Men whom our Anceſtors have driven out of Eubœa, the Rhodes, Mitylene, Peloponneſus, and Tripolis, and we our ſelves but yeſterday out of the famous Iſland of Cyprus; whoſe Cities and ſtrong Towns, in number infinite, our Emperor hath, as the rewards of his Wars; whom we have always vanquiſhed as well by Sea as by Land; and ſhall it then now repent you, that you in this War, embrued in the Chriſtian Blood, have ſunk or taken many of their Ships and Gallies? That you have carried away great and rich Spoils? That you have taken whole Iſlands and Cities at the firſt aſſault? That we have by proof ſhewed unto the World what force is in the Turk to ſubdue ſtrong Cities and Towns? And what little power is in the Chriſtians to defend the ſame? What direction brought us Victory before, the ſame ſhall alſo at this preſent give us the like. Not to ſpeak of that, that we far excel them both in number of Men and Gallies, this is more to be reckoned of, that we excel them in Valour and Proweſs; for you being old expert Souldiers, from your infancy trained up in the Wars, hardened in infinite Battels, and full of courage and ſtrength, ſhall fight againſt weak, freſh-water, and effeminate Souldiers; who entertained for pay (of the refuſe of all Nations) know nothing belonging to the Wars; or forcibly preſſed out of Cities, ſerve not becauſe they would, but becauſe they muſt neither will nor chooſe. But not to ſpeak more of the manner of the Chriſtian Souldiers, who are nothing elſe than the perpetual exerciſe of your renown and prowes; and to come un- *to him, under whoſe fortune and conduct they ſerve. What ſhould I ſay? Should I compare either of us (who have ſpent our Lives in Victories and Triumphs; who born and brought up amongſt Arms, have with our right hands gained unto our ſelves Honour and Fame) with this ſtripling and half months Captain, who never ſaw Battels but theſe? Who in a leſs matter never ſhewed proof of himſelf, why ſhould he be accounted of in a greater? who in ſo weighty a cauſe needed a Tutor; and ſuch a one, as indeed beareth the Name of a General, more for his honour, than for any worth in himſelf. Beſides, amongſt the Enemies is ſuch diſſention, that every Man regardeth his own private, ſerveth as pleaſeth himſelf, contemneth, and is contemned: Whereas with us is ſuch conſent, that it cannot be deviſed, how the Souldiers in general ſhould more truſt their Commanders, or the Commanders their Souldiers. What things were by the diſcipline of War or carefulneſs of a General to be prepared, all thoſe you have abundantly and plentifully in readineſs; only this laſt warlike labour remaineth; which once diſpatched, our Enemies ſhall be diſcomfited even in that wherein their greateſt confidence reſteth. They ſhall be diſpoiled of their Honour and Traffick at Sea; and that * once ſubdued, which is alone the glory of the Sea, there ſhall be no hope left for the Chriſtians, whether by Sea or Land; and (that we have always wiſhed)* Italy, fair Italy (wherein theſe matters are plotted againſt us) ſhall be in our hand and power; wherefore let us with ſuch courage aſſail our Enemies, as beſeemeth moſt victorious Conquerors, Men ſo many times conquered; And ſo ſet forward, as if you ſaw our Emperor himſelf encouraging you, and giving you the ſignal of Battel; of his bounty, and the preſent victory, expecting all felicity and bliſs.

* Viz. Venice.

This comfortable Speech with great gravity delivered by the Baſſa, ſo encouraged the Turks, as that they all with one voice and mind ſeemed to deſire nothing more than Battel; for they ſtill poſſeſſed with the firſt report of Caracoza, and encouraged by the Baſſaes Speech, were in good hope to have fought the Battel upon great advantage, and therefore thought upon nothing but preſent Victory. Whereupon ſetting forward with great chearfulneſs, they came out of the Gulf, and ſhaped their Courſe for the Iſlands Echinades, about midway betwixt Lepanto and Patras, before little Iſlands, or rather obſcure Rocks, ſcarcely appearing in the Sea, but now to be made famous throughout the World, by the moſt notable Battel that ever was fought in thoſe Seas.

The Turks Fleet cometh out of the Gulf of Lepanto. The Iſlands Echinades, or Corzulares.

The Chriſtians alſo coming ſtill on towards the Enemy, the ſeventh of October in the afternoon underſtood by their Eſpials, that the Turks Fleet was coming, and even now at hand; whereupon the General commanded the great Enſign of the Confederates (the appointed ſignal of Battel) to be forthwith diſplayed, and a great warning Piece to be ſhot off out of his Admiral Gally; And himſelf gliſtering all in bright Armor, with Cardona Admiral of Sicilia, and Soto his Secretary, in a long Boat went to all the Squadrons of the Fleet one after another, exhorting them with chearful countenance to follow their Leaders, and to play the Men; remembring, that they that day carried in their hands the Wealth, Honour, Glory, and Liberty of their Countries, yea and the very Religion of their Forefathers; and that that days Victory would bring unto them and theirs perpetual Felicity; whereas otherwiſe, if they ſhould as Cowards ſuffer themſelves to be overcome and vanquiſhed, it would be unto them the beginning of all manner of moſt woful calamities. To which and other like his Speeches, the Captains and Souldiers (before of themſelves chearful enough) in every place where he came gave ſuch applauſe with the joyful cry of Victory, Victory, ſo often and ſo chearful in all places reſounded, as that it was taken as a lucky aboadment of the glorious Victory ſhortly after enſuing. In like manner Auria in the right Wing, and Barbadicus in the left (for the Fleet kept the ſame order that they had appointed before at Meſſina) ceaſed not by all comfortable Speeches to encourage their Followers; ſhewing unto them, That now the time was come they ſo long wiſhed for, wherein they not oppreſſed with multitude, might at length ſhew their true Valour againſt the falſe and faithleſs Enemies; who being indeed nothing elſe but baſe and contemptible Slaves born to bondage, and having loſt their own liberty, came to impugn the liberty of others; bringing with them a greater terror of their name, than valour of their perſons; and that therefore, if ever, they would now ſhew themſelves valiant and couragious, and that day, wherein of all others true force was to be ſeen, to abate the pride of the barbarous and cruel Enemy, and to make their rejoycing for the Conqueſt of Cyprus ſhort, before they had well taſted the pleaſure thereof. At which time alſo, the Captains generally throughout the Fleet, with chearful countenances and couragious ſpeech encouraged their Souldiers; leaving nothing unſaid that might hearten them on; or undone, that might further the Victory.

Neither were the Turks wanting to themſelves (although it was fallen out much contrary to their expectation, to ſee the Chriſtians, who they before thought durſt not have ſhewed themſelves, now ready to dare them Battel) but encouraged with their former Victories, and furthered with a fair gale of Wind, came on proudly with their Fleet orderly and gallantly ſet after their wonted manner in form of a Croiſant or half Moon, their fortunate Enſign; nevertheleſs in their coming on they were much troubled with the brightneſs of the Sun, which then ſhining full in their faces, with his bright beams ſo dazled their eies, that they could not well ſee how to their moſt advantage to direct their Gallies. In this Fleet of the Turks were two hundred and fifty Gallies, fifty Galliots, and twenty Brigadines and other ſmall Veſſels; all which a far off ſhewed like a thick Wood, but coming near hand, preſented (as we ſaid) the form of a Croiſant. The middle Battel in number much like the Chriſtians, was conducted by the great Baſſaes Haly and Partau, attended upon with Agan Maſter of the Turks Arſenal, Muſtapha Zeliby the Treaſurer; Achmat Bay, with Mahomet his younger Brother, the Sons of Haly; Achmat Aga Governour of Theutbrania; Aſſis Caiga Governour of Calipolis; Caracoza, Caſſanes the Son of Barbaruſſa; Malamur Governour of Mitylene; Dely Solyman Gider Captain of Chios; Caſſambeius Governour of the Rhodes; Provi Aga Captain of Naupulium; Giaper Zeliby Preſident of Calabra; Dordagnan, Dondomeni, and many others, whoſe barbarous Names I purpoſely omit; all Men of great account and place, and for their experience at Sea the chief ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire. The right Wing was by the appointment of the Baſſaes commanded by Mahomet Bey with fifty ſix Gallies, with whom were alſo many worthy Captains; and in the left Wing was Uluzales the old Arch-Pyrat, but now the Vice-Roy of Algiers, with ninety five Gallies, accompanied with Caraiolo and Arabey his two Sons, with a multitude of Pyrats, Men of his own profeſſion, profeſſion, but moſt valiant and expert Souldiers. In the Rereward came Amurates Dragute, with thirty Gallies, and divers other ſmall Veſſels.

The great and notable Battel between the Turks and the Chriſtians, commonly called, The Battel of Lepanto.

Now was the day well ſpent, when both the Fleets were ready to give Battel; the Enemy ſtill coming on almoſt in ſame ſame order that the Chriſtians did; for their middle Battel came directly againſt our middle Battel, and their Wings againſt ours. So the ſignal of Battel on both ſides given by the ſhooting off of certain great Pieces; The Turks after their manner coming on with an hideous cry, firſt light upon the ſix Galeaſſes, which lying at Anchor almoſt a mile before the Fleet, as moſt ſtrong Bulwarks, out of their Fore-Caſtles poured out their murthring Shot upon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their paſſing by ſo plagued them, by diſcharging their whole Broad-ſides, firſt the one, and eftſoons the other upon them, that having received great loſs, and divers of their Gallies ſunk, they were enforced to break their order, and to fall further off. Which ſo much the more troubled the Turks, for that they had before ſuppoſed, thoſe great Carts and unſerviceable Ships (as they accounted of them) to have carried little or no great Ordnance on their ſides, after the manner of their Gallies; for the uſe of the Galeaſſes was not unto the Turks known, until now that they had received from them moſt notable harm; which as it was the beginning of their miſery, ſo was it unto the Chriſtians of greateſt importance for the gaining of the Victory. At which time alſo the Wind, which all that day had much favoured the Turks, was now (God no doubt fighting his own Battel) come about to the Weſt, and with a pleaſant Gale in the time of the fight carried the ſmoke of the great Ordnance upon the Turks, to their no ſmall diſadvantage. Yet for all this loſs and diſorder in their Fleet, the fierce Enemy with wonderful pertinacy paſſing by theſe Galeaſſes, quickly repaired again to their places, and made good their diſordered Squadrons, and with all their force aſſailed the Chriſtian Fleet. The Trumpets, Drums, and other Inſtruments of War had ſcarcely well ſounded, when all ſhook with confuſed cries, flames of Fire, thundring of Artillery, and other noiſe of the Mariners and Seamen; wherewith many were ſo aſtoniſhed as if they had been both deaf and blind, having upon the ſuddain almoſt loſt the uſe both of their ſight and hearing. At which very inſtant a Man might have ſeen the whole ſhowers as it were of Arrows and Darts mixt with the deadly Shot, flying from the one Fleet to the other; the Maſts broken, the Sail-yards ſtruck down, the Tackles rent, and all confuſed with horror and fear. Haly beholding the Admiral Gally (which was eaſie to be known by the Flag) and uſing the ſurpaſſing chearfulneſs of his Mariners and Rowers, ran upon her with ſuch violence as if he would have preſently ſtemmed her; but being with like force encountred by the Admiral, they met together with ſuch violence, that both their Beaks were with the Feaze broken off, and ſo fell into the Sea. There began a moſt cruel fight betwixt theſe two great Commanders, who had before drawn unto them the ſtrongeſt Gallies in their Fleets, and the choiſeſt Men in their Armies. In the Admiral Gally of the Chriſtians were four hundred ſelect Men pickt out of the whole Army, moſt of them Captains and Antients, Men of approved Valour; who not only valiantly repulſed the furious Enemies, but with greater courage enforced them to ſhrink back, and preſſing hard upon them, entred the Gally even to the main Maſt; where the Enemy ſtrengthned with new ſupply, fought couragiouſly, repulſed the Spaniards, and cleared again their Gally. Many were there wounded on both ſides, and many ſlain. Don John ſeeing his Men give way, ſent in new ſupply; wherewith the other encouraged, beſtirred themſelves more luſtily than before, and hardly charge the Turks, who with like hope and like courage encounter them. The Battel was like unto the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; thrice the Turks were even driven unto the main Maſt, and thrice ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, they with great ſlaughter repulſed the Chriſtians back again.

A terrible onſet,

A dreadful and doubtful Fight between the two Admiral Gallies

Venerius coming to the relief of Don John is encountred by Partau Baſſa.

Venerius perceiving the danger of the General, was about to have aſſailed the Poup of Haly his Gally, ſo to have endangered her, being ſet upon both before and abaft; but in coming thither he was encountred by Partau the other Baſſa, who with a Company of Gallies oppoſed himſelf againſt him, and that with ſuch celerity, that having made ſhew as if he would have charged him afront, he by and by ſet upon his ſide. Which unexpected manner of fight ſo ſuddainly faſhioned, at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians; who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themſelves. Venerius (upon whoſe Valour the Venetian State reſted) gallantly armed, not only encouraged his Men, one while with entreating, another while with threatning, but was himſelf in the midſt of them fighting, whoſe great Honour much moved the minds of his Souldiers; but his reverend years more; to ſee him (being above ſeventy ſeven years old) to perform all the parts of a brave youthful Commander, in the very face of the greateſt danger. The fierce Enemy having ſlain many of the Chriſtians, preſſed on more furiouſly, and fighting cloſe together, entred the Prow of Venerius his Gally now bared of Defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valour oppreſſed the Venetians; who had there no doubt been overcome, had not Joannes Lauretanus and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant Captains, and lying not far off, ſpeedily come to their relief. By whoſe coming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered; ſo that they which a little before fiercely aſſailed the Venetian Gallies, were now glad to defend their own; ſo for a ſpace the fight ſtood indifferent, but in proceſs of the Battel, thoſe two worthy Captains, whilſt they alſo perform the parts of moſt reſolute Souldiers, were both ſlain; ſhot through with ſmall ſhot. The fall of theſe notable Men did rather enrage than diſcourage the minds of their Souldiers; ſo that blinded as it were with fury, and ſuddainly become other Men, they deſperately preſſed in upon the Turks; ſo that whilſt they on the one ſide kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terror of the Battel was turned from them that were even at the point to have been vanquiſhed, upon the Victors; and our Men after great ſlaughter of the Turks, took two of their Gallies; Partau the Baſſa in a long Boat eſcaped the danger, and ſo got him out of the Battel. Not far off thence, Columnius the Popes Admiral, as a valiant Chieftain hardly aſſailed other of the Turks Gallies, and made amongſt them great ſlaughter; one ſingled from the reſt, he took, and diſordered the other. Lignius the Admiral of Genoa with like courage thruſt himſelf into the thickeſt of the Enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an Enemy fell about the Prince of Parma, Ruerts, Urſinus, Cornea, and Juſtinianus; who for their preſent honour, and future fame, fought moſt couragiouſly.

A terrible Fight betwixt Chiroche and Barbadicus.

The death of Barbadicus.

At which time Chiroche or Sirock (of ſome called Mahomet Bey) with his right Wing with great confidence came forward againſt the left Wing of the Chriſtian Fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the Galeaſſes, was from out of them miſerably beaten with the great Ordnance, having many of his Men ſlain, and divers of his Gallies ſunk and torn, few of the huge and deadly Shot falling in vain into the Sea, by reaſon of the thick ſtanding of the Turks Gallies; where alſo divers of the Enemies were burnt with Pots of Wild-fire caſt into their Gallies out of the tops of the Galeaſſes. Chiroche to avoid the danger of the Galeaſſes, and to ſhun the dangerous Shelf betwixt him and the Main (which the River Achelous running between the Borders of Acarnania and Ætolia, and there falling into the Sea, maketh) ſent a great part of his Gallies under the conduct of one Alis a notable Renegate of Genoa, to caſt about aloof upon the right hand, and ſo to come upon the back of Barbadicus the Leader of the left Wing of the Chriſtian Fleet. Which he perceiving, forthwith turned his Gallies, and with their Prows received the firſt onſet. The great Ordnance firſt on both ſides diſcharged, divers of the Gallies grapled faſt together, in ſuch ſort, as that they encountred one another not with their miſſive Weapons, only (as with their ſmall Shot, Arrows, and Darts) but with their drawn Swords foot to foot. Amongſt the reſt, the fight of two of the Chriſtian Gallies was moſt notable; in the one was Barbadicus himſelf, in the other Marcus Ciconia, upon whom fell ſix of the Enemies Gallies, and upon Barbadicus five; who although they were on every ſide diſtreſſed with a moſt doubtful and dangerous fight, yet did they moſt valiantly with worthy reſolution endure the ſame. In the fury of this Battel, Barbadicus encouraging his Souldiers, and fighting himſelf even there where moſt danger was, was hit in his left Eye with an Arrow, and ſo ſtruck into the Brain almoſt through the Head; wherewith falling preſently down, he was taken up for dead; howbeit he died not thereof until three days after. The ſuppoſed death of this worthy Man much troubled the Chriſtians, and both the Armies felt his fall (ſuch force there is in the valour of one worthy Man) for the Turks now as Conquerors luſtily boorded the Gally, troubled with the loſs of the Captain; and the Venetians as Men diſcouraged gave way; the Gally had there undoubtedly been loſt, had not Fredericus Nanius and Sylvius Parcia with their Gallies ſpeedily come to her relief; by whoſe coming in, ſuch an alteration was made, as that the Gally before half taken, was not only cleared, but divers of the Turks Gallies alſo boorded, and ſome of them taken, not without the great ſlaughter of the Turks. In this ſo hard and mortal a conflict, Sylvius was grievouſly wounded in the thigh and in his right ſide. It is reported of Barbadicus, That lying that evening at the point of death, the Battel then ended, he like another Epaminondas, asked which part had got the Victory; and being told that the Chriſtians had got it, and that the Turks Fleet was moſt part taken, and the reſt ſunk or burnt; he with his eies caſt up to Heaven, gave unto God immortal thanks therefore, and not long after joyfully departed this life, to live in Bliſs for ever.

Ciconia hardly beſet, and in danger to have been loſt, is relieved.

Ciconia in the mean time hardly beſet with ſix of the Enemies Gallies, (as we have before ſaid) was himſelf ſore burnt with Wild-fire and hurt in the face; and having endured a long and terrible fight, was now even at the point to have been loſt; when ſuddain relief coming in, he was now contrary to all hope ſaved, and therewith ſo much encouraged, that with his weary and wounded Souldiers, as Men from death revived, he afreſh charged the Enemy, and took one of his principal Gallies, with one of the Turks faireſt Enſigns, which in the Venetian Armory is yet there to be ſeen; of his worthy valour, his honeſt wounds in his face and the fore part of his Body, were moſt certain and undoubted witneſſes.

Chiroche ſlain, and his Gally taken.

Not far off, in the ſame Wing Joannes Contarenus an honourable and valiant Gentleman, did with his great Shot exceeding great harm amongſt the Turks Gallies; which Chiroche perceiving, and therewith inraged, ran ſo fiercely upon the ſide of Contarenus his Gally, that with his Beak he had well near ſtemmed her; and preſently grapling faſt with her, was like to have boorded her; who nevertheleſs the Chriſtians notably repulſed, with greater ſlaughter than was thought poſſible for ſo ſmall a number to have made; neither did the Enemies fall unrevenged, but all imbrued with the Blood of the Chriſtians. Seldom hath been ſeen a more cruel fight, or more reſolute Captains to encounter hand to hand. But after the Battel had of long time ſtood doubtful, the hope of the Chriſtians encreaſed upon two cauſes, for which the courage of the Enemy quailed; Firſt for that many of the Turks being ſlain or wounded, they were brought to a ſmall number; Then for that both parties ſaw Chiroche himſelf ſlain; from which time the Enemy, as well deſtitute of a Leader to conduct them, as of freſh ſupplies to relieve them, began to be cut down right, or taken. Which their danger was the more encreaſed, becauſe the Gally bulged with the great Shot, was now leaky, and in danger to ſink; wherefore the Turks in that Wing overcome with deſpair, began to think rather how to ſave themſelves by flight than by fight, repoſing their truſt in nothing more than in the nearneſs of the Main. But as they were turning about toward the Shoar, they were prevented by the Chriſtians; who entring the Gally, and having ſlain or driven overboord almoſt all that were left, took Chiroche, yet breathing, but half dead; and ſeeing ſmall hope of his life, with freſh wounds made an end of him.

A hard and doubtful Battel.

Divers and doubtful was the whole face of the Battel; as fortune offered unto every Man his Enemy, ſo he fought; according as every Mans diſpoſition put into him courage or fear, or as he met with more or fewer Enemies, ſo was there here and there ſometime victory, and ſometime loſs. Many fights were in ſundry places ſeen mingled together; ſome Gallies whiles they run to ſtem others, are themſelves by others ſtemmed; ſome, which you would think were flying away, falling by fortune upon one victorious Gally or other, ſuddainly take them; other ſome, as if they had been of neither part, row up and down betwixt the Battels. The chance of War in one place lifteth up the vanquiſhed, and in another overthroweth the victorious; all was full of terror, error, ſorrow, and confuſion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Chriſtians at length began to appear much ſuperior both in courage and ſtrength; and the Turks ſeemed now rather to defend themſelves, than to aſſail their Enemies.

Bacianus in the Rereward intentively marked all the whole fight, and ever as need required, ſent in preſent aid, without reſpect whether they were the Popes Gallies, the King of Spains, or the Venetians, that were diſtreſſed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks ſeeing the Chriſtians Generals Gally hardly charged on the Prow by Haly Baſſa, to be almoſt bared of Defendants in the Poup, all the Souldiers having their hands full before, were about to have boorded her abaſt, and to that purpoſe were fetching a compaſs about her; Which Bacianus quickly perceiving, gliſtering in bright Armor came ſpeedily in with certain Gallies, and by oppoſing of himſelf againſt them, ſtaied their courſe. In all the Battel was not ſeen a more cruel fight; for having diſcharged many volleys of Shot, and Arrows and Darts without number, they grapled at length together, and came to the Sword, where with the formoſt, Bacianus not only with words, but with his preſence and valour wonderfully encouraged his Souldiers, having received in his Target of proof two ſmall Shot. Many were on both ſides ſlain. The Spaniards attempting ſundry times to have entred the Turks Gallies, were with great loſs repulſed; but not giving it ſo over, neither giving the Enemy leave to breath, or ſo much as to look behind him, Valour was vanquiſhed by Pertinacy, and the Spaniards having overthrown and ſlain their Enemies, enjoyed their Gallies.

A terrible fight betwixt Haly Baſſa and Don John.

Now had Don John with like courage and ſtrength, but with doubtful Victory, fought three hours and more with Haly Baſſa; when after ſo dreadful and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts given and received, our Men began to faint, and brought to the uttermoſt of their devoir, were in danger to have been overcome, had not Don John betaken himſelf to his only and laſt refuge. He had (as is before ſaid) reſerved under the Hatches four hundred of his beſt and ſelect Souldiers, for their Valour choſen out of the whole Army againſt all the events of ſo long and dangerous a Battel; theſe Men attentively attending every beck of Don John, upon ſign given, as was before appointed, ſuddainly ſtart out, and with a terrible cry and deſperate onſet aſſail the Enemy, before almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds. This freſh and unexpected company ſo ſuddainly grown up, firſt aſtonied, and afterwards confounded, and with a great ſlaughter vanquiſhed the Turks and poſſeſſed the Gally. The Baſſa deadly wounded in the head with a ſhot, and all imbrued with blood, was taken, and as a joyful ſpectacle brought to Don John; who ſeeing him ready to breath his laſt, commanded him to be diſpoiled of his Armor, and his head ſtruck off. Which preſently ſet upon the point of a Spear, he for a ſpace held up aloft with his own hand, as a trophy of his Victory, as alſo with the ſight thereof to ſtrike a terror in the minds of the other Turks, who in the other Gallies faſt by fought yet right valiantly; neither was he therein deceived; for the Turks beholding the known countenance of the Baſſa their late General, and a Flag of the Croſs ſet up in the top of his Gally, and the noiſe of the Chriſtians, crying Victory, running through the Army; were therewith ſo diſcouraged, that confounded with fear they turned their Gallies and with might and main made toward the Land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Canalis and Quirinus, yet breathing with the late ſlaughter of the Turks, perceiving, with their Gallies hardly purſued the flying Enemy, and ſunk and took divers of their Gallies. Partau his Son by the ſtaying of the reſt got time to run his Gally on ground, and ſo forſaking her, ſaved himſelf and his Men by running aſhoar; ſo did alſo divers others run themſelves aground and forſake their Gallies, which preſently became a Prey unto the Chriſtians. In this hot conflict Caracoza the famous Pyrat (who abjuring the Chriſtian Religion, had turned Turk, and of long time done exceeding much miſchief upon the Coaſt of the Chriſtian Countries) valiantly fighting, was ſlain by Buzzacharinus of Padua, by whoſe death many were delivered of a great fear.

The Turks middle Battel diſcomfited.

Caracoza the famous Pyrat ſlain

Haly Baſſa had brought forth with him his two Sons Achmat and Mahomet, the one twenty three years old, and the other thirteen, the Nephews of the great Emperor Selymus, by his Siſter married to Haly; them their Father had placed in a great Gally, with a ſtrong guard of the Janizaries; who ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the main Battel, with the danger now drawing near unto themſelves, were exceedingly afraid, and therefore to ſave themſelves, thought it beſt with all ſpeed to make toward the Main. But in ſo doing they were prevented by Requiſenius the great Commander, who with his furious Spaniards boording the Turks, already diſmaied and running away, ſlew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruel execution done, took the Gally, and that which pleaſed him more, the two Sons of Haly both alive; in the time of which fight, the poor Chriſtians who faſt chained in the Gally, had as Slaves long ſerved in great miſery, now perceiving the Chriſtians to prevail, brake off their Gyves, looſed one another, and with ſuch Weapons as firſt came to hand luſtily laid about them, and notably furthered the Victory.

Notwithſtanding all this good ſucceſs, the fortune of the Battel ſtood yet doubtful in the right Wing. There ſtood in either Battel two of the moſt noble Chieftains one againſt another; on the Chriſtian part John Andreas Auria the Spaniſh Admiral; and for the Turks Uluzales; both moſt valiant and expert Commanders, well known the one to the other, for that they had of long uſed the ſame Seas, equal for their military diſcipline, as alſo for their noble acts, but far unequal for number of their Gallies; for the Turks had of one ſort and other almoſt twice ſo many. Auria, whether it were for that he would in the beginning of the Battel warily decline the danger, and not hazard his Gallies, wherein his chief Honour would be alſo indangered; or elſe affraid leſt the Enemy, who far exceeded him in number of Gallies, ſhould extend his Wing at large, and encloſe the Chriſtian Fleet behind; upon the ſignal of Battel given, ſhrunk farther off from the reſt of the Battel; but whether upon policy, that it might be at his choiſe either to fight, if the reſt of the Army prevailed, or to retire if they ſhould be overcome; or that he upon martial policy declined the force of too ſtrong an Enemy; divers Men diverſly gloſſed; but what the cauſe was indeed, the wiſeſt could not ſurely tell. Howſoever the matter ſtood, it ſeemed his purpoſe was by policy to countervail what he wanted in ſtrength. This his falling off ſeemed unto the Turks moſt ſtrange, to whom his quick departure ſeemed at the firſt in manner of a flight. Neither was Auria content with that ſpace he had firſt ſeparated himſelf from the Army; but the ſecond time fell off further, and there ſtaying and hovering aloof off, ſeemed to await ſome good opportunity to take the Enemy at ſome advantage; having in the mean time one of the Galeaſſes of Piſa lying before him, as it were in ſtead of a Bulwark, which with often ſhot much troubled the Enemy. Uluzales alſo extending his Wing, took ſuch a ſpace, as that he ſeemed able to have compaſſed in and encloſed Auria; yet offered not Battel, but rather lay as expecting if any advantage ſhould be given him him by the Chriſtians, than raſhly or unadviſedly to offer himſelf or his Gallies to any deſperate danger. He had not long ſo lien, but that according to his deſire, twelve of the Venetian Gallies, which had withdrawn themſelves from Auria, and without any order or direction roamed to and fro, fell into his danger; theſe Gallies cut off from the reſt, Uluzales with wonderful celerity encloſed, and with the multitude of his Gallies boording them one by one, ſlew the Defendants, and took the Gallies. In this fight many of the Knights of the Order of St. Stephen moſt valiantly fighting were ſlain. Benedictus Superantius a noble Venetian, ſeeing moſt part of his Men ſlain, himſelf mortally wounded, and his Gally now almoſt taken; reſolving rather preſently to die, than to fall into the hands of his Enemies, deſperately put fire to the ſtore of Powder he had in the Gally, and blew up himſelf and his Souldiers that were left, with a great number of the Enemies together. The report of the great Ordnance, and noiſe of the Battel in that part of the Fleet being heard, they which had now in the middle Battel got the Victory, together turned their Gallies thitherwards to aid Auria, but not in one Squadron together, but coming along one after another, as every Man had ſooner or later cleared himſelf of his Enemy, amongſt the reſt, Petrus Juſtinianus (Admiral of the Gallies of Malta) coming formoſt, was encountred with three of the Turks Gallies, with whom he with his Knights had a great and moſt terrible fight. Which Uluzales beholding, and above all others hating the Knights of the Order, ſpeedily ſent in other three Gallies to help their fellows. So Juſtinian hardly beſet with ſix Gallies, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his Enemies, had loſt fifty of his moſt valiant Knights, with one of his Enſigns, and with much ado hardly defended himſelf. But being now brought to the laſt caſt, and the Gally in the judgment of all Men given for loſt, two other of the Gallies of Malta, who had ſo valiantly fought with other three of the Enemies Gallies, that they were now upon point to have taken them all, ſeeing the danger of their Admiral, forſook their vanquiſhed Enemies, and with all ſpeed came to reſcue him; where they found him yet alive, but ſhot in with three Arrows, and ſtill fighting couragiouſly at the Deck of his Gally, with thoſe few he had yet left, beſet round with their Enemies; but by the coming in of theſe two Gallies, as if it had been by help ſent from Heaven, the Turks were notably repulſed, and the Admiral with his Gally reſcued, as a prey out of the mouth of the greedy Lyon. Uluzales underſtanding that the main Battel and right Wing of the Fleet was overthrown by the Chriſtians; for fear gave over the fight, and leaving the Gallies he had taken, and hoiſing Sail, was the firſt in that Wing that fled. Which Cardonius perceiving, who was come in before the reſt, ſuddainly ſhewed himſelf at his back, and by aſſailing the hindermoſt Gallies, did what he might to ſtay their flight until the reſt of the victorious Gallies were come in. But whilſt he ſo eagerly purſueth the flying Enemy, fifteen of the Turks Captains inraged with ſuch an unwonted diſgrace, and mindful of their wonted proweſs, ſtaid their flight, and contrary to the expectation of the Chriſtians, turned themſelves and renewed the Battel: What minds they bare, the event ſhewed; for in a trice almoſt all Cardonius his Souldiers and Mariners were ſlain; nothing letted the taking of the Gally, but that Uluzales ſeeing Don John, Columnius, and Venerius near at hand, and making towards him, and Auria alſo coming faſt on, was afraid longer to ſtay, and therefore giving over the fight, fled as faſt as he could; yet carrying away with him one Gally of Cyprus, and one Enſign of the Knights of Malta, as teſtimonies of his own Valour when he ſhould appear before Selymus. The Chriſtians although weary of the long fight which they had almoſt by the ſpace of five hours endured, yet ſo long as they were in any hope to overtake any of their flying Enemies, hardly purſued them in chaſe; but when they perceived it prevailed not to follow farther, and that it was more than time to ſee to their weary and wounded Souldiers and Mariners, they ſtaied from farther purſuit; for why the night came now faſt on, under the covert whereof the crafty old Pyrat flying for life with Sails and Oars, eſcaped with thirty (or as ſome write, forty) Gallies again into the Bay of Lepanto.

The Chriſtians hardly purſue the flying Enemy.

It was a right horrible ſpectacle to ſee, how in this Battel the Sea ſtained with Blood, and covered with dead Bodies, Weapons, and the Fragments of the broken Gallies; beſides the great number of them that were ſlain, and beaten into the Sea; many of the Turks blinded with fear, caſting away their Weapons, to eſcape the fury of the Enemy, threw themſelves headlong into the Sea; but finding no hope to recover the Land, laboured again to come to the Gallies; or elſe fainting by the way, were miſerably drowned. Others, either half dead, weak, and unskilful of ſwimming, or overcharged with their Armor, the Sea alſo devoured; yea many that could well ſwim, wearied and wounded, ſunk for fear. Others upon Planks and the pieces of the broken Gallies, ſought to ſave themſelves, and not knowing what to follow or what to ſhun, wofully periſhed. Other ſome ſwimming, and pitifully entreating their Enemies, rather to take them Priſoners than to kill them, were (as it often times chanceth where things are done upon choler, rather than upon diſcretion) without compaſſion ſlain; in which doing, the Chriſtians thought they did rather revenge former injuries to them done, than to do them any wrong; with ſome Mercy more prevailed than Wrath; who remembring the common chance of War, choſe rather to take the Turks Priſoners (wofully craving nothing but their Lives) than without mercy to kill them. The number of the Turks loſt in this moſt famous Battel, could hardly be known, by reaſon that many of them were drowned. Antonius Guarnerius writing the Hiſtory of this War, reporteth two and thirty thouſand to have periſhed; but they which writ more ſparingly thereof, reported not paſt half ſo many to have been ſlain; of whom theſe were of greateſt name; Haly Baſſa the General, Mahomet Bey (otherwiſe called Chirocbe or Sirochus) Governour of Alexandria, Caſſanes the Son of Barbaruſſa, with his Son Malamur Governour of Mitilene, Gider Governour of Chios, Caſſambeius Governour of the Rhodes, Provi Aga, Captain of Naupulium, Muſtapha Zelibi the great Treaſurer, Caracoza the famous Pyrat; with many others, whom but to name were tedious. The chief Priſoners there taken, were Achmat and Mahomet the Sons of Haly Baſſa, both afterwards ſent as Preſents to the Pope, of whom the eldeſt died by the way at Naples; the younger preſented unto the Pope by Columnius at Rome, was there honourably kept Priſoner; and Mechmet Bey, Governour of Eubœa; and about three thouſand five hundred others were in that Battel taken alſo. The chief of them that eſcaped by flight, were Partau Baſſa, who ſeeing all go to wrack, fled in time in a long Boat to land; and Uluzales, (who as it was afterwards certainly known) known) but with five and twenty Gallies, and ten Galliots fled to Lepanto. Of the Enemies Gallies were taken an hundred threeſcore and one, forty ſunk or burnt; and of Galliots and other ſmall Veſſels were taken about ſixty. The Admiral Gally then taken amongſt the reſt, was ſo goodly and beautiful a Veſſel, that for beauty and richneſs ſcarce any in the whole Ocean was comparable unto her. The Deck of this Gally was on both ſides thrice as great as any of the others, and made all of black Walnut-Tree like unto Ebony, checkered, and wrought marveilous fair with divers lively Colours and variety of Hiſtories. There was alſo in her divers lively Counterfeits, engraven and wrought with Gold, with ſo cunning hand, that for the magnificence thereof it might well have been compared unto ſome Princes Palace. The Cabbin gliſtered in every place with rich Hangings wrought with Gold Twiſt, and ſet with divers ſort of precious Stones, with certain ſmall Counterfeits moſt cunningly wrought. Beſides this, there was alſo found in her great ſtore of the Baſſaes rich Apparel, wrought with the Needle, ſo couriouſly and richly emboſſed with Silver and Gold, that his great Lord and Maſter Selymus himſelf could hardly put on more royal or rich Attire. His Casket there alſo found with ſix thouſand Ducats in it, with a yearly Penſion of three hundred Ducats, was given in reward to a Greek, born in Macedonia, which ſlew the Baſſa; and was therefore alſo Knighted by Don John; who had alſo given unto him the Burrel of the Turks Standard, which at his return to Venice (where he had of long time before dwelt, and ſerved in the Arſenal) he ſold unto a Goldſmith; whereof the Senate having intelligence, redeemed it of the Goldſmith, paying for every Ounce a Ducat, and layed it up amongſt the Trophies of that moſt famous Victory. It was all of maſſive Silver, Guilt and Engraven round about with Turſhik Letters. On the one ſide was written, God doth conduct and adorn the faithful in worthy enterpriſes: God doth favcur Mahomet. On the other ſide, God hath no other God, and Mahomet is his Prophet.

The ſurpaſſing beauty of the Admiral Gally.

The Greek that ſlew the Baſſa, honourably rewarded.

This notable Victory thus happily obtained, Don John the General, with Venerius and Columna, the other two Admirals, came together; whom the General friendly embraced, but eſpecially Venerius, calling him Father, and attributing unto him the greateſt part of the Victory. Afterwards, all together with their hands and eies caſt up towards Heaven, they upon their knees gave immortal thanks to Almighty God. So did alſo the reſt of the Captains and Maſters; commending one anothers valour and good ſervice; but eſpecially theirs, who for their Religion and Country had there moſt honourably ſpent their lives; which were in number about ſeven thouſand five hundred ſixty ſix. Amongſt whom, the chief Men that were ſlain, were Joh. and Bernardinus, of the honourable Family of Cordona in Spain, Horatio Caraffa, and Ferantes Biſballus. Virginius, and Horatius, noble Romans, of the honourable Family of the Urſini. Of the Venetian Nobility, Auguſtinus Barbadicus, Benedictus Superantius, Vincentius Quirinus, Joannes Lauretanus, Marinus Contarenus, Catherinus Malipetra, Georgius and Andreas Barbadicus, Marcus Antonius Landus, Franciſcus Bonus, Hieronimus Contarenus, Antonius Paſchaligus, Hieronimus Venerius, all of the Order of the Senators. Beſides divers other honourable Gentlemen, who well deſerved to be enrolled in the eternal Monuments of Fame. Of the Knights of Malta were alſo many ſlain, amongſt whom of the German Nation theſe were chief; Joachim Spart, Commander of Moguntia and Frankfort, Ro. of Hambergh, Commander of Hemmendorf, and Fra. Droſt. Of them that were wounded, theſe were of greateſt name; Don John the General, Venerius the Venetian Admiral ſhot through the Foot, Paulus Jordanus, Troilus Savel, and Mar. Molinus, with divers others of leſs fame, to the number of almoſt ſeven thouſand.

The number of the Chriſtians ſlain in the Battel of Lepanto.

Great was the joy conceived of this Victory, but to none more welcome, than to the poor Chriſtians faſt chained to the Turks Gallies, of whom twelve thouſand were thereby delivered from moſt miſerable Thraldom, and contrary to all hope reſtored to their ancient Liberty.

Two days after this Victory, Venerius ſent Humfredus Juſtinianus with news thereof unto the Senate at Venice; who coming in at the Adriatick Port about noon the nineteenth of October, by ſhooting off of certain great Pieces, gave warning unto the City of his coming, which at that time hung in a great ſuſpence betwixt hope and fear. The Citiſens generally awaked with the report of the great Ordnance, came flocking by heaps to the Port, every Man longing to hear the firſt news. There they might ſee Juſtinian coming a far off with his Gally, but when he was come nearer, they might perceive all the Mariners attired like Turks, and four of the Turks Enſigns hanging behind at the Poup of the Gally, which filled their minds with the hope of good news, deeming it to be (as indeed it was) part of the ſpoil of the Enemy. But after that Juſtinian was landed (which he had much to do for the preſs) and was gon to the Court, with a world of people following after him, crying out for news; and had there delivered his Letters, and at large diſcourſed of all the ſucceſs of the Battel (which was forthwith blown into the City) and that the Mariners alſo after his departure had reported the Victory, and that the Enemy was in a great Battel overthrown; good God, how the people as Men overjoyed, ran up and down the Streets, doubling and redoubling the joyful name of Victory. The Senators alſo rejoycing together, gave thanks to God with publick Prayers and joyful Hymns in every Church; and afterwards by ringing of Bells, Peals of Ordnance, Bon-Fires, and other ſuch like things, ſhewed all the tokens of joy poſſible. And to make this joy the more general, all Priſoners were ſet at liberty, and all Debts that exceeded not the ſum of five and twenty Crowns, payed out of the common Treaſury; which was generally done through all the Venetian Seigniory; and a Decree made, That that day whereon the Victory was gotten, which was the ſeventh of October, dedicated to the memorial of Juſtina, ſhould for ever be kept Holy-day; and for the perpetual remembrance thereof, a great Maſs of Mony was coyned, with the impreſſion of Juſtina upon it, and an Inſcription declaring the Victory. Many alſo their Neighbor Princes ſent their Embaſſadors congratulatory to Venice; namely, the Dukes of Savoy, Florence, Ferrara, Parma, Mantua, and Urbin, and the Knights of Malta. In which ſo publick joy no Man was ſeen to put on any mourning Garments, or to ſhew any token of heavineſs, although many had loſt their deareſt Friends and neareſt Kinſmen; whoſe lives they reckoned not loſt, but given unto the Chriſtian Common-weal. The like rejoycing was alſo made in Rome, in Spain, Naples, Sicilia, and Malta; eſpecially at ſuch time as Embaſſadors from their Neighbor Princes, came to joy them of this Victory; yea and afterwards in their Countries tries further off was like rejoycing and ſigns of joy, as with us here in England.

This is that notable Battel, commonly called the Battel of Lepanto, fought near unto the Iſland Curzolari, the ſeventh day of October, in the year 1571. the like whereof was never fought at Sea againſt the Turk, wherein he loſt his chief ſtrength at Sea, with moſt of his beſt Sea Captains; and might thereby well perceive what he and his Succeſſors were to fear, if the Chriſtian Princes at unity amongſt themſelves, all diſcord ſet apart, ſhould in zeal of their Religion joyn their invincible forces againſt them.

A witty and fit compariſon made by a Turk to ſhew that the loſs of Cyprus was greater than the loſe of the Battel at Lepanto.

In the midſt of all this joy, generally conceived of the late Victory, one of the chief Priſoners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the loſs of Cyprus (for that Selymus had therein loſt his Fleet, his beſt Men of War, with great ſtore of Ordnance) by a fit Compariſon ſhewed it not to be ſo, ſaying, That the Battel loſt, was unto Selymus as if a Man ſhould ſhave his Beard, which would ere long grow again; but that the loſs of Cyprus was unto the Venetians, as the loſs of an Arm, which once cut off, could never be again recovered. Declaring thereby the great inequality of the loſs.

The ſpoil of the Enemy divided amongſt the confederates.

The rich Spoil taken from the Enemy in this moſt glorious Victory, was thus divided amongſt the Princes Confederate. Unto the Pope were allotted nineteen Gallies, two Galliots, nine great Pieces of Ordnance, two and forty leſſer Pieces, and fourſcore and one Priſoners. Unto the King of Spain eight and fifty Gallies and an half, ſix Galliots and an half, eight and fifty great Pieces and an half, eight great murthring Pieces and an half, an hundred twenty eight leſſer Pieces, and a thouſand ſeven hundred and thirteen Priſoners. Unto the Venetians were aſſigned for their ſhare, nine and thirty Gallies and an half, four Galliots and an half, nine and thirty great Pieces and an half, five great murthring Pieces and an half, fourſcore and ſix leſſer Pieces, and a thouſand one hundred threeſcore and two Priſoners. The reſt were beſtowed upon ſuch other Princes as had given aid, or otherwiſe well deſerved in that ſervice.

The joy conceived of this Victory was not ſo great amongſt the Chriſtians, but that the ſorrow thereof was amongſt the Turks far greater. Selymus himſelf was then at Hadrianople, where eight days after the Battel, news was brought unto him, That his Fleet was overthrown and almoſt all taken or ſunk by the Chriſtians. Which ſo ſoon as he heard, he was ſtrucken with exceeding grief; and overcome with melancholy, would not that day ſuffer any Man to ſpeak with him. And the rumor of the overthrow ſtill encreaſing, had in ſhort time filled all places with fear, tears, mourning, and heavineſs; ſome bewailing their Parents, ſome their Children, ſome their Husbands, ſome their Friends or Kinſmen, there loſt. But that which moſt grieved the Turkiſh Emperor, was the loſs of ſo many worthy and expert Captains, of ſo many skilful Maſters and notable Souldiers; who brought up all their lives at Sea, were not thought inferior to any then living; beſides the perpetual ignominy and unwonted diſgrace, thereby inflicted unto him and his poſterity for ever. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to have commanded all the Chriſtians in his Dominions (in number infinite) to be put to death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they weary of the Turkiſh Thraldom, and deſirous of innovation, ſhould with Weapons put into their hands, riſe up againſt him, and take part with the other Chriſtians his Enemies. But whilſt the other Baſſaes (as Men diſmaid with the cruelty of the command) ſtood all ſilent, Muhamet Baſſa for his former deſerts in great favour with the Tyrant, thought it good to make proof if his fury might by reaſonable perſwaſion be mitigated, and ſome better courſe taken, both for the honour of Selymus himſelf, and the common good of the State; yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannical Government, openly to ſpeak any thing contrary to the good liking of the wilful Emperor, he durſt not apertly contradict him; but leaning as it were to his opinion and pleaſure, by little and little to draw from himſelf; and ſo before he were aware, to lead him into his own device, and by delay moderate the rigor of his former fury. To which purpoſe, he cunningly ſet upon him in this ſort.

Muhamet Baſſa cunningly diſſwadeth Selymus from ſo rigorous a reſolution, by filling his head with moſt neceſſary conſiderations.

Your anger (ſaid he) moſt magnificent and invincible Emperor, againſt the Chriſtians, is moſt juſt; and in this my deſire exceedeth all others, That they ſhould endure and ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as they have of right deſerved. Yet it behooveth us ſo to ſatisfie our wrath, as Men better regarding their own good, than the hot deſire of revenge. And foraſmuch as I am for your many and undeſerved favours, in all Loyalty bounden unto your Highneſs above others; I reckon it in part my duty, ſo much the more frankly to deliver my opinion, ſuch as it is, in matter of ſo great importance. Neither will I attemper my Speech in any reſpect to the comforting of your grieved mind; for how can it be that you, who following the worthy examples of your noble Progenitors, have always heretofore ſhewed your moſt heroical and couragious mind, contemning all the chances of Fortune; ſhould not for ever after ſhew your ſelf to be rather dreaded of all Men, than dreadful of any? Let others, whoſe Kingdoms built upon uncertainty, are ſubject to the revolution of time, and chance of Fortune, yield unto their evil haps: As for you, whoſe Empire is founded by the mighty hand of the moſt Higheſt, and compaſſed about with an impregnable defence, and are your ſelf by the power of God appointed King and Comander of Nations and People in number infinite; Fortune may well a little prick you, but never overthrow you. As for this late miſchance, if it muſt need ſo fall out, as proceeding from ſome immutable and eternal cauſe; muſt it be therefore always fixt and permanent? Only thoſe miſeries and miſchiefs which the cowardiſe or fooliſhneſs of Men bring unto themſelves, have their firm and certain calamities; other common events coming from other cauſes, have alſo their common and ſuddain chances; but how this late miſhap at Sea may be amended, and your former Glory there again recovered, is hereafter to be conſidered. Now for the preſent (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others moſt neceſſary, is to be provided, That the weak and worſt fortified places of your Empire, moſt ſubject to danger, may be preſently ſtrengthned with ſtrong Garriſons; and that by your preſent repair to the Imperial City, you chear up the minds of your heavy and diſmayed Subjects; which done, what ſhall let, but that you may at your pleaſure be revenged to the full of the Chriſtians? For there is no cauſe why we ſhould fear the Chriſtians, ſix hundred times and more before overthrown; both our Enemies and we are the ſame Men, we have been for many Ages, we bear the ſame minds, the ſame bodies, the ſame ſtrength, the ſame weapons, wherewith we have gotten infinite Victories, both of them and others. And although ſuch be the ſtate of Man, as that he cannot otherwiſe but ſometime or other taſte of the worſt Tun; yet I think this preſent misfortune to be rather imputed unto ſome fatal cauſe to us unknown, than to the Valour of the Chriſtians. Beſides that, we may well enough oppoſe one overthrow againſt our ſo many and infinite Victories; yea, we are to give immortal thanks unto Almighty God, that we have by force of Arms ſubdued the rich and famous Iſland of Cyprus, and that your high deſigns have in that point ſorted to your hearts deſire. And hard it is in mine opinion to judge, whether this late unfortunate Battel ſhall more hurt us, or the Chriſtians; for beſides that the multitude of the Turks hath no feeling of ſo ſmall a loſs, they will not as Men diſcouraged, give themſelves to mourning and vain lamentations, but with greater courage and fury come forth again into Battel, and revenge this loſs with the infinite calamities of the Chriſtians; who after this their good hap, will according to their wonted manner give themſelves to exceſs, pleaſure, careleſneſs, and eaſe, unto their own farther confuſion. Thus have I in brief faithfully declared mine opinion; yet with that ſubmiſſive Loyalty, as that whatſoever ſhould proceed from the mouth of your Imperial Majeſty, ſhall be of me deemed moſt wiſely and magnificently conſidered of.

The Baſſa was in ſuch grace and authority with Selymus, that his opinion in Counſel prevailed, and the Tyrants wrath by his perſwaſion was well aſſwaged. But by the coming of Uluzales to Court, the remainder of his former grief and melancholy was fully quieted; who after he had excuſed himſelf of the late overthrow, and declared what he had himſelf done in the Battel, and in teſtimony thereof, preſented him with one of the Enſigns of the Knights of Malta; told him alſo, how that he had left the Chriſtian Fleet ſore rent and torn, as that it could not poſſibly be made ſerviceable againſt the next year; which news was both of Selymus and the reſt gladly heard. In the mean time Selymus placed this Uluzales in the ſtead of Haly Baſſa that was ſlain; and ſtraitly commanded the great Officers which had the charge of his Navy, to build new ſhipping night and day; and further enjoyned every Governour out of his Province he had in charge, to have in readineſs one Gally or two againſt the next Spring, as well for the defence of his own Dominions, as to revenge the loſs he had ſo lately ſuſtained; whereunto alſo many of his great Men put to their helping hands, and chearfully furthered his deſire. New ſupplies of Souldiers were alſo preſently raiſed, and put into his frontier Towns, great ſtore of new Ordnance caſt, Weapons and Armor provided, and whatſoever elſe the neceſſity of the preſent time required. So with the Turks ſtood reaſon and induſtry, rather than with the Chriſtians, who (as ſome note) rather wanted diſcretion how to uſe the Victory, than Valour to gain the ſame; which whether it chanced for that proſperity begetteth negligence, or that Men joying in their preſent Bliſs, regard little the time to come, I leave it to the judgment of the wiſer to determine.

The Chriſtian Fleet diſſolved.

After this ſo memorable a Victory, the three great Commanders of the Fleet ſat in Counſel to conſult, what farther courſe they were beſt to take. But foraſmuch as Winter began now to approach, and that they could not do much until their Fleet were new furniſhed and manned, they all reſolved for that time to diſſolve the Fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of April, to meet together again at Corcyra. Whereupon Don John and Columnius returned to Meſſina, where they in ſafety arrived in November; and departing thence, and taking their leave the one of the other, arrived, Don John at Naples, and Columnius at Rome, where they were in both places with great joy and triumph received.

Suppoto again recovered by the Venetians.

The Venetians for all that grieved with the loſs of Cyprus, gave not ſo over, but repairing their Navy with 30 Gallies, wherein were embarked 6000 Souldiers, won a Caſtle in Epirus called Margarita; and alſo recovered the Town of Suppoto; which the Turks had that Summer before taken from them; but now hearing of this overthrow, did upon the approach of the Venetian Fleet again forſake it. The Gallies alſo of Crete conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turks Veſſels laden with Captives and the Spoils of Famaguſta, as they were paſſing thence to Conſtantinople.

Although upon the late obtained Victory, a certain reconciliation had been made betwixt Don John and Venerius, yet of the former diſſention remained an inward heart-burning of one of them againſt the other; for which cauſe the Spaniards requeſted the Venetians to appoint another Admiral in his place. Venerius was now indeed a Man of great years, and his ſtrength far ſpent; yet for that in his aged Body reſted great wiſdom and courage, and that they thought him for his great deſerts worthy all Honour, they were wonderful loath, and unwilling therein to gratifie the Spaniard; for why, they well knew there was no other cauſe of the Spaniards proud hatred, but that he had ſtood againſt them upon the Honour of the Venetians; and farther, They liked not that the Spaniard ſhould ſo preſumptuouſly preſcribe unto them, whom they ſhould place or diſplace, in or out of their honourable Offices. Nevertheleſs, not forgetting what commodity came by concord, and what evils of diſcord, and that they might not againſt ſo mighty an Enemy well ſpare the help of the Spaniard, they reſolved to make choice of ſome other; who ſucceeding Venerius, might with one conſent manage their Wars together with Don John and Columnius. There was then one Jacobus Fuſcarinus their chief Governour in Dalmatia, who but a little before had notably fortified Jadera and the other frontier Towns, and for the ſpace of fourteen months had notably repreſſed the furious incurſions of the Turks; of him then abſent and not deſirous of the place (as of a Man of worthy deſert) the whole State by general conſent made choiſe for their Admiral and General by Sea againſt the Turk; which moſt honourable place he received not with all the ſolemn ceremonies thereto belonging at Venice, as the manner was, but at Jadera; from whence he in the Admiral Gally ſent for that purpoſe by Aloyſius Grimanus, his ſucceſſor in Jadera, ſailed over to Corcyra; where he found the old Admiral Venerius, with no leſs care providing for all things, than if he ſhould himſelf have ſtill continued the War. Of which great care Fuſcarinus at his coming eaſed him, by taking it wholly upon himſelf.

Caſtra Novum in vain attempted by the Venetians.

Whilſt Fuſcarinus thus lay making his preparation againſt the next Spring at Corcyra, Sara Martinengus, who had the charge of the Adriatick (by the Counſel of Venerius, who was now returned to Venice) upon the ſuddain landed his Men, and beſieged Caſtra Novum, a ſtrong Town of the Turks in the Borders of Iſtria; where at his firſt coming he took the Suburbs, and had in ſhort time brought the Town to great extremity. But in the height of his hope to have won the Town, hearing that the Beglerbeg of Græce was with great power coming thither, he was glad to raiſe his Siege, and with all ſpeed to get him again to Sea. The Turks in like manner, to diſtreſs the ſtrong Town of Cataro, holden by the Venetians in the Borders of Dalmatia, built a great and ſtrong Fort upon the paſſage from Sea to the Town, wherein they placed great ſtore both of Men and Artillery; in hope by keeping them of the Town from all relief by Sea, at length to gain the Town which they had many times in vain attempted by force; for by Land it was already environed with the cruel Enemy, poſſeſſing the Country round about it. Jacobus Superantius the great Providetor, then lying at Corcyra with the Admiral, underſtanding how Cataro a Town of no ſmall importance, was thus both by Sea and Land by the Enemy diſtreſſed; with twenty Gallies manned with the moſt choice Souldiers could be pickt out of the whole Fleet, took upon him the raſing of the Fort, and relieving of the Town. Superantius with this ſelect Company, and certain other Gallies which met him by the way, came by night before the mouth of the Bay of Cataro, and there dividing his Fleet, left the one part thereof at Anchor before the Fort, and with the other himſelf couragiouſly paſſed by the Fort, further into the Bay; at whom the Turks out of the Fort made divers ſhot, but (by reaſon it was dark) to ſmall purpoſe. In paſſing by, Superantius took ſuch view as he could of the Fort, and by and by began on that ſide to batter the ſame; as did alſo the other Gallies on the other ſide; and withal, landed their Men on both ſides; who upon ſignal given, ran reſolutely to the Fort, and by plain force entring the ſame, prevailed upon the fearful Turks, and put them to the Sword every Mothers Son; ſo that of all that great Garriſon, was not one left alive to carry news of the ſlaughter. This Fort was in length five hundred Paces, but not ſtrong towards Land, from whence no ſuch fear was doubted. In it was taken ſeventeen great Pieces of Ordnance, with much fair Armor, and great abundance of Victuals; and ſeven Galliots which lay at Anchor under the Fort. Cataro thus relieved, Superantius with Victory returned again to Corcyra.

1572. Fuſcarinus the Venetian Admiral with all things in readineſs, having long lien at Corcyra, expecting the coming of the Confederates, as was before appointed; ſent Superantius the Providetor with five and twenty Gallies to Meſſina, to haſten the coming of Don John, and to attend upon him by the way. But coming thither, and thinking to have found a great Fleet and a ſtrong power in good forwardneſs to have ſet forward, he found ſuch ſmall preparation, as well ſhewed the Spaniards ſmall care for repreſſing of the Turk, and that they would not be very forward in the ſervice intended. Which filling him with grief and indignation, cauſed him to complain unto himſelf, of their unfaithfulneſs, and to bewail the ſtate of his Country, with the whole Chriſtian Commonweal; for Don John had before ſolemnly promiſed unto the Venetian Embaſſador, that all things ſhould be in readineſs againſt the appointed time; but now a great part of Summer was paſt, when ſcarce ſome few Companies, and about fifty Gallies were met together at Meſſina; and when Auria would come with the reſt, no Man could tell. So that the careful Providetor ſtood now no leſs in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turks fury.

Selymus ſendeth out Uluzales with two hundred Gallies.

Selymus, after the great overthrow he had received at the Iſlands Corzulares, for fear he ſhould be driven quite out of the Sea, was above all things careful for the renewing of his Navy; and having partly new built, partly repaired two hundred Gallies, commended them to the conduct of Uluzales; with expreſs charge, That by how much things had fallen out worſe the laſt year, he ſhould with ſo much the more care now beware the like danger; and not to go out of the bounds of the Archipelago, or to adventure Battel but upon advantage, or at leaſtwiſe upon an even hand.

Uluzales a Renegate Chriſtian and now the Turks Admiral.

This Uluzales (otherwiſe called Occhial) was an Italian born in Calabria, who in his youth taken at Sea by the Turks, and chained in the Gally, and afterwards renouncing his Faith, by many degrees grew unto the higheſt preferments among the Turks, and ſo became an exceeding Plague as well to his own Country as all other of the Chriſtians bordering upon the Mediterranean. He now Admiral for the Turk, after the manner of the proud Barbarians, threatned with Fire and Sword to be revenged upon the Venetians; which known at Venice, much troubled them, as well acquainted with the fury of the old Arch-Pyrat. Beſide that, Ant. Barbarus their Embaſſador, all the time of this War kept in ſafe cuſtody at Conſtantinople, had by Letters certified them, what a great Fleet, and what a ſtrong Army Selymus had provided againſt them; and that he himſelf told 250 ſail of Gallies when they ſet forward from Conſtantinople, beſide ſome other that were to meet with them at Calipolis; and that therefore they ſhould beware how they encountred with the Turks Fleet but upon equal ſtrength. It was alſo at the ſame time commonly reported, That King Philip chief of the Confederates, careleſs of the Wars againſt the Turk in the Eaſt, was about to turn his Forces upon the Kingdom of Tunes or Algiers, nearer unto him; as indeed he did the year following. The Venetians intangled with ſo many difficulties, were even at their wits end, and day by day the Senate ſat from the riſing of the Sun to the ſetting of the ſame, conſulting how all theſe miſchiefs were to be remedied. But for as much as the greateſt danger was to be feared from the Turks Fleet, as then hovering even over their heads; they by Letters commanded Fuſcarinus their Admiral, That whether the Confederates came unto him or not, he ſhould forthwith take his Courſe toward the Eaſt, and there according to the Enemies deſigns, and his own diſcretion and valour, to do what he ſhould think beſt to be done for the common good of his Country; and not to refuſe to joyn with the Enemy in Battel, if he ſaw any good hope of Victory. Neither ceaſed they at the ſame time, both by their Embaſſadors and Letters, earneſtly to call both upon the Pope and the King, to haſten their Forces to encounter the Enemy before he ſhould come out of his own Seas; and to carry the terror of the War home to his own doors, rather than to receive it at their own. The like Meſſage was alſo done to Don John, putting him in mind what his place, what the time, and what the danger of the time required; entreating him (if it were poſſible) of himſelf to add ſomething unto that haſt which the neceſſity of ſo important a cauſe required. Who nevertheleſs, for all the Meſſengers and Letters to him ſent (which were many) went ſtill on fair and ſoftly, delaying from day to day; telling, That he would by and by come, and that the Spaniards would always be ſo good as their word. Which was ſo far from his thought, that afterwards finding one excuſe after another, he not only ſtaied his coming, but called back again Requiſenius alſo, whom he had ſent before with twenty Gallies to Corcyra. Now were two months (fitteſt for the Wars) vainly ſpent; when Superantius grieved to ſee time to no purpoſe ſo ſlip away, and fearing leſt the reſt of the Summer ſhould to as ſmall effect in like manner paſs alſo, with great inſtance importuned him to haſten his journey. Then at length Don John anſwered, That the Venetians requeſted but reaſon, neither that he wiſhed for any thing more, than to ſatisfie their deſires; but that a greater care hindred the leſs, which was firſt to be prevented: He was advertiſed (as he ſaid) that the French King pretending the ſuppreſſing of certain Pyrats, had aſſembled a great Fleet at Rochel, with purpoſe indeed to invade Spain, now that the King was buſied in theſe Wars againſt the Turk; and that therefore they muſt pardon him if he preferred the regard of Spain before others, being expreſly commanded from the King, not to depart from Meſſina until he had other commandment from him. But whether this excuſe by France proceeded of a true fear or otherwiſe, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather, for that the French King underſtanding thereof by the Venetians, was therewith (as reaſon was) exceedingly offended; proteſting, that he was ever ſo far from that purpoſe of hindering any the Confederate Princes in that their Religious War, that if the troubles of his own Country would have ſo permitted, he would gladly have given them aid therein. Many there were alſo that thought, Envy the ancient Enemy of Vertue and Valour, to have had a great power in his delay; doubting whether the Spaniards would more rejoyce of the Victory well hoped for, if they ſhould joyn with the Venetians; or grieve if the ſame ſhould by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius weary of diſcourſes and long expectation, and almoſt out of hope of any help in time from the Spaniard, how untowardly ſoever things went, thought better yet warily to moderate his grief than in ſo dangerous a time to give any occaſion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet ſpake he not fauningly or flatteringly of the matter, but with a certain modeſt gravity declared, That he had thought Heaven would ſooner have fallen, than that Don John would not at the appointed time have come to Corcyra. And withal beſought him, and wiſhed him to beware that he brought not the common State into ſome great danger; if they had to do with ſuch an Enemy as might be delayed with, then he ſaid he could eaſily abide delay; but now for that the War and the Enemy was ſuch, as wherein, or with whom never any General had delayed without loſs, to what end did he longer defer or trifle out the time? Or what other Fleet did he expect? If they ſhould divide their Forces, then were they all too weak, but united together, ſtrong enough to defend the common cauſe. The nearer the Enemy came, the more haſte were to be made to joyn with the Venetian Fleet. And what could be (as he told him) more honourable or glorious, than for him a noble young Gentleman royally deſcended, of whom the World had conceived a great hope, that he would in Martial Honour exceed the glory of his moſt famous Anceſtors, again to vanquiſh the proud Turk, the greateſt and moſt mighty Monarch of the World; to fight the Battel of the Higheſt, to aſſure the Chriſtian Common-wealth againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy, and to purchaſe unto himſelf immortal Glory and Renown? As for the French, there was no ſuch thing to be feared as was pretended, who with ſuch ſlender preparation, not worth the name of a Fleet, was not ſo unadviſed as to ſet upon a Kingdom of ſuch ſtrength and power as Spain. Furthermore he ſaid, that it concerned not the Venetians more than the King himſelf, to have the Turks repreſſed; whoſe Kingdoms of Naples, Sicilia, and Spain, were no leſs than their Territory, expoſed to danger by Sea. The good ſucceſs of their Affairs in the Eaſt would open the way to the Conqueſt of Africk; but if the Turk ſhould prevail, then were they to deſpair, not of Africk, but of all Italy, Sicily, yea and of Spain it ſelf. The time (he ſaid) and neceſſity of the War, with the extremity of the danger of the whole and common State, required that he ſhould with all his power and ſpeed poſſible, take upon him the defence of the common cauſe, or to ſay more truly of the Chriſtian Common-weal, then ſo dangerouſly impugned. Theſe reaſons drawn from the common good and the truth it ſelf, much moved the General; but the Kings pleaſure was to be preferred before all reaſons or dangers that could be alledged. But hearing afterward, what reſolute command the Venetian Senate had ſent unto their Admiral, he became exceeding careful; for he feared leſt if the Admiral ſhould without his help fight the Battel and gain the Victory, he would convert all the glory thereof unto himſelf; but if he ſhould chance to be overthrown, it would turn to his utter reproach and perpetual infamy, that in ſo neceſſary a time he had withdrawn himſelf from the common cauſe. Wherefore as a Man perplexed, and in doubt what to do, he ſtood for a while as one at his wits end; yet at laſt, he upon deliberation reſolved to take a middle Courſe, and ſo neither without the command of the King (by whoſe preſcript order all was to be done) to depart with the Fleet from Meſſina; neither altogether to fruſtrate the Confederates of the expected aid. And to that purpoſe ſent two and twenty Gallies under the conduct of one Lilly of Andrada (a noble Gentleman) to the Venetian Admiral at Corcyra; with whom went alſo Columnius with the Popes Fleet. Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Vigo Boncompanius, by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his ſtead; who upon the ſame conditions with his predeceſſor, had entred into the League, and liking very well of Columnius, kept him ſtill for his Admiral.

Superantius haſteneth Don John.

Don John in doubt whether to ſend aid to the Venetians or not.

He ſendeth Lilly of Andrada, with 22 Gallies.

Long had Fuſcarinus expected the coming of the Confederates, and albeit that the year was far ſpent (Auguſt being then come) and no ſuch aid ſent as he had expected; yet deſiring to do ſomething worth the remembrance, and beſeeming their honour, he earneſtly perſwaded Columnius and Lilly to ſet forward with him toward the Eaſt, and with their united Forces to give the Enemy Battel; telling them, That if they were all of like courage, they ſhould go not only to the glory of the preſent Battel, but to the great honour and advancement of the whole Chriſtian Commonweal. After that, he extenuated the power of the Enemy; ſaying, That he could not but marvel, from whence ſuch a number of Gallies as was reported, could ſo ſuddainly be gathered, or whereupon ſo great confidence and boldneſs was grown unto them, ſo lately overthrown and put to flight; The Enemies Fleet (he ſaid) was the year before overcome and diſperſed, the Captains and Mariners ſlain; and that therefore it was not credible, that ſo many Gallies could with ſuch celerity be built, and ſuch a number of Mariners and Maſters as was needful, in ſo ſhort time provided; That the proviſion of the Enemy was by flying Fame made far greater than indeed it was or poſſibly could be; for why, they might eaſily gueſs what the Enemy was able to do, by the Chriſtians themſelves, who could not without much ado and great labour build their Fleets, and train up their Mariners and Maſters; and that therefore letting Fame flie, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadful than they are; he was verily perſwaded, that the Enemy was glad to uſe moſt unskilful and ignorant as well Mariners, Maſters as Souldiers; who ſuddainly taken up in the inland Countries, and put into the Gallies, knew not ſo much as the very names of the Ropes and Tacklings, and other Equipage; and then thoſe Gallies which they had were like enough to be but weak, as of them which were the laſt year rent and bruiſed, and now again botched up; or in haſte built of green Timber, could not be nimble or greatly ſerviceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, as valiant Men to ſet forward againſt the Enemy; and that with the greater courage, for that the laſt years Victory had opened unto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it ſhould ſo fall out, as good hope there was, they ſhould thereby take from the proud Enemy both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recover his ſtrength at Sea; ſo that they in the mean time without fear, might at their pleaſure take the rich Iſlands in the Archipelago. Now if the Turks declining Battel, ſhould retire themſelves into the Helleſpont, then might they with Fire and Sword ſpoil all the Frontiers of their Dominion on this ſide the Straits, and open a way unto the Chriſtians to do great matters.

Hardly were Columnius and Lilly perſwaded by the Admiral; neither did they thereunto give their conſent, until it was decreed, That they ſhould not in any caſe joyn Battel with the Enemy; but with their Gallions and Galeaſſes firſt placed in the front of the Battel, in whom conſiſted the greateſt hope of the Victory. So ſetting forward toward the Enemy, and come to Commentitia, Letters were brought unto them from Don John, certifying them, That he was now by Letters from the King commanded to come towards the Eaſt, and to joyn his Forces with the Confederates; but yet that for certain days he could not come, until he were better provided of all things neceſſary; and that therefore they ſhould in the mean time carefully look unto all things, promiſing ſo ſoon as he poſſibly could to come unto them. Upon theſe Letters, Columnius and Lilly began to doubt, whether to go on further, or to expect the coming of the General; yet foraſmuch as he had not expreſly written any thing concerning their ſtaying, and Fuſcarinus urged them forwards, on they went, with their Fleet divided into three Battels. The whole Fleet conſiſted of 155 Gallies, ſix Galeaſſes, and twenty tall Ships; in the right Wing was Superantius; in the left Wing Canalius; and in the middle Battel, Columnius, Fuſcarinus, and Lilly; and in the Rereward followed Quirinus. Before each Battel went two of the Galeaſſes ſtill in readineſs for preſent Battel. In this order they came firſt to Zacynthus (commonly called Zante) and ſo to Cerigo; the next day after to Colubraria (commonly called Dragonaria) over againſt Cerigo. Here Angelus Surianus a valiant Gentleman, ſent before to diſcover the Enemy, and what ſtrength he was of, returning unto the Fleet, declared unto the Admiral, That the Turks Fleet, conſiſting of 160 Gallis, ſixty Galliots, and four great Ships, lay about Malvaſia, in the entrance of the Bay called Sinus Argolicus, upon the Borders of Peloponneſus, about fifty miles off from the Chriſtian Fleet. Shortly after, the ſame Fleet was again diſcovered making for Malea; whereupon the Chriſtians, before reſolved to fight whereſoever they ſhould meet the Enemy, forthwith put themſelves in order of Battel, and ſo with their Galeaſſes in the front, made with what ſpeed they could toward him. Theſe two Fleets were thought for many reſpects almoſt equal; the Enemy was in number more, but inferior in ſtrength. The Chriſtian Fleet by reaſon of the heavineſs of the Galeaſſes, made but ſmall way; and the Enemy afraid of the great ſtore of Ordnance the Galeaſſes carried, durſt not come near them. The Turks Fleet was rather nimble than ſtrong, but ours more firm and forward. Look wherein each exceeded the other, therewith they endevoured to help themſelves and annoy the Enemy. The Chriſtians fearing to be circumvented by the multitude of their Enemies, oppoſed their Ships and Galeaſſes before them as a moſt ſure fortreſs; and the Turk, by how much he had had the worſe ſucceſs the year before, was ſo much the more careful to beware how he endangered himſelf within the reach of the Galeaſſes. The Chriſtians deſired nothing more than to fight and to come to handy Blows; but the Turk, who thought it ſufficient for the preſent not to be overcome, ſometime made away as faſt as he could, and by and by ſtayed again, if happily he might have taken the Gallies ſeparated from the Galeaſſes; never ſeeming willing to adventure further than reaſon and diſcretion would. The Enemy ſeeing the Chriſtian Fleet coming ſtill on, and ready to give Battel, firſt ſeemed as if he would have done the like, but afterwards turned his Courſe upon the right hand, and kept aloof alongſt the Coaſt of Malea; At which time the Chriſtians, although they were very deſirous to have followed them, yet the Turks with their nimble Fleet were quickly too far gon for the Chriſtian Fleet to overtake them, eſpecially with their heavy Ships. That day almoſt ſpent as it were in the chaſe of the Enemy, towards the going down of the Sun, the Enemy put into the current of the Sea betwixt Cerigo and the Harts Iſland, in bredth about ten miles, and there dividing their Fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the coming of the Chriſtians, with the Prows of their Gallies turned, as if upon the confidence of the place, which they had filled overthwart, they had purpoſed nothing more than to fight. Yet both Fleets ſeemed reſolved; the one not to fight without the Galeaſſes, and the other not to come near thoſe hot Ships, from whom they had but the year before received ſo great harm. And although the Enemy, as was afterwards known, purpoſed nothing leſs than to fight, but upon great advantage; yet fearing by open flight to diſhonour his Lord and Maſter, and by granting as it were of Victory, to encreaſe the Fame of the Chriſtians, the crafty Pyrat made a great ſhew of that he leaſt indeed purpoſed. For pretending a great deſire to fight, he indeed deluded the Chriſtians hope; who although the Wind had failed them, yet in hope the Enemy would abide them Battel, with much labour and rowing came ſo near him, that the great Shot began to flie too and fro on both ſides; but when the matter ſhould have come to have been tried by dint of Sword, then it plainly appeared what the Enemy had indeed purpoſed; for ſtill keeping the Prows of his Gallies upon the Chriſtians, he by little and little ſhrunk back; and beſide that the ſhadow of the night began then to approach, he cauſed all his great Ordnance, charged only with Powder, to be ſhot off, and ſo in the thick of the ſmoke retired unſeen; colouring his ſubtil departure alſo, by certain Lights left in their Cock-Boats, making ſhew as if the whole Fleet had ſtill there ſtayed. By this means the Turks with great celerity eſcaped, being alſo holpen in this, that the Chriſtians hindred by the heavineſs of the Galeaſſes, could not but fair and ſoftly purſue them; for theſe Galeaſſes, as they are Veſſels of great ſervice, ſo are they alſo heavy and unweldy, and not fit for chaſe. The departure of the Enemy at length known, the Chriſtians alſo unwilling to fight by night, returned to Cerigo. Two days after, the Turks ſtayed in the Bay of Tenarus (now called Metapan) and the Chriſtians at Cerigo; contented in that, that the Enemy was the cauſe that the Battel was not fought, and reckoning his weary and covert declining of Battel, as a ſecret confeſſion of the Victory. The third day after, the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing more than to joyn in Battel with the Enemy, in their former order ſet forward from Cerigo, and ſailing all the night, were in the break of the day deſcried from Land by the Turks; whereupon Uluzales by ſhooting off of certain warning Pieces commanded all his Men to go aboord, and to put themſelves in readineſs for Battel. And now the Chriſtians were not far off, when as the Turks (leſt declining of Battel might reprove them of fear) came out of the Haven, with their Fleet divided into three Battels; whereof the left Wing was extended a great way into the Sea, the right Wing ſtill keeping near unto the Main, and in the middle Battel was Uluzales himſelf; who came all on faſter than the Tide drave them, ſtaying their Courſe oft times of purpoſe, to have drawn the Gallies of the Chriſtians from the Galeaſſes and Ships. Uluzales ſeeing his Fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the Galeaſſes, commanded both the Wings of his Fleet (having in each of them fourſcore Gallies) to fetch a great compaſs about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloof off from the Galeaſſes, and ſo to aſſail the Wings of the Chriſtians on the ſides or behind; in hope ſo to have diſordered their Battel, and without danger to have drawn the Gallies from the Galeaſſes and the other heavy Ships. Which their intent the Chriſtians perceiving, in their Wings turned about their Gallies alſo, in manner of the new Moon, their main Battel ſtill facing the middle Battel of the Turks. The Wings of the Turks Fleet thus far ſeparated from the middle Battel, ſeemed to preſent unto the Chriſtians a great advantage; which Fuſcarinus (intentive to all the offers of good Fortune) quickly perceiving, and calling unto Columnius and Lilly, and ſhewing them the Enemies main Battel at hand, and the Wings gone a great way off, requeſted and perſwaded them, That not ſtaying for the heavy Ships and Galeaſſes, they would with him upon the ſuddain aſſail the Enemies middle Battel now deſtitute of the Wings; not doubting but ſo to overthrow the Enemies greateſt ſtrength there, before the Wings could, now they were ſo far gon, joyn themſelves to the Battel again. What could (as he ſaid) have hapned more wiſhedly, than to have their Battel divided? So that they might at more advantage fight againſt every part thereof, now ſeparated, than againſt all three parts at once. If they had thought themſelves not only equal, but too ſtrong for the whole Enemies Fleet united, ſhould they not the better overcome them apart and diſperſed? The opportunity, as he ſaid, was but ſhort, and therefore to be forthwith reſolved upon. If they would take the preſent occaſion of Victory then offered, and as reſolute Men charge their Enemies, little fearing any ſuch thing, they ſhould by their celerity and valour, teach the Turks what the Chriſtian diſcipline of War and power was able to do; but if they would therein uſe delay, they ſhould ere long in vain wiſh for the like occaſion they had let ſlip, when as their Battel was again ſtrengthned with the Wings. This the Admirals Speech was of moſt that heard it joyfully received, and his Counſel well liked; and that with ſuch a general chearfulneſs of the Souldiers, as ſhewed in them no want of courage to have given the Enemy preſent Battel. But Columnius and Lilly being of the ſame mind they had been always, ſaid it were dangerous ſo to do, for fear of drawing the whole three Battels of the Enemy at once upon them, againſt which they ſhould be too weak, without the help of the Galeaſſes and heavy Ships; and therefore ſaid flatly, That without thoſe Veſſels ſo much feared of their Enemies, they would not in any caſe hazard the fortune of a Battel. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion for that they ſo thought, or were ſo charged by Don John (of whom they altogether depended) not to fight in his abſence, many doubted. The Wings of the Chriſtians in turning about to confront the Wings of the Enemy, were a little diſordered; which the Turks perceiving, and taking the preſent opportunity, with fifteen of their Gallies were about to have charged the ſtragling Gallies; which Superantius perceiving, to ſtay their Courſe, went out courageouſly againſt them with four Gallies, and made with them a great fight; in the heat whereof, Superantius ſeeing forty more of the Enemies Gallies coming towards him, and doubting to be encloſed, with all ſpeed ſent for relief, which came preſently in, namely twenty Gallies, with two of the Galeaſſes; which forthwith ſent their thundring Shot ſo thick and furiouſly amongſt their Enemies, that in a little time eighteen of their Gallies were by them all rent and torn; and the Turks therewith diſmaied, were glad in ſuch haſt to return, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius having at that fight but one of his Gallies ſhot through, returned again unto his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would have been the event of the whole Battel, if the opinion of Fuſcarinus had prevailed. Both the Fleets falling again into their order, although the Chriſtians could not ſo faſt follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they ſo near them, that oftentimes they changed Bullets, as well with their ſmall Shot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many ſigns gathered, that neither the Turks would abide preſent Battel, neither the Chriſtians longer delay, if by their Enemies they ſo might. The Chriſtians had agreed (as is before ſaid) not to joyn in Battel without their Galeaſſes and tall Ships; which Uluzales well underſtood, both by the Fugitives and his own Eſpials, as alſo by their manner of ſailing. And he himſelf, although he had no great deſire to fight, yet to be the better able to fruſtrate the endeavors of the Chriſtians (who with great labour drew with them the Galeaſſes and other heavy Ships) ſent his chargeable great Ships to Malvaſia, there to be unrigged; whereby he diſcharged himſelf of a great burthen, and made himſelf able at his own choice and pleaſure, to leave or take, to fight or not; and alſo with ſuch Souldiers and other neceſſaries as were in the ſame great Ships, ſupplied the wants of his whole Fleet. By which policy the matter was brought to that paſs, that if the Chriſtians would needs draw the Enemy to Battel, they muſt of neceſſity forſake their Galeaſſes, their moſt aſſured ſtrength; or if they would not leave them, then they could not by any means enforce the ready Enemy to fight. The day now declining, the Enemy ſuppoſing himſelf to have done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Chriſtians, and encouraging of his own People, in ſeemly order, as one not afraid, ſailed with his Fleet to Corona. The Chriſtians in like manner retiring themſelves to Cerigo.

The Turks Fleet at Corona, and the Chriſtians at Cerigo.

John Don ſendeth word to the Fleet to meet him at Zacynthus.

Whilſt things thus went, Don John by a Frigot ſent of purpoſe, gave knowledge to the Fleet, that he was come to Corcyra, ſharply blaming the great Commanders for their departure, and that they ſtaied not for his coming; and further commanded them as their General, all other things ſet apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to reſolve of all matters. Columnius wholly devoted to the Spaniards, and preferring the favour of Don John before the reſt, hearing his Meſſage, was in ſuch haſt to have returned, that he would have perſwaded Fuſcarinus to have left the heavy Veſſels and other weak Gallies at Cerigo, and with 100 of the beſt Gallies with all ſpeed to have returned to the General. Of which opinion was alſo Lilly. But Fuſcarinus more careful than the reſt, as he whom the danger more concerned, would not yield to that perſwaſion; for that in ſo doing, they ſhould (as he ſaid) leave the Ships and Galeaſſes, the chief part of their ſtrength, in danger to be ſpoiled by the Enemy; whom they now kept at a Bay without the help of their General; and ſhould, as he well hoped, by often provoking of him, at one time or other draw him to battel, and have over him a notable Victory. And therefore requeſted them for the love of God, and the Zeal they bare unto the Common-good of all Chriſtendom, not to depart farther off, nor to ſuffer the Enemy to eſcape out of their hands, neither by their departure to leave the Iſlands of the Venetians ſubject to the fury of the Enemy; whereas the General might at his pleaſure and without danger come unto them, they lying betwixt the Enemy and him. But Columnius and Lilly reſolutely ſet down, hap what hap ſhould, to do what Don John had commanded, would not liſten to the reaſonable perſwaſions of the Venetian Admiral, but told him flatly, That if he would not in that they had ſaid yield unto them, they would forthwith leave him unto himſelf, and with their Gallies preſently return to Zacynthus, as the General had commanded. Whilſt they were yet thus diſcourſing, news was brought, that the Enemy was come with his Fleet into the Fret of Cerigo; which cauſed them all with one conſent to reſolve in ſuch order to paſs by the Enemy, as if they ſhould have given him preſent Battel; whereas before, they were determined by the perſwaſion of Fuſcarinus to have gon to Crete, and there leaving the Ships and Galeaſſes in ſafety, to have afterwards returned to the General. In ſuch order the Chriſtians paſſed by the Enemies Fleet, which lay ſtill in the Fret of the Sea without moving, ſtanding as it were rather upon the guard of themſelves, than reſolved for Battel. In three days ſailing they came to Zacynthus, where they found not Don John, but two of his Gallies, and commandment, that they ſhould there leave their heavy Ships, and with their Gallies come to Cephalenia, where they ſhould not fail to meet him. Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieved, and muttered through the whole Fleet, That the Spaniards bearing themſelves upon their Wealth, were too proud, and in compariſon of themſelves, regarded neither the conditions of the League, neither any other Mans credit, but trod all Men under foot; and would now uſe the Venetians, not as their Friends and Confederates, but as their Slaves and Vaſſals, feeding them in the mean time but with vain hope. Yet foraſmuch as the time and neceſſity ſo required, they were content to be overruled; and ſo leaving the Ships and Galeaſſes at Zacynthus, went with the reſt of the Fleet to Cephalenia; whether Don John was not yet come, but had ſent word thither, That if they had any deſire to joyn their Forces with his, they ſhould yet come further back unto him in Corcyra. This Meſſage (which they had rather feared than expected) much troubled the Venetians; who readier to ſuſpect every miſchief, than to hope for any good, began to fret and complain, That the Spaniards could very well tell the Venetians what they had to do, and forget in the mean time, what was on their own part to be performed. A hard thing it was to ſay, and yet to be ſaid, that now they had more to do with thoſe their dallying Friends and Confederates, than with their Enemies; for with their Enemies they were to fight but in time of Battel, but with them they were to wreſtle at all times and in all places. They were by them (as they ſaid) drawn from the ſight of their Enemies, when as they might have been overthrown; not to the intent that with their united Forces they might more ſafely fight againſt them, or under the conduct of Don John gain the Victory; but rather leſt any thing ſhould have been done which might be to the honour or profit of the Venetians, and that time which was to have been beſtowed in the managing of the War, ſpent in lingring and delaying, and vain going forward and backward to no purpoſe. One only way there was (as they ſaid) to have diſpatched with the Turk, which was, by overcoming him in another notable Battel, and ſo to have utterly broken his ſtrength at Sea; which Courſe the Confederates made no leſs difficult by their backwardneſs and delays, than the Enemy by declining of Battel; That they had long ago by many ſecret ſigns probably conjectured, that the Spaniards had more care to hinder and croſs other Mens doings, than to do any thing of themſelves: That their endeavours were to fruſtrate thoſe great hopes which promiſed unto the Chriſtian Common-weal, the greateſt Felicity and Happineſs, together with immortal Glory; and, That the Turks of late diſcouraged with the fortunate proceedings of the Chriſtians, might again rejoyce at their miſhaps.

Don John commandeth the Fleet to repair unto him to Corcyra.

The Chriſtian Fleet altogether at Corcyra, ſetteth forward again towards the Enemy.

The Venetians, notwithſtanding all theſe their murmuring Speeches, loath to fall off from the Spaniard, kept ſtill on with the reſt until they came to Don John at Corcyra, who then lay with 53 Gallies, and 18 Ships at Spilca, in the uttermoſt end of the Iſland. At their firſt meeting, Don John ſhewed himſelf not a little offended, that they had not with more duty before attended his coming; and they again not a little complained of his long ſtay, with many other their grievances, which were tedious here to rehearſe. The Fleet now all with much ado at length met together, which conſiſted of two hundred Gallies, nine Galeaſſes, and thirty ſix tall Ships; It was by general conſent agreed, That they ſhould again ſet forward toward the Enemy. They were not yet under Sail, when two of their Eſpials brought them news, that the Enemies Fleet (weakly furniſhed both of Mariners and Souldiers) was come to Navarinum; which filled them all with good hope, that the Turks Fleet ſo evil provided, might in that place upon the ſuddain be eaſily oppreſſed, and the rather, if they came upon them unexpected. Wherefore, becauſe they would not be deſcried, they kept not their Courſe on right forth, but ſailing by night, kept aloof upon the right hand; and having paſſed Zacynthus, came with great ſilence unto the Strophades, where they lay at Anchor all that day. In the evening they looſed thence, ſo caſting their Courſe, that the more to terrifie the Enemy, they might before day fall upon him; and be ſeen in the mouth of the Haven where he lay, before there could be any report made of their coming thither. But this Courſe ſo well ſet, the time was ſo evil caſt, that it was fair day long before they could come to the appointed place; when the Turks out of their watch Towers diſcovered a far off the coming of the Chriſtian Fleet, gave warning thereof unto their Fellows; whereupon an Alarm was preſently raiſed in the Town, and all Men in Arms ran headlong to the Walls and to the Haven. But the Turks out of hope with their evil rigged Fleet to be able to withſtand the Chriſtians, and not daring to truſt to that weak Habor, and all now in a great hurly burly, ran confuſedly hand over head, Souldiers and Mariners, aboord; and whilſt they had yet time, got them in haſt out of that Habor, and as Men chaſed by their Enemies, got them into ſafe Harbor at Modon, a ſtrong Town of Peloponneſus, about ſix miles off. Columnius was ſent before the reſt of the Fleet to have purſued them; but they were got ſo far before him, that they had recovered the Harbor before he could overtake any of them. The Chriſtian Fleet coming before the Harbor, and leaving a ſpace as it were of purpoſe for the Enemy to come out into, there lay in the face of the the Town, daring the Turks Battel. But when they had ſo lien almoſt all that day, and no Man durſt come out; and now towards the evening certain ſigns of Tempeſt appeared, the Chriſtians fearing to be by force of Weather driven on ground, put farther off again to Sea. Then at length Uluzales ſent out certain light Gallies to follow in the tail of the Fleet, when the Confederates ſuddainly ſtaying their Courſe, and turning their Prows upon them, drave them headlong again into the Harbor; and afterwards retired themſelves with the whole Fleet into the Iſlands Oenuſæ, now called Sapientia, right oppoſit againſt Modon. The next day wanting freſh Water, they removed unto the Bay of Meſſina, there to water in the mouth of the River Pamiſus, which there falleth into the Sea; where in paſſing by Corone, they were oftentimes ſhot at out of the Town; and landing their Men to water, were encountred by certain Troops of Horſemen, ſent for that purpoſe by Uluzales. There was Water dearly bought with the Lives of many there ſlain on both ſides; in the end, the Chriſtians prevailing, watered, and ſo again returned unto the Oenuſæ from whence they came.

The deſcription of the Bay of Modon.

Methone or Modon (for it is by both Names known) ſtandeth almoſt in an Iſland ſtretching far into the Sea, where towards the Weſt runneth out a long point of the Land a great way into the Sea; in the uttermoſt part thereof, ſtandeth a great round Tower. The Town it ſelf, is on the one ſide encloſed with the Sea, and toward the Land ſo ſtrongly fortified, as that it ſeemeth almoſt impregnable: Towards the South cometh in a fair Bay about three miles wide, ſafe from all Winds except the Northerly Wind only; and ſhut up by a little Iſland in the mouth of the Bay, maketh a ſafe and quiet Harbor, with two entrances thereinto on either ſide of the Iſland. Within this Bay lay the Turks Fleet, with the Sterns of their Gallies toward the Land, and their Prows towards the Sea. At the Southerly coming in of the Bay ſtandeth an Hill, which the Inhabitants call Albus; On the top whereof, the Enemy had placed ſix great Pieces of Ordnance, wherewith to keep the Chriſtians from entring that way. So had they alſo upon the point of the Main, which (as we ſaid) runneth out from the Town, and upon St. Bernards Rock, planted other great Pieces of Ordnance to defend that paſſage alſo. The Chriſtians coming unto the mouth of the Bay, there lay with their Fleet divided into four parts, but yet doubtful what to do; for beſide that the entrances of the Bay were but narrow, they were alſo far more dangerous to be entred, by reaſon of the great Ordnance planted upon them. Nevertheleſs, the Venetian Admiral in hope of good ſucceſs, and loath to let the fearful Enemy ſo to eſcape out of their hands, would fain have perſwaded the General with his whole Fleet to have entred the Bay, and there in the Harbor to have oppreſſed the Enemy; which he ſhewed to be no hard matter to do, for that the Enemy was too weak in ſtrength, and could not be from Land relieved. In which doing, they ſhould indeed overthrow but one Fleet; but in the overthrowing of that one, cut in ſunder all the Sinews of the Turkiſh Empire by Sea; and raiſing a Tumult in the Bay, and filling all with a general fear, ſhould undoubtedly at the firſt onſet put the Enemy to flight: Which done, what ſhould let, but that carrying about with them the terror of the Victory, they ſhould with their victorious Fleet, take from the Turk all the Iſlands of the Ægeum? That truly and wiſely it was ſaid of Themiſtocles, That whoſoever had the command of the Sea, muſt needs alſo prevail in the reſt, and at length carry away the Victory by Land alſo. It was (as he ſaid) the part of good Chieftains, not to be wanting unto themſelves when occaſion was offered; beſides that, they were the ſame Turks, whom they had but the year before vanquiſhed; and what had that one year either taken from them, or given unto the Turks? Or what ſhould they fear ſix Pieces of Ordnance mounted upon a Hill, who if they ſhould undertake the Battel, were not to fear the great ſtore of Ordnance in 260 of the Enemies Gallies and Galliots? I my ſelf (ſaid he) will be the Guide and Leader, in whatſoever ſhall ſeem moſt difficult and dangerous; and will in perſon my ſelf be the firſt that ſhall enter the Harbor, and adventure the firſt danger. Great Victories (he ſaid) were not to be gained but with great adventures; and that therefore the matter were to be haſted, before more aid ſhould be ſent unto the Turks. Wherefore they ſhould as reſolute Men attempt that, the Turks thought the Chriſtians durſt not to have attempted; and with the ſame courage break into the Bay, wherewith they had but the year before broken the ſtrength of the ſame Enemy; and by the power of God, carry away another notable triumph of the vanquiſhed Turks; who overcome in a ſecond Battel at Sea, muſt needs depart with all their maritime Territories. With evil liking of the Spaniards was the Venetian Admiral heard; and Don John the General, deeming both the time and place unfit for the attempting of ſo great an exploit; rehearſed on the one ſide, the ſtrength of the Enemy, the diſadvantage of the place, the difficulty of the Battel, with the manifold and great calamities received by the overhaſty and raſh attempts of their Enemies: That the Enemies ſtrength was not to be ſo much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reaſon; and that many in ſeeking to encreaſe their former glory, had in ſo doing overthrown the ſame: That the Chriſtians in entring and adventuring the Harbor, ſhould on the one ſide be beaten with the Artillery from the Hill; and on the other, with the Artillery out of the Caſtle of Modon; and that it was not like that Uluzales ſhould if need were, lack aid from Land, who but the other day had ſent great Troops of Horſemen to have kept the Chriſtians from watering; That a matter of ſo great importance, was (by Fuſcarinus his leave) not raſhly to be taken in hand upon an heat and hautineſs of Stomack, but upon a grave and mature deliberation; for if they ſhould in a place of ſo great diſadvantage, hazard the fortune of a general Battel, it ſhould ſeem that either he knew not that kind of fight, and force of the Enemy, or elſe would make the Bay of Modon more famous by the overthrow of the Chriſtians, than was the Curzulari by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Then what a ſhame would it be, if they which were about to oppreſs the Enemies Fleet, ſhould themſelves be overthrown, and that in their own device? He had rather (as he ſaid) preſerve his own Fleet, than to take 600 of the Enemies Gallies, and to account the ſame for a greater honour. Which he determined not, for that he would not have any thing done; but that unripe occaſions ſhould not be too much haſtned, and as it were thruſt headlong forward; whereas time would give opportunity for the overthrow of the Turks Fleet, ſo that they ran not blindly on headlong; and that in future time, the Venetians would rejoyce that they had ſo moderated their deſires. The Chriſtians (he ſaid) had ſufficiently prevailed, if thoſe things ſhould fall out well, which were warily and adviſedly conſidered and reſolved upon.

John Don refuſeth to follow the Counſel of the Admiral.

The matter thus on both ſides debated, and nothing done, they returned with the Fleet into the Port of Navarinum. This proceeding, as it diverſly moved the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo brought it forth divers Speeches, every Man ſpeaking in favour of his own Nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That he had moſt providently reſolved, for that how dear the Counſel of the Venetian Admiral would have coſt if it had been followed, the thing it ſelf (as he ſaid) ſhewed, by the extream danger thereof preſented, not in the doubtful opinon of Men, but laied open before their Eies. The Venetians on the other ſide more deſirous of Battel, the nearer they had ſeen the opportunity to have prevailed upon the Enemy, the more impatiently they endured ſo aſſured a Victory to have been let ſlip out of their hands; and thereof ſpake accordingly.

The Chriſtians lying at Navarinum, conſulted of many things what they were beſt to take in hand; and reſolving at laſt, by Sea and Land to beſiege the Caſtle of Modon, which kept the paſſage into the Bay, and defended the Turkiſh Fleet; they returned again thither, and landed 7000 of their beſt Souldiers, to beſiege the Caſtle. And at the ſame time, appointed the Galleaſſes with certain Gallies to batter it alſo from Sea; which the more commodiouſly to do, they joyned two of their greateſt Gallies together ſide to ſide, which they made faſt with Maſts and ſtrong Ropes, and ſo boorded them clean over, whereon as on a Platform, they placed their Gabions all afront, filled with Earth, and great Ordnance betwixt, to have battered the Caſtle. But when this Engin (in manner of a floating Fort) ſhould have performed the ſervice for which it was deviſed, it proved unſerviceable, after it had with much ado been brought thither, being ready to ſink with the weight of the great Ordnance and other things wherewith it was overcharged. For which cauſe, and for that they underſtood a great number of Horſemen to be come into the Town, they gave over the Siege vainly begun, and put again with their Fleet to Sea. It fortuned at the ſame time, that a tall Ship of Venice departing from Zacynthus, and coming alongſt the Coaſt of Peloponneſus with proviſion for the Fleet, was deſcried by the Enemy; who thinking to do the Chriſtians a great diſhonour, if they could almoſt in the ſight of their Fleet ſurpriſe her, they ſent out certain light Gallies to have taken her; Uluzales in the mean time with the reſt of his Fleet, lying in the very mouth of the Bay, ready to come out, if the Chriſtian Fleet ſhould once ſtir to relieve her. Which the Chriſtians perceiving, and well hoping that ſo the Enemy would be drawn to battel, ſent out Columnius with his Gallies to reſcue the Ships; and others alſo which lying aloof, might get in betwixt the Turks Gallies and the Bay: Don John and the Venetian Admiral, lying ready to have given Battel, if Uluzales ſhould have come forth; but the Chriſtians coming on with a ſmall Gale, the Enemy being afraid, by ſhooting off of certain warning Pieces within the Bay, in time called back the Gallies that were already gon out of the Bay; who all forthwith came in, excepting Mahomet the Nephew of Barbaruſſa, a moſt famous Captain amongſt the Turks, who as one of great courage, and deſirous of honour, ſtaied a little without the Bay, with greater courage than diſcretion, expecting who ſhould aſſail him. Him the Marqueſs St. Crucis ſet upon, and had with him a great and terrible fight; but in the end the Marqueſs prevailing, ſlew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honour carried away the Gally. So the diſhonour which Uluzales would have done the Chriſtians, fell upon himſelf, having in his own fight loſt one of his beſt Captains with his Gally.

The next day, becauſe the year ſhould not paſs without ſomething done, nor the hope of ſo great a preparation come to nothing, the Chriſtians determined to beſiege the Caſtle of Navarinum (which was in ancient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the native place of old Neſtor. The City of Navarinum ſtandeth upon a riſing ground, ſtretching ſomewhat into the Sea; whereinto it hath a large proſpect, and a fair large Haven, but ſubject to the North-wind. It is defended with a point of the Main, running with a compaſs into the Sea, whereon ſtandeth an old Caſtle. Some ſent before to view the ſituation of the place, brought word back, that the Caſtle might in three days be won. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma, whom the Venetians furniſhed with Munition and Victual. He landing with 2000 Italians, 1000 Spaniards, and 500 Germans, began with twelve great Pieces to batter the Caſtle. And albeit that the Battery was planted ſo far off, as that it did the Enemy no great harm; yet happily the enterpriſe had taken effect, if by taking the ſtraight and troubleſome paſſages through a rough and thick Foreſt, the City had been kept from relief; but foraſmuch as thoſe paſſages were left free, the Enemy cunningly oppoſed policy againſt force, for ſallying out of the City, they gave the Chriſtians an hot skirmiſh; and in the mean time whilſt the Chriſtians were ſo buſied, by a Port toward the Foreſt on the other ſide of the City, received in great number both of Horſe and Foot. The report of this new come aid cauſed the Prince to raiſe his Siege, and to go again aboord. And now reſted all the hope of the gaining of the Town in the ſtrength of the Fleet; and that not ſmall, for that the Turks not relieved with Victuals by Land, were by the Confederates kept from them alſo by Sea; for at that time the Turks were troubled with two great miſchiefs, the Plague, and Famine. For no proviſion had there been made, as in a thing not feared; and that little being ſpent that was in the Town, they were enforced to ſeek for Victuals further off; which coming but ſparingly, as in time of Dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the Souldiers that lay about in the Country Villages, wanting Victuals no leſs than they in the City. And the more Men the Beglerbeg of Græce brought down for defence of the Sea Towns, ſo much the more the wants of all things daily encreaſed: So that no Man doubted, but that in ſhort time all would be brought to extream penury. What a death the Mortality had made, the want of Men in their Gallies well declared; for many of the Gallies for lack of Mariners and Souldiers were ſent away into Eubœa, or left at Malvaſia, or carried away to Conſtantinople. Thoſe who ſtaid in the Bay of Modon, were ſcarce 100 Gallies, and 40 Galliots; and they ſo ſlenderly manned, that the greateſt Gallies had ſcarcely an hundred and twenty Men left in them, and they ſo meager and faint, as that they could ſcarcely hold up their Weapons. The Chriſtians underſtanding of theſe things, were in good hope, that by continuing the Siege, they ſhould without danger gain a notable Victory; for which cauſe Fuſcarinus perſwaded the Spaniards (of woſe conſtancy he doubted) to hold it out, as Men of reſolution; ſhewing them, that in the event of this action reſted for them for ever to be feared or contemned of the Turks; who except they ſhould be changed into Fiſhes or into Birds, could not (as he ſaid) without a notable overthrow eſcape their hands out of the Bay. But unto this his hope and counſel, the event was not correſpondent; for the Spaniards, whether it were for the tediouſneſs of the Siege, or for want of Victuals, or for the approach of Winter, or elſe moved with ſome

The weakneſs of the Turks Fleet

ſome other reaſon, began to think of the matter diverſly; and at the firſt a report was raiſed, That the Chriſtians giving over the Siege, would ſhortly return home; and the reaſon was, for that they wanted Bisket, and had ſcarcely Victuals left for fifteen days, which was to be reſerved for their long journey home: beſides that, The approach of Winter did call them from the action; and that having done what they might, they could never draw the Enemy forth to battel; and that therefore having ſufficiently and as far as was poſſible already diſcharged their duties, they were now alſo to regard their ſafety, and to foreſee that their Fleet, wherein the welfare of them all was repoſed, were now not too far endangered. At the firſt theſe Speeches were divulged by the common Souldiers and Mariners of ſmall credit or reputation; but afterwards by more, and they alſo Men of better place and ſort: Yea Don John himſelf, whether it were to ſome other purpoſe, or that he ſo ſpake in good earneſt, began to lay the fault upon others, why that he, ſo lately come from Meſſina, ſhould in ſo ſhort time want Victuals and all things elſe neceſſary.

The Venetians murmure againſt the Spaniards.

With theſe unexpected reports, and ſo far different from the confederation, the Venetian Admiral with the reſt of the Venetian Commanders were exceedingly troubled, and grieved above meaſure; for it ſeemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the moſt fertil and plentiful Country of Sicilia, in all Ages the moſt faithful and abundant Granary and Storehouſe of Italy, both in Peace and War, could ſo ſoon want Victuals. Could eighteen tall Ships (which ought by the Capitulations of the League to have come loaded with Bisket, Victuals, and other warlike and neceſſary Proviſion) become empty? Or but to have brought ſo much as might but ſuffice for a month only? If this were done without the knowledge of Don John, where was then the care of a General? If he winking thereat, where was his zeal to the confederation, or to what purpoſe came he to Corcyra? Was it to avert the Chriſtian Fleet (having once or twice met with the Enemy) from doing any good upon him? Could it come into any Mans head (beſides that in ſo doing he was therein to extinguiſh the glory of a moſt certain Victory, like to work the Turks confuſion) by the infamy of a voluntary return to encreaſe the glory and renown of his Enemy, and bring a perpetual ignominy and diſgrace unto the honour of the Chriſtians? Verily the Spaniards, therein to ſhew themſelves not ſo willing to have the power of the Turks abated, as the ſtrength of the Venetians not encreaſed.

The Venetian Admiral perſwadeth the Spaniards in no caſe to return from the Enemy.

Theſe things Fuſcarinus and the Venetians ſometimes fretted at amongſt themſelves; and otherwhiles the Admiral himſelf expoſtulated the ſame with Don John and Columnius; and in the preſence of the greateſt Counſellors ſhewed, not only how pofitable, but alſo how neceſſary perſeverance was in all Martial Affairs; That it was an old and uſual matter for Men in beſieging of their Enemies, to ſuffer many difficulties; if they ſhould, having performed nothing, return with the Fleet, who would doubt but that both their labour and charge was again the next year to be renewed? And what could this delay be elſe, but a propagation of their further calamities? That therefore it much concerned the Chriſtian Common-weal, although they had not all things in abundance, yet reſolutely and with patience to endure the ſcarcity of Victuals. If want of Bisket were feared, the General might eaſily remedy that matter, by ſpeedily ſending for thoſe Ships which lay laded with Victuals good ſtore at Tarentum; which thing might in ſhort time be performed. In the mean time he promiſed to ſupply the Spaniards wants with part of his own ſtore; and that he had rather his Men ſhould live with Roots, than to let the Enemies Fleet coupt up, ſo to eſcape his hands: That the deſire to protect the honour of the Chriſtians, would overcome all difficulties. Beſide that, the matter would be but ſhort, if it were done at once, in one continued Courſe; and would undoubtedly be by them performed, if they gave not over the thing they had ſo well begun, until they had accompliſhed it. They (as he ſaid) might in good ſafety lie with their Fleet in the Ports of Navarinum, Sapientia, and Capraria; whereas the Enemy, lying ſhut up in the Bay of Modon, ſhould have but a bad and dangerous Winter Harbour; and October being now begun, ſhould in ſhort time be in danger to periſh with bluſtering Storms and rage of the Sea, familiar unto that time of the year; or elſe enforced with the extremity of the Weather, and with want, to adventure into the open Sea, and with their weak Forces to joyn Battel. What ſhould therefore let, why they ſhould not for 10 or for 15 days continue the Siege, as beſt beſeemed the honour of themſelves, the valour of their Souldiers, and worthineſs of the Chriſtian Name? What a terror it would be unto the Enemy, to ſee the Chriſtians ready to endure all extremities and wants, to gain the Victory over the Turks? Again, what diſhonour and diſcredit would it be unto themſelves, if they ſhould ſuffer the Enemy (ſhut up and not daring to fight) to eſcape; eſpecially, when as they might ſitting ſtill, end the War? The Senate of Venice, he ſaid, moſt reſted upon the valour and courage of Don John, and therefore he requeſted him not to deceive the great hope they had of him conceived; for how much ſhould he himſelf blemiſh his own honour, if when he had before relieved the afflicted ſtate of the Common-weal, he ſhould now, when it was moſt of all to be holpen, forſake the ſame? Which ſhould not be much unlike, as if a Man ſhould with great labour purchaſe great ſtore of precious Pearls, and upon an humorous paſſion caſt them all into the Sea: That Men generally held a great opinion of him the General, an honourable remembrance of his Victory, and regard of his Valour; all which, how much the more pregnant and honourable ſhould they be, by the ſecond vanquiſhing and ſubduing the moſt mighty Monarch of the World; and that if the action well begun, ſhould be effectually proſecuted by the goodneſs of God, the direction of the Commanders, and the reſolution of the Souldiers, in ſhort time the Chriſtians ſhould carry the Victory from the Turks, and make him their General, equal not only with the great Chieftains of the preſent time, but even with the moſt famous Commanders of all former Ages. Whereunto Don John replied, That the action then in hand no leſs concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians; and that he had in his life deſired nothing more, than to ſtand the Chriſtian Common-weal in ſtead: That he pointed at the ſame mark with Fuſcarinus, and in zeal to do good unto the Chriſtian Common-weal, gave place to no Man; but indeed to perform it, was a thing much more difficult than to ſay it; leſſer things (he ſaid) were to be overpaſſed, to reſerve themſelves for the performance of greater; and therefore marveiled that Fuſcarinus alone could not ſee things moſt manifeſt before his eies, who otherwiſe could with his piercing wit ſee through the deepeſt matters; could he think by any other means to abate the power of the Turk, than if they kept their Fleet whole? that it were ever the manner of the greateſt and moſt worthy Commanders, rather to ſhun the preſent dangers, that to encreaſe their Territories:

Don John replied upon the Venetian Admiral.

That nothing was ſo well purpoſed, which might not be of ſome wrongfully ſuſpected; but his faithful meaning to be pure and without ſpot; and albeit that the opportunity ſerved not for him to ſhew it; yet was his deſire and endevour nothing leſs: And that Fuſcarinus ſhould do well more intentively to conſider, what the cauſe, the matter, and the time required: That the manner of War at Land and at Sea, were much different, and that although Wars of both ſorts were to give place unto the moſt unſeaſonable time of the year, unfit for any kind of War; yet might Men at Land, better endure the Winter Storms in their Tents and Cabins, than at Sea in their Gallies, where oftentimes, will, skill, wiſdom, nor valour help not; but that (except it be ſo provided and foreſeen, that the ſeaſonable time of the year, and commodious for ſailing, may be taken) all muſt together periſh by Shipwreck. What, would he have them to ſtrive above their power with the Winter Storms, and Famine, the greateſt extremities of nature? Beſides that, he was verily perſwaded, that the Turks enjoying the commodities of a good Harbor, and of a rich City, would there in ſafety Winter; the Country of Peloponneſus relieving them with all neceſſaries; when as the Chriſtians in the mean time, except they in time returned home, ſhould lie expoſed to the rage of the Sea, ſtanding as it were in a continual Watch, not laying away their Weapons in the depth of Winter and dead time of the year, which in reaſon ought to give reſt to all Men. And that therefore every Man ought for the preſent to bear his own grievances, and not by the harms of his Friends and Confederates, to ſeek his own avail. And that he bearing himſelf upon the inward integrity of his good will toward the Venetians, would this ſay, howſoever Fuſcarinus ſhould underſtand it, that if the Kings Fleet ſhould by long ſtaying there periſh, it would no leſs concern the Venetians, than the King himſelf; and taking God to witneſs, would ſolemnly promiſe, Nothing to be unto him more leifer or religious, than to be preſt ſo ſoon as the time of the year would give leave, and by his endeavour to make all Men to know, that he had no leſs care of the Venetian State, than of the Kings Affairs; neither deſired any thing more, than to be accounted, and indeed to be a moſt conſtant upholder of that moſt Chriſtian League; and that beyond all expectation, even in the judgment of the Venetians themſelves; but for the preſent they muſt pardon him, if he gave place unto the neceſſity of the time. As for the offer of the communicating of their Victuals, that would not be any help, but the deſtruction of both the Fleets; for ſo they ſhould both ſooner feel the want; wherefore it were much better to preſerve the Fleet, which they might uſe in the next years Wars, than wilfully to caſt away the ſame by Famine, and the rage of the Sea. In brief, what an indignity ſhould the Chriſtians ſuſtain, if they themſelves ſhould by the ſame means be overthrown, whereby they had thought to have overthrown others?

The Spaniards about to return without the knowledge of the Venetians.

Now the Spaniards were ſo reſolutely ſet down for their departure, that not only without the conſent of the Venetians, but even without their privity, their departure was reſolved upon, and ſecret commandment given unto the Maſters of the Gallies, with all the haſte that might be, to depart thence to Meſſina. Which the Venetian Admiral underſtanding, and therewith troubled as with an unexpected matter, came aboord the General, and greatly complained of his purpoſe for ſo ſuddain a departure; requeſting him a while to ſtay, until the two Gallies made faſt together in the Harbour of Navarinum (as is beforeſaid) with the Ordnance upon them, might be put in good ſafety, and neither they, or any thing elſe left for a prey unto the Enemy. With much ado, Fuſcarinus perſwaded him to ſtay that night, that thoſe Gallies might be brought out of the Harbour, and all things put in order for their departure. The reſt of the night was ſpent in debating of the matter too and fro; where Don John would needs have it conceived into a publick Inſtrument in writing, That the Fleet by the general conſent of the three Admirals returned for lack of Victuals; whereunto the Venetian Admiral hardly conſented. But when the Inſtrument ſhould have been made and confirmed, Don John better adviſed by one of his Secretaries, That the ſame would redound unto the great diſhonour both of the King and himſelf, that the Fleet coming out of the fruitful Country of Sicilia, ſhould in a months ſpace want Victuals; changed his mind for the writing, and only requeſted the Venetian Admiral to credit him and Columnius, in that they had ſaid concerning the want of Victuals; promiſing him, that if upon the way he ſhould meet with the Victuals that were ſent for, he would forthwith return and give him aid, as the time and occurrents ſhould require; but in the mean time to proceed by common conſent, to do that which was moſt needful. Hereupon they returned; and coming to Corcyra, they met the expected Ship laded with Victuals. Now is not Fuſcarinus unmindful of his duty, but coming to Don John, put him in remembrance of his promiſe; telling him, That it was not unlike, but that the Enemy ſo ſoon as he underſtood of their departure, would come out of the Bay, and return with his Fleet towards Conſtantinople; and being but weak manned, and worſe furniſhed of Mariners, might eaſily be overtaken upon the way and overthrown. But Don John was not by any means to be thereunto perſwaded, pretending, that he was by the King commanded forthwith to return. So the expectation of great matters to have been this year done, came to nought, but vaniſhed into ſmoak; and nothing performed worth ſo long a diſcourſe, more than to ſee with what difficulty great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their own Honour, or envying at others, corrupt with delays the faireſt opportunities, and by their croſs dealing, no leſs than the Enemy, hinder the common good, whereat they would all faineſt ſeem to aym. From Corcyra Don John departed to Meſſina, and Columnius unto Rome. Fuſcarinus with greater honour than ſucceſs returned to Venice, where he was with great joy received, both of the Senate and the Citiſens in general; and ſo (no leſs famous for his patience and moderation towards the other Confederates, than for his policy and valour) with the good liking of all Men gave up his charge, in few years after to receive a greater.

Amida the exiled King of Tunes craveth aid of Don John.

About this time, Amida King of Tunes (of whom much is before ſpoken in the Life of Solyman) being but a little before driven out of his Kingdom by the Turks (who had of long by little and little encroached upon him) and as a private Man lived in Exile with his two Sons at Guletta with Franciſcus Tovares Governour thereof, hearing of the great overthrow of the Turks at Lepanto, and of the good ſucceſs of the Chriſtians, ſent Embaſſadors to Don John General of the Confederate Princes, then lying in Sicilia, humbly requeſting his aid for the recovery of his Kingdom; promiſing to defray the whole charges of the War, and for ever to hold his Kingdom of the King of Spain, as his Vaſſal and Tributary. Which his requeſt well conſidered of, and the matter thought of no ſmall conſequence for the ſafety of the Chriſtian Countries lying over againſt that part of Africk, to have 1573. ſo dangerous an Enemy removed; Don John the year following (in the beginning of October) by the commandment of the King of Spain his Brother, departing from Drepanum in Sicilia, with an hundred and five Gallies and forty Ships, arrived the next day about noon at Guletta, where the Gallies of Malta came unto him, and ſhortly after John Andreas Auria the Admiral with nineteen more, and Columnius the Popes Admiral with fourteen more, all well appointed. At his arrival at Guletta, he underſtood by Amida and the Governour, the whole eſtate both of the City and of the Kingdom of Tunes; and that the Turks and Moors, terrified with ſo great a Fleet, were about to forſake the City. Wherefore having well viewed the place; he the next day after landed his Forces about four miles from the City, and ſent two thouſand five-hundred Footmen before the reſt of the Army to the City; who found it all deſolate, the Turks and Moors being before for fear fled, ſome to Caravana, ſome to Biſerta; who entring without reſiſtance, came to the Caſtle, wherein they found two hundred Moors, who ſaid they kept it for Amida their King; but yet would by no means ſuffer the Chriſtians to enter. All which was forthwith made known to Don John, who then becauſe it was almoſt night, would not move, but early the next morning ſet forward with his whole Army; and entring the City, before abandoned by the Inhabitants, and ſo coming to the Caſtle, found nothing therein but great ſtore of Oil, Butter, and Wool.

Amida the late King, by the commandment of Don John all this while ſtaied at Guletta. But whilſt Don John was yet at Tunes, news was brought to him the thirteenth of October, That the Turks Garriſon before fled out of Tunes, with divers Moors, coming to Biſerta, were there kept out by the Citiſens, and not ſuffered to enter; for which cauſe they began to burn and ſpoil the Country thereabout. Whereupon the General ſent Tovares the Captain of Guletta thither with part of the Army; who encountring with thoſe Turks overthrew them, and had the City by the Citiſens peaceably delivered unto him.

The juſt judgment of God upon Amida the late King of Tunes.

The Kingdom of Tunes thus eaſily once again recovered from the Turks, Don John throughly informed of the faithleſs and cruel dealing of Amida the late King, and that in deteſtation of the Chriſtians and their Religion, he had already had intelligence with the Turks, and procured the death of ſome of the Chriſtians; gave this definitive ſentence upon him, being yet in the Caſtle of Guletta: That foraſmuch as he had of long time been the author of great diſcord and endleſs troubles in that Kingdom, and had moſt unnaturally deprived Muleaſſes his Father, firſt of his Kingdom, and afterward of his ſight; and in like manner tyranniſed over his natural Brethren, the rightful Heirs of that Kingdom, whereby the Turks had taken occaſion both to invade and poſſeſs the ſame; he ſhould therefore by the commandment of the King of Spain be carried Priſoner with his two Sons into Sicilia, there to remain for ever. Which heavy doom he taking moſt grievouſly, and yet crying out for mercy, was forthwith thruſt into a Gally, and with his Wife and Children tranſported into Sicilia, there to live in perpetual Exile; The juſt reward of his mercileſs and unnatural dealing with his Father and Brethren; God no doubt requiting him with the like meaſure he had before meaſured unto them.

Mahomet, Amida his Brother, made King of Tunes, and Vaſſal to the King of Spain.

After that (the King of Spain ſo commanding) Mahomet, Amida his elder Brother, and right Heir of that Kingdom, was appointed King in his place; who departing from Guletta to Tunes, was received as King, and there by ſolemn Oath promiſed for ever to be the King of Spain his Vaſſal, and to do whatſoever he ſhould command.

There was before departed out of Tunes forty thouſand Moors, who now came and offered their ſupplication to Don John, that they might again return and live with their new King; which their requeſt being eaſily granted, they in great numbers every day returned into the City. Shortly after, 1500 Turks, with 3000 of thoſe wild People which ſome call Arabians, ſome Alarbes, ſore troubled all the paſſages about the City; who were at laſt by the Chriſtians overthrown, and 150 Chriſtians whom they had taken Priſoners, reſcued. After that, Don John by the advice of his moſt expert and skilful Captains, commanded a ſtrong Caſtle to be built in the middle way betwixt Guletta and Tunes; and for the performing thereof left Gabriel Serbellio with 2000 Italians; and Calazar a Spaniard with other 2000 at Guletta. And ſo having performed that he came for, and diſpoſed of all things as he thought beſt, returned again into Sicilia.

A grief of griefs it is, and ſorrow almoſt unconſolable, when worthy actions moſt happily begun, ſort not to ſuch happy end as was in reaſon hoped for. The greateſt and moſt famous Victory of all Ages gained againſt the Turk, ſeemed to have lightned the Chriſtian Common-weal, and great hope there was, that the Chriſtians falling into unity amongſt themſelves, would by an happy exchange make the Turkiſh Empire the Seat of their Wars, and to turn into the Turks Dominions, the terror, ſlaughter, and other calamities of War, which had ſo many year afflicted the Chriſtian Common-weal. But by how much the more the joy was amidſt ſuch daily calamities and tears, ſo much greater was the ſorrow, ſo great an hope to be come to nought, and Men to be ſo blinded with the darkneſs of envy and diſdain, that they could not ſo much as think, with what diſhonour and danger of the Common-ſtate, they ſhould ſhrink from ſo juſt, ſo honourable, and ſo needful a ſervice, including in it ſelf the general good of all Chriſtendom. When poſterity ſhall conſider what things might then have been done, and the devices whereby the common cauſe was overthrown; it will worthily blame and greatly lament ſo notable a Victory and fit opportunity, ſent as it were from Heaven for the effecting of great matters, to have been let ſlip and paſſed over ſo lightly regarded. This made, that they who before had repoſed all their hope in Arms, had now no other confidence or hope of their welfare, but in concluding of Peace. Truly the Venetians both ſpoke and thought honourably of King Philip, as of a moſt faithful, juſt, devout, and honourable Prince; yet greatly blaming his Officers and others of great authority about him, as Men more regarding their own private, than the good of the Chriſtian Common-weal. In theſe perplexities of the Venetians, King Philip promiſed them to ſet forth a greater and ſtronger Fleet againſt the next year, and to be ſooner in readineſs with all his Forces and warlike Proviſion, and ſo to help them in all he might. Who for all that gave ſmall credit unto thoſe promiſes, for that with the like they had been oftentimes before deceived. And therefore as truſting moſt unto their own ſtrength, they with all carefulneſs and expedition entertained more Souldiers; of whom ſome they put into their Fleet, the reſt they placed in their Garriſons in Crete, in Dalmatia, and their frontier Towns in Epirus. Neither were the Turks then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that War with greater fame than ſtrength; for they had of purpoſe given it out, That they would the next Spring with divers Armies invade the

The Venetians weary of the delays and croſs dealing of the Spaniard, reſolve to ſue unto the Turks for Peace.

Venetian Territories in Crete, in Dalmatia, in Epirus, yea and in Italy it ſelf; and with their innumerable multitude both of Horſe and Foot ſo overwhelmed the Venetians, that they ſhould not be able poſſibly to hold out. This and more too they bravely vaunted of; but indeed Uluzales coming to Conſtantinople, had brought his Fleet ſo ſhaken and ſo weak, as that it ſeemed not poſſible but in long time to be again repaired, and furniſhed with Souldiers and Mariners, in ſtead of them that had been loſt, ſome in fight, but more by the contagiouſneſs of the Infection. But howſoever the matter ſtood, the Venetians careful with the expectation of great matters, and in ſmall hope of good ſucceſs, comparing their own ſtrength with the ſtrength of the Enemy; yet were they no leſs diſcouraged with the delays and croſs dealing of the Confederates, than with all the proviſion of the Enemy. It ſtuck in their minds, how that the Spaniards at ſuch time as Cyprus might have been defended, delaied their coming ſo long, that Nicoſia being loſt, it was time to return; neither could they forget that lingering delay to have been the cauſe of the great mortality amongſt their Men, dying in the Fleet at Jadera; They remembred alſo, that the commodities which of ſo notable a Victory were moſt plentifully to have been reaped, were by the ſlender proſecuting of the ſame, ſo ſparingly taken, that the former dangers ſtill remained; And that Don John, who ought by appointment to have been at Corcyra in the beginning of Summer, was ſcarcely come thither in the later end of Auguſt; And that he in the third year of this War, at ſuch time as their Fleet was with great labour and charge again repaired, would not, or liſted not to adventure to have again overthrown the Enemies Fleet, but in the very action to have always trifled away the greateſt part of Summer, before his Spaniards could ſet forward; and when he might ſafely have come to Cerigo, to have called back Fuſcarinus and the reſt, then facing of the Enemy, and even ready to have given him Battel: It was then ſecretly ſuſpected, the Spaniards to have ſtaied of purpoſe, and to have dallied on the time, that the Venetians having ſpent their Forces, might be the more expoſed and ſubject to their injuries: It ſtuck faſt not in their minds alſo, but even almoſt in their eies, what things had happened of former times in their Confederations with that Nation; they were grieved in the ſpace of three years an hundred times, twenty hundred thouſand Ducats to have been to little or ſmall purpoſe ſpent in that War: Beſides that, they doubted leſt the Flemings with their Confederates ſhould ſo intangle the King of Spain in defending of his own Territories, as that he ſhould not be at leiſure to ſend any aid into the Eaſt; in which caſe, what hope or help were they to look for? How ſhould they then defend the reſt of their Seigniory in the Eaſt? How ſhould their empty Coffers ſuffice to maintain ſo great Armies both by Sea and Land, as might withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy? Long were the diſcourſes, and effectual the perſwaſions, that the Venetians had amongſt themſelves, to induce one another, and all in general, more circumſpectly to conſider, not only what had already paſſed, or was preſently in hand; but alſo more warily to foreſee what would be the courſe and what the event of a matter ſo important; and betime to break off the Confederation, which they had always found to have ſtood them in ſmall ſtead. In revolving of theſe things, only one remedy ſeemed moſt effectual for the curing of their afflicted State; which was, by deſiſting from War, to conclude a Peace with the Turk, howſoever; which they were the rather in good hope to obtain, for that divers Speeches concerning the ſame had paſſed at Conſtantinople, and were from thence again reported at Venice. All Men thus inclining to peace, the Senate referred the proceeding therein unto M. Antonius Barbarus their Embaſſador, (who all the time of theſe Wars had lien in ſafe cuſtody at Conſtantinople) willing him therein to uſe the help of the French Embaſſador, who had always been a perſwader of Peace.

Selymus himſelf deſirous of Peace.

Selymus having got the Iſland of Cyprus and divers other places from the Venetians, and yet well wearied with the harms and loſſes he had himſelf received both by Sea and Land, was alſo deſirous enough of Peace. So that the French Embaſſador might as it was thought, have got a reaſonable and indifferent Peace, if he had but expected the opportunity of the time: But he (whether moved with the common harms, or ſome other ſecret cauſes to him beſt known) in making too much haſt, and ſeeming too deſirous of Peace, much hurt the common cauſe of the Venetians, which he moſt deſired to have furthered. Selymus having found him, reſolved with Mahomet the great Baſſa, what he would have done; who at ſuch time as the ſame Embaſſador came unto him about the matter, told him, That he had himſelf many times moved, yea and ſo far forth as he might, importuned his great Lord and Maſter for Peace, but could never find him willing to hear thereof, until that now at length overcome and wearied with the continual ſolicitation of ſuch as might do moſt with him, he had yielded thereunto. So the thing that Selymus himſelf undoubtedly deſired, that the crafty Baſſa ſeemed him with moſt difficulty to grant, rather upon the inſtance and contemplation of them that laboured for the ſame, than for any deſire he had thereunto of himſelf. For certain days at the firſt the French Embaſſador was moſt courteouſly heard, and the Baſſa with fair and cunning Speech promiſed, that the matter of pacification ſhould eaſily and in ſhort time be compaſſed; and ſo at their firſt conferences things paſſed rather in general terms, than that any conditions of Peace were particularly agreed upon; only this was on both parties conſented unto, That the Venetians ſhould ſend their Embaſſador of purpoſe, for the full concluding and confirming of the deſired Peace. Which charge was by the Senate committed to Jacobus Superantius, in whoſe wiſdom and valour they had repoſed great hope and confidence. He was no ſooner come to Conſtantinople, and the Turks delivered of the fear of the Chriſtian Sword, by the diſſolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed, and the Venetians glad to endure the proud looks of the Turks, their diſdainful ears, their deſpightful ſpeeches, their long and inſolent attendance, with many other ſhameful indignities: Yea the Baſſa was ſo ſhameleſs, as proudly to ask them, How they durſt be ſo bold as to impugn the great Emperor Selymus his Fleet at Sea. Whereunto the Embaſſador anſwered, That the Venetians had always honoured the Majeſty of the Turkiſh Emperors, neither had at any time taken up Arms againſt him, but in their own reaſonable defence, when force was by force to be repulſed, a thing lawful even for the wild Beaſt in the wild Wilderneſs to do. At the firſt entreaty of the Peace, the Baſſa ſeemed to put the Venetian Embaſſador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his requeſt ſhould enjoy their Territories in Dalmatia in as ample manner as in former times, and bounded with the ſame bounds, whereof they had in theſe Wars loſt ſome part about Jadera. But when the matter ſhould have come to the ſhutting up, the Turk began to ſhrink from that he had before promiſed, Muhamet Baſſa dealeth cunningly with the French Embaſſador, ſoliciting the Peace in the behalf of the Venetians.

The Venetians ſend their Embaſſador of purpoſe to Conſtantinople to entreat a Peace.

promiſed, refuſing not only the reſtitution of the Territory they had indeed by Treaſon got; but by cautelous expoſitions of his meaning, framing the concluſion of the preſent Peace unto the form of their former Leagues, required, That as the Turks had now yielded unto them Malvaſia and Nauplus, ſo now they ſhould redeliver unto them two other places of like worth and importance: As for not reſtoring the Territory they had taken about Jadera, to colour their deceit, they pretended that they might not by their Law reſtore unto the Chriſtians any Town or place wherein were any Church or Temple dedicated or converted unto the Mahometan Religion, as was there; and further, That the ſame Territory was already given by Selymus in reward unto his Souldiers, Men of deſert, from whom without great injury it might not be again taken. Hereupon the French Embaſſador complained, That promiſes were not performed; and the Venetians ſo fretted, that they were even about to have returned as Men ſhamefully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained (the Turks ſtill ſtanding upon ſuch hard terms) the Embaſſadors by the appointment of the Senate concluded a Peace with the Turk; whereof theſe were the chief Capitulations; firſt, That the Venetians ſhould give unto Selymus three hundred thouſand Ducats, one hundred to be preſently payed, and the other two hundred by equal portions in two years next following; then, That the Merchants Goods ſhould be indifferently on both ſides reſtored; and laſtly, That ſuch places of the Venetians as the Turk was already poſſeſſed of, ſhould ſtill remain unto the Turks; but that ſuch Towns or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks Dominion, ſhould be again forthwith reſtored. For the firſt payment of the Mony the Turk was earneſt, thereby as by a fine for an offence committed, to make this League unto him more honourable.

1574. The Peace proclaimed at Venice.

This Peace at Conſtantinople concluded the eleventh day of February in the year 1574, was by the Decree of the Senate confirmed; and afterwards the 13 of April following ſolemnly proclaimed in Venice, to the great wonder of the other Confederates. For the better ſatisfying of whom, the Popes Nuntio, with the Embaſſador of Spain, were ſent for into the Senate Houſe. And although there were many things that grieved the Venetians, yet did they forbear all hard ſpeeches, and of that their moderation received ſo much the more honour, as it is more difficult for an angry Man to overcome himſelf, than others. The Duke with calm and temperate Speech, framed to the purpoſe, declared unto them, That Anger and Hope, two evil Counſellors, being ſet apart, he had concluded a Peace with the Turk; not for that he was deſirous of the Turks friendſhip, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the love he bare to the State, which was not only with loſs, but even with death it ſelf to be maintained. How he had been ſpoiled of the Kingdom of Cyprus, he further declared; and that the Venetian State grew every day weaker and weaker by the continual War; and that therefore, before it were by loſs upon loſs come to the uttermoſt of extremity, they not able to maintain ſo heavy a War, were to take ſome better courſe for the preſervation of that which was yet left of their Seigniory; for that the ſafety of the Venetian State ſhould at all times be a ſure fortreſs and defence of the Chriſtian Common-weal againſt all the furious attempts of the Enemy, and uncertain events of time.

The Fame of this ſuddain and unexpected Peace was for the juſt and common hatred of the Chriſtians againſt the Turks, generally evil taken; and the Venetians for the concluding thereof hardly ſpoken of, as if they had betrayed the whole Chriſtian Common-weal, or at leaſtwiſe their Confederates. For Men were for the moſt part of opinion, that the Turks Peace would be but feigned and deceitful; and that having gained time to ſet things in order, according to his deſire, he would for the natural grudge he bare unto the Chriſtians, come to his old courſe, and as he had always done, break the League and take up Arms. Some ſaid, That the Venetians forſaken of their Friends and Confederates, would in their own devices periſh; yet ſo, as that their deſtruction would turn to the general harm of all Chriſtendom; and theſe Men were of opinion, That in that caſe, and againſt that Enemy, a dangerous War was to be preferred before an uncertain and diſhonourable Peace. Nevertheleſs the Venetians, beſides that they for the preſent eaſed themſelves of many an heavy burthen, ſo have they thereby enjoyed the fruits of a long and happy Peace, and found the ſame unto their State both wholſome and profitable until this day. It was thought by the ſequel of matters, That Selymus was the more willing to have Peace with the Venetians, that he might the better recover the Kingdom of Tunes and the ſtrong Caſtle of Guletta from the Spaniards; who with the Knights of Malta now gaped more after Tripolis and the other Port-towns holden by the Turks upon the Coaſt of Barbary, than how to defend the Venetians their Confederates. Thus with the loſs of Cyprus and ſome part of the Venetian Territory in Dalmatia, ended the mortal and bloody War betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the Courſe whereof is well to be ſeen, what great matters the united Forces of the Chriſtian Princes were able to do againſt this moſt mighty Enemy, if all diſcord and contention ſet apart, they would in the quarrel of the Chriſtian Religion joyn with heart and hand againſt him, and fight the Battel of Chriſt Jeſus.

The Peace by experience found profitable unto the Venetians.

Selymus now at Peace with them who before moſt troubled him; to keep his Men of War buſied, ſhortly after converted his Forces againſt John Vayvod of Valachia, and ſo at length joyned all that Province to his Empire. This Country of Valachia was in ancient time called Dacia; it hath on the Eaſt the Euxine (now called the Black Sea) on the South the famous River Danubius, on the Weſt Tranſylvania, and on the North Ruſſia. It is divided into two parts, the one called Tranſalpina, and the other Moldavia (of the River Moldavus running through the midſt thereof) but far paſſing the other both in greatneſs and abundance of Paſture. That part called Tranſalpina, Mahomet ſirnamed the Great (who won Conſtantinople) made ſubject to the Turkiſh Empire; but upon Moldavia, the other part, he only impoſed a yearly Tribute of two thouſand Ducats. After which time the Vayvods of that Country, aided ſometime by the Hungarians, and ſometime by the Polonians, roſe up oftentimes againſt the Turks, and refuſed to do their homage. It chanced, that Bogdanus Vayvod of that Country, favouring the Polonians, and joyning in League with them, lived much in Ruſſia, as purpoſing from thence alſo to have taken his Wife. Which Selymus ſuſpecting, with a great power chaſed him into Exile, and placed in his ſtead one John (called of his Country-men Iwan, and of ſome Ivonia) the ſuppoſed Son of Stephanus ſometime Vayvod of that Country; who with *Jeremias Czarnieviecziu*s (a Moldavian, who afterward notably betrayed him) having of long time lived amongſt the Turks, to be the more gracious amongſt them, renounced his Faith, and being circumciſed, turned Turk; and following the trade of Merchandiſe, became, among them a Merchant of ſuch Fame, that he became very familiar and well acquainted with the great Baſſaes of the Court, and at length with Selymus himſelf. He underſtanding by his Friends near about the Turkiſh Emperor, of his purpoſe for the removing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Baſſaes, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayvod of Moldavia; ſtill encreaſing the ſuſpicion Selymus had conceived of Bogdanus, and telling him, That he ſupported by the Polonians, was like enough in ſhort time to reject his obedience to his Imperial Majeſty. Selymus at the inſtance of the Baſſaes nominated this John to be Vayvod, who with a great power of the Turks Horſemen entring into Moldavia, eaſily poſſeſſed himſelf of the Country, Bogdanus being then abſent in Ruſſia, and as then ſuſpecting no ſuch matter; who yet afterwards attempted in vain by the help of the Polonians to have again recovered his Country, but finding no poſſibility ſo to do, fled afterwards into Muſcovia, where he long time after lived.

John the Vayvod falleth into ſuſpicion with Selymus and the Baſſats of the Court.

John now quietly poſſeſſed of Moldavia, for ſome few years held the ſame with the good liking of the Turk, paying him his wonted Tribute; but afterwards repenting himſelf of his wicked revolt from the Chriſtian Faith, and now eftſoons again embracing the ſame, and (ignorant of his own Fortune) perſecuting with too much ſeverity thoſe which withſtood his coming into the Country, eſpecially ſuch great Men as took part with Bogdanus; and now after his return unto the Chriſtian Faith, not favouring the Turks as he was wont, but croſſing them in many matters, became ſuſpicious both unto Selymus and the Baſſaes his old Friends. Which the Vayvod of the leſſer Valachia (commonly called Valachia Tranſalpina) underſtanding, he became a ſuter unto the great Baſſaes of the Court for his Brother Peter, and earneſtly travelled with them, that as John ſupported by Selymus, had driven Bogdanus out of Moldavia, ſo Peter his Brother might in like manner by his help drive John out alſo. In which his Sute he ſpared for no coſt, neither ceaſed by malicious ſuggeſtions to encreaſe the ſuſpicion already conceived of John the Vayvod; who having rejected the Mahometan Religion, and again embraced the Chriſtian Faith, would (as he ſaid) in ſhort time, as had Bogdanus, joyn hands with the Polonians, and caſt off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whom he had been ſo highly promoted. Beſides that, this malicious Man offered, That his Brother Peter for ſuch his preferment, ſhould pay yearly unto Selymus twice ſo much more as did John, namely an hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats by the name of a Tribute.

The Baſſaes before corrupted, and moved with the greatneſs of the Tribute, perſwaded Selymus, by an Embaſſador to ſend for John the Vayvod, to come unto him himſelf in perſon, and to command him to give place to ſuch a Man as he ſhould ſend thither in his ſtead; which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce unto him open War. Hereunto Selymus, who had even then much emptied his Coffers with the loſs of his Fleet in the Battel of Lepanto, and the chargeable Wars againſt the Venetians, was eaſily induced; and to that purpoſe ſent his Embaſſador to the Vayvod; who having audience the one and twentieth of February, at the ſame time that Henry Valoys (afterwards the French King) was crowned at Cracovia, delivered his Meſſage as followeth:

Selymus the Great Emperor of the Turks ſendeth me unto thee, John, Vayvod of Valachia, his Tributary; with this Command, (whereunto his pleaſure is, that thou ſhouldeſt without delay ſend him anſwer:) firſt, He chargeth thee to ſend him not ſuch a Tribute as he was wont, but twice ſo much more, to wit, an hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats. If thou ſhalt refuſe ſo to do, there is another ready to give it both for himſelf and his poſterity. But Selymus mindful of thy Conſtancy, Fidelity, and Valour, will not be troubleſome unto thee in thy Government, if thou forthwith ſend the aforeſaid Tribute. Which if thou ſhalt refuſe to do, then his will is that thou ſhouldſt give place to another, and thy ſelf return with me to Conſtantinople, there to anſwer the matter; otherwiſe, I am in his Name to denounce all hoſtility and the calamities of War both unto thee and thy Country.

This proud Meſſage of the Embaſſador ſtruck farther into the mind of the Vayvod than any would have thought; yet diſſembling his grief, he commanded him to be brought to the Lodging appointed for him; telling him, That in a matter of ſo great importance, and ſo much concerning the whole State of his Country, he could not give him ſo preſent Anſwer as he required; but that upon mature deliberation had with his Nobility and Council, he would in ſhort time anſwer him accordingly. The Embaſſador being gon to his Lodging, the Vayvod forthwith began deeply to conſider of Selymus his demands; and that in the Turks Faith was no aſſurance, which he kept or brake with the Chriſtian Princes as beſt fitted his own turn; and beſides that, That if he ſhould grant to pay that ſo great and heavy a Tribute in ſo great poverty of his Kingdom, ſore waſted with civil War, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, ſo long as any Man would give him more, but happily would the next year exact a greater, and in the end ſuch an one as he with all his Subjects ſhould not be able to pay; which it ſhould not be ſafe for him at any time to refuſe, ſo long as any Man would give it. Wherefore calling together the Nobility and States of his Country, he brake with them in this ſort:

The Speech of the Vayvod unto his Nobility and Subjects.

If ever you were to conſult and deliberate of a moſt important and difficult matter, this verily is that time; for Selymus the Turkiſh Emperor, enflamed with enſatiable Avarice, and I know not by whoſe perſwaſion, not contented with his wonted Tribute, exacteth of us twice ſo much more. If you ſhall grant it, it ſhall not much concern me, as not to be payed by me your Sovereign, but by your ſelves and your poſterity; if we deny it, forthwith he denounceth unto us Fire and Sword, with all the calamities of War. And in this bareneſs of our Kingdom, almoſt ſpoiled by Civil Wars, how ſhall we be able to pay it him? Wherefore declare your minds. Verily I foreſee, that if you ſhall in this yield unto Selymus, and grant him ſo great a Tribute, he will not therewith long hold himſelf contented, but every year extort a greater, until he have altogether eaten us up. Wherefore it were better for us (in mine opinion) to loſe our lives together with our Wives and Children, than to ſuffer ſo great an indignity; neither is it mine own Eſtate that troubleth me; for why, it is you that are to pay it, and not I. Wherefore if you liſt not to endure this ſo diſhonourable and baſe a ſervitude, let me forthwith ſo underſtand from you; and I will for my part ſo provide, as that I will not only not pay unto the barbarous Tyrant the new and heavy Tribute he demandeth, but not ſo much as any Tribute at all; ſo that you be not wanting both to your ſelves and me. I know right well (beloved and Fellows in Arms) what I owe both unto you and the Common-weal, for whoſe good and welfare I am always ready to lay down my Life.

He had no ſooner thus ſaid, but that a ſecret ſorrow and unwonted ſilence had as it were oppreſſed the whole Aſſembly. At length, as Men awaked out of an heavy and dead Sleep, they murmured among themſelves, that the Turkiſh Emperor ſhould ſo without reaſon oppreſs them, with doubling and redoubling of his Tribute; and were generally of opinion, That the Vayvod had not ſo plainly as truly ſpoken of the intollerableneſs thereof; and that therefore they had rather die, than to endure ſo great diſhonour, joyned with ſo foul a ſlavery. And thereupon offered unto the Vayvod to ſerve upon their own charge, and with him upon the Bank of Danubius to meet the proud Enemy, and there in defence of their Lives and Liberty, to fight it out unto the laſt Man. The Vayvod in few words commending their fidelity, and taking of them an Oath for the faithful performance of that they had ſo reſolutely promiſed, ſent for the Turks Embaſſador, and gave him this ſhort anſwer:

The anſwer of the Vayvod unto the Turks Embaſſador.

I, for the ancient Fidelity and Allegeance which I owe unto my Lord and dread Sovereign, the mighty Emperor Selymus, would willingly yield unto him the Tribute he requireth, were it not that I know the minds of my People to abhor the ſame; wiſhing rather to endure all calamities, hap whatſoever hap may, than to yield unto ſo diſhonourable and ſhameful ſlavery. Wherefore ſithence I cannot by any means extort the ſame from my Subjects, tell my Lord Selymus, That I moſt humbly requeſt him, not to take the ſame in evil part; whoſe amity I wiſh to be unto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than diſgarce or hinderance. And that upon that good hope I both asked, and for my ſingular Fidelity obtained of him the Vayvodſhip of Moldavia; which my good hope I moſt heartily beſeech him may not deceive me.

With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the Embaſſador unrewarded, and with a ſafe convoy brought him to the Bank of Danubius; which his homely uſage of the Embaſſador, cauſed him not a little to be ſuſpected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The Embaſſador ſent away, the Vayvod not ignorant of the ſuddain invaſions of the Turks, forthwith began to raiſe his Army; and at the ſame time, ſent Embaſſadors unto Henry King of Polonia his neareſt Neighbor, certifying him of the dangerous ſtate of Moldavia, the ſureſt Bulwark of the Polonian Kingdom, which once overthrown, opened a fair and eaſie way for the common Enemy into Polonia; and therefore requeſted him, that as the Kings of Polonia had of ancient time, even for the ſafety of their own State, protected that Country; ſo it would pleaſe him now in like manner in ſo dangerous a time, to give him aid; or at leaſtwiſe to give leave unto ſuch of his Subjects as were willing to ſerve for entertainment, to come unto him, whom he would with all honour and bounty uſe according to their place and quality. Whereunto the King anſwered, That foraſmuch as he and his predeceſſors the Kings of Polonia, had for the ſpace of more than an hundred years been in League with the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, he could not either ſend him aid, or yet give leave unto any of his Subjects to ſerve againſt the Turk, as he deſired. With this anſwer the Vayvod was much troubled, as there deceived where he moſt hoped for relief; yet hearing of certain Companies of the Polonian Coſſacks, which having long lien in hope of prey upon the ſide of the great River Boryſthenes, were returning empty home, he by fit Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, offered them great entertainment to ſerve him in his Wars againſt the Turk; of which his offer, they (as Men living for moſt part by ſervice) gladly accepted; and ſo without the knowledge of the King went unto him, to the number of twelve hundred, with their Captains Men of great Courage and Valour, of whom Sujercevius was chief; who were by the Vayvod honourably entertained, and did him in theſe Wars right worthy ſervice. Theſe Coſſacks are light Horſemen, lying moſt commonly upon the Borders of the Polonian Kingdom towards the Tartars; an hardy and valiant kind of Men, whoſe beſt living, is the ſpoil they take from the Enemy; and their beſt Lands, their Horſe and Launce. For albeit that the Turks and Tartars are moſt commonly in League with the Polonians, and ſeem never ſo deſirous of Peace; yet do they oftentimes in great numbers, upon the ſuddain break into the Countries of Podolia, and Ruſſia, part of the Polonian Kingdom, and there do great harm, if they be not in time repreſſed or cut off by the aforeſaid light Horſemen, who for that purpoſe lie always in wait for them, as doth the Hawk for the prey.

The Vayvod entertaineth the Polonian Coſſacks.

Selymus ſendeth his Forces againſt the Vayvod.

Selymus underſtanding the anſwer of John the Vayvod, was therewith exceedingly enraged, and the more by the bitter complaint of the Embaſſador, who angry with the Vayvod, that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, ſpared not to the uttermoſt of his power, to incenſe the angry Emperor againſt him, as if his Honour had been in the perſon of himſelf contemned and violated. Wherefore without delay, he ſent thirty thouſand Turks, and two thouſand Hungarians unto the Palatine of Valachia Tranſalpina, that joyning thoſe Forces to his own, he might take John the Vayvod, and ſending him in Bonds to Conſtantinople, to place Peter his Brother, Vayvod in his place. The Palatine glad of this command, and having raiſed his own power, together with the Turks and the Hungarians, ſwam over the River Moldavus, having in his Army about an hundred and two thouſand fighting Men; a power, not only ſufficient to have driven the Vayvod out of Moldavia, but alſo to have ſhaken a right puiſſant King in his Kingdom. The Palatine in the midſt of ſo great a ſtrength, little fearing, and leſs regarding the ſuddain coming of the Vayvod, ſuffered his Men with their Horſes to lie diſorderedly here and there, diſperſed in the large Meadows and Paſtures all alongſt the fair River ſide; ſo the better to refreſh themſelves, weary of their long travel. In the mean time certain Scouts came to the Vayvod then at Dinner, certifying him, that the Enemy with an huge Army (the certain number whereof they could not well deſcry) was come over the River; and now reſting themſelves, had turned off their Horſes into the rich Meadows thereabout, in ſuch diſordered and careleſs manner, as that they might with a ſmall power be eaſily overthrown. The Vayvod glad of this news, forthwith ſent before Sujercevius with his Coſſacks, and 5000 other light Horſemen, more certainly to deſcry what the Enemy did, with the manner of his lying; and he himſelf with the reſt of his Army followed fair and ſoftly after. Sujercevius with great ſilence approaching the Enemies Camp, ſuddainly light upon the Enemies Scouts, in number about 500; who encloſed before they were aware; were taken every Man by the Coſſacks, and by them ſtraightly examined of the ſtate of their Army and Camp. Who for ſafegard of their Lives now in the Enemies power, frankly confeſſed, how that the Palatine lay ſecurely there by, reſting his Army, not ſo much for the refreſhing thereof after his Travel, as with greater ſtrength to ſet upon the Vayvod with his freſh Souldiers; and that in the Army were about ſeventy thouſand Valachians, thirty thouſand Turks, and three thouſand Hungarians; who now diſperſed, and ſleeping in ſecurity, might eaſily be overthrown. Of all theſe things Sujercevius advertiſeth the Vayvod vod; requeſting him with all poſſible ſpeed to haſten his coming, for the obtaining of a moſt notable and aſſured Victory; he in the mean time lying cloſe with his Men not far from the Enemy. The Vayvod certified of all theſe things, came without delay, and forthwith commanded Sujercevius with his Men to give the onſet upon the Enemy; purpoſing himſelf with the reſt of his Army on the other ſide, to charge the diſordered Camp in three places. Sujercevius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcry, ſuddainly ſet upon the ſecure Enemies; who diſmaid with the ſuddainneſs of the unexpect danger, ſtood as Men aſtoniſhed, not knowing which way to flie, or how to make reſiſtance. But whiles Sujercevius with his light Horſemen thus on the one ſide filled the Camp with tumult, terror, ſlaughter, and fear; behold, even as a ſuddain Tempeſt, cometh the Vayvod, bearing all the diſordered Camp down before him; neither had the Enemies any means to flie, having put their Horſes a great way off from them into the rich Paſtures; but there taken unarmed, were miſerably ſlain. In all the Camp was lamentation and mourning, Death raging in every place with ſuch fury, that of ſo great an Army as of late paſſed the River, few or none eſcaped, more than the Palatine with Peter his Brother, who by great chance with much ado getting Horſes, ſwam over the River, and ſo came to the Caſtle of Brailovia in Valachia; all the reſt were ſlain, and left to be of the Beaſts of the Field, and Birds of the Air devoured. It was a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſee the ground covered with the Bodies of the dead, all ſtained with gore Blood, and their Weapons of all ſorts lying by them. In the Camp were found great Riches, all which the Vayvod gave unto his Souldiers, and there ſtaied four days to refreſh his wearied Men. After that, he with his victorious Army entred into Valachia, the Palatines Country, where he took many Caſtles and Towns, and put to the Sword all that came in his way, Men, Women, and Children, without reſpect of Age or Sex; and burnt all the Country Towns and Villages before him as he went; ſo that all that part of the Country of Valachia Tranſalpina, was covered with Smoke and Fire, to the terror of the Beholders. The aged Fathers were in every place drawn forth to ſlaughter, the young Babes were cut in pieces, the Matrons and Virgins defiled, and afterwards ſlain; and in brief all the Cruelty that could be deviſed, performed; in the bloody execution whereof, the Vayvod commended his Men, perſwading them in like manner ſtill to proſecute the Victory, and that the reſt of their labours was all but for prey and booty, for the enriching of themſelves. In this havock of all things, it was told him, That the Palatine with his Brother Peter, the Men whom he moſt ſought after, were in the Caſtle of Brailovia not far off; whereupon he forthwith marched thither with his Army. The City of Brailovia ſtandeth upon the River Danubius, and had in it a Caſtle of ſome good ſtrength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a ſtrong Garriſon of the Turks, which Selymus had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the Key of the Country; not far from this City the Vayvod encamping his Army, writ unto the Captain of the Caſtle, forthwith to deliver unto him the Palatine, with Peter his Brother, his mortal Enemies; who never wronged by him, had invaded his Country, and ſought after his life, and being overthrown in Battel, were fled unto him; which if he ſhould refuſe to do, he threatned never to depart thence, until he had to his further harm, conſtrained him by force to yield them. Theſe Letters he ſent by two Valachian Captives, to be delivered unto the Captain of the Caſtle; whereunto he returned anſwer by four Turks, two of the City, and two of his own Servants, by whom he alſo ſent ten great Shot, and as many ſmall, with two Turkiſh Arrows, and this Meſſage.

The Palatine with the Turks overthrown by the Vayvod.

The blunt anſwer of the Captain to the Vayvod.

For that I know thee to be the Servant of my dread Sovereign Selymus, I regard thee; and will not deny the ſame Men to be with me, whom thou ſo much requireſt. But foraſmuch as I underſtand, that thou of late haſt ſlain a great number of the Servants of the great Emperor, who by his commandment were bringing Peter the Brother of the Palatine into Moldavia: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raiſe thy Siege, I will feed thee and thy Followers, with ſuch Diſhes as theſe; whereupon thou and thine Army gorged to the full, ſhall all afterwards dangerouſly ſurfeit and caſt. Farewel.

Barbarous Cruelty.

This rough anſwer ſo much moved the Vayvod, that he commanded hands to be laid upon the aforeſaid four Meſſengers; and their Noſes, Lips, and Ears, being cut off, both their Feet to be with great Nails faſt nailed unto a long piece of Timber, and ſo with their Heads hanging downward, to be ſet up before the City, and ſo left for the Captain and the Citiſens to gaze upon. Signifying withal unto the Captain that ſent them, that he himſelf with the other Fugitives his Gueſts, ſhould in like manner be ſerved, if they fell into his hands. Immediately after, he aſſaulted the City, and uſing the chearfulneſs of his Souldiers, by plain force took the ſame, the Defendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great ſlaughter of the Turks, whereas no Man was taken to mercy; the very Babes were ſlain, together with their Mothers, and Blood ran like Rivers into the Danubius. For the ſpace of four days this bloody execution indured; no place ſerved for refuge, even the moſt ſecret and obſcure places were ſearched, and the poor Creatures there found, drawn forth and ſlain. The fury was ſo great, that no living thing, no not ſo much as the very Dogs were ſpared. Much Gold, Silver, Plate, Jewels, and other rich Spoil was there found, all which became a prey unto the greedy Souldiers; for that City was of all others in thoſe Quarters the richeſt, as a place much frequented, and enjoying long Peace, as after ſuch time the Turks were fully poſſeſſed of Græcia, not being troubled with any Wars; until now, that it way by the Vayvod firſt ranſackt, and afterwards raſed down to the ground, and nothing thereof left ſtanding, more than the bare Caſtle it ſelf; which the Vayvod durſt not adventure upon, for that it was well fortified, and furniſhed with ſo ſtrong a Garriſon, as that it could not without great loſs be taken.

The City of Brailovia taken by Vayvod and raſed to the ground.

The Turks again overthrown by the Vayvod.

Whiles the Vayvod was thus buſied in the ſpoil of Brailovia, news was brought unto him of the coming of fifteen thouſand Turks to the relief of the Caſtle; againſt whom he forthwith ſent Sujercevius with his Coſſacks, and other eight thouſand Moldavian Horſemen; who ſuddainly coming upon the Turks, diſordered and fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew almoſt 14000 of them, and chaſed the reſt unto the Caſtle of Teina. Of this Victory Sujercevius in all haſt certified the Vayvod; and withal, that there was another great power of the Turks coming, which might eaſily be alſo overthrown, if he leaving the Siege of the Caſtle of Brailovia, would without delay come and joyn his Forces with his. He glad of that news, and well perceiving how difficult and dangerous that Siege would be unto him, roſe forthwith with his Army, and went to Sujercevius; and afterwards upon conference had with him, laid Siege to Teina; which City taken without much labour, he put to ſword all the People found therein, not leaving one alive; and by the ſervice of Sujercevius overthrew the Turks coming towards Brailovia.

Selymus in doubt to have been thruſt out of Valachia by the Vayvod.

Selymus in the mean time much troubled with the proceedings of the Vayvod, and doubting to be quite thruſt out of Valachia Tranſalpina (which he was like enough to have been, had not the Treaſon of Czarnieviche hindred the matter) prepared new Forces for that ſervice; and after the manner of the Turks in time of their greateſt diſtreſs, appointed general Supplications and Prayers to be made unto his Prophet Mahomet, for the better ſucceſs of his Wars; the undoubted ſign of his Fear.

The Vayvod after ſo many Victories againſt the Turks, purpoſing for a while to break up his great Army, called unto him his old Friend Jeremias Czarnieviche, unto whom, as unto the Man he of all others moſt truſted, he had reſolved to commit the charge, with part of his Army, to keep the Turks from paſſing again over the River Danubius into his Country; and in delivering to him his Charge, ſpake unto him as followeth:

The kind Speech of the Vayvod to Czarnieviche.

Sith Fortune hath hitherto anſwered our deſires (worthy Czarnieviche*) with moſt rare and perpetual ſucceſs againſt the Turks, our moſt cruel Enemies, we are thankfully to take the ſame, and to render moſt humble and hearty thanks unto Almighty God, that it hath pleaſed him, the Author of all Victory, ſo to have proſpered our endeavours againſt theſe fierce and devouring Enemies. Now what remaineth for the preſent, but to disband mine Army, wearied with labour and travel, and to give my Souldiers leave to depart home to reſt themſelves, that ſo I may as occaſion ſhall require again uſe their freſh Forces for our better ſervice; you in the mean time with thirteen thouſand of my ſelect Souldiers, ſhall lie upon the ſide of* Danubius, to keep the Turks from paſſing the River. Have good regard I pray you, unto this your charge, which I upon an eſpecial truſt, grounded upon your ancient love and fidelity, have at this time impoſed upon you. And let me from time to time with all expedition underſtand from you of every motion of the Enemy, that ſo we may in due time provide for him accordingly.

And ſo in token of his greater favour, taking his leave of him with a Kiſs (as the manner of thoſe People is) gave leave unto the greateſt part of his Souldiers to depart home, yet with this charge, to be always in readineſs whenſoever they ſhould be called upon.

Czarnieviche having received his Charge, and promiſing unto the Vayvod the uttermoſt of his faithful devoir, went towards Danubius, and there moſt carefully kept the paſſages with continual watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come down to the other ſide of the River, and more were ſtill coming, yet none of them was ſo hardy as to adventure the great River; Czarnieviche with his Horſemen lying in the faces of them, ready to receive them on the other ſide. Which the Baſſa whom Selymus had ſent with his Army, perceiving, ſent certain Men pickt out for the purpoſe, to Czarnieviche, to ſound him, if he might by any means be drawn to come over, in ſecret to talk with him; and the more to move him, beſide his conduct for his ſafety, ſent him by the ſame Meſſengers thirty thouſand Hungarian Ducats for a Preſent. With which ſo fair a Bait Czarnieviche allured, received the Mony, and faithfully promiſed to come; and ſo ſhortly after, ſecretly paſſing over the River, had conference with Peter the Palatines Brother, who then lay on the further ſide of Danubius, with a great power of the Turks. In this conference, Peter declared unto him in how great danger the Vayvod ſtood, and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his Tributary and Vaſſal ſhould work the deſtruction of his ſo great Armies; which his heavy diſpleaſure he could no otherwiſe ſatisfie but with his head; and that therefore he ſhould no longer rule in Moldavia, for that Government was by the great Emperor given unto him. Wherefore (ſaid he) if thou be wiſe, whilſt it is yet in thy power, gain the good will of Selymus by ſome good deſert; for an eaſie matter it is to begin any War, but an hard matter to end the ſame. Foraſmuch as it is not always in the ſame Mans power to begin Wars, and at his pleaſure to make an end. Every Fool may when he liſt enter into Arms, but muſt lay the ſame down when it pleaſeth the Conqueror. Now you have a fair opportunity, and it is in your own power to procure his friendſhip for ever, better ſtanding with your Affairs than War. And albeit you may hope well of the power of the Vayvod, yet wiſdom would not, that you ſhould prefer uncertainties before things certain; you have now received 30000 Ducats, the earneſt of your further deſerts; which ſhall hereafter have alſo their due rewards in moſt full and bountiful meaſure. Wherefore if you will do your ſelf good, and provide both for your ſafety and preferment, confound not your own good Fortune, with the broken and deſperate ſtate of the Vayvod, but ſuffer the Turks to paſs as Friends over the River of Danubius; for I am come (ſaid he) with a great and puiſſant Army from the mighty Selymus, to take upon me the Government of Moldavia, and to ſend the Vayvod in Bonds to Conſtantinople; and of me, being once Vayvod, what is it that for ſo great deſert thou and thine may not aſk and obtain? Wherefore I pray thee conceal the coming of the Turks, and withdraw thy ſelf from the River; ſo ſhall we paſſing over the River with our populous Army, eaſily oppreſs the Vayvod with all his power, and at once revenge all the former injuries and diſgraces done both unto Selymus and us.

Czarnieviche hath ſecret conference with Peter the Palatines Brother, who cunningly perſwadeth him to give the Turks paſſage.

Czarnieviche corrupted, giveth the Turks leave quietly to paſs over the River of Danubius.

With greedy Men what will not the foul deſire of Gold work? Czarnieviche overcome with the golden Promiſes of Peter; and forgetful of his Faith before given unto the Vayvod, yielded unto all he requeſted; and drawing his Forces further off from the River, as if it had been for his more ſafety, gave the Turks free paſſage. There was then in the Turks Army two hundred thouſand Men, well appointed, and furniſhed with great Ordnance and all other things neceſſary, both for the Field and for Siege, who by the ſufferance of the falſe Traitor paſſed quietly over the River. Czarnieviche forthwith poſting to the Vayvod, certified him, how that the Turks truſting to their multitude, had paſſed the River of Danubius, againſt whom he was not able (as he ſaid) to make head; and that therefore he ſhould do well, without delay to go againſt them with ſuch Forces as he had then in a readineſs; which joyned unto his, might eaſily overthrow them. Glad was the Vayvod of this news, and filled with the hope of good ſucceſs, demanded of him what ſtrength the Enemy might be of? They are (ſaid he) not not much above twelve thouſand that be already come over, but are ſtill coming more and more, and will before your coming thither be above fifteen thouſand.

The Vayvod lay then at the Siege of the Caſtle of Teina (having before taken the City) but hearing this news, raiſed his Siege, and ſo in four days came and encamped within three miles of the Enemy; and forthwith ſent forth Sujercevius with his Coſſacks, and Jeremias General of the Horſemen, with ſix thouſand Horſe, to take view of the Enemies Enemies Camp, and to underſtand what might be of their deſigns. Theſe two Captains marching together, chanced to fall upon the Turks Scouts, in number about ſix thouſand Horſemen, with whom they had a light ſkirmiſh, and in ſhort time put them to flight. Of theſe Scouts they took one, and him grievouſly wounded; who being examined of the ſtrength of the Enemy, and feeling himſelf wounded to death, told them diſſemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Coſſacks doubting of the truth of that report, and probably conjecturing by ſo great a number of Scouts, that the Enemy was of far greater ſtrength than was ſuppoſed or reported; quickly certified the Vayvod thereof, wiſhing him in time to provide for the ſafety of himſelf and his Army, and not too much to truſt Czarnieviche, whom they had a good while before ſuſpected. But the Vayvod nothing doubting of the Faith of him whom he had a long time found moſt faithful in the time of his hardeſt diſtreſs, and uſed as a moſt truſty Companion in all his Travels, anſwered nothing, but that he knew whom he truſted; and that it was not now time to ſtand in doubt, or to be afraid, and that he would ere long come and take view of the Enemies Camp himſelf; for that he was not come ſo far to flie, but to fight in defence of his Country and Subjects, even to the laſt gaſp. And ſo fortifying his Camp near unto a Lake that runneth out of Danubius (for the more convenient watering of his Army) he ſet forward with all his power againſt the Enemy.

Near unto the Enemies Camp was an high Hill, from whence the Vayvod had thought to have deſcried the number of them, with the manner of their lying; but coming thither, he could deſcry nothing but four Companies of Scouts a far off, one Company from another; who alſo upon the ſight of the Moldavians withdrew themſelves of purpoſe out of ſight unto the Army, which then lay in a low Valley behind an Hill, not to be diſcovered until a Man were almoſt upon it. The Vayvod ſuſpecting the Enemy to be at hand, divided his Horſemen, in number 30000, into 30 Companies, and placing before every Company certain Field-Pieces, ſo marched ready to give Battel. His Footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of People, but unto him of all others moſt faithful, and armed with ſuch Country Weapons as they had, he placed by themſelves. So marching on, he came to another Hill, from whence he might not far off eaſily deſcry the huge Army of the Enemy, and how he had been by the Treaſon of Czarnieviche deceived; whereupon he preſently ſent for him; who ſent him word back again, That he could not now come, the Enemy being ſo nigh at hand, but that he ſhould forthwith ſee him in the Field as forward as the forwardeſt againſt the Enemy. Czarnieviche had then under his command 13000 of the moſt choice Souldiers in the Army; who upon the ſignal of Battel on both ſides given (for the Turks were now alſo ready) firſt according to his promiſe ſet forward, as if it had been to have given the onſet; but being come near unto the Enemy, forthwih (as he had before agreed) cauſed his Enſign to be let fall, and his Men with their Caps upon the points of their Spears and Swords, in token of their voluntary yielding and ſubmiſſion, to bow down their Heads and Bodies; whom the Turks with their Spears and Lances holden upon high, joyfully received as their Friends, or rather as Men taken to mercy. The reſt of the Army almoſt diſcouraged with this ſo ſuddain a revolt of ſo great a Man, retired in haſt to the Vayvod, crying out unto him, That all was loſt. But he nothing diſcouraged therewith (as a moſt reſolute Man in the moſt ſuddain dangers) with comfortable words cheared them up, willing them as couragious Men to follow him againſt the Enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which always gave not the Victory. The Turks perceiving the Moldavians lately revolted, upon the joyning of the Battel (as Men in Conſcience wounded) to ſhrink back, thruſt them perforce into the head of their Battel, making of them no more account, but to blunt the Enemies Swords; and ſuch as hung back, they themſelves ſlew; upon whom as falſe Traitors the Vayvod cauſed his Field-Pieces to be moſt furiouſly diſcharged; ſo that moſt part of theſe treacherous Men there ſlain, ſome by the Turks, ſome by their own Friends, received the juſt reward of their Infidelity and Treaſon, accompanied with perpetual Infamy. Over the dead Bodies of theſe Traitors the Turks coming on, were at the firſt notably encountred by the Moldavians; and after a moſt cruel Fight, as if they had been diſcouraged, began to retire, but indeed of purpoſe to have drawn the Chriſtians before they were aware, within the danger of their great Ordnance, and Ambuſhes, which they had before aptly and covertly placed for that purpoſe. Which Sujercevius well acquainted with the Turks fineneſs, perceiving, with much ado ſtaid their further purſuit, and ſo avoided the danger prepared for them. The Turks deceived of their expectation, came on again afreſh, with no leſs fury than at the firſt; whom the Chriſtians right valiantly received, and made with them a moſt cruel and mortal Battel; wherein many both of the Turks and Chriſtians fell, and never roſe again. But what was ſo ſmall a power againſt ſuch a world of Men? After long Fight, the Moldavians oppreſſed with the multitude of their Enemies, began to give ground; and ſeeing no other remedy, but either to flie or to die, betook themſelves to flight, wherein moſt part of them were ſlain, the furious Enemy ſtill hardly purſuing them at the Heels; of the Coſſacks were left only 250. The Horſemen (the chiefeſt ſtrength of the Vayvod) thus by the Treaſon of Czarnieviche overthrown, the Vayvod with 20000 Footmen, and ſuch Horſemen as had now after the Battel joyned themſelves unto the Footmen, retired unto a Town not far off, which he but a little before had raſed; but was now glad in the ruins thereof to fortifie himſelf againſt the ſuddain and furious Aſſaults of the Turks; who the ſame night ſo beſet the Vayvods Camp with ſuch a multitude of Men, that no Man could go in or out of the Camp; or the uttermoſt part of that huge Army be from any place deſcried.

Czarnieviche revolteth unto the Turks.

Traitors juſtly rewarded.

The Battel betwixt the Turks and the Moldavians.

The Moldavians overthrown.

The Vayvod having fortified himſelf within the ruins of an old Town is beſieged by the Turks.

The next day (which was the 11 of June) the Turks ſhot divers great Shot into the Vayvods Camp, but to ſmall purpoſe; for the Chriſtians had (for ſo ſhort a time) notably fortified themſelves within the ruins of the old Town. Which the Turks well perceiving, and withal conſidering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to aſſault the Vayvod in his ſtrength, they ſent Meſſengers unto him, to perſwade him without delay to yield himſelf, and to repoſe more truſt in the mercy of the Turks, than in his own broken Forces; eſpecially in his ſo hard diſtreſs, being ſo beſet, as that he could not poſſibly eſcape; and out of hope of all relief; and therefore ſhould by ſuch voluntary yielding, ſeek for grace of his Enemies, rather than by a deſperate obſtinacy to caſt himſelf into a moſt certain deſtruction, where no mercy was to be expected. Whereunto the Vayvod anſwered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the Treaſon of Czarnieviche and his Followers, than by the Valour of the Enemy; yet had left with him a ſtrong power of moſt valiant and reſolute Men, who would in his quarrel and defence of themſelves, ſell their lives very dear unto the Turks; nevertheleſs, that to avoid the farther effuſion of blood, he could for his part be content to yield unto his hard fortune, ſo that the great Commanders of the Turks Army would condeſcend unto ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould propound, and for the performance thereof give him their Faith,not once or twice,but ſeven times by ſolemn Oath to be taken. Of this his offer the Turks accepted, willing him to ſet down the conditions; which were, Firſt, that the Polonian Coſſacks might in ſafety depart into their Country, with their Horſes and Armor; then, that they ſhould without any violence offered to his perſon, ſend him alive and in good ſafety unto the great Emperor Selymus, before him to anſwer his own cauſe; as for the Moldavians, he ſaid he needed not to covenant any thing, for that the injury offered unto them tended alſo to the hurt of the Emperor himſelf, and of him whom he ſhould appoint Vayvod, whoſe Subjects they were. Theſe conditions (as reaſonable) were well liked of the Turks, and ſo according to his deſire, confirmed ſeven times by the ſolemn Oath of every Captain and Commander in the Army,both for themſelves and their followers. Upon this agreement, the Vayvod brought all his Army out of their Trenches wherein they had lien ſtrongly encamped,and there with heavy heart took his laſt leave of his Souldiers, to the general grief of them all; amongſt whom he divided ſuch Mony and Jewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindneſs. And there in the ſight of them all diſarming himſelf, accompanied only with Oſmolius a Polonian, went in manner of a ſuppliant to the Turks Camp, where he had full four hours Talk with the great Commanders of the Army; until that at laſt Capucius Baſſa (either offended with his Speech, or unmindful of his Faith, before given) with his Scimitar upon the ſuddain ſtruck him a great blow overthwart his Face, and another croſs the Belly; whom ſo wounded, and as yet but half dead, the Janizaries took and cut off his Head; which was forthwith ſet up upon a Lance, for all Men to behold. His dead Body they bound by the Feet unto two Camels, and ſo ſhamefully tore it in pieces; and happy was he that could get any little piece thereof, or embrue his Sword with the leaſt drop of his Blood. This was the lamentable and woful end of John the Vayvod of Moldavia, a right valiant and worthy Man, ſhamefully murdred by the perfidious Turks; who had he been more conſtant in the Chriſtian Faith, had not happily fallen into ſo great miſery. Whoſe woful fall may ſerve as a moſt notable example of the uncertainty of theſe worldly things; for as no Man for a time had of the Turks more or more glorious Victories, ſo in the end, and as it were in demonſtration of Mans fragility, no Man periſhed more miſerably. The Vayvod thus perfidiouſly murthred, the Turks with like Treachery forthwith ſet upon the Moldavians, and ſlew them down right as Beaſts appointed for the ſlaughter. Which the Coſſacks beholding, and hoping for no better meaſure, thruſt themſelves into the thickeſt of their Enemies, and there valiantly fighting were all ſlain, except ſome few of the better ſort reſerved for ranſome,among whom was Sujercevius with ſome other Captains; who were afterwards for great ſums redeemed, when as they could by no means be perſwaded to forſake their Religion and turn Turk.

The Vayvod ſhamefully and perfidiouſly murthred by the Turks.

All Valachia made ſubject to the Turks.

After this Victory and ſhameful Murder of the Vayvod, the Turks overran all Moldavia, and put to the Sword all the Nobility of that Country, with many of the Country people; of whom they alſo as their manner is in Countries new conquered, ſent great numbers in Colonies into the farther parts of the Turkiſh Empire; and for the more aſſured poſſeſſion thereof, placed ſtrong Garriſons in every Town and Caſtle, as they thought it moſt convenient. Thus all Valachia (both the higher and the lower) fell into the Turks hands in the year 1574, and was by Selymus joyned unto the Turkiſh Empire, none of the leaſt things by him done; for beſide the gaining of ſo great a Country (the moſt aſſured Bulwark of Polonia) he hath thereby opened a fair and eaſie way for his Succeſſors, at their pleaſure to enter into Podolia, or Ruſſia, parts of the Polonian Kingdom, yea and into Polonia it ſelf; which they will undoubtedly in time do, if God in mercy bridle not their immoderate deſires, and with his mighty hand protect the dangerous ſtate of that Kingdom.

The loſs of Moldavia dangerous to Polonia.

Selymus at the ſame time,not a little grieved with the loſs of the Kingdom of Tunes, and that Don John had there done the year before; began forthwith to caſt in his mind, how he might again recover the ſame, and withal, thruſt the Spaniards out of the ſtrong Caſtle of Guletta; which they had now almoſt forty years kept, ever ſince that it was by Charles the Fifth, taken from Barbaruſſa in the year 1535; for he well ſaw it to be a matter of no ſmall moment, to whom that ſtrong Fortreſs (ſtanding ſo commodiouſly in the Frontiers of Africk) belonged. There was (and ſtill is) upon that Coaſt divers of the Turks Adventurers, which living altogether upon ſpoil, had to that place ſafe recourſe, as to a moſt aſſured refuge; and if no Booty were to be met with thereabout,then would they run out towards Malta, Sardinia, Sicilia, and the other Iſlands thereabouts; yea oftentimes into Italy and Spain, and from thence carried away with them great booties both of Men and Cattel, and whatſoever thing elſe came in their way; for which cauſe many of the Turks Men of War reſorted thither in hope of purchaſe. But after that Guletta was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards, they were not only deprived of that ſo commodious an Harbor, but many times intercepted even by them of that place, and by the Gallies of Malta; which two places ſerved as two moſt ſure Bulwarks againſt the Turks and Moors Adventurers, by whoſe means they many times came ſhort home. For which cauſe the Turks, eſpecially theſe Pyrats (of whom the Turk maketh great account, as not his leaſt ſtrength at Sea) wonderfully deſired to have both thoſe ſtrong places gotten out of the hands of the Chriſtians. In the Caſtle of Guletta was continually a ſtrong Garriſon of a thouſand Spaniards, who kept them of Tunes in great ſubjection, and oftentimes cut ſhort theſe Pyrats and Rovers, who much troubled thoſe Seas. Wherefore the Turkiſh Emperor Selymus, having made great preparation both for Sea and Land Service,commanded Sinan, Pial, and Uluzales, his chief Baſſaes, and Men of great experience, with all ſpeed to paſs over with his Fleet into Africk, to beſiege Tunes and Guletta. Who when they had put all things in readineſs according as they had in charge, ſet forward, and with 300 ſail of Gallies came before Guletta the 13 day of July; whether alſo reſorted unto them other the Turks Men of War from Alexandria, Algiers,and other places, in ſuch number, as that all that Coaſt ſeemed to be covered with ſhipping. The Turks at their firſt arrival laid Siege to the Water Town, wherein were 800 Souldiers well provided of all things needful for defence, who moſt valiantly maintained the place, until ſuch time as that moſt of them being by the often Aſſaults of the Enemy ſlain; the reſt by the commandment of the Captain retired to him into the Caſtle. In taking of this Tower the Turks loſt 3000 of their Men.

After

Guletta beſieged by the Turks.

After that, they began to beſiege the Caſtle of Guletta, againſt which they caſt up divers Mounts, and from thence moſt terribly battered the Caſtle; from whence the deadly ſhot was ſent again among them not ſparingly; ſo that in one day 200 great Shot were reckoned to have been ſhot out of the Caſtle amongſt the thickeſt of the Enemies. But after many furious Aſſaults, too tedious to report, and much harm done on both ſides, the Turks to their great advantage took the Channel of the Lake of Tunes; and fearing leſt ſome relief ſhould be ſent to the beſieged, maintained their Aſſault day and night without intermiſſion. Nevertheleſs, certain Companies of Spaniards ſent from the new Caſtle by Serbellio, got into Guletta; after which, they in the beſieged Caſtle ſallied out, and the 20 of Auguſt repulſed the Turks, with an exceeding great ſlaughter. But the Baſſaes fully reſolved upon the winning of the place to engage their whole Forces, and without ceaſing ſtill bringing on freſh Souldiers, after they had all the day continued a moſt terrible Aſſault, at length about two hours after Sun ſet, they took the Caſtle the 23 day of Auguſt, when there was now ſcarcely 200 Souldiers left alive to defend the ſame; who altogether with the other weak People in the Caſtle were without mercy cut in pieces. What wealth the Turks found in this Caſtle, is hard to ſay; but certain it is, that they had therein great ſtore of Victuals, Armor, Shot, and Powder, and four hundred great Pieces of Artillery.

Guletta taken by the Turks.

The new Caſtle beſieged.

Guletta thus taken, the Turks forthwith laid Siege to the new Caſtle, appointed by Don John the year before to have been built betwixt Guletta and Tunes, which was not yet altogether finiſhed; wherein the two ancient and valiant Captains, Serbellio and Salazar (left there of purpoſe for the building thereof by Don John) lay with a Garriſon of 4000 good Souldiers. The Baſſaes when they gave the firſt ſummons to the Caſtle, the 24 of Auguſt, required to have it forthwith delivered unto them; to whom Serbellio ſtoutly anſwered, That he had promiſed the King his Maſter, to give him a better account of the place; and being now alſo very old, could not indure the Turks heavy Yoke, but would therefore hold it out unto the laſt Man; which both he and Salazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by Men to be done for defence of the place; and ſallying out, ſometime the one, and ſometimes the other made great ſlaughter of the Turks, giving them alſo repulſe upon repulſe when they came to the Aſſault. But the great Baſſaes, little feeling, and leſs regarding the loſs of Men, ſo that thereby they might gain the place, after many moſt terrible and deſperate Aſſaults, at length (namely the 13 day of September) when they had with all their force for the ſpace of ſix hours furiouſly aſſaulted the Caſtle, and ſlain moſt of the Defendants, at laſt look it. Serbellio ſhot in with two Bullets, and wiſhing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the Enemy, thruſt himſelf into the midſt of the Turks, there to have periſhed; but by the haſty coming in of Pial Baſſa, both he and Salazar were taken alive; as for all the reſt that followed them, they were put to the Sword. The Baſſa in his rage ſtruck Serbellio, and the more to grieve him, cauſed his Son to be cruelly murthred before his Face. Neither was this Victory by the Turks obtained without Blood, having in leſs than three months ſpace that the Siege endured, loſt above thirty thouſand Men.

The notable anſwer of Serbellio.

The new Caſtle taken.

These ſtrong Holds (the greateſt ſtrength of that Kingdom) thus taken, the Turks marched to Tunes, which they eaſily took, and afterwards overthrew the Fortifications thereof, becauſe it ſhould no more Rebel. Mahomet the young King, but the year before placed in that Kingdom by Don John, was there taken, and in bonds ſent aboord to be carried with Carrera Captain of Guletta, Priſoners to Conſtantinople; and thus the Kingdom of Tunes, with the ſtrong Caſtle of Guletta, fell again into the poſſeſſion of the Turks, to the further trouble of the Chriſtian Countries lying over againſt it. The proud Baſſaes having (as they thought) beſt diſpoſed of all things at Tunes and Guletta, departed thence, and with their Fleet of 400 Sail, came the fourth of October within ſight of Malta. But underſtanding that they of Malta were provided for their coming, and remembring what diſhonour their moſt magnificent Emperor Solyman had not many years before there ſuſtained (whereof divers of them had been eye-witneſſes) they turned thence, and ſailed directly to Conſtantinople.

Selymus dieth.

Shortly after, this great Emperor Selymus ſpent with Wine and Women, unto whom he had given his great ſtrength, died the ninth of December in the year of our Lord 1574; when he had lived one and fifty years, and thereof reigned eight, and lieth buried at Hadrianople. He was but of a mean Stature, and of an heavy Diſpoſition, his Face rather Swollen, than Fat, much reſembling a Drunkard. Of the Othoman Kings and Emperors he was of leaſt Valour, and therefore leaſt regarded, altogether given to Senſuality and Pleaſure; and ſo dying, left his Empire unto Amurath his eldeſt Son, a Man of more Temperance, but not much greater Courage; who nevertheleſs by his valiant Baſſaes and Men of War, did great matters, eſpecially againſt the Perſians, the mortal and dangerous Enemies of the Turks, as ſhall be hereafter in this Hiſtory declared.

AMVRATHES TERTIVS TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEXTVS 1574

Non ego fortis eram: quis tanto nomine dignus!
Ni fortem faciat mens generosa virum.
Me tumidum fortuna tumens evexit in altum,
Et par fortuna mens mea semper erat.
Sic quamvis tenero mihi nil nisi molle placeret:
Nominis augendi raptus amore fui.
Emisique meos ad fortia facta miniſtros:
Per quos sublatum est, nomen in aſtra meum.

Mustapha, Ferhates, Sinan et ter maximus Osman, Terrores Orbis, Succubuere mihi.
Armenios domui fortes, Medosque feroces;
Et mihi paruerat Regia Taurisij.
Sed mihi quid prodest tantorum parta labore
Gloria, Si Subito maxima quæque ruant?
Et nihil est tanti, quod non brevis auferet hora
Sic mea cum multis gloria victa jacet.

Valiant I was not, none deserve that name
But those, whose generous minds bespeake their fame.
Fortune advanc'd me high, and fickle Shee
Still found a Soule, bravely prepard in me,
Soft in my tender years tho' I became,
Yet still I priz'd the glory of my name:
I sent abroad my Ministers of State,
To doe the Slavish drugery of my fate.

Osman, Ferhates, Sinan, Mustapha
The terrors of the World, did me obey.
I broke the Medes, and the Armenian Powers,
And batterd downe the proud Taurisian Towers.
Yet what's all this to my ill gott renowne,
Since greateſt things are sooneſt tumbled downe,
We're robb'd of all we have, in one short houre,
And quickly we, and ours shall be no more.

THE LIFE OF AMURATH,

The Third of that Name, Sixth Emperour of the Turks.

1574

Amurath takes upon him the Turkiſh Empire the 25th day of December, in the year 1574.

The deſcription of Amurath.

He pacifieth the Janizaries, and augmenteth their priviledges.

He ſtrangleth five of his Brethren.

A deſperate woman.

THE death of the late Emperour Selymus, was, for fear of the inſolent Janizaries, notably concealed by the great Baſſa's, until ſuch time as Amurath, his eldeſt Son, then in Aſia, by ſpeedy Meſſengers advertis'd thereof, about twelve dayes after arrived at Conſtantinople, and there received into the Seraglio, took poſſeſſion of the Empire the five and twentieth day of December, ſolemn amongſt us Chriſtians, for the Nativity of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus. He was about thirty, or as ſome write, ſeven and twenty years old, when he began to reign; of a manly ſtature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his Beard thin and long: in his Countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman Princes, being indeed himſelf of a peaceable diſpoſition, a lover of Juſtice, and, in the manner of his Superſtition, very zealous. The riot and exceſs grown amongſt the Turks by his Fathers evil Example, he reformed by his own Temperance, and the ſevere puniſhment of notorious Drunkards; yet it is reported, that he would oftentimes himſelf drink plentifully of Wormwood-wine; he was much ſubject to the Falling-ſickneſs, and ſore troubled with the Stone; more ſpare-handed than was for the greatneſs of his State; and yielding more to the counſel of his Mother, his Wife, and Siſter, than of his great Baſſa's, which was of many imputed to him for ſimplicity. At his firſt coming to Conſtantinople, to appeaſe the murmuring of the Janizaries, (grieved to ſee themſelves ſo diſappointed of the ſpoil of the Chriſtians and Jews, which they were wont to take in the vacancy of the Empire) he, beſide the uſual largeſs which the Turkiſh Emperours at their firſt entrance into the Empire, beſtow upon them, augmented alſo their daily wages, and granted them this Priviledge, That their Sons, as ſoon as they came to be twenty years old, ſhould be inrolled amongſt the number of the younger Janizaries, and be partakers alſo of their immunities; whereby he won their favours exceedingly. And immediately, to rid himſelf of all competitors, he, after the unnatural manner of the Turkiſh Policy, cauſed his five Brethren, Muſtapha, Solyman, Abdulla, Oſman, and Tzihanger, to be all ſtrangled in his own preſence. The Mother of Solyman, pierced through with the cruel death of her young Son, as a Woman overcome with ſorrow, deſperately ſtruck her ſelf to the heart with a dagger, and ſo died. At which ſo tragical a ſight, it is reported that Amurath let ſome tears fall, as not delighting in ſuch barbarous cruelty, but that the ſtate and manner of his Government ſo required.

Ruſſia invaded by the Turks. Leon. Gorecius de Bell. Ivonia.

In the beginning of his Reign he eſtabliſhed divers wholſome Laws, altered the Coin, and bountifully relieved the Poor. And albeit that he was of a mild and peaceable nature, yet becauſe he would not ſeem to degenerate from the Othoman Princes his Progenitors, he proſecuted his Fathers Wars, and by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, in the month of October in the year 1575 entred into Ruſſia, part of the Polonian Kingdom, where he burnt and deſtroyed two hundred Noble-mens houſes, beſides an infinite number of Towns and Villages, made great ſlaughter of the poor Country people, and carried away great numbers of Cattel and Priſoners bound in thongs made of raw Hides. But whilſt they were dividing the ſpoil with Peter the new Vayvod of Valachia, who had before ſolemnly promiſed to give the Tartars no paſſage that way, the Polonian Coſſacks, who had lien waiting for their return upon the River Boriſthenes, brake into the Tartars Country, and there requited them with like harm, and brought back with them a number of old Captives, who little expected that their ſo ſudden deliverance.

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themſelves about the Election of their new King; Henry Valoys, their late King, being the laſt year, after the death of Charles his Brother the French King, ſecretly ſtoll'n from them into France, to take upon him that Kingdom: after whoſe departure ſome of the Polonian Nobility made choice of Maximilian the Emperour; other ſome, no leſs inclining unto the choice of the great Duke of Muſcovy, and ſome unto others alſo. Whereof Amurath underſtanding, and loth that either of thoſe two great Princes, his Enemies, ſhould be inveſted or ſtrengthened with that ſo great a Kingdom, and ſo near unto him; to hinder that their Election, and to bring in another of leſs power, and ſo leſs dangerous unto himſelf, even in the beginning of his Reign wrote unto the Polonians to that purpoſe, commending unto them Stephen Battor, the Vayvod of Tranſilvania, for their King, in manner following:

Amurath, God of the Earth, Governour of the whole World, the Meſſenger of God, and faithful Servant of the great Prophet; unto the moſt honourable Nobility and Counſellors of the Kingdom of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath's Letters unto the Nobility of Polonia.

IT is not unto the World unknown (moſt honourable and mighty Senators) our Noble Progenitors to have of long time and for many Years holden good Friendſhip and Religious Leagues with the Kingdom of Polonia: For which cauſe it hath ſeemed good and reaſonable unto us, to put you in remembrance of this ſo antient a League and Bond of Friendſhip; for that we underſtanding your Kingdom to be of late become deſtitute of a King, by the departure of the Noble King Henry your Crowned King (deſcended of the Royal Race of the French Kings) our friend: Who, for the ſmall regard you had of him (ſo Great and Worthy a Prince) and for your Diſloyalty, is departed out of your Kingdom, without purpoſe of returning any more into Polonia. Whereupon, as it is reported unto us (but how truly we know not) you paſſing over your ſaid Crowned King Henry, are about to make choice of a new King, and eſpecially of Maximilian the Emperour, or of the Duke of Muſcovie, both men of running wits, and of us greatly hated : For why, you may well know they will be troubleſome and grievous, not unto every one of you only, but even unto us alſo. Wherefore be you ware that you be not deceived; and take heed leſt your Confederations and Leagues cannot long by their valour and proweſs be eſtabliſhed ; and withal, conſider well the great dangers and loſſes which you may thereby fall into : Whereof we have thought good to give you a taſte : Wherefore beware that heavier things befall not your State. We know there are right Noble and Wiſe men amongſt you, which know better than they how to Rule and Govern : And if ſo be it pleaſe you not to make choice of any of your own Nation, there is not far from you one Stephen Battor Prince of Tranſylvania, a Man of great Honour and Valour, by whoſe Labour and Dexterity, you may eaſily procure the peace and quiet of your Kingdom. Whereas if you ſhall do otherwiſe, we take to witneſs your God, and his Servant our Great Prophet, to deſtroy all your Wealth and Goods, which together with your Selves, your Wives and Children ſhall be given for a prey unto our Souldiers, with the chief men of your Cities of Cracovia and Leperis : Which for all that we ſay not as any thing at all doubting of your Fidelity and Conſtancy toward us. As for the reſt, which it pleaſed us by word of Mouth to have told unto you, we have given charge unto this our Embaſſadour and Counſellour, unto whom our deſire is, that you ſhould give full credence. From Conſtantinople the laſt of September, in the Year of our Prophet Mahomet 983, and firſt of our Reign.

This great Sultan's commendations ſo much prevailed with the Polonians, that notwithſtanding that Maximilian the Emperour was by the Archbiſhop of Gneſna and ſome others choſen King, yet was that his Election by the greater part of the Nobility revoked, and both he and the great Duke of Muſcovy being paſſed over, the noble Princeſs Anne (of the moſt honourable Jagellonian Houſe) choſen Queen of Polonia ; yet with this condition, That ſhe ſhould marry Stephen the Vayvod of Tranſylvania, to them by Amurath commended. Who, afterward elected King, all the time of his Life right worthily governed that noble Kingdom, not only defending the ſame in ſuch ſtate as he found it, but alſo notably extending the bounds thereof, enlarging it with ſuch Territories as he by force of Arms got from his Neighbours, eſpecially the Muſcovite. Of this Election Amurath would oftentimes afterwards boaſt, and ſay, That he had given the Polonians their King. But of him, and of the League made by him with Amurath, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

The year following, great troubles aroſe in Perſia, whereby the flouriſhing ſtate of that moſt mighty Kingdom was ſore ſhaken, and opportunity given for the Turkiſh Emperour to invade the ſame; which he laying hold upon, entred into that bloudy War, which, to the great quiet of the Chriſtian Common-weal, for long time after exerciſed the Forces of thoſe moſt puiſſant Princes one upon another. For the better underſtanding whereof, it ſhall not be amiſs compendiouſly to ſet down the ſame troubles of the Perſian Kingdom, the very ground of the long and mortal War between thoſe two moſt mighty Monarchs.

Old Tamas, the Perſian King, Son to the noble Iſmael, who with great glory had more than fifty years worthily governed that large Kingdom, and mightily withſtood the often invaſions of the Turkiſh Emperours, now ſpent with years, died the eleventh of May in the year 1576, leaving behind him eleven Sons ; namely, Mahamet, the eldeſt, of an infirmity in his eyes ſirnamed Codabanda, a man of a peaceable and quiet diſpoſition, more delighted with the ſweet pleaſure of a contented Life, than the careful Honours of ſo great a Kingdom : Iſmahel the ſecond Son, of a more fierce and troubleſome nature, ſo much abhorring quietneſs, that, not regarding the League hardly concluded betwixt his aged Father and the Turkiſh Emperours, Solyman and Selymus, he would now and then, without his Fathers knowledge, upon a youthful heat, break out into the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, and there make great ſpoil ; for which doing, although he was both of his Father and the People the more regarded, yet was he by his Fathers commandment (who in outward ſhew ſeemed to miſlike of thoſe his youthful pranks, tending to the breach of the League) reſtrained of his liberty, and ſent to the Caſtle of Cabacha, betwixt Tauris and Casbin, where he remained at the time of his Fathers death : Aidere the third Son, no leſs ambitious than was his Brother Iſmahel, but not of like valour, kept by Zalcan, Pyry Mahamet, and other his Kinsfolks, all men of great Power and Authority. The other eight were, Mamut, Solyman, Muſtapha, Emanguli, Alichan, Amet, Abrahim, and Iſmahel the younger.

The eleven Sons of Tamas the Perſian King.

The old King before his death had by his laſt Will and Teſtament ſolemnly appointed Iſmahel his ſecond Son to ſucceed him in the Kingdom ; as of all his Sons moſt fit to take upon him ſo great a charge. Which thing Mahamet his elder Brother ſeem'd not much to diſlike, contenting himſelf with ſuch Honours as his Father had before beſtow'd upon him.

Iſmahel appointed by his Father to ſucceed him in the Kingdom.

Tamas thus dead, Iſmahel was by the Sultans ſent for to Cabacha, to take upon him his Fathers Kingdom at Casbin, when in the mean time there aroſe a great tumult in the City, yea even in the Kings Palace ; for Aidere, the third Brother, who in the time of his Fathers greateſt ſickneſs had entred the Chamber where he lay drawing towards his end, and in his ſight moſt preſumptuouſly ſet the Royal Crown upon his head, to the manifeſting of his ambitious deſires, for which he was then worthily reproved : now after the death of his aged Father, carried headlong with the ſame aſpiring humour, and ſupported by Zalcan, and other his mighty Favourites, had ſo effectually dealt with the great Lady Periaconcona, his eldeſt Siſter, and the other Sultans, Counſellors of Eſtate, put in truſt to ſee the Will of the dead King put in execution, as that the Succeſſion could not be any longer kept from him, and preſerved for Iſmahel, but by the help of ſome fine and ſecret deceit. This Lady Periaconcona, (elder than all the young Princes, the Sons of Tamas, her Brethren, a Woman of great ſpirit and deep conceit) left in great truſt by her Father, ſeeing the proceedings of her Brother Aidere, durſt neither openly to move any thing unto the Sultans prejudicial to his deſigns, neither could ſhe in her heart indure ſo great an injury to be done to her Brother Iſmahel, appointed by his Father to ſucceed him. Wherefore in this perplexity ſhe caſt in her wily head how to ſatisfie her ambitious Brother preſent, how to ſave the right of Iſmahel abſent, the honour of her dead Father's Will and Teſtament, and the ſafety of the Kingdom. For having thorowly debated the matter with the Sultans, ſhe reſolved that Aidere, inveſted in Royal Apparel, and ſetled in the great Gallery, ſhould attend the acclamation of the People, and be there openly inthroniſed as the very elected King. With which vain ſhew the unwiſe

youth (blinded with Ambition) ſuffered himſelf to be led: and being ſet in his Majeſty, verily perſuaded himſelf that he ſhould now be honoured, both of his Friends and Foes, as King. But unto theſe his ſo haſty and proſperous deſigns, the Succeſs that ſprung from the ſubtilty of thoſe Counſellors, and his diſſembling Siſter, were nothing conformable; for that ſhe, by their advice, took order for the gates of the Palace to be preſently lock'd, leaving at every paſſage a ſure Guard, and only one wicket open, ſafely warded with a company of moſt faithful and valorous Captains and Souldiers, wholly devoted to Tamas and Iſmahel, with ſtraight charge, to ſuffer every man to enter in, ſaving only the known friends of Aidere. In this ſort did ſhe think to have entertained the young man, until ſuch time as Iſmahel ſhould arrive at Cahaca, and ſo put in execution what he thought beſt for the honour of himſelf, and the general quiet of the Kingdom.

Who joyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a King, repleniſhed with unwonted joyes, receiving honour from all men but his beſt Friends. By means whereof, perceiving now the prohibition of them, and moved alſo with the great ſtir of Zalcan, his greateſt Favourite (who diſcovering the deceit, and crying upon King Aidere, threatned the Lady, the Sultans, and the reſt that waited upon the feigned Succeſſion, indeed ordained but for the ſcorn and deſpight of the ambitious man) ſtrucken with an exceeding fear, and full of ſorrow, he withdrew himſelf cloſely amongſt certain Women in the Court, hoping ſo to find ſome way to eſcape with life.

In the mean time, ſo greatly increaſed the cries and threatnings of the Friends and Favourites of Aidere, (who now had all of them prepared themſelves for ſome dangerous and pernicious attempt) that the Counſellors, with conſent of the Lady his Siſter, were inforced to take order, That to bereave this tumultuous and ſeditious People of all their hope and courage, Aidere ſhould be deprived of his Life. Whereupon, Sahamal the Georgian, Uncle to Aidere by the Mothers ſide, by the appointment of the Lady Periaconcona and the Sultans, after long ſearch made for him, at laſt found him hidden amongſt the Women, and without further delay, taking him by the locks, ſtruck his head from his ſhoulders, and in the place where Zalcan and the reſt of his unfortunate Favourites ſtood crying and threatning, amongſt the thickeſt of the preaſe of the proud Conſpirators, flung the Head all bloudy, and as it were yet breathing for heat; crying aloud to them, Behold there your King, enjoy him at your pleaſure. At which ſudden and horrible Spectacle, every man burned in rage and anger; neither for the preſent wanted there many a raſh head, that vainly threatned moſt cruel revenge; but in the end, when they perceived the neer Succeſſion of Iſmahel inevitable, and the death of Aidere irrevocable, every man betook himſelf to his own private Affairs, and ſo at laſt divided themſelves one from another; and ſo departing from the Palace, ſcattered themſelves ſome one way ſome another, every man as he thought beſt for his own ſafety.

Iſmahel ſaluted King.

He murdereth eight of his yonger Brethren.

Shortly after, Iſmahel, the deſired King, arrived at Caſbin, where he was of his Siſter and the Sultans joyfully received as their lawful and undoubted Sovereign, and with the great acclamation of the People ſaluted King; who, as ſoon as he ſaw himſelf poſſeſſed of the Royal Seat, and his power now anſwerable to his deſires, he, after the manner of the Turkiſh Policy, moſt unnaturally cauſed the Heads of his eight younger Brethren to be ſtricken off; and withall uſed ſuch farther diligence, that not only all thoſe which were near unto them in Blood or Affinity were bereaved of their Lives, but alſo all the Favourites of his late ſlain Brother Aidere were deſtroyed in that publick ſlaughter; ſo that all the Streets of Caſbin were defiled with blood, and all the City reſounded with mourning and complaints. Which unexpected Cruelty, altogether unworthy ſo worthy a thought King, ſo altered the minds of his Subjects in general, that all their former hopes were now converted into new fears, and their joy into mourning. But much greater, and far more lamentable did the miſeries grow, as ſoon as it was given out, That he would change the Religion of the Perſians (who with great devotion honour their fooliſh Prophet Aly) into the Superſtition of the Turks, (who with no leſs impiety obſerve and maintain the wicked Rites of Ebubekir, Hanmer, Oſman, and others, by them ſuppoſed to be the moſt true Succeſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet.) For by means of this uncouth novelty and unexpected change, and by force of an Edict concerning that matter, publiſhed by this new King, many of his prophane Prieſts, many of the Governours of his friendly and ſubject Cities (too much devoted to their former Superſtition) were driven, ſome into exile, ſome clapt into priſon, ſome had their Eyes pluck'd out, (among whom was the Caliph of Caſbin) and not a few others, in ſundry ſorts depriv'd of their Lives. Yea, many Ladies, joyned in blood with Iſmahel himſelf, and divers others of his Kinsfolks (to whom neither Sex, nor Age, nor Innocency, could be a ſufficient defence) endured ſundry torments and ſtrange calamities; ſo that in Perſia was never felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this ſo great an Innovation, and among theſe Tumults, there went abroad withall a general rumour, not in the Cities of Perſia only, but in the Regions of the Turks alſo, even as far as Conſtantinople, That Iſmahel with a puiſſant Army of ſuch as favoured this new proclaimed vanity, was determined in perſon himſelf to go to Babylon, now called Bagdat, there to receive the Crown of the Empire, at the hands of him that he ſhould find to be the Succeſſor of their great Calyph, and in the chief place among their unclean Prieſts; as had ſometime Solyman, the great Emperour of the Turks, and the Perſian Kings of ancient times. In this world of troubles, when as the fear of farther miſeries increaſed, rather than any hope of ancient quietneſs; he was, when he leaſt feared, by the help of the afore-named Lady Periaconcona, ſuddenly bereft of his Life: but whether overtaken in ſome of his own amorous practiſes, or poiſoned by his ſaid Siſter, or that ſhe (as ſome probably affirm) having ſecretly conſpired with Calil Chan, Emir Chan, Pyry Mahamet, Curchi Baſſi, (being all at that time men of great account, and, as it were, Preſidents of the Kingdom) who, diſguiſed in Womens apparel, and brought in by her, ſtrangled him, at ſuch time as he had privately withdrawn himſelf amongſt his Paramours, is uncertain. Howſoever it was, ſufficeth it, that he by the help of the ſaid Lady Periaconcona, was by unnatural Death taken out of this World the four and twentieth day of November, in the year of Grace 1577, to the exceeding joy of all thoſe Nations, who by his death thought themſelves now freed of many great and dangerous troubles; when he had reigned one year, ſeven months, and ſix days.

Iſmahel thus taken out of the way, the Lady began forthwith to perſuade with the great Sultans (the Miniſters of Iſmahels death) that as they had for the general good of Perſia contrived the death of the late King, ſo now that they would take upon them the Protection of that great Kingdom, with the preſervation of the Majeſty and Liberty thereof, untill ſuch time as it were known who ſhould worthily ſucceed in that Crown, which now remained in their Hands. There was at that time many of the greateſt Princes and Governours of that Kingdom aſſembled at Caſbin, there gaping after ſuch Mutations of thoſe troubleſome times, as might beſt ſerve their private deſigns. Emir Chan, burning in ambitious Deſires, was in hope, by means of a match to be made with a Siſter of Periaconcona (who was already greatly inclining unto him) to be exalted to the ſovereignty of all Perſia. Mirizi Salmas, the chief Sultan, hoped on the other ſide to advance into the Eſtate, either Mahamet Codabanda, the eldeſt Brother of the dead King, or elſe Hamze, the eldeſt Son of the ſaid Mahamet; and by beſtowing upon him his Daughter in Marriage (as afterwards he did) ſo to increaſe the glory of his Houſe. Others there were that thought they ſhould be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemoſt Son of Mahamet) out of Heri, and to make him King. Neither wanted the Infant Tamas his aſpiring Friends, whoſe Tutor waited likewiſe for ſome Opportunity to ſettle him in the Kingdom, and ſo by means of his Greatneſs, to make himſelf greateſt amongſt his Fellows. A number of others there were, that ſecretly waited upon every Occaſion that time ſhould preſent for their Preferment. Howbeit in this ſo great variety of Thoughts, the Sultans anſwered the Lady with one conſent, and promiſed her in moſt liberal Terms, all the Protection that their Forces could afford, or their Weapons procure: and yet did every one of them, both in Action and Word, Clerk-like, diſſemble their ſeveral Imaginations, whereunto their Minds were as prone and ready, as their Hearts were cunning cloſely to conceal them.

Amurath intentive to the ſtirs in Perſia.

Amurath the Turkiſh Emperour now wakened, firſt at the Death of the old renowned Tamas, and then at the Rumour of the deſire Iſmahel had to paſs with an Army to Babylon, as alſo at the freſh Report of the Turkiſh Superſtition newly publiſhed in Perſia; and withall, throughly inſtructed what harm this late King had done in Perſia, what Diſſentions he had raiſed, and how hardly the Provinces of that Empire had endured thoſe Calamities; began forthwith to think hereby a fair Occaſion to be miniſtred unto him to take up Arms againſt the Perſians, and Matter ſufficient ſuggeſted for him to put in Execution the great deſire he had of ſome new Conqueſt. For it is an ancient Cuſtom, which is grown to be as it were a Law among the Othoman Kings, That they may not challenge their due Honours in their Life-time, nor their proud Monuments after their Death, unleſs they attempt ſome great and ambitious Actions and Enterpriſes, and perform ſome Exploit conformable to their Majeſty. Amurath therefore bent upon theſe great ſtirs in Perſia, would not direct his Mind any other way, or take any other War in hand, untill he might firſt ſee what iſſue theſe marvellous Innovations in Perſia would bring forth; which in the Perſon of Mahamet, the ſucceeding King, ſeemed to be more pregnant than ever before, and miniſtred unto Amurath new Occaſions of victorious and ſtrange Hopes. For as ſoon as Iſmahel was dead, the afore-named Mirize Salmas (in Dignity chief man among the Sultans, though in Blood and Nobility, inferiour to them all) after many Letters diſpatched to and fro, at laſt aſſured Mahamet Codabanda, how, with all quietneſs of Mind, and ſecurity of Perſon, he might come and poſſeſs himſelf of the Kingdom. He was alſo advertiſed by the ſaid Salmas, of the whole Conſpiracy plotted againſt his Brother, to bring him to his end; and likewiſe made acquainted how the fraudulent Lady, with the Sultans, had capitally conſulted againſt himſelf: and how ſhe, favouring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of Heri, her Nephew, and his Son, more than became her, did little regard the due and rightful Succeſſion of him, being the eldeſt Brother. So Mahamet, bearing himſelf upon the Faith and Diligence of Mirize Salmas, and deſiring withall, to ſee his eldeſt Son Hamze Mirize advanced to ſome ſuch ſovereign Dignity as he ſaw was due to the lively hope every man perceived to be in him, in regard of his Virtue and Prudence for managing the Commonwealth, and Matters of War, (wherein alſo he ſhewed himſelf unto his Father jealous and ſuſpicious, leſt ſome other men ſhould uſurp upon him that Honour and Authority which ſo properly appertained unto him) reſolved in the end, not to leave the Kingdom in the hands of private Perſons, nor the lightneſs of an unconſtant Woman of ſuſpected Modeſty, and a rebellious Conſpirator againſt her own Blood; wherewith ſhe had, without any pity or remorſe of Conſcience, now twice defiled her ſelf. And therefore he wrote back again, that he was minded to take the rightful Succeſſion upon him, and that for the ſame purpoſe he was putting himſelf upon his Journey; with ſtraight charge notwithſtanding, that Mirize Salmas ſhould before his entrance within the Gates of Caſbin, preſent him with the miſchievous Head of Periaconcona, a Woman (in reſpect of the ſcorn exerciſed againſt his Brother Aidere, and of the treacherous Death of her other Brother Iſmahel, and of the perverſe Imaginations which ſhe had conceived to cauſe the Succeſſion to fall into other mens hands, and of the prodigal familiarity which ſhe had with ſome of the Sultans) well worthy of a thouſand Deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmas put in Execution whatſoever Mahamet had privately enjoyned him, ſo that by his means he was preſently and ſolemnly proclaimed King of Perſia. And afterwards, having gathered together many ſquadrons of men, wholly devoted to the Blood and Name of Mahamet, the ſame Mirize Salmas met him on the way, carrying the Head of that manlike Virago Periaconcona upon the point of a Lance, with her Hair diſperſed, and ſome other uncouth ſights to the Terrour of the Beholders. From which Novelties (one miſchief as it were hudling upon the neck of another) there ſprung up divers inward Hatreds, ſundry tumultuous Seditions, and much Civil Wars; this new King, by the inſtigation of Mirize Salmas, ſeeking on the one ſide to be revenged on the Sultans for his Brothers Death; and they on the other ſide oppoſing themſelves with all their Power againſt him, the State of Perſia began to fall into great Inconveniences, and of theſe Novelties to reap new Loſſes. Sahamal the Georgian fled into his Mountain of Brus, fearing the Wrath of his new Lord: Leuent Ogli, likewiſe another of the Lords of Georgia, underſtanding of the flight of Sahamal his Neighbour, eſtranged himſelf ſo far from his old Love and ancient Devotion towards the Perſian Kings, that he ſeemed now to deſire ſome new Innovation. The Nations alſo that were Neighbours to the Turks, and the People of Media Antropatia (now called Siruan) diſliked of this new King; and in the end it appeared, that Perſia, under this King, through many Mutations, was in ſhort time fallen into moſt notable Miſery, and the ſtate thereof more weakened than it had been of long time before.

Mahamet reſolveth to take upon him the Perſian Kingdom.

Mahamet proclaimed King of Perſia. The Head of Periaconcona preſented to Mahamet on a Lance.

Of all theſe things had Amurath from divers places intelligence, but more particularly from Vſtreff of Van, (a City of Armenia the greater, ſcituate upon the Lake of Actamar) who ſent him moſt perfect information of all the ſtirs in Perſia; diſcourſing unto him of the death of Iſmahel, the conſultations of the Sultans, the treacheries and death of Periaconcona, the broils between the King and the Sultans, the nature of the new King, (being diſeaſed in his eyes, little eſteemed of his Subjects, beſotted in affection towards his Sons) the facility to over-rule the chief Governours of the Georgians, and the People of Siruan, evil affected towards the new King; and to be brief, whatſoever had in truth ſucceeded in Perſia, and might inflame the mind of the ambitious Sultan, to convert his Forces againſt an Enemy of ſmall counſel, and much confuſion; adding thereunto, that never was there greater opportunity to overcome that King than was now offered, and therefore wiſhed him, not in any caſe to let ſlip ſo fair an occaſion, as the Othoman Kings had never before, for the obtaining of ſo certain and glorious Victories.

Amurath, of long time wholly bent to mark the event of the troubles in Perſia, now ſtirred up with theſe Advertiſements from Uſtreff, ſetled himſelf more deeply in his former conceits to prove his Forces in ſubduing the Perſian King, the antient Enemy of the Othoman Emperours, and his only Corrival and odious Competitor in the Eaſt. But no one thing did more inflame him thereunto, than to think, how he ſhould have to his Enemy a King not acquainted with deeds of Arms, doting upon his Children, and weakned with the diſſention of his Subjects; and on the other ſide, entring into the conſideration of his own Forces, of the infinite number of his men, both Horſe and Foot, of the means he had to find money, of his Artillery and Engines of War, wherein he far ſurpaſſed the Perſians; he did more and more reſolve with himſelf, to take the occaſion that now was offered him to begin the War. For the compaſſing of which his purpoſe, he was greatly favoured by the preſent State of Chriſtendom, at that time being wholly in league and amity with him. So not finding any thing contrary to his deſignments, he reſolved at laſt to confer with the chief Baſſa's, which had the government of his Empire, Whether it were better upon this occaſion to begin the prepenſed War; or if they thought not this opportunity to be ſo fit, then to lay it aſide, and to convert his Forces and Counſel againſt the Commonwealth of Chriſtendom. For ſuch is the barbarous Policy whereby this Empire is managed, That it is lawful for them to break any League, be it by never ſo many promiſes or ſolemn Oaths confirmed, whenſoever any Enterpriſe is to be attempted for the advancing thereof. So that although this War could not be moved either againſt the Perſians or Chriſtians without breach of their promiſed Faith; yet among the manifold Conſultations that paſſed among the great Baſſaes, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but all with one accord, without farther reſpect, ſought to ſet forward the ambitious deſire of their proud Lord and Maſter. At laſt, after long conſultation and large diſcourſes, it was agreed upon by the great Baſſaes, Mahomet, Sinan, and Muſtapha, That it would be better, and leſs danger to attempt War againſt the Perſians, than againſt the Chriſtian Princes. Muſtapha amongſt the reſt, preferring the Valour of the Latines (whereof he had made good tryal, eſpecially at Famaguſta) before the Armies and Forces of the Georgians and Perſians. Whereby it is apparent to the World, that neither the zeal of their Religion, nor any injury receiv'd from the Perſian King, but only the ambitious deſire of Amurath (to ſubdue a Kingdom, both in his own conceit and other mens relations, evil governed, by an effeminate and ſottiſh King, and through civil diſſention brought into great danger) was the firſt provocation of making this War.

No aſſurance in the Turks League.

Ambition the Cauſe of the Perſian War.

*A Conſultation holden amongſt the Baſſaes about the manner of the Invaſion of Perſia.

* Upon this reſolution there aroſe new conſultations touching the manner thereof, and upon what coaſt they ſhould begin their journey, for the more honourable ſucceſs thereof. Which point Amurath greatly urged, proteſting before his chief Counſellors, that he would not enter into that War, except he were in great hope to bear away the Victory. Some thought it moſt convenient to ſend the Army to Babylon, and from thence to Syras, called in old time Perſepolis, the chief City of the Country of Perſia: others there were that gave adviſe, that the Army ſhould be directly ſent to Tauris, there to erect ſtrong Fortreſſes, and to take poſſeſſion of all the Country round about it; and there wanted not ſome (as it is reported) that thought it better to ſend two ſeveral Armies for both the fore-named Places; and ſo by bringing the Enemy into a ſtraight, to enforce him to yield to whatſoever ſhould be of him required. But Amurath durſt not repoſe ſuch Confidence in his Forces, as to think, that with his Battels divided and ſo weakened, he ſhould be able to conquer that Enemy, who had always moſt valiantly fought againſt the monſtrous and puiſſant Armies of his Anceſtors: and therefore firmly reſolved with himſelf to ſend one only Army, and ſo with his united Forces to ſeek the overthrow of the Enemy. And ſo preferring the ſtrong hope he had conceived to conquer the Country of Siruan, and the chief Cities of Media the great, before the difficulty of making War upon the Coaſt of Scyras, repoſing alſo great hope in the notable help that was promiſed him by the Tartars, called Precopenſes, he confirmed the great Baſſaes his Counſellors in the ſame Opinion; and withall, diſcovered unto them a matter, which to all of them, but eſpecially to Sinan, ſeemed moſt ſtrange; namely, that he was determined not to go himſelf in Perſon with his Army, but to ſend one of his worthieſt Captains in his ſtead. The Cauſes why he ſo did were many, but eſpecially, for that he was troubled with the falling Sickneſs, and feared greatly (and that not without good cauſe) leſt his Son Mahomet (being much favoured of the People) might peradventure in his abſence be untimely advanced to the Empire; beſide the Dangers that he ſuſpected at the hands of the Chriſtian Potentates: and withall, perſwaded it to be unto himſelf a great Honour to perform thoſe things by his Servants, which had in thoſe Countries been unfortunately attempted by his moſt noble Predeceſſors in their own Perſons.

While they were thus conſulting about the Expedition, and the great Baſſaes, Sinan, Muſtapha, and others, made means to be ſent as the Soveraign Miniſters of their Lords Deſignment, he diſpatched away ſundry Poſts and light Horſe-men, with order to the Baſſaes and Governours of Van, Babylon, and Erzirum, in the Frontiers of his Dominions, that they ſhould by often inroads ſpoyl the Towns and Caſtles of the Perſians, and by all means to do them what harm they could. Which they were not ſlack to put in Execution, and eſpecially Uſtref (or rather Huſreve) Baſſa of Van; who with often Incurſions did much Miſchief, as well in the Countries Tributary, as ſubject to the Perſian King. A forcible preparative for greater Troubles to enſue.

Uſtref Baſſa beginneth the Wars in Perſia.

Now in theſe great Preparations for the [illegible]ſian War, (which for many years after notably exerciſed the greateſt part of the Turks Forces, to the great quiet of the Chriſtian Common-wealth) Stephen Bathor the late Vayvod of Tranſilvania, but now by the Commendation of Amurath, become King of Polonia; in the beginning of his Reign, by his Ambaſſadour the great Lord John of Syenna, entred into a ſtrong League and Confederation with the great Turkiſh Sultan Amurath at Conſtantinople. Which, for that it ſheweth in what Terms that famous Kingdom then and yet ſtandeth 1577 eth with the Turks great Empire, and withall, containeth Matter well worth the Chriſtian Conſideration, it ſhall not be impertinent to our purpoſe (omitting the long and glorious Stile of that barbarous Monarch, ſerving to no other end but to ſhew the greatneſs of his Power) plainly to ſet it down as it was on his part at the ſame time by him confirmed.

The League betwixt the moſt puiſſant and and mighty Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkiſh Emperour, and Stephen King of Polonia, agreed upon and concluded at Conſtantinople, in the Year of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſu 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet, 985.

The League betwixt Amurath the Turks Sultan, and Stephen, King of Polonia.

I Sultan Amurath, the Son of Selym Chan, the Son of Solyman Chan, the Son of Selym Chan, the Son of Bajazet Chan, the Son of the Great Emperour Mahomet Chan, &c. Prince of theſe preſent times, the only Monarch of this age, of power able to confound the power of the whole World, the ſhadow of Divine Clemency and Grace, Great Emperour of many Kingdoms, Countries, Provinces, Cities and Towns; Lord of Mecha, that is to ſay, of the houſe of the glory of God, of the reſplendent City of Medina, and of the moſt bleſſed City of Hieruſalem, Prince of the moſt fruitful Country of Ægypt, Imen, Zenan, Aden, and many other ſuch like: In moſt loving manner declare, That the moſt Glorious and Renowned Stephen King of Polonia, Great Duke of Lithuania, Ruſſia, Pruſia, Maſovia, Samogitia, Kiovia, Livonia, and many other Countrys moe; Prince of the couragious followers of Jeſus, Governour of all the affairs of the people and family of the Nazarets, the welcomeſt cloud of Rain, and moſt ſweet fountain of Glory and Vertue, eternal Lord and Heir of the felicity and honour of the aforeſaid noble Kingdom of Polonia, unto whom all the diſtreſſed repair for refuge, wiſhing a moſt happy ſucceſs and bleſſed end to all his actions: offering unto us many Religious vows and Eternal praiſes, worthy our perpetual Love and moſt Holy League, and with great Devotion, performing theſe and other like Honours, as for the diſpatch of his Letters to our moſt Glorious Court, for the new confirming of the moſt ſacred League and Confederation with us, ſending the Honourable Lord John of Syenna (his moſt faithful Counſellour) his Embaſſadour to our Imperial Court; declaring his Love and Integrity, and purging himſelf of all the ſuſpicion of Hoſtility, hath requeſted the League and Confederation to be renewed. At whoſe inſtance we have given theſe our Letters confirming the ſaid League of Peace and Confederation: Wherein we command, That none of our Counſellours, Beglerbegs, Sanzakes, Generals of our Armies, Captains or Servants ſhall do, or on my behalf preſume to do any hurt unto the Kingdom, Countries, Cities, Caſtles, Towns, Iſlands, or whatſoever elſe to the Kingdom of Polonia belonging. And in like manner, that none of the Nobility, Generals, Captains, or others whatſoever belonging unto the King of Polonia, ſhall dare to do any harm unto my Kingdoms, Cities, Caſtles, or Towns confining unto the Kingdom of Polonia. In brief, my will is, that he being a mortal Enemy unto my Enemies, and a faſt Friend unto my Friends, ſhall do no grievance or harm unto any my Subjects, or things whatſoever unto my juriſdiction belonging. So in like manner, commanding alſo, that no hurt by any means, or for any occaſion, be done by our people unto the Subjects, or whatſoever elſe, unto the Juriſdiction of the King of Polonia appertaining.

The Creatures, Embaſſadours, Meſſengers, and men of whatſoever condition elſe, ſhall on both ſides freely without lett or trouble, come and go without any harm receiving, either in their perſons or goods.

1577 It ſhall be lawful alſo for the King of Polonia his Subjects, to ſeek throughout our Empire, for any the Polonian Captives taken before the time of this League; and the ſame ſo found (if they have not received the Turkiſh Religion, but ſtill remain Chriſtians) to redeem without the contradiction of any man.

And that whatſoever ſhall be taken and carried away after the confirmation of this League, ſhall be all again freely and without any thing paying, delivered and reſtored.

That the Merchants on both parts may freely Traffick with all kind of Merchandize in the Black and White Sea, as alſo upon the main; and ſo paying their uſual and lawful cuſtom, to be in nothing wronged or moleſted.

If any of the Polonian Merchants ſhall die in our dominion, the goods of him ſo dead, ſhall not be embezled, but kept in ſafety until his brethren or other his friends, ſhall come with the King of Polonia his Letters: Upon the ſhewing whereof, having alſo our Letters mandatory, the goods ſhall be forthwith reſtored unto the dead mans heirs. In which ſort alſo my Merchants ſhall be dealt withal, if any of them ſhall chance to die in the Kingdom of Polonia.

If any wrong be done within the limits of mine Empire, unto any belonging unto the Kingdom of Polonia, after the date of theſe Letters confirming the League; the doer of the wrong ſhall by my commandment be ſought out, and being found ſhall be puniſhed, and the wrong done, without any delay or contradiction forthwith recompenced. And the like Juſtice to be alſo on the behalf of the King of Polonia adminiſtred.

If any debtor ſhall depart out of mine Empire into the Polonian Territory, whereſoever he ſhall chance to be found by his creditor, he ſhall be brought to the Judge of that place to be examined, and whatſoever it ſhall be proved him of right to owe, the Judge of that place ſhall according to the equity of the cauſe make the creditor to be ſatisfied.

But if the debtor cannot himſelf perſonally be found, no other man ſhall by reaſon of another mans debt be taken, detained or moleſted: Neither ſhall the innocent be troubled for the guilty, in either or both our Kingdoms.

In brief, upon whatſoever conditions and capitulations the League of Peace and Confederation was in the time of my Father, my Grandfather, or great Grandfather of famous memory, made with the Kings of Polonia, upon the ſame conditions and capitulations be it now made alſo.

Whatſoever hurt hath hitherto been done to either part by reaſon of the diſagreement of the Governours and Captains, ſhall all be on both parties neglected and forgotten.

Alſo after the time of theſe Letters confirming the League and Confederation, Whereas the King of Polonia ſhall in time pay a certain ſumm of money uſed to be paid unto the Tartars; the Tartar Chan, and his Son Mirzeleby their Princes, ſhall reſtore the ſame again, and not to dare to ſuffer his Armies by any means to hurt the Polonian Territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their Armies, no harm ſhall be done unto the Kingdom of Polonia, neither on the part of the Polonians, to the Territories of the Tartars. And if any harm ſhall by the Tartars be done in the King of Polonia his Territories, it ſhall by my commandment be again reſtored. And ſo likewiſe on the part of the Palatine of Moldavia, or the inhabitants of the Kingdom of Moldavia, no harm ſhall be done unto the Countries ſubject unto the King of Polonia; but if any be done and certainly known, to be by my Commandment again recompenced.

On the part alſo of the King of Polonia and his Subjects, whatſoever harm ſhall be done unto the Territory or Subjects of the Moldavian Palatine, or Tartars, the harm ſo done to be recompenced, and the doers thereof puniſhed.

Alſo that all ſuch Fugitives as having done any notorious Felonies, or other Villanies in Moldavia, and ſo are fled into Polonia, ſhall at my requeſt, or at the requeſt of the Palatine of Moldavia, be reſtored, and in no caſe denied.

That all the Polonian Captives within my dominions, yet profeſſing the Chriſtian Religion, may by the King of Polonia his Subjects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their Lords and Maſters payed: every ſuch Maſter of the ſlave taking his oath that he coſt him ſo much. But ſuch Captives as have received the Turkiſh Faith, to be forthwith ſet at liberty: And ſo the Turks ſlaves in the Kingdom of Polonia, to be likewiſe manumiſed.

That our Embaſſadours on both ſides (ſo long as we are in League and Amity) may freely come and go, and not be ſtayed in any place; and being willing to meet together, may at their pleaſure ſo do. And being entred into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by ſome good and faithful guide appointed unto them, conducted unto the place they are to go unto. And this to be on both ſides kept.

No man to dare to hurt or ſtay any Merchant, having paid his thirtieth part, or lawful cuſtom.

If any of our Subjects ſhall have any ſuit with any of the King of Polonia his Subjects, the Judges ſhall without delay, be bound to adminiſter Juſtice. All Thieves and Robbers ſhall be diligently ſought out; and being found, to be ſeverely puniſhed, and the goods taken away, without impeachment, to be reſtored unto the right owners, their Heirs, or to the King.

The Sanzakes of Siliſtria and Bolograve, the Cuſtomers and Water-bayliffs, ſhall not ſuffer any man but Merchants and ſuch as are ſent in our ſervice, to paſs over the River Nyeſter; who paſſing over, if they ſhall bring with them any Slave or Bondman out of Polonia, he ſhall be ſent back again. The Shepherds, if they will tranſport their Sheep into the Juriſdiction of the King of Polonia, ſhall not ſo do without the leave of the Polonian Governours, before whom they ſhall alſo number their Sheep: of whom if any ſhall be loſt, the Governours ſhall cauſe them to be ſought for, and to be reſtored unto the Shepherds, as alſo to pay for their Hay.

The Zauzij, Janizaries, or Poſts, ſhall not dare in time of Peace or War, to take any Horſes from the Polonian Merchants, or other the Kings Subjects coming into our Kingdom.

The Palatines of Moldavia, in whatſoever condition they have been towards the former Kings of Polonia, they ſhall now alſo ſtill ſo be hereafter. The thirtieths and cuſtoms of both parts, ſhall continue in their old manner, and not be encreaſed. The Polonian Kings Subjects and Merchants, as well Armenians as of any other Nation, whenſoever they ſhall enter into Moldavia, or any other part of our Empire, ſhall not travel by uncertain and unknown, but by the common and high ways; wherein if they ſhall ſuffer any loſs or harm, either in their goods or perſons, the doers of ſuch wrongs ſhall be ſought for, and ſeverely puniſhed. Which Merchants ſhall be ſuffered without any moleſtation quietly to come and go, having payed their thirtieths; and no Merchant to be troubled for anothers debt.

If any the Polonian Kings Merchants or Subjects, be willing for ready money to redeem and carry away any ſlave taken out of the Polonian Kingdom, and yet profeſſing the Chriſtian Religion, the Judges ſhall in no caſe withſtand them, neither preſume to take them from them, or again to redeem them. But if any of ſuch ſlaves have received the Turkiſh Religion, they ſhall not be again demanded by the King of Polonia.

Such ſlaves as have not received the Turkiſh Religion, if after a certain ſpace they ſhall be ſet at Liberty by their Maſters, and in the Letters Teſtimonial of their Liberty, it ſhall be declared that they have received the Turkiſh Religion; yet ſhall they not by the Judges be therefore detained.

In the City of Buruſa, the Polonian Merchants having payed their uſual thirtieths, ſhall not be farther preſſed with any other unuſual payment.

My will is alſo, that the Territories at this preſent in the poſſeſſion of the King of Polonia, as hereafter to be by him taken from the Muſcovite or any other the Chriſtian Princes, to be comprized within this League, and ſo to be Royally by him poſſeſſed.

And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in theſe our Letters of Confederation contained, I ſwear by the power of the moſt Mighty God, and of his moſt Holy Prophet, and by the moſt clean and pure Spirits of all the Prophets; That for all the days of my life, and ſo long as nothing ſhall on the behalf of the King of Polonia be done contrary to the Peace and League, nothing ſhall alſo on my part be done contrary unto the ſame. Witneſs the Almighty, the upright Judge and diſcerner of mens actions. From Conſtantinople the year of the Holy Prophet Mahomet 985, the 14th. of the Month Cziemaſſi Eumel, and of Chriſt, 1577.

This League betwixt theſe two mighty Princes, Amurath and King Stephen, thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen, by Sigiſmund the Third (which now reigneth) renewed, as it hath been ever ſince to the Polonian Kingdom for the time commodious, ſo hath it as with an Adamantine band ſo bound that moſt famous Kingdom, as that in the hardeſt diſtreſſes of the Chriſtian Common-wealth, and moſt indeed concerning it ſelf, it hath afforded no more help than hath the Members farther off, which is, (I rue to ſay it) none at all; as in theſe late and preſent Wars betwixt the Chriſtian Emperour and the two laſt Turkiſh Sultans, it is too plainly to be ſeen: wherein, had it in due time given but ſuch reaſonable helps as it might well have ſpared, much, no doubt might have been done for the repreſſing of the common Enemy, and the recovery of the greateſt part of that is loſt of Hungary: but thus bound ſtandeth as a dead Member, ſerving to no uſe more than to the more ſpeedy deſtruction of it ſelf, together with the reſt of the ſick Body. For what aſſurance it can have in this long, (I muſt needs ſay) but evil aſſured Peace, is well to be ſeen in the great Conſultation of this great Sultan Amurath, with his Baſſa's after the Perſian War, for the invading of Chriſtendom; the Polonians, for all this League ſo ſolemnly conſtrained, were nothing the more regarded, but laid in the ſame balance with the leaſt, and preſerved only by the Providence that all governeth: which leading the Turk againſt the Chriſtian Emperour their Neighbour, hath given them that Peace they were otherwiſe hardly to have looked for. Unto whom for all that, having to his endleſs praiſe maintained a long and moſt chargeable War, they have not lent any great help or friendly hand; yet lying themſelves ſtill in the Lyons mouth, and like enough to be the next (God grant I be therein deceived) that is to be of him devoured.

But leaving theſe the heavy conceits of a melancholy Mind, and ominous forebodings of that I wiſh not, to return again toward Perſia, Amurath his greateſt care. Amongſt many the ambitious Competitors for the managing of theſe Turkiſh ſo great deſigns, was the great Baſſa Muſtapha (even he, who in the reign of the late Emperour Selymus conquered Cyprus, carrying thence, together with his Victory, perpetual Infamy, for his faithleſs and cruel dealing with Bragadine, the worthy and renowned Governour of Famaguſta) appointed General of the Turks Army into Perſia; and authority given him, to provide whatſoever he ſhould think needful for ſo great a War. And Commandment ment given unto the Baſſaes, and other Commanders of the greateſt part of the Turkiſh Empire Eaſtward, that they ſhould themſelves with their Souldiers of all ſorts, bound by their perpetual Annuities to go to the War in the beginning of the Spring this Year 1578, repair to Erzirum, a City of Cappadocia, bordering upon Armenia, there to attend the command of their new General. Who having his diſpatch from Conſtantinople, and for faſhion ſake conducted by moſt of the Court over the Straight to Scutari, and from thence paſſing thorough the Countries of Amaſia and Sivas, in the very beginning of Summer arrived at Erzirum, and there ſtayed untill ſuch time as his People, Victuals, Artillery, and other his neceſſary Proviſion was come thither. From whence he departed for Siruan, having firſt taken a diligent ſurvey of his whole Army, muſtering the Souldiers of every Nation by themſelves; namely, of the Meſopotamians twelve thouſand, of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians fourteen thouſand, of the Syrians two thouſand, of them of the leſſer Aſia (now comprehended under the name of Natolia) ten thouſand, of the Jews and Philiſtims one thouſand, and of the Cilicians four thouſand. After whom followed the Souldiers of Gracia, the Glory and Hope of all the Camp, valiant Men, to the number of ten thouſand; and after them the familiar and faithful Guard of the General, ten thouſand Janizaries of Conſtantinople, with Harquebuzes on their ſhoulders, and Scimitars by their ſides: of the City alſo of Erzirum, and the Juriſdiction thereof, appeared four thouſand, under the Enſign of Beyran Baſſa their General. All theſe were Stipendaries to the Turkiſh Emperour, unto whom other voluntary Adventurers joyned themſelves, in number not inferiour to the reſt, but better furniſhed, and of greater Courage: So that in this general ſurvey of the Army were found about an hundred and ten thouſand Men, moſt part Horſemen: yet was there not any ſtirred out of Arabia, Egypt, Affrica, or Hungarie, or other Places along the Sea Coaſts; neither were the Provinces from whence theſe Souldiers were drawn, left deſtitute or unfurniſhed of their ordinary Garriſons. Beſides this multitude of Men, Muſtapha brought with him five hundred ſmall pieces of Artillery, with many loads of Money for his Souldiers pay, with further order for the taking up of more at Aleppo, and other Places, if his Occaſions ſhould ſo require. He cauſed alſo great quantity of Corn to be tranſported by the great Sea, called in ancient time Pontus Euxinus, to Trapezond, ſo to be conveyed to Erzirum, being but four days Journey diſtant thence. To be ſhort, having taken order for all things he thought neceſſary for the War, he in ſeemly array departed from Erzirum, and in eight days arrived at the Ruines of Chars, and in the fruitful Country thereabout reſted himſelf; but was there ſurpriſed with ſuch a violent Tempeſt of Wind and Rain, as rent in ſunder his Tents, and did great harm, by means whereof many fell ſick, and were conſtrained to forſake the Army.

Muſtapha cunningly encampeth his Army at Chielder.

Having ſtayed three days at Chars, the Bounder of the Turkiſh and Perſian Empires, he departed thence with his Army, and that evening lodged under the Mountains of Chielder, ſuppoſed to be part of the Hills Periardo; where, hearing the Perſians to be in Arms, he thought it beſt for the ſecurity of his Army, to pitch his Tents as that he might well diſcover the coming of the Enemy, and not to be aſſaulted unawares. And therefore, planting himſelf in the Plain, he gave order that Beyran, Baſſa of Erzirum, ſhould take Poſſeſſion of a certain Hill on the right-Hand, and Deruis, the Baſſa of Caramit, ſhould keep another Hill that ſtood on the left hand; and with them Oſman Baſſa, Mahomet Baſſa, Muſtaffade Baſſa, adventurers, with many others, as well ſtipendary as voluntary men, ſhould likewiſe pitch their tents upon the ſame Hills, in ſuch ſort, as that they making as it were two Wings to the Camp, might diſcover the comming of every man, and yet he himſelf, being ſhadowed with the two Hills, might lie unperceived of any.

Tocomac General of the Perſians.

Mahamet, the new King of Perſia, as yet ſcarcely ſettled in his Kingdom, ſtirred up by the fame of theſe motions, reſolved in himſelf to ſtand upon the defence of his State, and for a time to diſſemble the conceived hatred which he bare to ſome of the Sultans of Perſia, and Princes of Georgia, and to make ſome apparent ſhew that he was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promiſe unto himſelf any form of an Army, or Defence; wherein, (notwithanding all the troubled State of his Kingdom) he wrought ſo cunningly, that almoſt all the great men of account, took upon them the Protection of his State and Kingdom. And ſo Tocomac a Sultan, the Chan and Governour of Reivan, a famous man, well known unto the Turks, and of great Reputation amongſt the Perſians, was choſen General of this Expedition; with charge, That the gathering together the greateſt number of Men he could out of Atropatia, out of Media the greater, and other Places near unto the Turks, he ſhould by all means poſſible ſtop their paſſage into Georgia and Media Atropatia. And thereupon Precepts were ſent out into all parts of the Kingdom, That all the Chans, Sultans, and Souldiers whatſoever, ſhould come ready preſt to attend upon their new General. Many obedient to the Kings Proclamation, came, but many there were that would not ſtir a foot, for their Obſtinacy in the Broyls begun, and for the Suſpition they had of unlooked for Miſchiefs; at whoſe Diſobedience the King much grieved, but now there was no Remedy but to make the beſt of the matter, and for the ſafeguard of his Honour to make the beſt reſiſtance they could. So with thoſe few, which for the love of their Prince and Country were met together in thoſe parts, being in number not above twenty thouſand, Tocomac was diſpatched about his Buſineſs, if happily he might with theſe ſmall Forces oppreſs the Enemy in ſome ſtraight and troubleſome Paſſage, where the great multitude ſhould rather ſerve to the confuſion of themſelves, than to the help of one another. Theſe twenty thouſand were all Horſe-men, armed with Scimitar and Bow, with ſome Harquebuzers among, and furniſhed with very fine and well tempered Armour; but above all, couragious they were and reſolute, and well the more, for the Valour and Proweſs of their General. So provided of all things neceſſary, they ſet forward, and keeping the way of Tauris and Genge, they came to the turning of Chars, where they were advertiſed, that the Enemies Army was already paſſed.

They were now come within a days Journey of Chielder, when they ſent quick and faithful Scouts to bring them certain News of the Condition and number of the Turks Army, who came thither even at the very time that Muſtapha was incamping his Army between the two Hills, whereupon the two Baſſaes, Beyran and Deruis, with their People, had already pitched their Tents. Theſe Scouts diſcovering the Turkiſh hoſt aloft, perſwaded themſelves that there was not any other Battel than thoſe which they ſaw upon the Hills; whereof, with all ſpeed they could, they returned News to Tocomac, who at eaſe had followed theſe his Scouts a far off. Tocomac thus miſinformed by his Scouts of the number of his Enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpoſe to aſſault them; and having diſcovered their Tents upon the Hills, was throughly throughly confirmed in the Opinion he had before conceived of the number of his Enemies, and the Scouts relation, and with ſo much the more confidence ſet forward to aſſail them. But Beyran and Deruis, who quickly from the Hills perceived the Perſians coming in the Plain, although they knew them to be men of great Courage, yet repoſing an aſſured Confidence in their Generals Battel, with all ſpeed mounted upon their Horſes, and ran to meet them. So in the aforeſaid Plains under Chielder, within one hour after noon was joyned a moſt bloody Battel, wherein at laſt were ſlain ſeven of the Turks Sanzacks, with a very great number of Souldiers, without any apparent loſs at all among the Perſians, who fighting cloſe together in a great heat, and all be-bloodied, urged their happy and fortunate Victory.

Muſtapha commeth with his Battel to relieve his diſtreſſed People.

But Muſtapha, who perceived all that had paſſed, and ſtaied waiting till the fight was at the hotteſt, and the medly at the thickeſt, that ſo the flight of the Enemies might breed their greater diſorder; and now ſeeing that his People could no longer endure the fury of the Enemies Rage (even as if it had lightned and thundred, and as though the Earth had ſhaken) with ſuch Cries and Acclamations as the Turks uſe in their Aſſaults for the more Terror of the Enemies, exciting his Army, ran as it were headlong upon his Adverſaries, and ſo renewed a moſt terrible Battel. The Perſians wonderful Courage endured this unexpected and dreadfull Aſſault, and with incredible ſignes of Valour, in that little time of day-light that was left (for the Night began now to approach) continued their manifold ſlaughters, and at laſt, being favoured by the darkneſs of the Night, withdrew themſelves with as little loſs as poſſibly they might. Neither durſt Muſtapha any longer purſue them, but was glad by Night to return to his Camp. Of the ſucceſs of this Battel the Perſians certified their King; as alſo of the greatneſs of the Turkiſh Army, with their further purpoſe for the annoying thereof. And by the Turks alſo were preſented to Muſtapha (who had already ſent away Poſts with News to Amurath) 5000 Heads, which by their Colour, Countenance, and Beards, bewraied themſelves to be Perſians, and 3000 Perſians alive. Of this Victory Muſtapha greatly rejoyced, and to make it ſeem the greater (ſeeking by all means to conceal his own Loſſes, and to raiſe a greater Terror by the Fame thereof, amongſt his Enemies,) cauſed the Heads of thoſe three thouſand that were brought before him alive, to be preſently cut from their Shoulders, and gave order, that of thoſe Heads there ſhould be framed a Bulwark in thoſe Fields, for a moſt horrible and uncouth Spectacle.

A Bulwark made of the Heads of the ſlain Perſians.

The ſame day that Muſtapha imployed himſelf about this barbarous and cruel work, there came unto him certain Meſſengers from Manucchiar, the younger Son of the Georgian Widow Dedeſmit (a great Prince in that Country) who told him, That with his good favour and leave, Manucchiar their Lord and Maſter was comming to ſalute him, and to offer himſelf unto him as his obedient and devoted Servant. At which news Muſtapha redoubling his Joy, gave commandment, That all the Baſſa's and Captains of the Army, with all ſolemn Pomp, with Trumpets, Drums, peals of Ordnance, and all other ſigns of munifical and joyfull Entertainment, ſhould go forth to meet the ſaid Manucchiar, and to accompanie him to his Preſence. Which they did accordingly, and ſo encountering him with all ſignes of Honour, conducted him to the great Pavilion of Muſtapha, who there cauſed him again to be ſaluted with like Triumph. Manucchiar diſmounted from his Horſe, and againſt his Will beholding the ſtrange and uncouth pile of Heads, all pale and filthie to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant: yet notwithſtanding, before all other things, having done his due Reverence to the great Baſſa, and according to his degree placed himſelf next to his ſide, after he had preſented him with ſuch Gifts as his Country yielded, he gave him to underſtand, That for the Honour and Eſtimation which he bare to the Turkiſh Valour, he was always devoted to the Houſe of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes deſired to ſpend his Goods and Life in their Service, ſo at this preſent time, moved by his ancient deſire, allured by the ſtrange Fame of this victorious and wonderful Army, and ſtirred up by a particular fantaſie, to learn the painful and hard Precepts of the Art Military, under ſuch a General, Commander of other Commanders; he offered him all Devotion and Service, more than ever he had done to any heretofore, and himſelf having nothing in the World more deare unto him, conſecrated his own Life to his Commandments; deſiring that the ſame might be imployed in the conflicts of War under his Banners, among Warriers and Souldiers of Fame and Renown: and therefore beſought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whoſe obedient Vaſſal he vowed himſelf to remain for ever.

The ſpeech of Manucchiar to Muſtapha.

The Anſwer of Muſtapha.

Graciouſly did Muſtapha receive all this Diſcourſe from Manucchiar, and having ſhewed him again the pile of Heads, together with his Battels, Armour, and Proviſion of War, told him, That as all theſe Forces are the Gift of God, who always favoured the righteous Counſels of the Othoman Emperours, in ſuch ſort that they lord it over all the World, even to the aſtoniſhment of all that live in the World at this day; ſo had he, for his particular, choſen the better part, in comming now to yield himſelf, and to ſubmit his Obedience to his Lord, although it had been better if he had done it before. And as concerning the deſire he had to be his Companion and Fellow in theſe warlike Affairs, he did very friendly accept of his comming, and promiſed him all good Entertainment and aſſured Safety. And ſo in exchange of the Preſents which he brought with him, he apparelled him in Cloath of Gold, honoured him with a Battel-axe and Targuet wrought with Gold and Ammel, and never permitted him to go from his Pavilion without a train of his Slaves following him.

A terrible Rain and Tempeſt.

This Georgian Prince thus ſolemnly entertained, the General gave order thorough the Camp, That they ſhould the next Morning remove from thoſe Mountains: and now every man was putting himſelf in readineſs, when as there riſe a moſt terrible Tempeſt of Wind and Rain, mixt with Thunder and Lightning; which continued with ſuch Violence by the ſpace of four days together, as if the Heavens had been diſſolved into Waters. Whereby it came to paſs, that out of the dead Carkaſſes and Heads before mentioned, iſſued a moſt horrible ſtink; ſo that thereby, and by the foulneſs of the Weather, with the other Annoyances always attending upon ſo great a Camp, the whole Army was exceedingly troubled, and divers Diſeaſes aroſe among the Turks. But at the laſt the Weather breaking up, Muſtapha riſe with his Camp, and ſet forward toward Teſlis; and being not able by reaſon of the foulneſs of the way to paſs any further, that day ſtayed in the Plains, where the Lake Chielder Giol ſtandeth, and there refreſhed his ſick and wounded Souldiers; removing thence, the next day about Noon he came to the Caſtle of Archicheleck, ſometime a Caſtle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his Wars againſt Tamas, and ever ſince holden by the Turks. Here Muſtapha ſurveyed his Army, and by diligent account taken, found himſelf to want 40000 of his Souldiers; whereof ſome were ſlain in the Battel, ſome were dead of Sickneſs, and many, wearie of ſo long and perillous a Journey, were by Night ſtolne out of the Camp, and returned to take their eaſe at home. From thence the Army removed, and lodged at Night near the mariſh called of the Turks Peruana Giol, or Lake of Slaves; and the next day came to Triala, where at this day are to be ſeen the Ruins of a great City, and of many Churches; whereof ſome are yet repaired and maintained by devout Chriſtians, the Reliques of thoſe happy and religious Forces, that with ſo great and faithful zeale paſſed the Seas and Mountains through thoſe barbarous Nations into the Holy Land; Men worthy of eternal Praiſe. The next day the Turks aſcended the high and craggie Mountain that ſtandeth upon Teſlis; from the top whereof deſcending the day following, they ſeiſed upon a Caſtle of the Georgians, called by the Turks Giurgi Chala. Departing thence, and lodging in certain Plains, the next day they came near to the River that runneth by Teſlis. But in theſe four days march from Archichelec, where Muſtapha took view of his Army, many of the Turks, who in ſeeking for Victuals for themſelves and their Horſes, had ſtraggled from the Army, were cut off by the Georgian Captains, who with a number of their own Country Souldiers ſecretly followed the Turks Army, and well acquainted with all the ways of the Country, lay in ambuſh upon ſuch Places as the Victuallers were to paſs through, and ſo ſuddenly ſetting upon them, ſpoyled them at once both of their Goods and Lives.

Muſtapha comming to Teſlis, found that Caſtle empty, for that Daut Chan Lord thereof, hearing of the comming of the Turks, forſook the ſame, and betook himſelf to the Fields, providing better for himſelf in ſo doing, than by ſtaying ſtill in the Caſtle, to have been there taken Priſoner. This Caſtle, for the convenient Scituation thereof, Muſtapha cauſed to be repaired and fortified, and planted therein an hundred pieces of Artillery, and appointed Mahamet Baſſa General Governour of that Place, with a Garriſon of ſix thouſand Souldiers; which done, he departed for Siruan. At which very time thoſe of Soria, which had brought a thouſand loads of Rent-Corn to the Camp from Aleppo, being themſelves in number a thouſand Perſons, with five hundred others of Omps (in ancient time called Hus, the City of the patient Job) and other places of Soria, men neither of Duty bound, nor of themſelves willing to follow the Camp, returned homewards towards their own Country; but upon the way they were ſet upon by Aleſſandro, Giuſuf, and David, (three of the Georgian Lords) and all ſlain, except ſome few, who by the ſwiftneſs of their Horſes eſcaped with Naſſardin their Captain.

Aleſſandro the Georgian ſendeth Ambaſſadors to Muſtapha.

Aleſſandro courteouſly entertained by Muſtapha.

Now after that Muſtapha had paſſed the deſcent of the ſteep Mountains of Teſlis, the next day he incamped in certain low Plains; where the Ambaſſadours of Aleſſandro, ſurnamed the Great, Son of Leuent, a Georgian Prince, came unto him, and told him, That their Lord was ready, if it ſo pleaſed him, to come unto him to do him Reverence, and by word of mouth to promiſe him that Devotion he had always in mind borne to the Othoman Emperours. With a glad Heart and chearful Countenance did Muſtapha receive theſe Ambaſſadors; and preſently ſent them back to will their Lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendſhip ſhould be unto him moſt dear and acceptable. And after their departure, took order with all the Commanders of his Army, to receive him with all the ſignes of Joy that might be; which at his coming was accordingly by them performed. Who, after he had preſented unto the General the rich Gifts he had brought with him, he offered his Obedience to the Baſſa, with the moſt lively Speeches he could poſſibly deviſe, calling Amurath his Lord: ſeeming to take it in evil part, that he paſſed not through his Territory, where he ſhould (as he ſaid) have had plenty of all things for the relief of his Army; yet hoping that in his return from Siruan he would take it in his way; whereas he ſhould find him moſt ready to beſtow all that he had in the Service of his Lord: telling him moreover, That although he could not, for many urgent reſpects, go with him into Siruan, yet he would always accompany him in Mind, and continually pray unto the Creator of all things, for his Proſperity and moſt happy Succeſs. Courteouſly did Muſtapha receive both his Preſents and Submiſſion, and in exchange thereof beſtowed upon him certain Gifts after the Turkiſh manner, and in magnifical Terms gave him anſwer; promiſing him in his return to paſs through his Country: and ſo diſmiſſed the Perſian Duke with like Honour wherewith he was entertained at his coming.

Muſtapha, holding on his Journey toward Siruan, through mooriſh and troubleſom ways; in twelve days after he departed from Teſlis, came into the Confines of Siruan, near to the River Canac, and there reſted on this ſide the River one day. At which time they of the City of Sechi, bordering upon the Siruanians and Georgians, four days Journey from Sumachia, came to offer themſelves to Muſtapha, as Subjects to the Turks: Of whoſe Submiſſion the General graciouſly accepted, promiſing to them his aſſured Protection.

The Turks Army afflicted with Hunger.

The Turks Army over-wearied with the continual travel of twelve days march, but yet far more afflicted with hunger, not finding in thoſe Parts ſo much as one wild beaſt to aſſuage their greedy deſire of Meat, ſought by all means, every man for himſelf, to get ſomething, eſpecially when they underſtood their General would paſs the River into a Country unto them all unknown, where they were altogether uncertain what to find for their relief. So whilſt they were inquiring among themſelves, who were able to conduct them to ſome ſuch place as where they might ſupply their wants, behold, certain Perſians were taken, who being ſtraitly examined on that point, after much reſiſtance, at laſt told them, that not far off, after they had paſſed certain Mariſhes, where Canac diſchargeth it ſelf into Araxis, they ſhould find many Fields full of Rice and Corn in the blade, and a little farther certain fat heards of Cattel, ſufficient to relieve the whole Army. Of this News was the General certified, who, although he greatly doubted the ſubtilty of his Enemies, yet to gratifie his Souldiers, and to make them more willing to follow him into Siruan, he licenſed every man that had a deſire thereunto, to go and provide himſelf of Victuals, and ſo ſuffered all that would to go freely. Whereupon there went of themſelves, and were ſent by their Captains, about ten thouſand ſervile Perſons, with Camels, Horſes and Mules, to fetch away this proviſion of Corn and Cattel: but the Event anſwered not to their deſires. For Tocomac, with the other Perſian Captains, and the reſt of the Souldiers that were eſcaped from the overthrow given them in the Plains of Chielder, having gathered together the remainder of the Army, and recovered ſuch places as they thought ſafe and friendly for them, carefully attended the marching and paſſing of the Turkiſh Army. And being certainly informed by them of Reivan and Georgia what way they kept, and that of neceſſity they muſt arrive at the Banks of Canac, they began to deviſe how they might in ſome meaſure be revenged for their former loſs, and impeach their Enemies entrance into Siruan. But wanting rather ſtrength than courage to aſſaile the whole Army, they thought it beſt to ſtay in ambuſh in ſome fit place, untill ſome part of the Turkiſh Army (allured with the prey of the Corn and Cattel) ſhould for the releif of their common Neceſſities deſcend into thoſe fields; And the rather to draw them on, ſent out divers men, who, as if they had gone about their own buſineſs, and by chance at unawares had lighted upon the Turks Camp, revealed unto them as a great Secret, what a good Prey was hard by them; and ſo withdrawing themſelves out of ſight, privily awaited the coming of the Turks: when as within the ſpace of three days it ſo fell out, that the aforeſaid ten thouſand Forragers arrived at the wiſhed place; where they had no ſooner begun to charge themſelves with the Prey, but they were ſurpriſed by the Perſians and all ſlain, ſaving a few who by haſty flight ſaved themſelves. The noiſe of this hot Skirmiſh being heard into the Turkiſh Hoſt, cauſed Muſtapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out even as indeed it was; and therefore riſing with his whole Army, haſted with all poſſible ſpeed to have ſuccoured the poor People, who were now all ſlain. And albeit he came not in ſo good time as to yield them relief, yet came he very fitly to revenge their Death upon the Perſians, ſtaying too long to load themſelves with the Spoil of their Enemies.

Ten thouſand of the Turks Forragers ſlain.

The place from whence the Turks were to have had the aforeſaid Booty, was almoſt in manner of an Iſland, incloſed with the Rivers of Araxis and Canac; whereinto Muſtapha entred with his whole Power, Deruis Baſſa leading the one Wing, as did Beyran Baſſa the other, and he himſelf coming on in the middle with the main Battel. The Perſians, ſeeing Muſtapha with all his Forces haſting towards them, and withall, remembring the late overthrow by them received in the Plains of Chielder; began to bethink themſelves how much better it had been for them to have contented themſelves with the late ſlaughter of the Forragers, and with ſpeed to have got them away out of that Straight, than by ſtaying longer, to be incloſed with the multitude of their Enemies, as that they could now no way eſcape without moſt manifeſt Peril. In this perplexity diſcourſing among themſelves, whether it were better to fly, or with ſo great diſadvantage to joyn battel, and ſo rather to dye honourably, than to live with reproach; at laſt they reſolved to reſerve themſelves to the further ſervice of their Prince and Country; deeming it rather a point of Wiſdom than of Diſhonour, not to adventure unto moſt deſperate and aſſured death, ſo many worthy men as might in future time ſtand their Country in good ſtead: yet did they not ſee how by flight well to eſcape, for that they were in ſuch ſort ſtrained within the Rivers, as that there was no ground left for them to eſcape by, than that which contrary to their Expectation was by the Turks already poſſeſſed. In theſe Difficulties every man began to betake himſelf to his own private Conceit and Fortune. Tocomac with Emir Chan, and other the great Commanders of the Army, were the firſt that turned their Backs, and by the help of their Couragious Horſes got over the River of Canac: whoſe Example moved many others to attempt the like, though not with like Fortune; for that their Horſes being not of ſuch Courage, and out of Breath, lay many of them drowned in the River. Wherewith others being amazed, as perceiving inevitable death in flying preſent before their Eyes, and repoſing all their hope even in deſpair, ran as it were headlong in a Rage and Fury upon their Enemies, and in fighting ſhewed unſpeakable Valour: but what was one againſt an hundred? For there they were alſo all ſlain, though worthy of immortal Fame. Thus was the Perſian Army quite diſcomfited in this demy Iſland, being firſt ſtained with the Blood of the Enemy, and afterward with the ſlaughter of the Neighbour and proper Inhabitant, and ſo became the perpetual Sepulchre of a moſt couragious and warlike People. The Turks in this laſt Conflict loſt not above 3000 men, beſide the ſlaughter of the 10000 Forragers; although Tocomac, to make his loſs to ſeem the more tolerable, made report to the King of a great ſlaughter made. The Perſian Captains, full of ſorrow for this unexpected overthrow, with the licenſe of their General departed every man to his ſeveral Government: as Emanguli Chan to Genge, Seraph Chan to Naſſivan, Tocomac himſelf to Reivan, and all the reſt to other Cities, to the Government whereof they were before by the King appointed, and ſo remained expecting his further Pleaſure from Caſbin.

The Perſians fly, and in flying are many of them drowned in Canac.

Muſtapha was now come to the River of Canac, which he was to paſs over into Siruan; and therefore made ſtraight Proclamation through his whole Army, That every man ſhould be in readineſs againſt the next day to paſs the River. At which Proclamation all his People ſuddenly aroſe in a tumult, and with injurious Terms, even to his Face, reproved his Folly and Inhumanity, propounding utter danger unto himſelf, and an univerſal Confuſion unto the whole Army: and therefore prayed him to ſurceaſe from proceeding any further, unleſs he were minded to caſt them all away. But his reſolute Mind was not by their Threats or Intreaties to be removed, neither gave he them other Anſwer than this, That ſo had Amurath commanded, and that if all the reſt ſhould ſhew themſelves unwilling to obey their Sovereign, he himſelf would not, nor could not, but would be the firſt man to attempt and perform that which they all ſo abhorred and reproved. Valiant Soulders (he ſaid) were diſcovered and known not in Idleneſs and Eaſe, but in great pains taking, and difficult Enterprizes: who never ought to be afraid to change this momentary Life for everlaſting Honour, or to ſhun Death, if the Service of their Prince ſo required. And for mine own part, ſaid he, I moſt earneſtly requeſt you, that after I have attempted the paſſage of the River, if any thing happen unto me otherwiſe than well, yet carry my dead Body to the other ſide of the River; to the end that if I cannot whilſt I yet live execute the Commandment of my Sovereign, I may yet at leaſt perform the ſame when I am but a ſpeechleſs and liveleſs Carkas: foraſmuch as the deſire of my Lord is not in any ſort to be fruſtrated, for making too great account of mine own Life.

The Reſolute Anſwer of Muſtapha to his tumultuous Souldiers.

Divers and ſundry murmurings and whiſperings followed upon this ſpeech of the General, who notwithſtanding the next morning did firſt of all wade over the deep and ſwift River himſelf: after whom preſently followed the Baſſa's with all their Slaves, by whoſe Example the reſt alſo were induced at laſt to do the like, and ſo continued untill the darkneſs of the Night interrupted their Paſſage; by which Occaſion more than half the Army could not then get over. In this Paſſage, being with great Tumult and Diſorder attempted, it came to paſs that about 8000 Perſons, carried away with the violence of the River, were miſerably drowned, with the great outcry of all the Hoſt. The like hapned alſo to many Mules, Camels, and Sumpter Horſes, upon whoſe Backs divers Perſons being mounted, in hope to have paſſed dry over the River, were likewiſe headlong overwhelmed therein. With great Complaints and blaſphemous Curſings was the whole Night ſpent by them that were yet on this ſide the River, whoſe fears were not a little increaſed by the Example of their unfortunate Fellows before drowned. And like enough it was ſome peſtilent Sedition to have enſued thereupon, had there not a ſhallow Foord by great chance been diſcovered, which gave ſafe Paſſage to thoſe that were left; for in the Paſſage which the People made that followed Muſtapha, the Gravel of the bottom of the River being raiſed and removed by the heavy Hoofs of the Cattel, was driven down the River to a place where by great good hap there was alſo a Foord, and there gathered together in a heap, had in ſuch ſort raiſed the depth of the Channel, that it made as it were a ſhelf for their commodious Paſſage, ſo that the remnant of the Army, Carriages, and Artillery paſſing over the ſame, there was not ſo much as one man that periſhed. So having with much difficulty at laſt got over the River of Canac, they reſted themſelves that day and the next, and there ſtayed untill the whole Army was muſtered, and again put in Order. Removing thence, the day following they encamped in certain barren Champains, where was neither Corn nor Cattel; neither could they perceive or learn, that in thoſe quarters were any Villages at all. By means whereof, the hunger of their Beaſts increaſing, they were inforced to give their Horſes and Mules Leaves and Stalks of very dry and withered Reeds, and ſuch other like things of little or no ſuſtenance at all: and the men themſelves were fain to ſatisfie their hunger with thoſe uttermoſt reliques which they were fain to pick out of ſuch poor Victuals as now by Corruption were become loathſome to mans Nature; and that which worſe was, they ſaw no end of their Miſeries they were ſo entred into. Notwithſtanding there was now no looking back, but needs on they muſt, and follow the fortune of their Leaders; among whom Muſtapha before all the reſt ſet forward on his determined Journey. He had not long marched, but there was diſcovered good ſtore of ſundry Plants, and ſhortly after a very large plain Country all green and flouriſhing, and garniſhed with many Trees; by the only ſight whereof every man was refreſhed with the hope of Relief, and with more than ordinary paces haſted untill they were entred into thoſe Champains, abounding with all kind of Corn and Fruits that could be of an hungry man deſired. In this place did every man ſatisfie his Appetite, and forgot in part the fore-paſſed Calamities. Through this fruitful and pleaſant Country Muſtapha leading his Army, at laſt arrived at Eres, the chief City in that Coaſt of Siruan, as you travel from Georgia.

Famine in the Turks Hoſt.

The Turks Army refreſhed.

This City of Eres was forſaken of a number of her Inhabitants, as ſoon as it was known that the Turks were come to Canac, who all followed their Governour Samir Chan; who with Ares Chan, Governour of Sumachia, and other the Governours of Sechi, and other Places of Siruan, forſook the Cities, and all together withdrew themſelves into the Mountains, as places of more ſurety, attending the event of theſe ſo great Motions: ſo that as the Turks entred the City undiſturbed, ſo were they with the prey they found therein nothing inriched, for that in this common danger every man had carried away with him the beſt things he had. Here ſtayed Muſtapha two and twenty days, during which time he erected a Fortreſs in the ſaid City; whereupon he placed two hundred ſmall pieces of Artillery, and for the keeping thereof appointed Caitas Baſſa with a Garriſon of five thouſand Souldiers. In the mean time alſo he commanded Oſman Baſſa (one of the voluntary Captains) with ten thouſand men to poſſeſs Sumachia, ſometime the metropolitical City of that Province, with the Title of Viſier and Governour-general of Siruan. Giving him further in charge, that in any caſe he ſhould clear the paſſage to Derbent, and give preſent Advertiſements to the Tartarians of his arrival there, whom he ſuppoſed by that time to be come into thoſe quarters, for that they had before ſo faithfully promiſed to Amurath. Oſman comming to Sumachia, preſently ſeiſed upon the City, and was friendly entertained of thoſe that remained there; whom he likewiſe courteouſly intreated, without doing or ſuffering any outrage to be done upon them. Of which his courteous uſage they of Derbent underſtanding, ſent preſently to offer their City unto him, beſeeching him to receive them into his Protection, and to defend them from the Perſians; under whom, although they had long lived in ſubjection, yet differed they from them in the Ceremonies of their Mahometan Superſtition, wherein they better agreed with the Turks.

Muſtapha returneth out of Siruan.

Muſtapha having thus brought the Country of Siruan into the Turkiſh ſubjection, and finiſhed his Fortreſs at Eres, and put all things in ſuch order as he thought beſt; importuned by the Janizaries and the People of Grecia, and ſomewhat inforced by the ſeaſon of the year, which was now far ſpent, departed from Eres, and turned his courſe homeward toward the Country of Alexander, ſirnamed the Great, as he had promiſed in his late paſſage into Siruan. And having travelled a long Journey, he ſent before him certain Engines and Pioneers to make a Bridge over Canac, ſo without danger to paſs over his Army. Having paſſed the River, he gave notice to Sahamal (one of the Lords of Georgia) of his arrival, who preſently came and yielded himſelf as Vaſſal to the Turks; and being entertained of the Baſſa with great Pomp, and rewarded after the Turkiſh manner, took his leave, and ſo returned into his Mountain of Brus.

Muſtapha ſetting again forward, and travelling by Night, becauſe he would not loſe the oportunity of the fair weather, by the errour of his Guides loſt his way, and ſo fell into rough and difficult Paſſages, whereby he was inforced to ſtay and wait for day light; which ariſing, did manifeſt unto them, that they were now entred into the Countries of his Friend Alexander: and therefore he gave forthwith Proclamation through all the Army, That no man upon pain of Death ſhould be ſo hardy as to moleſt or diſquiet any of the Subjects of Alexander, but to have good reſpect unto them, and to intreat them with all Courteſie. The day following, he ſtill travelled on in the ſame Country, when there arrived from Zaghen certain Ambaſſadours of Alexanders, with great abundance of Cattel, Corn, Fruits, and other relief ſent for a Preſent to the General, with a ſolemn excuſe that he came not himſelf; becauſe the Infirmity of his Body would not ſuffer him. Wherewithall Muſtapha reſted ſatisfied, and leaving the City of Zaghen on the right hand, cauſed the Meſſengers of Alexander to guide him the way to Teflis, which they ſo directly did, that within the ſpace of three days they conducted him thither with his Army, without the feeling of any annoyance; from whence they returned, being well rewarded for their pains by the General. Who now come to Teflis, found the Garriſon he had there left for the keeping thereof, ſo hardly pinched with Famine, that they were glad to eat Cats, Dogs, Sheep-skins, and ſuch like unwonted food; for neither durſt they for fear of the Enemy go out of the Caſtle to provide for themſelves, neither if they had ſo done, had it any thing availed, ſuch was the carefulneſs of the Enemy in keeping of his things: but now, by the coming of the General, they were relieved with Meat, Money, and plenty of all things. Having ſtayed there two days, he put himſelf again upon his way, and with Fire and Sword deſtroyed whatſoever came in his way in the Champains ſubject to the ſaid City, only the Sepulchres of Simons Progenitors (Lord of that Country) were left untouched by the Turks Fury. The next day they travelled over rough and ragged Mountains, full of a thouſand difficulties, which were the more increaſed by wonderfull great Snows that were fallen, by reaſon whereof, many Souldiers, Horſes, Camels, and Mules periſhed. In which diſtreſs the Army continued two days, during which time the Souldiers were fallen into ſuch diſorder, that forgetting the fear of the Enemies Country wherein they were, every man without regard took up his ſeveral lodging apart, ſome here, ſome there, where they might find either ſome thick Buſh or ſome ſmall Cottage, or ſome quiet Valley to ſhelter themſelves in from the Wind, the Snow, and the Storms. Of which diſorder certain Georgian Lords underſtanding by the Scouts, which from time to time waited upon the Turks Army, joyned themſelves together, and in the Night ſecretly approached unto it, expecting the Opportunity of performing ſome notable Exploit; and having obſerved, that Hoſaine Bey had withdrawn himſelf with his Regiment from the reſt of the Army under certain Mountains, to defend himſelf from the Storm and Wind; they took the Occaſion preſented, and ſo aſſailing him, ſlew his Slaves and all his Squadrons, took a great booty of many loads of Money and Apparel, led away with them all his Horſes, and whatſoever elſe they could find, and ſcarce gave him lieſure to ſave himſelf, by flying into the Tents of Beyran Baſſa. The next morning the Turks removed, and in the Evening came to a Caſtle called Chiurchala, where they ſtayed a whole day to make proviſion of Victual; which was attempted by ſending abroad many of their Slaves into the Fields, conducted by them of the Caſtle, who were all miſerably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this Place the Turks Army departed in great hunger, over divers rough places of the Georgians, where they were oftentimes fain to reſt themſelves; and at laſt came to the Confines of Dedeſmit, of her called the Widows Country. In the entrance whereof, they muſt needs paſs thorough a narrow Straight, between certain Mountains, where the River Araxis windeth it ſelf with a thouſand turnings in the low Vallies, a dangerous place, and ſo narrow, that no more but one man alone could at once paſs through it. Between this Straight and a very thick and hilly Wood, they lodged upon the Bank of the ſaid River, and from thence they removed the next morning and travelled over very ſteep Mountains and rough Forreſts, over Ice and Snow, more hard than Marble, and over other hanging Rocks, in ſuch miſerable ſort, that many Camels, Mules, and Horſes, tumbling down headlong into the River, there miſerably periſhed. Through theſe ruinous Crags, and divers other Miſeries, they marched all the next day, and after that another day alſo, as miſerable to the Army as the former; and ſo at laſt being ſore afflicted with hunger, ſpoiled of the Enemy, tormented with the hard ſeaſon of the Year, and ſcituation of the Place, they arrived in the Territories that lay under Altunchala, or golden Caſtle, the princely Widows Palace, where they had all manner of Relief for all the Miſeries they had endured since their departure from Chiurchala, by the ſpace of ſix days; which if it had been a fair common travelled way, might have been performed in one only days Journey.

The Georgian Widow ſubmitteth her ſelf with her Son Alexander to Muſtapha.

The Widow, with Alexander her eldeſt Son, came down from her Caſtle, and went unto the Pavilion of Muſtapha, offering him divers Preſents, and promiſing unto him all faithful Obedience; whom Muſtapha courteouſly received, declaring unto her what honourable entertainment he had given to Manucchiar her younger Son there preſent, who had been with him in all the Expedition into Siruan. And for the preſent, diſſembling the privy diſpleaſure he bare againſt Alexander (whom he thought to have been one of them that ſpoiled the Sorians in their return from the Camp) he embraced him courteouſly, and prayed her to be content to leave him alſo there with him; giving her farther to underſtand, that he would ſend both her Sons to Conſtantinople to Amurath, with Letters of Credence for their yielded Obedience, for their Favour ſhewed to his Army, in giving it ſo ſecure Paſſage, and ſo many Helps; and laſtly, that for their good Deſerts, they might be of the ſaid great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged Lady, although her Mind was herewithall ſo retroubled, yet outwardly in her Countenance ſhewed her ſelf pleaſed; and ſeemed courteouſly to yield that ſhe was of neceſſity conſtrained to grant; as well for that he was already poſſeſſed of one of her Sons, as alſo for that both herſelf and her whole ſtate were now in his Power; and as it were at his Devotion: and therefore, leaving both her Sons behind her, ſhe returned her ſelf heavy to her Caſtle.

Muſtapha cometh to Erzirum, and diſchargeth his Army.

In this Place Muſtapha having refreſhed his Army two days, departed thence toward Chars, and after many days travel, at laſt arrived at Erzirum, to the great rejoycing of the whole Army, which was there preſently diſcharged by the General, without any muſtering at all, and leave given for every man to return into his Country.

Muſtapha magnifieth his own Exploits to Amurath.

Muſtapha ſettling himſelf in Erzirum, diſpatched Poſts with Letters of plentiful Advertiſements to his great Lord and Maſter, of all things that had paſſed; not forgetting to magnifie his own Exploits above Meaſure. He certified him of the Battels he had had with the Perſians, the Obedience he had received of the Georgians and Siruanians, the mutiny of his own Souldiers, the Fortreſs he had built at Eres, the Garriſons left in that City with Caitas Baſſa, and in Sumachia with Oſman Baſſa; and in brief, whatſoever elſe had paſſed, and whatſoever he had taken from the Enemy. Neither did he fail to propound unto Amurath what he thought convenient to be attempted the next year, for the ſtrengthning of thoſe places he had already conquered, and for preparing the way for new Enterprizes. And principally he put him in Mind of a Fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any Paſſage into Georgia or Armenia, by ſcituation fruitful and commodious both for Men and Cattel. And withall he ſent unto him the Widows two Sons Alexander and Manucchiar, the Georgian Princes, certifying him of their Submiſſion, and that he had received in their Country all good entertainment and friendly welcome: and withall declaring his Opinion, That Manucchiar was the meeter man for Government than his his Brother Alexander, and the readier to do him Service. Greatly did Amurath commend the Valour and Diligence of Muſtapha, and highly pleaſed himſelf with this conceit, That of theſe beginnings might grow mighty Conqueſts, to the enlargement of his Empire, and that by this means he ſhould be able to ſurpaſs the Glory of his Predeceſſors. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about theſe Wars, the leſs he troubled himſelf with thinking how to annoy Europe with his Forces.

It was not long after the departure of Muſtapha from Eres, but that the Tartarians, having left the Fens of Meotis, and the unmountable ſhores of the black Sea, and having paſſed over the Rocks upon Cholchis, and ſurveyed the frozen Crags of the Mountain Caucaſus, were now arrived upon the Confines of Siruan, and there attended the Commandment of the Turks. Theſe Tartarians, being of them that are called Præcopenſes, to the number of thirty thouſand, conducted by their Lord and Captain Abdilcherai, a young man of great Valour and Fame, and of a comely Perſonage, were come, according to the faithful Promiſe of Tartar Chan, with full Reſolution to attempt whatſoever ſhould be commanded them in the Name of Amurath. Now Oſman Baſſa underſtanding of their approach, according to the charge before given him by Muſtapha the General, invited them to enter into Siruan, and by increaſing of the Turks Forces, to further theſe beginnings of Amurath's Glory, and theſe his Conqueſts, (or more truly to ſay, theſe magnifical and famous Terms of Victory) all which was moſt diligently put in Execution by Abdilcherai; who, having entred the Iron Gates where Derbent ſtandeth, (which by the Turks at this day is called Demir Capi, and ſignifieth the Gates of Iron) and ſo from thence paſſing into the Country of Siruan, there ſtayed, and thereof gave Advertiſement to Oſman, as was by him appointed. Ares Chan, late Governour of Sumachia, who for fear of the great Army of the Turks had abandoned the City, the chief place of his charge, and betaken himſelf to the ſafeguard of the Mountains, hearing of the departure of the Turkiſh General, reſolved with the other Governours of Eres and Sechi (who following his Example, had in like manner fled) now to return again to their forſaken Country, and to make proof if he could by any means take revenge of the Injury done unto him by the Turks. So paſſing under Sumachia, and having put to the Sword certain of Oſmans ſtragling Victuallers that were gone out of the City, he incamped with all his People a little from Sumachia, and by good Fortune ſurpriſed certain Meſſengers ſent from Abdilcherai the Tartar, to certifie Oſman Baſſa of his arrival, and to know his Pleaſure what he ſhould put in Execution. Theſe Tartarians, brought before Ares, after much Torture diſcloſed the Letters they carried, which the Perſian Captain read, and conſidering the great number of the Tartarians that were come, (for the Letters made mention of thirty thouſand) he reſolved not to ſtay any longer in thoſe quarters, but preſently raiſed his Camp, and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certifie the King of thoſe Novelties, and upon the banks of the ſaid River to attend the Kings anſwer. The Tartarian Captain coming to Sumachia, was appointed by the Baſſa to paſs over the River of Canac into Genge, the Country of Emanguli Chan, with the ſpoil thereof to enrich himſelf, and by all means to make his arrival unto the Perſians moſt terrible. With this charge the Barbarian departed, thirſting now for nothing more than for the blood and ſpoil of the Enemy; and with poſting Journies came to Canac, where Ares Chan was yet incamped; whom he upon the ſudden moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, and like a devouring flame diſcomfited all his Hoſt: and taking him alive, ſent him to Sumachia to Oſman, who forthwith cauſed him to be hanged by the Neck out of a Lodging in the ſame State-houſe where he had not long before ſat as Governour. The Tartarian after that, ſwimming over the River, and courſing a little above Genge, found Emanguli Chan with his Wife, and all his Family, and a great part of the Nobility of Genge in a Valley hunting the wild Boar; and aſſailing him, put him to flight, took from him his Wife, all the Ladies, and many Slaves, and ſlew many of the reſt that were come thither to ſee the ſport: and after that rode on to Genge, which he took, and yielded it wholly to the Fury and Luſt of his barbarous Souldiers, who left no manner of inhumane Cruelty unattempted, in ſatisfying their immoderate and barbarous Affections. And ſo being loaded with the Spoyls, and weary with the ſlaughter of their Enemies, they returned merrily toward Siruan: and paſſing again over Canac, came to the higher ſide of Eres into certain low Champains, environed about with Hills, and there having pitched their Tents, without any fear ſetled themſelves to ſleep, and to reſt their weary Bodies.

Ares Chan hanged at Sumachia.

Emanguli Chan taken, and Genge ſacked by the Tartarians.

In the mean time, and long before theſe Actions, was News brought to the Perſian Court of all the Turks proceedings: whereupon the Perſian King having gathered new Forces, had diſpatched Emir Hamze Mirize, his eldeſt Son, with 12000 Souldiers to paſs into Siruan, to ſee what hurt the Enemy had done, and to attempt the revenge of the forepaſſed Injuries; but above all things to puniſh the Villany of them of Sechi, and the other Citys of Siruan, that not induced with any Neceſſity, had ſo voluntarily yielded themſelves to follow the Obedience and Religion of the Turks. The Perſian Prince departing from Casbin, accompanied with his Mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloved Son, was on his way towards Siruan, under the guiding and Government of Mirize Salmas, chief of the Sultans; and had now left behind them the Countries of Ardovil and Caracach, when he was certified by the advertiſements come from Ares Chan, of the arrival of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tartarians; and was thereby at the firſt ſtrucken into a great quandary, and almoſt out of comfort: yet, prick'd forward with an honourable deſire of Glory and Revenge, he proſecuted his intended enterpriſe for Siruan, and haſtening his Journey, came to Eres long before the King his Father thought he could have ſo done. This his notable Celerity ſerved him to great purpoſe, for that Caitaſs Baſſa was boldly gon out of the Fortreſs, and went ſpoyling the Country, carrying away with him whatſoever he met withall, and committing ſuch Inſolencies as hungry Souldiers beyond all honeſty uſe to do in ſtrange and fruitful Countries. But when he was in the midſt of theſe ſpoyls, and leaſt feared the Enemy, he was ſuddenly aſſailed by the Prince; and having no means to eſcape his Fury in this Extremity, after a fierce and bloody Battel (wherein the Turks although in number few, yet ſhewed many effects of Valour) he was there ſlain with all his Souldiers, leaving the Fortreſs, the Spoils, and the Country committed to his Cuſtody, free to the Pleaſure of the Victor: which the Perſian Prince having once again gotten into his Poſſeſſion, took away the two hundred pieces of Artillery that were left in the Fort by Muſtapha, and preſently ſent them to Casbin to his Father.

Eres recovered by the Perſians.

The Prince, encouraged with ſo happy a beginning, leaving his Mother at Eres, followed on his Journey toward Sulachia, but by the way deſcending 1578 ing the Hills, he diſcovered where the Tartarians lay encamped. Whereupon he ſtood in great doubt, whether to adventure upon ſo mighty an Enemy, or to content himſelf with the Victory he had already gotten, and ſo to return into Perſia: to return he thought it too great a ſhame, and choſe rather to adventure himſelf to moſt manifeſt Peril. And therefore deſcending the Hill, and drawing nigh the Enemy, he perceived that the Army was all laid down to reſt, and that their Horſes were ſome couched, ſome ſtanding, but all unſadled; whereupon, without any ſtay ſetting Spurs to his Horſe, he pricked forward with all his hoſt, and moſt terribly aſſaulted the Tartarians, now buried in their ſpoils and ſleep; and having ſlain their firſt and ſecond Watch, although with ſome loſs, among the tumultuary Souldiers he made an univerſal confuſion and ſlaughter, putting ſome to flight, killing others, and taking divers of them Captives: Among whom was their General Abdilcherai, who was taken alive, and ſent to the King.

Sumachia beſieged by the Perſian Prince.

After theſe Victories the Perſian Prince ſcoured to Sumachia, and compaſſed the City round about, wherein the Turkiſh Baſſa Oſman ſat as Governour, to the reproach of Perſia; and there encamping himſelf, ſend word to Oſman, That if he would yield himſelf, he would let him depart with Life and Goods; otherwiſe, if he would obſtinately hold it out, and not yield the City, which he ſo unjuſtly poſſeſſed, he ſhould be conſtrained to ſurrender it by force, and his Life withall. Oſman, who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians overthrow, but ſtill hoped of their return, thought it beſt to entertain the Prince with fair words untill their coming; and therefore gave him courteous anſwer, that he was very ready to yield up the City. but withall intreated him, that he would ſtay but for three days, and grant him time to put all things in readineſs, that ſo he might freely depart, as it had pleaſed him in courteſie to offer. The Prince, glad of ſuch an anſwer, ſuppoſing it to have proceeded of a ſincere meaning, expected of the Turk the performance thereof: But Oſman meaning nothing leſs, than to commit himſelf to the faith of his Enemy, and ſeeing that the Tartarians, whom he looked for, appeared not, he reſolved to ſave himſelf by ſecret flight; doubting, as he had good reaſon, that if he ſhould longer ſtay, to be betraied by the Inhabitants of the City themſelves; and therefore ſomewhat before the aſſigned term of the three days appointed for the ſurrendring of the City, he, by the help of a dark Night, and the covert of the high and rough Crags, with great ſilence withdrew himſelf out of Sumachia, carrying away with him all his Subſtance, and ſo in ſafety arrived at Derbent. The next Morning the Inhabitants of Sumachia opened the Gates of the City to the Prince: who ſeeing their Infidelity, firſt by giving of entertainment to Oſman, and now by helping him to eſcape, without giving him any knowledge thereof, did put in execution the effect of his Wrath and Indignation, which even at Caſbin he had conceived in his Mind againſt them; and with great Cruelty did puniſh the miſerable and unfortunate Citizens, laying their Houſes even with the Ground, raſing both the old and new Walls of that City, of late ſo deſired a Receipt for the Turks. But when he was to depart thence, he ſtood in doubt, Whether to go on to Derbent, or to return to Perſia; the ſtrength of that City, the approach of Winter, and the long Journey he was to take homeward, perſuaded him to lay aſide the enterpriſe for Derbent: whereupon he reſolved to return to Caſbin, yet firſt to make his return by them of Eres and Sechi, and upon them, as upon Rebels, to inflict well deſerved Puniſhment. So making his preſent repair thither, ſpared neither Sex nor Age, nor any Condition of Perſons, but upon them all poured forth his furious Indignation without exception. Which done, he with his aforeſaid Mother Begum, and his Army, though ſomewhat diminiſhed, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to Caſbin. 1578

Sumachia yieldeth unto the Prince.

Abdilcherai beloved of the Perſian Queen.

Young Abdilcherai the Tartarian was kept ſafe in the Kings Palace at Caſbin, but with ſuch eaſie Impriſonment as was agreeable to his calling; which was day by day ſo inlarged, as that he ſeemed not to live as a Priſoner, but rather as a Companion of thoſe of the Court, and as it were in apparent Liberty. By which occaſion, having inſinuated himſelf into the love of Begum the King's Wife, he ſpent his time in courting her, and ſhe again in entertaining of him in all ſecret and covert manner. Yet theſe their mutual Affections and interchangeable Favours paſſed not ſo ſecretly, but that in the Court and all over the City it was a riſe Report, That the ſhameleſs Lady, prodigal of her Honour, had participated both her bed and her ſelf with the Tartarian Priſoner. Howbeit, neither the King nor the Prince knew any thing of it. But the King perceiving the young Gentleman to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely Feature, and withall nobly born (for he gave it out that he was the Brother of Tartar Chan) perſwaded himſelf, that it would ſtand with the great good of his ſtate, of a Captive to make him his Son-in-law, by giving him his Daughter in Mariage; whereby he was in good hope there might grow ſuch an amity and union between the Tartarian Præcopenſes and himſelf, as that they would from thenceforth not only refuſe to favour Amurath in thoſe Wars, but alſo become Enemies unto him, and in the favour of Perſia, turn their Arms and Affections againſt him. Which his deep and conſiderate purpoſe ſo diſpleaſed the Sultans of Caſbin, that they ſought by all means they could poſſibly deviſe to avert the King from that ſo ſtrange a Policy; but all in vain, for the King being fully reſolved, and now upon the point to make a concluſion of the Marriage; the Sultans entering into the Palace with their Followers, and finding there the unfortunate Tartarian, ran him through the Body, and cutting off his privy Members, flapped them upon his Mouth after a moſt barbarous and filthy manner. It is reported, that the Queen was then alſo murdered by them; certain it is, that the poor Lady never after that day ſaw the light of the Sun: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the King her Husband, or that the Sultans did it for the publick Intereſt, is not certainly known. Upon theſe Murders ſprung up many Troubles, and much civil Diſſention, threatning the utter Confuſion of the Perſian Kingdom, to the ſingular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous Diſorders the King, by bridling his own Affections, and the Motions of his Son Emir Hamze Mirize, well appeaſed, procuring at laſt a perfect Unity, as then moſt Neceſſary for the defence of his Kingdom.

Abdilcherai ſlain in the Court.

The Perſian Queen made away.

Oſman Baſſa being in Derbent (the only place of refuge now left for the Turks in Siruan) ceaſed not with all carefulneſs to deviſe what he poſſibly could, for the aſſuring of that Country (of late won, and now again almoſt loſt) under the Government of Amurath. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof, together with his own ſafety, he thought it good to enter into Friendſhip with old Sahamal the Georgian, Lord of the Mountain of Brus. With this man did Oſman practice many tokens of good will, and he again interchangeably towards Oſman; whereupon there aroſe great Friendſhip between them, at leaſtwiſe in outward appearance; whereunto in ſhort time there was added a ſtrait knot of Alliance: for that Oſman took to Wife a Daughter of the ſaid Sahamals, the greateſt ſign of his ſincere love towards him. Nevertheleſs, ſhortly after, Oſman, upon ſome reaſonable Conjectures, began to ſuſpect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal, for all the fair ſhew of Friendſhip he made towards him, might for all that receive ſome ſecret order from the Perſian King to betray him, and to free the City from the Turks, and ſo to reduce all that Province unto the antient Devotion; in which jealous ſuſpicion he was fully confirmed by the Speeches of his Wife, the Daughter of Sahamal; who, raviſhed with the Honour, Valour, and Riches of her Huſband, could not conceal any thing that ſhe knew deviſed againſt him, but frankly told him, That her Father, being ſecretly reconciled to the Perſian King, held Friendſhip with him, and that Letters went between them of great matters, and particularly of the Affairs of Siruan. Hereupon the Baſſa perſwaded himſelf, that all the Friendſhip of Sahamal was but deep Diſſimulation, and the Marriage of his Daughter nothing but a mean to procure his Death. Nevertheleſs he made ſhew unto his Wife, as if he had made no ſuch reckoning of it as indeed he did, but kept it in ſtore to his own ſafety, and the Deſtruction of Sahamal; whom, for all that he ſtill entertained with all Honour and Kindneſs due unto a moſt loving Father-in-law. But to prevent the malicious purpoſe of Sahamal, having invited him, according to the cuſtom, to a certain ſolemn Feaſt, he acquainted certain Companies of his moſt truſty and valiant Souldiers with his Determination, enjoyning them, that as ſoon as Sahamal was entred into his Court, even in the very diſmounting from his Horſe, they ſhould all fall upon him, cut off his Head, and put all his retinue to the Sword. Which his cruel command was by them accordingly at Sahamals comming put in execution, he in lighting from his Horſe being ſlain, and all his Followers murdered, when forthwith were ſent forth by Oſman two thouſand Horſemen to ſpoil and ſack all the Country of the ſaid Georgian Lord, to the great marvel and aſtoniſhment both of far and near. The Perſian King hearing of theſe News, took the matter grievouſly, as foreſeeing that the recovery of that Country and Province of Siruan would prove a matter of great Difficulty, and fearing greatly that it would ſtill remain (as indeed it doth) in the Poſſeſſion of the Turks. This was the end of the Turks Attempts againſt the Perſians in Siruan this year 1578, wherein they loſt above ſeventy thouſand men, devoured partly with the Sword, and partly with Famine, and the other Miſeries of War. And ſo Winter comming on very ſharply, every man withdrew himſelf from the Field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, untill the comming on of the next Spring.

Sahamal ſlain by Oſman.

The Conſultations of Amurath.

Amurath, advertiſed by Letters from Muſtapha, of all that had hapned in the late Expedition againſt the Perſians, upon theſe proſperous Succeſſes (which the Baſſa had for the advancing of his own Credit deſcribed to be far greater than indeed they were) began to caſt many Devices in his Head, touching ſuch matters as were to be attempted the next year. And firſt, he thought it neceſſary to ſend his Forces again into Siruan, to recover ſuch Places as were firſt conquered by Muſtapha, but afterward again ſubdued by the Perſians; ſo to eſtabliſh his Government in that Country. But upon better conſideration, he ceaſed further to think of that matter, for the great hope he had conceived of the aid that was promiſed him by Tartar Chan, who had faithfully aſſured both him and Oſman, that he would over-run that Province anew, and do great matters in furtherance of the Turks Deſigns; all which for all that fell out to be but windy words; yet in reſpect of this hope he laied Siruan aſide, and committed the defence thereof to the falſe Promiſes of the Tartarian, and the Valour of Oſman. And pleaſing his ambitious Deſires with more haughty Thoughts, he began to deviſe with himſelf for ſending his Army directly to Tauris, there to erect a Fortreſs; which being ſtrongly fortified, and furniſhed with a great Garriſon of moſt valiant Souldiers, ſhould never be again ſubdued by all the power of Perſia; and by this means to keep in Subjection all thoſe great Countries between Tauris and Erzirum. Which his conceit, being of great weight and importance, was much increaſed by the perſwaſion of others, very inward with him; every man being almoſt of Opinion, That it was an eaſie matter for ſo great an Hoſt in few days to perform that Service, and to pierce, not only into Tauris, but farther, to paſs whitherſoever he would deſire. Yet after he had more deeply conſidered of an Enterpriſe of ſo great importance, and with more indifferent Judgment compared his own Forces with his Enemies, he began to find many difficulties and Dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious deſires he at the firſt ſaw not; for beſide the length and tediouſneſs of the Journey, he doubted that in ſending his Army for Tauris, it might be on the other ſide aſſailed by the Georgians (of whoſe obedience he had as yet no great aſſurance) and on the other ſide by the Perſians, and ſo brought into great danger; which he was always to fear, whenſoever he ſhould have occaſion to ſend new ſupplies unto the Fortreſs by him intended at Tauris. Whereupon, laying aſide all his former Conceits, as too eager and perillous, he reſolutely concluded with himſelf, firſt to make ſure his own Borders, and afterwards by little and little to enter into the Enemies Country, ſtill fortifying in convenient Places as he went; and ſo ſurely, although but ſlowly, to triumph over his Enemies, rather than by thruſting his Army headlong upon uncertainties into places ſtrongly fenced both by Nature and the Power of moſt mighty Enemies, to be inforced with ſhame to abandon the enterpriſe ſo haſtily begun.

Muſtapha careful to put in execution Amurath's command.

Of this his Reſolution he advertiſed Muſtapha by Writing, giving him in charge, againſt the next Spring to provide all ſuch things as ſhould be neceſſary for the building of certain Forts upon the way that leadeth from Erzirum into Georgia: that having made thoſe ways ſafe, and brought the People under his obedience, he might afterwards attempt greater matters. Whereupon Muſtapha preſently directed forth Precepts to the Cities of Aleppo, of Damaſco, Caraemit, and other Places of Soria and Meſopotamia, for the taking up of cunning Workmen, of Pioneers, and ſuch like, to the number of twenty thouſand; and likewiſe wrote to all the Countries, out of which he had raiſed his Army the laſt year, That all their Souldiers (yea and in greater number alſo) ſhould be in readineſs againſt the next Spring, to return to the Wars. The rumor whereof he cauſed to be ſpread even as far as Ægypt. He commanded alſo the Taxes and Tenths of thoſe Countries to be collected, and further, uſed the Chambers of Aleppo, and other Places, for ſuch maſſes of Money as he thought neceſſary for theſe purpoſes.

In this while, the two Georgian Brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, ſent (as we have before ſaid) by Muſtapha to Amurath at Conſtantinople, in doubtfull hope, expecting the end for which they were both ſent unto the Court; were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometan Religion, whereunto Manucchiar eaſily yielded. Whereas on the other ſide Alexander his elder Brother could by no Allurements or means be induced induced to conſent to ſo infamous and damnable a change of his Religion, although he knew he ſhould therefore be deprived of his ſtate; but proteſting his Obedience at all times to Amurath, and his love to his Brother, requeſted only, that he might but as a private Man go and live in his Country, there to be buried amongſt his Anceſtors. Which his requeſt the Turkiſh Emperour referred to the Diſcretion of Manucchiar, to do therein as he ſaw good; who conſented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchiar was circumciſed, and the name of Muſtaffa given him, with the Title of the Baſſa and Governour of Altunchala, and of all his Mothers and Brothers Countries: and being thus created a Turk, had his Brother Alexander, a Chriſtian, committed unto him, and ſo both returned into their own Countries.

Emanguli Chan taketh upon him the defence of Siruan,

Now in the Perſian Court at Casbin, were many Conſultations had for the repreſſing of the Invaſions of the Turks. And among others careful of thoſe matters, Emanguli Chan, Governour of Genge, doubting to loſe his honourable Government, by reaſon of the late ſack of his City, and ſpoil of his Country by the Tartarians; by thoſe Plots that were daily in contriving for the ſending of men into Siruan to impeach the Deſignments of Oſman Baſſa, and if it were poſſible, to drive him out of Derbent; took occaſion to offer unto the King, upon pain of his Head, to defend Siruan, and not to ſuffer Oſman the Turk to attempt any new Fortifications, or further Conqueſts in that Province. Of which his offer the King accepted, and thereupon the Government of Genge, and guarding of the Country of Siruan againſt the Forces of Oſman, was frankly committed unto him; and commandment given to the Governours of Tauris, Reivan, and Naſſivan, and to divers other Captains that were neareſt, to be ready at all times with their Power to aſſiſt Emanguli Chan, if it ſhould fortune either the Tartarians or Turks, with any great Power to enter into Siruan: which order ſo taken, was thought ſufficient for the Security of that Province.

But how to protect the Georgian Country, was thought to be a matter of great importance, every man being almoſt of Opinion, That ſome great Power of the Turks ſhould be ſent thither, for the more aſſurance of the Conqueſt thereof already begun, and for the Succour of the Fortreſs at Teflis, which muſt needs otherwiſe fall again into the hand of the Georgians. This matter ſo troubled the Perſian King, as that he ſeemed to have bent his whole Counſels and Thoughts thereupon: When Simon, a Georgian, a famous Captain, (ſometime Priſoner with Iſmahel the late King at Cahaca, and by the familiarity he had with him, ſeduced from the Chriſtian Faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tamas, choſen to live deprived of his Liberty and State) thinking it now a fit time to obtain at the Kings Hand ſuch help as he had long deſired, for the recovery of his Dominion uſurped by David, otherwiſe called Daut Chan, his younger Brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Chriſtian Religion) offered now unto the King his faithful Service, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Country wherein Teflis ſtood (being in right, part of his own Inheritance) againſt the Turks; reproving by way of Diſgrace, his younger Brother of Cowardiſe, and promiſing the performance of great matters in himſelf, both for the Defence of that evil defended Country, and further annoying of the Enemy. With great content did the Perſian King conſent to the requeſt of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Kingdom which he poſſeſſed before whilſt he was a Chriſtian: and ſent with him Aliculi Chan into Georgia, with five thouſand Horſemen, and certain pieces of Artillery taken at Eres, when Caietas Baſſa was ſlain. Simon afterwards coming to Georgia, was joyfully received of his Country-men, and there preſſed about three thouſand Souldiers of his own and of his Neighbours; excuſing himſelf that he was become a Perſian, not becauſe he preferred the Mahometan ſuperſtition before the Chriſtian Religion, but only ſo to be delivered from his long Impriſonment, and by that means to maintain his Eſtate. And in this order were the Affairs of Georgia aſſured and ſtrengthned in the beſt manner that might then be.

The meeting together of the Turks Army at Erzirum.

Now began the Spring to approach, and every man prepared himſelf to the diſcontinued Travels of the Wars begun; and now were met together at Erzirum, out of all the wonted Provinces, all the Turks Forces, with all things neceſſary for the intended War. With this Army, in all things equal with the firſt, Muſtapha ſet forward, and in twelve days came to Chars, not perceiving in his Souldiers any ſign of diſcontentment at all. And foraſmuch as here they were to ſtay, and to fortifie both with Walls and Ditches that ruinated City, and that with as great ſpeed as was poſſible; there was no Remedy, but that beſide the Pioneers and Engineers that were brought for that purpoſe, many of the Spaoglani, yea and of the Janizaries alſo, muſt be ſet to work. Whereupon they all ſuddenly in a tumult, began with bitter Proteſtations to tell the General, That their ſtipends wherewith it pleaſed the Sultan to favour them, were not beſtowed upon them to imploy their Forces and Virtues in ſuch ſervile Works; but only with their Swords and other Weapons, to exerciſe that force and hardineſs for which they were eſteemed worthy of that Honour. Whereunto the General anſwered in moſt haughty Terms, and not yielding one jot to their Incivility, but uſing all means of Authority and Terrour, brought them to work ſo much as he deſired: So that within the ſpace of twenty three days the Towers and Walls were erected, the Ditches digged, the Artillery orderly planted upon the Walls, and the Water brought round about it. Many Inconveniencies happened in the Army while they were buſie in this work; and namely upon the twenty fifth day of Auguſt, when they had almoſt even finiſhed the whole Building, the Souldiers endured a moſt ſudden cold by reaſon of the Snow that then fell in great abundance.

Chars fortified in twenty three days ſpace.

Snows at Chars in Auguſt.

Chars thus fortified, the General reſolved to ſend Succours into Georgia to Teflis; without which it was moſt certain that the Fortreſs would be yielded to the Georgians, [illegible]t in what ſort to relieve it he remained doubtful. To ſend part of his Army with ſome valiant Captain ſeemed dangerous, and to go himſelf with all his Forces, would ſound (as he thought) to his diſcredit with his great Lord and Maſter, whom he had already made believe that he had ſubdued the Georgians, and brought all that Province to his Obedience and Devotion. In this Ambiguity, the deſire he had to preſerve his Credit with Amurath prevailed; and ſo he made choice of Haſſan Baſſa, Son to Muhamet, principal Viſier of the Court, a gallant Gentleman, and of great Valour, to whom he delivered between eighteen and twenty thouſand Souldiers; joyning unto him one Reſuan, Captain of certain Adventurers that voluntarily offered themſelves to follow the Forces of Haſſan; aſſigning unto him likewiſe forty thouſand Duckets, and many loads of Rice, Meal, and Barley, with other things neceſſary both for Diet and War, and ſo ſent him away for Teflis.

Haſſan Baſſa ſent with twenty thouſand to the ſuccour of Teflis.

Haſſan with this charge ſet forward, fully reſolved to put theſe ſuccours into Teflis, or to loſe all: and at length came to the famous Streight of Tomanis, nis, where the over-grown Woods on the one ſide, and the deep Vallies and craggie Rocks on the other, would aſtoniſh a right conſtant Beholder. When upon the ſudden, the Perſians and the Georgians, under the Conduct of Aliculi Chan and Simon, at unawares ſet upon the Turks, and joined Battel with them. For theſe two valiant Captains, remaining for the moſt part in the Borders of Teſlis and Tomanis with 8000 Souldiers, waiting for ſome Opportunity to annoy either them of the Fort of Teſlis, or elſe ſuch as ſhould come to their Succours; underſtanding by their eſpials, of the coming of Haſſan with this aid, had ſcattered themſelves all along the ſaid Streight, in hope there to aſſail the Turks, and, holpen by the advantage of the Place, to drive them headlong into the deep Valley, and at once to bereave them both of their Goods and Life. But Haſſan, careful of nothing more than how to avoid that danger, choſe rather to make his Journey through the thick Woods, and ſo as he might to eſcape the ambuſh that the Enemy might lay for him upon that ſtraight Paſſage.

The Perſians aſſail the Turks, and make of them a great ſlaughter.

And ſo entring with his Army into the Wood, which he was to have left upon his left hand, to diſcover what might be plotted againſt him, he was hardly charged by the Enemy, and conſtrained to fight with a thouſand windings and turnings in and out, through a thouſand crooked Paths and doubtful Cranks, in a moſt confuſed medly, with great ſlaughter of his Men: who, not accuſtomed to this kind of Fight, nor acquainted with the ſcituation of the place, were in the skirmiſh driven ſo far, that down they fell, and being not able to recover themſelves, were preſently ſlain. And thus with much ado he at length paſſed the Streight of Tomanis. Haſſan, deeming himſelf much diſgraced by ſuffering his Enemies, in number ſo far inferior, to have done him ſo much harm, and ſo to have eſcaped his hands; and further, conſidering that in ſuch Places, ſleights and ſtratagems more avail than open Forces; burning with deſire of revenge, would needs ſtay near unto thoſe Streights, as if it had been to refreſh his wearied Army, but indeed to try if the Perſians would adventure again to trouble him, or no: and appointed Reſuan Baſſa with certain Bands of the Souldiers of Grace, and of his own Adventurers, to lie in ambuſh within the covert of the Streight, attentive to every ſtir of the Enemy. Two days the Turks Army lay thus divided, and were now reſolved the third day to remove thence towards Teſlis; when as the Perſian Captains, Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainly imagining that this ſtay of the Turks was for fear of the Perſians, fooliſhly returned, and gave a freſh onſet upon the flank of Haſſans Squadrons.

The Perſians overthrown, and Aliculi Chan taken.

Who forthwith raiſing all his Souldiers, and giving a ſign to Reſuan, with all ſpeed compaſſed in his Enemies, and ſtraightning them on both ſides, took ſome of them alive, cut in pieces other ſome, and put all the reſt to flight. Among others that were taken alive, was Aliculi Chan, the Perſian Captain, who over-raſhly charging upon the face of Haſſan, fell into his Hand.

The Miſery of the Turks in Garriſon at Teſlis.

The next day following (being the eleventh day after Haſſans departure from Chars) he joyfully arrived at Teſlis, where he found among the poor beſieged Turks many Miſeries; whereof ſome were already dead, and ſome yet ſick, for they were ſo plagued with Famine, that they not only devoured their Horſes, but even the very Skins of the ſame Horſes, of Sheep, and of Dogs, and in ſuch moſt miſerable wants had paſſed the time; whom Haſſan at his arrival comforted with Gifts and good Words, exhorting them to perſiſt conſtant in the ſervice of their King, whoſe Honour (as he ſaid) was never more than there to be reſpected. And for as much as the Souldiers of the Fort did with one Voice requeſt Haſſan to appoint them a new Governour, becauſe they did miſlike Mahamet Baſſa, who the laſt year was left by the General in that Fort; Haſſan removed the ſaid Mahamet, and put Amet Baſſa in his place: and ſo after he had filled up the places of the dead Souldiers with a new ſupply, and ſet all things in order, he took his leave, recommending the charge and cuſtody of that Fort to their Truſt and Valour. Haſſan returning from Teſlis, and being without any trouble come to the Streight of Tomanis, was advertiſed by his Scouts, That it was ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the Enemy, and ſo ſhut up with Artillery, as that it was not to be paſſed through: for Simon, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that Haſſan would return that way, had ſo belayed that Streight, as that the Turks could not without moſt aſſured loſs paſs the ſame: which thing much troubled the Baſſa, and filled his head with many Conceits, how he might make his Journey ſome other way, and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtful what to do, or which way to turn himſelf; Aliculi Chan the Perſian (who to purchaſe his Liberty could have been content to have done any thing) offered Haſſan to ſhew him a ſhort and ſafe cut, whereby he might without danger paſs with his Army out of that troubleſom Country; yet covenanting before, that he ſhould promiſe him to ſet him at Liberty for his ſo good Service. Which his requeſt the Baſſa did not ſtick in large manner to promiſe, although he afterwards to his great diſhonour performed not the ſame. So bending his Journey on the right hand, he was guided by Aliculi through ſtrange and uncouth wayes, out of thoſe Woods and Dangers, not meeting ſo much as with one of his Enemies. But when the Perſian Duke well-hoping for his Liberty, put the Turk in mind of his promiſe; he with deep and feigned ſighs proteſted, That he was right ſorry that he could not perform what he had promiſed to do for him, foraſmuch as it lay not in his Power to ſet any man at Liberty, that was taken in Battel by the Souldiers of his great Lord and Soveraign: yet gave him his faith, that ſo far as his Intreaties and Favours with the General Muſtapha could prevail, he would uſe all the moſt earneſt means he could to procure his liberty and return to his own Country.

Simon deſtroyed the rereward of Haſſan's Army, and taketh from him his Treaſure.

Simon the Georgian, perceiving that the Turks were removed, imagined forthwith that they had taken this new way: but being afterward certified by his faithful Spies, that it was ſo indeed, he ran all headlong, and as it were deſperate, to meet with this ſo happy an Army. And all inflamed with rage for this great Fortune of the Turks, he fell upon the tail of the Turkiſh Hoſt, which with unmeaſurable Fury he wholly deſtroyed, leading away with him all the People, all the Horſes, and all the Treaſure of Mahamet Baſſa which he brought from Teſlis, and all the Treaſure of Haſſan Baſſa likewiſe. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon moſt greedily ſought for, he was ſent way in the front of the Army, ſo that he was not to be reſcued. Haſſan holding on his way, came to Chars in the ſpace of eight days after his departure from Teſlis, and there preſented unto Muſtapha the General, the Perſian Captain Aliculi, recounting unto him the dangers he had indured, and whatſoever elſe had happened in that Expedition. Aliculi, the unfortunate Perſian, was by the commandment of Muſtapha carried to Erzirum, and there in the Caſtle committed to Priſon.

Muſtapha returneth to Erzirum, and there diſchargeth his Army.

Not long after, Muſtapha returned himſelf alſo to the ſaid City of Erzirum, with his Army ſore weakned and diſcontented, which was there preſently by him diſcharged.

About the ſame time that theſe things were in doing, Amurath, to make a ſafer and more eaſie paſſage for his Forces into Georgia, ſent Vluzales his Admiral with a great Fleet into the Euxine Sea to Mengrelia, called in ancient time Cholchis; who entering the famous River of Phaſis (now Faſſa) there fortified, and laid ſuch a beginning, that it is now one of the Turks proud Beglerbegſhips, although thoſe Fortifications, ſhortly after the departure of the Admiral, were for the preſent again by the Mengrelians demoliſhed. And this was the end of the ſtirs of this year 1579.

Of all theſe Succeſſes Muſtapha afterwards ſent Advertiſements to the Court to Amurath, recounting unto him the fortifying of Chars, the Deſerts of Haſſan, as well for the ſuccouring of Teflis, as for the taking of Aliculi the Perſian. And becauſe the ſaid General had the year before perſwaded Amurath, That the Country of Georgia, and the People thereof, were brought under his Obedience, to the end that he ſhould not marvel at ſo many Loſſes and ſo many Battels, and thereby doubt of ſome falſe Informations; he declared unto him, that all theſe Troubles were not raiſed by the natural and home-bred Georgians, but by two certain Captains, Aliculi and Simon, ſent out of Perſia, who had made all theſe ſtirs; of which one of them now remained with him in Priſon, for him to determine of at his Pleaſure. With great Delight did the Turkiſh Emperour read all that Muſtapha had written, and by two of his Gentlemen-Uſhers ſent to Haſſan a Battle-axe all gilt and ſet full of Stones, a Targuet of Gold and Pearl, and a rich Garment of Cloth of Gold, in reward of his good Service, for which he greatly commended him; and withall gave order, That Aliculi ſhould be kept where he was in the Caſtle of Erzirum, in diligent and ſafe Cuſtody.

Haſſan Baſſa rewarded for his good Service by Amurath.

Theſe Invaſions of the Turks much troubled the Perſian King in his Court at Casbin, conſidering, that now they had both throughly acquainted themſelves with all the Paſſages into Georgia, (in the difficulty and roughneſs whereof conſiſted the chief defence of that Province) as alſo that divers of the Georgian Princes were more than inclining unto the Turks Service; ſo that he could not but juſtly fear, that his Enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble Cities of Media the greater, yea and peradventure even unto Tauris before any of the reſt. Which his care of foreign Invaſion was doubled with domeſtical Fears; Mirize Salmas, his chief Viſier, and upon whom he moſt reſted, ſtill filling his Head with a jealous Suſpition, That Abas Marize's Son (made Governour of Heri, by Tamas his Grandfather,) was about in theſe Troubles with the Turk, to proclaim himſelf King of Perſia, to the great Ignominy of his Father, and Prejudice of Emir Hamze, his eldeſt Brother, the worthy and undoubted Heir of that Kingdom. This Mirize Salmas (according to his longing deſire) had married a Daughter of his to the ſaid Emir Hamze, with the Conſent of the King his Father; but yet not content with that Honour, ceaſed not continually with ambitious Devices, to ſeek out means how to bring to paſs, that the Perſian Eſtate might wholly remain to his Son-in-law, undivided and intire from the Participation of his Brethren; and therefore little regarding the Perils that might happen from the Turks, and blinded with the deſire of his own greatneſs, he went about to turn the King (being a man very credulous and inconſiderate) againſt Abas Marize; either to take him and commit him to Priſon, or at leaſt to bereave him of all Authority and Command. And the better to perſwade the King thereunto, he diſcovered unto him, how little Abas Marize's Son had reſpected him in divers Occaſions; and that in theſe late Wars he had not ſo much as ſent forth one man againſt the Turks, but had forbidden ſuch as were of his Juriſdiction of Heri, to come to Casbin, at ſuch time as they were ſummoned both by Letters and Commandment, to have paſſed with Emir Hamze into Siruan; by reaſon whereof not one of them would ſtir a foot, anſwering, That they were enjoyned ſo to do by Abas Marize, their Lord; who had not only cauſed himſelf to be called King of Heri, but had given it out, that he meant to claim the Succeſſion in the whole Kingdom. Theſe complaints much prevailed with the King, both in reſpect of the love he bare to Emir Hamze, his eldeſt Son, and alſo of the credit he gave to his Viſier; eſpecially being accompanied with the crafty packing of the ſaid Viſier; who as he was very cunning in ſuch Practiſes of himſelf, ſo did he make them much more effectual with the effeminate King, by the means of divers great Ladies, and other Devices that were to him very familiar and uſual: Inſomuch that the King, carried away with light belief, did continually bethink himſelf how to find Opportunity to repreſs the boldneſs of his diſobedient Son; not forgetting for all that, to make ſuch preparation againſt the Turks, as ſhould be ſufficient to ſtay their Paſſage to Tauris, if they had any purpoſe ſo to do. But leaving the Perſian King to his troubled Cogitations for a while, let us again return unto the Turks General, the great Baſſa Muſtapha.

He now lying at Erzirum, after many troubles abroad, was ſurpriſed, and almoſt overwhelmed with unexpected Quarrels at home, many grievous Complaints being made of him to Amurath, whereby he was induced afterwards to take from him his Generalſhip, and to call him to the Court to give account of his Actions. Which ſeemed not to be done without cauſe, he having before raiſed a great Diſcontentment in the Mind of Amurath, by ſending ſuch a ſtrong power to the Succours of Teflis; whereby he conjectured, that the Affairs of Georgia were not in ſuch Security as Muſtapha had already informed him they were, and alſo generally offended the Minds of the Souldiers of his Army, who all in an uprore, accuſed him of Improvidence and Prodigality, for that now this ſecond year he had with ſo much ado gathered together ſuch a number of Souldiers, to the trouble of the whole Empire, and infinite charge of their Lord, and yet performed nothing worthy the Glory of Amurath, or anſwerable to ſo great a charge. Which Complaints, although they were of ſome moment, yet would the Turkiſh Emperour, for the great Favours he bare unto him his antient Tutor, never have conſtrued them ſo hardly againſt him, as for the ſame to have been induced to have deprived him of his place, if the inveterate envy of Sinan Baſſa had not miniſtred ſtrength and force to theſe hard Accuſations, and ſet (as it were) an edge upon Amurath to do what he afterwards did.

Muſtapha diſcharged of his Generalſhip, and called home to Conſtantinople.

This Sinan was a moſt antient Enemy to Muſtapha, and in all things thought himſelf his match. For if Muſtapha had ſubdued Cyprus, ſo had he conquered Tripolis, Guletta, with the Kingdom of Tunes in Affricke: and if Muſtapha were a man of great Courage, and reverend for his years, Sinan would be his equal both in the one and the other; yea, and did not ſtick to think himſelf his better too, for that in the enterpriſe of Giamen in Arabia, he performed ſuch an Exploit as Muſtapha neither durſt, nor yet knew how to put in Execution, ſo carrying away the Glory of that famous Conqueſt; for which ever after there was between them a continual heart-burning, one of them envying at the others Glory, and both in Word and Deed, as Occaſions fell out, in all things oppoſing themſelves one againſt the other. At laſt happens this Opportunity for Sinan, who taking the occaſion of the Complaints of ſo many againſt Muſtapha, cauſed a great number of them to frame their Supplications Sinan accuſeth Muſtapha to Amurath.

1579 to Amurath, which he for his part did in moſt malignant manner inforce and exaggerate againſt his old Adverſary, accuſing him, that this ſecond year he had moſt manifeſtly ſhewed himſelf to have gone unto the Wars, not as a worthy General, deſirous of noble and honourable Enterpriſes, but as a man that would make merchandiſe of Blood, and of his Souldiers pay; employing the moſt liberal Proviſion of Corn and Money, not as Rewards of well-deſerving men, nor to the erecting of ſuch Fabricks as were needful, and might have been built therewithall, but onely to his own proper gain, ſo to inrich himſelf with his Peoples loſſes, to the great ſhame of his Lord, and conſuming of the publick Treaſure; adding hereunto, that if the things done by Muſtapha were well ſearched, it would be found, that he had neglected many good Opportunities, attempted many things in vain, and not done any good either to the Emperour or his Souldiers, but only to himſelf; whom rather than they would follow again as their General, all his People in an uprore ſhewed themſelves ready and willing to adventure themſelves in any other far greater Labour that by their Lord and Soveraign ſhould be commanded them.

Theſe and ſuch like Complaints, with the hard Opinion already conceived againſt him by Amurath, were the occaſion why he reſolved to put him from his place. Beſide that, he thought it a thing dangerous to his ſtate, to ſuffer one and the ſelf ſame General any long time to command over ſo great Armies; deeming it not ſo much for his Honour, ſtill to employ one man, as to ſhew that he had variety and choice of Subjects, worthy of ſo great a charge. And therefore, being deſirous to find out the truth of that was reported to him concerning Muſtapha, he ſent the chief of his Gentlemen Porters, with fifteen others, to bring him to the Court, with his Chancellour and Treaſurer, to ſhew the accounts of ſuch Monies as he had received, and to give up an account of their whole Office. Unto this Meſſenger had Amurath delivered three divers Letters, which he ſhould warily ſhew, as occaſion ſerved; one of them was ſo written of purpoſe, that Muſtapha in the receiving thereof might by the ſame Meſſengers be ſtrangled; in the ſecond was the Emperours warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded; and in the third was contained, that Muſtapha ſhould forthwith ſend his Chancellour and Treaſurer to the Court by thoſe Meſſengers. Muſtapha in the mean time by divers means, but eſpecially by the guilt of his own Conſcience, venting the Diſpleaſure of the Emperour towards him, and ſuſpecting (as the truth was) his Life to be by thoſe Meſſengers ſought after, at ſuch time as the Captain-Porter came to his Camp, found many delays to put him off, and would not in any caſe be ſpoken withal. But when the Meſſenger would indure no longer delay, he was at length admitted to his preſence, having a circle appointed for him, out of which he and his Companions might not ſtir or approach nearer unto him, the Baſſa's Guard ſtanding in Arms round about him. The Meſſenger perceiving the Baſſa's warineſs, wilily pluck'd forth the third Letters, concerning the ſending of his Chancellour and Treaſurer to the Court. Then began the crafty old Baſſa to find many excuſes to have delayed the matter; but being hardly preſſed by the Meſſenger, and ſeeing no other Remedy, he with much difficulty delivered them both, covenanting before with the Meſſenger, to have both their Lives ſpared; who coming to Conſtantinople, were forthwith clapt faſt into the Tower called Jadicula, as there to have been ſeverely examined of all the doings of the Baſſa. But Muſtapha, after long delay, coming at length to 1579 Conſtantinople, the ninth of April in the Spring following, and uſing the mighty and potent mediation of divers great Ladies, and other his gracious Friends in Court, prevailed ſo much in that corrupt Government, as that he was again at length received into the Favour of Amurath, without any further proceeding againſt Him, his Chancellour, or Treaſurer, who by his means were afterwards alſo inlarged and ſet at liberty; yet was he never after admitted to thoſe Honours, which he perſwaded himſelf were of right due unto him, for his good and faithful ſervice of long time done to the Othoman Emperours.

Jo. Leuncla. in ſupplement. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 79.

Muſtapha by the Mediation of certain great Ladies appeaſeth the diſpleaſure of Amurath.

In this time that Muſtapha was General at Erzirum, Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa was treacherouſly ſlain at Conſtantinople; after whom, ſhortly died alſo Achmet Baſſa, who ſucceeded in his place; ſo that the ſaid ſovereign Dignity, in Honour next unto the Turkiſh Emperour, was by rightful Succeſſion due to Muſtapha, the next Baſſa; but that he was not thought worthy of it by him that might, and of right ought to have gratified him therewith, as ſhall be a little hereafter declared, when we have briefly ſet down the ſudden and ſtrange death of the ſaid Muhamet the Viſier, worthy in all Hiſtories to be regiſtred, as a mirrour for all ſuch as adminiſter Juſtice in ſo great place, to look upon.

The ſtrange Death of the great Viſier Baſſa Muhamet.

This Baſſa, a man of as great Fame as ever was any that had Government in the Othoman Empire, in the time that he all commanded, had for ſome light cauſes deprived a certain Souldier of Conſtantinople of his yearly Penſion, which, with many Labours and Dangers he had gotten to maintain himſelf; which Penſion the Baſſa beſtowed upon another Souldier, ſo that the other poor Soul remained in Miſery, altogether unprovided for. Unto which miſerable eſtate ſeeing himſelf now brought, and not guilty to himſelf of any Fault worthy ſo great Puniſhment, he determined with himſelf, to revenge the Injury with the Blood of that great Baſſa, and to bereave him of Life, that had bereft him of Living; which, becauſe he could not by any fit means put in Execution (by reaſon of the Guard of Slaves that kept the Perſon of the Viſier, ſo that no man can come near him that holdeth that high place) except he could by ſome means acquaint himſelf in the Viſiers Houſe, and ſo inſinuate himſelf into his acquaintance; he reſolved to take upon him the rude habit of thoſe religious, which the Turks call Deruiſlars, and after their manner to preſent himſelf every Morning before the Viſier, to ask his Alms, and ſo he did, counterfeiting withall, a certain kind of folly and lightneſs of Mind, as do thoſe Deruiſlars, to make the People believe, that they contemn all worldly things, as men raviſhed only with heavenly Cogitations; which yet was by ſome that knew him, thought to have hapned in him, through the Grief he had conceived for the loſs of his ſtipend. Muhamet not only the firſt time, but alſo at all other times that this counterfeit Hypocrite came before him, cauſed him to be comforted with his Alms, and as it were with a kind of private ſtipend, enjoyned him every Morning to come unto him into the Divano, and there, together with others appointed for the ſame purpoſe, to ſay his devout Prayers, and in ſinging Praiſes to their wicked Prophet, to intreat God for his Salvation; for it is a cuſtom of all the Noble-men, that at ordinary hours of Prayers, all their Prieſts aſſemble themſelves in the Divano, which is made ready for them, and there all together the infidel Wretches do with their unclean Mouths mumble up their ſuperſtitious Prayers, or rather moſt abominable Blaſphemies. By this means did this diſſembling Companion ſo inſinuate himſelf into the Viſiers Acquaintance,

1579 that the counterfeit fool went in and out of the Divano at his Pleaſure, no man gain-ſaying either his going in or coming out, but daily ſat in the Preſence of the Viſier, and ſo having ſaid his Prayers, and taken his Alms, with all Reverence quietly departed. At laſt, when the crafty Hypocrite thought that the time was come wherein he might moſt fitly execute his purpoſe, having utterly reſolved with himſelf to die, ſo that he might ſatisfie the Deſire he had of Revenge, ſo long covertly foſtered in his Heart; having conveyed a very ſharp Dagger ſecretly into one of his Sleeves, he went according to his Cuſtom, to require his Alms, with an aſſured Reſolution (when he had ſaid his Prayers, and reached out his hands to receive his wonted Alms) ſpeedily to charge upon the Viſier, and with the Dagger to ſtrike him to the Heart. According to the accuſtomed manner was the counterfeit Hypocrite (for who would ever have ſuſpected ſo long and ſo traiterous a deſignment) admitted into the Divano, where Muhamet the Viſier ſat in his Houſe, to give publick audience, and after the uſual manner, before any of the ſuters that attended for anſwers and diſpatch of their buſineſs ſuſpected any ſuch deceit, he was admitted near to the Viſier, and ſitting right againſt him, according to his old wont, poured out thoſe vain Devotions which thoſe hypocritical Barbarians uſe to mumble up in their Prayers; which being finiſhed, whilſt the Viſier ſimply reacheth unto him his wonted Alms, the traiterous Villain in receiving it, ſuddenly drew out his Dagger, and once or twice ſtabbed it into the Viſiers Breaſt, out of which ſo deadly Wounds guſhed out his Blood and Life together. Whereupon the ſtanders by, aſtoniſhed with the ſtrangeneſs of the Act, ran in, but lo the old hoary Viſier lay all ſoiled in his own Blood, deadly pale, and breathing forth his laſt gaſp. The miſchievous murderer they preſently laid hands upon, and bound him faſt; but the Rumor of the ſtrange fact did by and by flie unto the Emperours Ears, who, ſuſpecting that ſome of the other great Baſſa's, deſiring to mount into that high Dignity, had provoked the Traitor to do this deteſtable Act, would needs underſtand of the traiterous Murderer, what occaſion had moved him ſo treacherouſly to kill his Viſier. Who reſolutely anſwered him, That he did it to deliver the City of Conſtantinople from the Tyranny of him, by whom he was undeſervedly deprived of his Penſion. But when he could get no other anſwer of him, he delivered him into the hands of the Slaves of the dead Viſier, who with moſt exquiſite Torments put him to death.

Muhamet thus dead, after him ſucceeded Achmetes the next Baſſa, who (as is before ſaid) ſhortly after died alſo; ſo that it was now Muſtapha's courſe to ſucceed in that chief room, for that he was the third in the order of the Baſſaes. But when he had uſed all the means that he poſſibly could, to have obtained that ſo honourable a place by order due unto him; yet could he not find ſo much grace in the ſight of Amurath, his great Lord, as to have it granted him under Seal, although in effect he made him ſit as Viſier, and all matters of State were brought unto him as chief Viſier: but in his ſtead the Seal was ſent to Sinan Baſſa, who was now made General for the Perſian Wars. Which diſgrace not a little diſcontented Muſtapha, fearing leſt ſome other ſtrange accident ſhould in ſhort time light upon him.

Sinan Baſſa choſen General for the Perſian War.

After that Muſtapha was thus diſplaced from his Generalſhip, Amurath nominated Sinan Baſſa to be General in his ſtead, for this Expedition againſt the Perſians, and for the Preſervation of Chars and Teflis; giving him ſovereign Authority to command, and to ſet in order all ſuch Preparations as he ſhould think neceſſary for ſuch Enterpriſes as he ſhould think good to attempt in his firſt year; who although by reaſon of his great favour, he grew haughty and Glorious, yet did he not foreſlow to diſcourſe throughly with himſelf upon all his Deſignments: and namely, beſide the ſuccouring of Teflis, he determined to build a Fort at Tomanis, to aſſure the Paſſage thither from Chars; and withall to attempt all the means he could to induce the Perſian King to ſend Ambaſſadors for Peace, with ſuch Conditions as ſhould be acceptable to Amurath. With theſe and ſuch like Diſcourſes did he buſie himſelf whilſt he was yet making preparation to ſet forwards towards Erzirum.

The Perſian King ſendeth Maxut Chan his Ambaſſador to Amurath.

Of all theſe changes and alterations was the Perſian King advertiſed, as alſo that this new Turkiſh General Sinan was careful how this long War might by ſome means be appeaſed, and a good Peace concluded. Upon which occaſion, and by the Perſwaſion of Leuent Ogli, the Georgian, and of Mirize Salmas the Viſier, he was induced to ſend Ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople, to demand Peace of Amurath. Upon which Reſolution he diſpatched Maxut Chan (of ſome called Maxudes) his Ambaſſador, with direction that he ſhould go to Sinan, and of him to receive Guides to conduct him to Conſtantinople with Letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in him, to labour for the pacifying of all theſe troubles: and in any caſe to conclude upon it, ſo that he would be content with Chars and Teflis. With theſe Inſtructions the Ambaſſador departed, and at length arrived at Chars, and ſo came to Erzirum, and was from thence conducted towards Amaſia. But when he came to Sivas, he found Sinan the General there encamped, gathering together his Army for the Execution of his Deſignments: for Sinan, upon the arrival of Muſtapha, departing from Conſtantinople the five and twentieth day of April, was now come ſo far on his way. Of the coming of this Ambaſſador, the Turks received great Joy, and News thereof was in poſt ſent by Cicala Baſſa to the Court. The Perſian Ambaſſador informed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalf of King Mahamet; and laboured earneſtly to perſwade him of the Equity of the Cauſe, and of his Requeſt; declaring unto him, That foraſmuch as both the Nations were conjoyned under the Law of Mahomet their common Prophet (though there ſeemed ſome ſmall difference not worth thoſe troubles) it were a very inconvenient thing for them to contend among themſelves, and to ſeek the overthrow or utter deſtruction of one another; and that therefore he was in good hope to obtain of Amurath this deſired Peace, if he had no other cauſe wherewith he found himſelf agrieved, as in truth he had not. Wherefore he beſought the General, that he would with ſafe Convoy conduct him to Amurath, to the end that, if it were poſſible, theſe bloody Wars might take end; at the very report whereof, the reſt of the World rejoyced, and ſtood attentively waiting to ſee what would be the iſſue thereof.

This Ambaſſador Sinan entertained after the beſt manner the rudeneſs of his Nature would afford; and thinking that the very fame of his Valour had wrought in the Minds of his Enemies this Reſolution, to come to demand Peace, granted unto the Ambaſſador a ſure Convoy to conduct him to Conſtantinople; and wrote to Amurath in his Letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, repreſenting unto him what great and important matters (he hoped) might now be obtained. But before he diſmiſſed the ſaid Ambaſſador, he adviſed him not to go to Amurath, without Reſolution to offer unto him ſome great good Conditions, and to yield unto him all that Country which he by force of Arms had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath very well, that he was reſolved in himſelf, not to yield ſo much as one hands breadth of that Ground which he had won with the Sword. Which motion of the pround Baſſa ſo troubled the Ambaſſador, that fearing he ſhould not be able to conclude any thing, he ſtood in doubt, whether to proceed on his Journey to Conſtantinople, or to return back again into Perſia; but conſidering better what belonged to his Duty in ſo weighty a buſineſs, and hoping to receive more reaſonable Conditions from the mouth of Amurath himſelf, he gave large words to Sinan, and ſo with a ſafe Convoy departed from Sivas, and by long Journeys came to Scutari, and ſo paſſing over that little ſtrait, the fourth of Auguſt arrived at Conſtantinople.

The Preparations of the Perſian King againſt the Turks.

The Perſian King in the mean time, ſtirred up with the report of the Turks Preparations, to cauſe it to be noiſed, that he likewiſe intended ſome important matters, commanded all the Chans and Governours of his Kingdom, to meet together with all their Forces at Tauris, where he himſelf, with the Prince Emir Hamze his Son, met them. And after many Conſultations there had for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh Invaſion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant to attempt) he reſolved to ſend Souldiers into Georgia towards Teſlis, whether of neceſſity Succours muſt be ſent by the Turks to them of the Fort; and withall, determined alſo to go himſelf with all his Army from Tauris to Caracach, a place very commodious and near, to guard both Tauris and Siruan, being ſcituate even in the middeſt between the one and the other; and there to expect the removing of Sinan, whoſe ambitious Nature the King knowing, doubted that he, to ſurmount Muſtapha, would attempt ſome great Enterpriſe; yea peradventure, to run even upon Tauris. But when it came to the point that he ſhould ſend ſome of his Captains into Georgia, he made choice of ſuch as had beſt experience of thoſe Countries, and were neareſt unto him; with whom he ſent Tocomac alſo, and the reſt, whoſe Service he had before uſed againſt the Turks: commanding them to joyn their Forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all means poſſible to annoy the Enemy; whom, if they ſhould perceive to bend for Tauris, they ſhould not fail to follow him; to the end they might joyn together with him, and ſo incounter the Enemies Army. All thoſe Captains were reſolute men, and led with them ten thouſand Souldiers, which being joyned with them of Georgia, amounted to the number of thirteen thouſand: who, arriving at Genge, gave knowledge to Simon of their coming, and that in his behalf they were ready to do great Matters.

Now was the Perſian Ambaſſador with all due honour received at Conſtantinople, where he was honourably entertained by the great Baſſaes of the Court, but eſpecially by Muſtapha, who within two days after, ſuddenly died; of a ſurfeit taken of eating too much of Musk-melons, and immoderate drinking of Zerbet, (a kind of pleaſant drink which the Turks uſe, made of Water and Sugar:) but moſt men thought him to have poiſoned himſelf, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be again inflamed by the new complains of the Perſian Ambaſſador againſt him, for that he in the time of his Generalſhip, had diſhonourably ſuppreſſed certain Ambaſſages ſent from the Perſian King; which he now fearing to be called in queſtion for, the former ſtorms as yet ſcarce well appeaſed, made himſelf now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if he had longer lived, he ſhould have been undoubtedly ſtrangled; which to prevent, he became the worthy Executioner of himſelf, that had moſt unjuſtly cauſed others to be moſt ſhamefully murdered. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather believed, for that the infinite Wealth he had of long time ſcraped together, was immediately after his Death taken into the Kings Treaſuries, ſome ſmall portion thereof being left unto his Nephews; a moſt certain token of Amuraths Indignation againſt him.

The Perſian Ambaſſador having audience the ſeventh of Auguſt, with many lively Reaſons and much Eloquence, perſwaded the Turkiſh Emperour to deſiſt from the War begun, as contrary to the Will and Pleaſure of their common Prophet Mahomet; as alſo to the Peace, which was ſo royally, and with ſo many Capitulations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his Grandfather; and was not to have been broken, and Wars raiſed, but upon ſome great Quarrel or Injury done; which the Perſians had not at any time offered, but had always wiſhed unto him all Happineſs, as they had manifeſtly declared, by ſending unto him an Embaſſage to that purpoſe by Sultan Tocamac; whereby he might plainly perceive the good mind and zeal the Perſian King had for the maintenance of the Peace. And although in the ſhort reign of Iſmahel, there was ſome Rumor raiſed, that he meant to go unto Babylonia, and ſome ſuch like News: yet that was but a youthful part, and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to ſuch as being kept long in ſtrait Priſon, cannot uſe their Liberty with Moderation, and had therefore received due Puniſhment for it, by ſudden and unexpected death. But as for the King that now is, he did above all others, imbrace amity with his Majeſty, and therefore did moſt earneſtly deſire, that it would pleaſe him to temper his Anger conceived, which had incenſed him to take up Arms againſt a King ſo much his Friend; being of the ſame Religion, and better affected towards him than all the reſt of the Nations in the World.

This Ambaſſador the Turkiſh Emperour diſmiſſed without any Reſolution at all, but onely gave order, that whatſoever he had to ſay touching this Peace, he ſhould communicate it with his Viſier. Many were the Diſcourſes which hapned, for that the Turk required all thoſe Cities and Countries, which till that time he had conquered with the Sword, or (as their proud manner of Phraſe is) whereon his Generals Horſe had trod, to be yielded again unto him; and the Ambaſſador on the other ſide, had no warrant from his King to yield any more than that part of Georgia, which is on this ſide the River of Araxis. Whereupon the ſaid Ambaſſador began to fear, leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected for a Spy, and ſo be evil intreated: wherewithall he did find himſelf too manifeſtly charged by the hard ſpeech that the Viſier uſed towards him. Being thus doubtful whereupon to reſolve, perceiving himſelf ſtrained to the grant of theſe demands, and receiving alſo ſome threatnings withall, he determined with himſelf to inlarge his Speeches with the Viſier in divers and ſundry particularities, and to give him good hope that he ſhould be able to perſwade with his King, the yielding up of ſo much as Amurath had and did demand. Hereupon was Maxut Chan the Ambaſſador in friendly manner and without any outrage ſent from Conſtantinople to Chars, and Commiſſion given to Sinan (then at Chars) that without delay, and with all fidelity, he ſhould cauſe the Ambaſſador to be conducted to Van, and from thence into Perſia, whereſoever he did deſire; all which was faithfully performed.

Sinan* muſtereth his Army at Erzirum.

But to return again to Sinan the General, who from Sivas had ſent the ſaid Ambaſſadour to Conſtantinople (as is before declared;) and being departed parted thence, arrived at Erzirum, where he took a Survey of his Army, and other Proviſion neceſſary for this Expedition: and ſo from thence was now come to Chars, from whence he diſpatched the Perſian Ambaſſadour, much diſcontented that no other Concluſion for Peace could be wrought.

Maxut Chan reporteth unto the King what he hath done, and is for his good ſervice by him rewarded.

Maxut Chan at laſt arriving at the Perſian Court, reported unto the King all that had happened in this his Ambaſſage; the ſum whereof was, That Amurath would not condeſcend to any condition of Peace, unleſs the whole Country of Siruan might be yielded unto him, for that he had once (as he ſaid) conquered the ſame. Neither did the ſame Ambaſſador forbear to tell the King the Suſpition Amurath had conceived of him, to have been a Spie rather than an Ambaſſador; and of the large Promiſes he was fain to make to the Turk, to avoid the manifeſt danger of Impriſonment, or Death: all which for all that, now lay in his Majeſties Power to perform or not. The King for the preſent remained well ſatisfied with that Maxut had done, and in reward of his great travel and expences, gave him the charge of the Chamber at Tauris, naming him the Chamberlain of that rich and great City. Of which new Office (though very honourable, and of great importance) he took ſmall Pleaſure, for that one Emir Chan, his ancient Enemy, was chief Governour of that City, from whom he feared ſome dangerous treachery; wherefore he appointed his Deputy for the Execution of the Office, and withdrew himſelf from Tauris to Caſſangich, a place of his own, there to paſs away the time untill it ſhould pleaſe the King otherwiſe to diſpoſe of him. But Emir Chan, who ſtill nouriſhed in his mind the ancient hatred he had conceived againſt him, took this as a moſt fit occaſion to bring him into diſgrace with the King; certifying him, That Maxut, not contented with the great preferment it had pleaſed him to beſtow upon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned Tauris, and ſubſtituted in his place a moſt baſe Perſon to repreſent the King's Majeſty, and to manage his Treaſure: and that he abſented himſelf far from that City and the Court there, having withdrawn himſelf into the Confines of Turkie, no doubt for ſome miſchievous intent, either to yield himſelf unto them, or elſe to have Intelligence with them, and was like enough to be guilty to himſelf of the great Errour he had already committed, by offering Siruan unto the Turkiſh King; and making promiſe of ſo large Conditions, whereby he had obtained ſuch a ſure and ſafe Convoy to conduct him; when as he had before diſcovered himſelf to be a Favourer of the Turks, and a Traitor to his own King: and that therefore it were good to make trial of his Inclination, and ſo peradventure to decline ſome great Miſchief, tending to the danger of the Perſian State. This malicious Accuſation ſlily contrived, ſo wrought in the mind of the ſuſpitious King, that he commanded Emir Chan ſecretly to apprehend Maxut, and to bring him to the Court, and (if he could not by other means) then by torture to wreſt from him the truth of all thoſe matters. Glad was Emir to have his Enemy thus put into his hands; and thought it long untill he had brought this ſhame upon Maxut: who having already heard ſome inckling thereof, reſolved with himſelf to do any thing, rather than to fall into the Power of his hateful Enemy. And therefore at ſuch time as fifteen tall fellows were for that purpoſe ſent unto him from Emir Chan, who in the Kings name ſummoned him to the Court; he, without making any ſhew that he took the matter otherwiſe than well, entertained them courteouſly, and made them great chear; but when he perceived them to be overcome with ſleep, which crept upon them by reaſon of the exceſs wherewith they had overcharged themſelves, he cauſed them to be ſtraitly bound, and with long Cords hanged them down into a deep Well, and there ſhut them up ſecretly covered. Then gathering together the moſt precious things he had in his Houſe, and ſetting his Wives, his Children, his Brethren, and Nephews on Horſe-back, fled with all his Family in the Evening, and the next day arrived at Salmas, and was there friendly entertained by the Turkiſh Baſſa, and from thence conveyed to Van, where he was courteouſly welcomed by Cicala Baſſa, and honourably accompanied, ſent to Sinan the General, who very glad of his coming, ſent him with all diligence to Conſtantinople, to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the firſt enterparlance of Peace betwixt the Perſians and the Turks.

Maxut Chan flyeth unto the Turks.

Sinan remained at Chars eight days, and there again ſurveyed his Army and Proviſion; and afterwards ſet forward towards Tomanis, with Reſolution there to build a Fort. But being come thither, he could by no means put that his Deſignment in Execution, by reaſon of the immoderate Rain, which continually, by the ſpace of eight days fell in ſuch abundance, as that neither did the Sun appear, or the Sky clear. Beſide that, Sinan greatly feared leſt the Enemy, taking the Opportunity of this Rain, of the Streight, and of the Building, ſhould aſſault his Army, and finding it in evil plight, and out of order, greatly endamage it; wherefore, caſting off his former Determination for fortifying at Tomanis, he removed thence, to carry Succours to Teflis. But as ſoon as he was riſen with his Army, and paſt the Streight, Tal-Ogli, Captain of the Janizaries of Damaſco, and Homar, Sanzack of Saffeto, having received ſecret intelligence, that hard by, a little out of the way, was good ſtore both of Corn and Cattel; reſolved with themſelves to go thither to fetch in that booty; and ſo with two thouſand Souldiers, greedy of Prey, they ſet forward. Now Simon the Georgian, and the Perſians, following the Turks Army a far off, had divided his Souldiers into all ſuch places as where there was either Corn or Water, or any ſuch thing as might allure the Turks to ſcatter themſelves from the Camp; and perceiving theſe hungry Turks careleſly to run head-long to lay hold on this deſired booty, he ſuddenly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces, being diſordered; ſo that of thoſe two thouſand eſcaped but Tal-Ogli the Captain of the Janizaries only, Homar the Sanzack, and all the reſt being left dead upon the Ground.

Sinan cometh to Teflis.

Sinan holding on his way, in two days came to Teflis; where preſently he called a Counſel of all the chief men of his Army; taking order, That every man upon his Oath, ſhould depoſe the truth touching the greatneſs of Teflis; which he did, only in reproach of Muſtapha the great Baſſa; who moſt untruly had informed Amurath, That it was as great and populous as Damaſco, whereas in truth it was not in any reſpect to be compared unto that ſo famous a City. After that, he divided the Treaſure and Succours he had brought, among the Souldiers of the Fortreſs, chearing them up with good Words, and promiſes of great Matters. And becauſe the Souldiers there in Garriſon complained greatly againſt the Baſſa their Captain, he cauſed a Bill of complaint to be framed againſt him, and finding him guilty, that he had converted the Souldiers pay to his own uſe, he condemned him to the Reſtitution thereof, and ſo immediately diſcharging him of his Office, placed in his room Guiſuf Bey, a Lord of Georgia; who for the antient Enmity between him and Simon, had yielded

that

himſelf to the Turks, and was of them ſo welcomed, that Sinan truſted him with the Cuſtody of that Fort, which with ſo many dangers had been maintained and defended till that day.

Sinan departeth from Teflis.

All things thus ſet in order at Teflis, Sinan with his Army departed thence, and having again paſſed the Streight of Tomanis, there came unto him Muſtaffad Baſſa (afterward Governour of Aleppo) declaring unto him, That not far off was great ſtore of Corn and Cattel, and no body but only a few Georgians to keep the ſame; and therefore wiſhed him to ſend forth ſome to fetch it in, whereof, though it had been much more, his Army then ſtood in great need. Sinan was well affected unto this Muſtaffad, and therefore the eaſilier induced by him to ſend for the aforeſaid booty; but moved with the freſh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal-Ogli and Homar, he gave order, That to fetch in this Corn and Cattel there ſhould go out 10000 Horſe-men and their Servants, among whom was alſo the ſame Muſtaffad as their General. Now ſtood Tocomac, Simon, and the other Perſian Captains in ſecret ambuſh, waiting when any of the Turks ſhould come to fetch in this booty. Whereupon the aforeſaid Souldiers being now come, as they deſired, and having almoſt charged all their Mules and Horſes with that which beſt pleaſed them to make choice of; the hidden Perſians all on a ſudden iſſued out of their lurking places among them, and with great ſlaughter put them to flight, and with ſuch fury purſued the Victory, that they ſlew of them 7000, carried away many Priſoners alive, and the Mules and Horſes laden with the ſtolne booty. Muſtaffad was the firſt that fled, and the firſt that brought the unhappy News of that overthrow to Sinan; which was forthwith confirmed by the report of ſuch as had by ſpeedy flight eſcaped the Fury of the Enemy. Whereupon Sinan diſpatched the Baſſa of Caramania with a great Power, charging him whereſoever he ſhould find the Enemy, to ſet upon him; and preſently riſing himſelf with his whole Camp, followed the ſaid Baſſa: but all too late, for the Perſians, after the aforeſaid Victory, without ſtaying, had withdrawn themſelves into their ſtrong Places, known only to ſuch as were well acquainted with the difficult Paſſages of Georgia: and having there diſpoſed of their Prey, were now returning to wait ſome freſh occaſion of new ſlaughter. But when they deſcried the whole Army of the Turks upon the riſing of a certain Hill, they were afraid to meet them, yea and ſtood in ſome doubt alſo, leſt Sinan ſhould deſcend from the Hill, and ſo aſſault them; for which cauſe they retired themſelves again into the ſtrength of the Mountains; yet not with ſuch ſpeed but that the Turks overtook ſome few of them, and ſlew about fifty or threeſcore of them, whoſe Heads, in ſign of Triumph, they carried a good part of the way upon the points of their Spears; and took Priſoners about threeſcore and ten more.

Seven thouſand Turks ſlain by the Georgians and Perſians.

At laſt Sinan with all his Army having paſſed theſe dangerous Places of Georgia, arrived at Triala, where it was told him, That the Perſian King in Perſon, himſelf being already departed from Tauris, with an exceeding great Army was coming to bid him Battel. At which News he cauſed Proclamation to be preſently made thorough all his Army, That every man ſhould put himſelf in readineſs for the Voyage to Tauris, whither he himſelf meant to go to meet with the King his Enemy. In the mean time (as is reported) he diſpatched certain Poſts to the Perſian King, then at Carachach, to intreat him to ſend another Ambaſſador to Amurath for Peace, thinking by that means (as ſome do conjecture) to remove the King from the Reſolution of comming to aſſail him, if he had any ſuch meaning. After this Proclamation made, he deſcended into the open and large Plain of Chielder; where preſently he muſtered his whole Army, and gave it out, That before he would ſet forward toward Tauris, he would make trial of the readineſs and nimbleneſs of his Souldiers, in ſuch ſort as if they ſhould preſently joyn battel with the Enemy; which, without further delay, he put in Execution the next Morning, formally ranging his whole Army in order of Battel, and then ſending out ſome few others to ſhew themſelves upon the top of certain Hills, as if they had been Enemies that came to ſeiſe upon his Army; he cauſed all his Artillery to be diſcharged, and commanded every man to skirmiſh and beſtir himſelf altogether after the ſame manner as if the Enemy had been there preſent before them: where the thundring of the great and ſmall ſhot, the thick ſtorms of Arrows, with the brightneſs of the Armor and Weapons, yielding forth lightnings as if it had been fiery beams, and the noiſe of Drums and Trumpets, and other Inſtruments of War, with the Enſignes of blue and yellow flying in the Wind, made ſuch a medly of all things, as if it had been the turmoil of a very battel indeed. In the end he cauſed the retreat to be ſounded, and then ſetting all his Army in order again, made the like ſhew the ſecond time, and ſo the third time alſo; which was indeed performed with the great ſcorn and deriſion of his Souldiers, who deemed it rather Childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Baſſa. Theſe counterfeit ſhews of War thus finiſhed, yet did he not ſet forward toward Tauris, as he had given it out, but loitered eight days in thoſe Plains of Chielder. At which time there arrived out of Perſia one Aider the Aga, as an Ambaſſador from the King, who was by Sinan with great Joy entertained. Divers were the things by this Ambaſſador propounded, ſuch as had Maxut Chan before; but the concluſion of all was, that the Perſian King would be content voluntarily to relinquiſh Chars and Teflis, and ſo remain as he did before, in Amity with Amurath; and ſo deſired Sinan to conclude a peace with his Maſter, if it might be; as for himſelf, this Meſſage done, he was preſently to return into Perſia. For this Peace Sinan promiſed to deal with Amurath, ſo that the Perſian King would ſend another Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople. Upon which Concluſion the ſaid Aider returned into Perſia, and at Tauris declared to the King what he had ſeen, what Promiſes he had received of Sinan, and withall, exhorted him to ſend a new Ambaſſador unto the Turkiſh Court. After this, when the publick Rumor of the coming of the Perſian King was found to be falſe, Sinan, inſtead of going to Tauris, returned to Chars, where he idely ſtayed a whole Month, to the general marvelling and murmuring of all his Army, aſtoniſhed to ſee themſelves (to the great charges of their King, and the diſturbance of his whole Kingdom) brought forth not for any honourable Conqueſt, but as it were only of purpoſe to make a vain ſhew of War.

Sinan derided of his Souldiers.

Sinan cometh to Erzirum, and there breaketh up his Army.

At laſt he departed from Chars, for that now Winter was come on, and the Froſts and Snows did his Army great harm; and ſo coming to Erzirum, there preſently diſmiſſed every man to go and winter in his own Country; but remained ſtill himſelf in the ſame City. From whence he by ſpeedy Poſts diligently advertiſed Amurath of the Succours he had left at Teflis, of the loſſes he had received from the Enemy, of all that which was by Muſtapha miſreported, of the coming of the Perſian Ambaſſador to him, of the Promiſes made unto him touching a new Ambaſſador, and to be ſhort, of all his whole Actions. Beſides all this, he advertiſed Amurath, That the Enterpriſe of Perſia 1580 was a very hard, long, and difficult matter, and ſuch a one as needed another manner of Preparation than had been as yet appointed for it; and that if he deſired to ſubdue Perſia, it was then very neceſſary that he ſhould ſpeak with him at large, and diſcourſe upon many particularities, which could not ſo well without exceeding tediousneſs be declared by writing. After that, he ſent other Meſſengers alſo, to ſollicite Amurath for his return to Conſtantinople; continually telling him, That it was not poſſible to ſignifie by Writing, what he purpoſed to report to him by word of mouth, for the better accompliſhing of the enterpriſe begun. Nothing in the World did Sinan abhor more than this War, having his mind altogether bent againſt the Affairs of the Chriſtians in Europe, and therefore ſought by all means poſſible for the diverting of thoſe Wars from the Eaſt, into ſome other quarters. At laſt he wrought ſo much, he intreated ſo much, he writ ſo many Letters, and ſollicited the matter ſo earneſtly, that Amurath was perſwaded to ſend for him to Conſtantinople, as ſoon as ever he was certified of the arrival of the new Ambaſſador from Perſia, of whom Sinan had before advertiſed him. For he was reſolved either to grow to a peace with the ſaid Ambaſſadour, if he came with honourable Conditions; or if he came not, or, that after his comming they could not agree upon the Peace, then to put in Execution thoſe his Conceits, whereof he muſt needs in particular talk with Sinan by word of Mouth. At length the promiſed Ambaſſadour, called Ebraim Chan, a Man of great Eloquence, and highly honoured in Perſia, came to Sinan; whereof Sinan gave preſent Intelligence to Amurath, beſeeching him again to permit him to come to Conſtantinople. Which his requeſt Amurath then granted. Whereupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the univerſal Govetnment of the whole Empire. At his firſt coming to the preſence of Amurath, (wherein he diſcourſed not with him of any thing, but of the coming of the Perſian Ambaſſadour) the conditions were ſet down which they were to require for the reducing of the Capitulations of this Peace to a good end. After which agreement, the Ambaſſadour being now come, and moſt magnificently received in Conſtantinople, had audience. At which time he with much glorious Speech laboured to perſwade Amurath, That his King had a moſt ardent deſire to be reconciled unto him, and to joyn his Forces with his, againſt the Enemies of the Mahometan Religion; and that for that purpoſe he was now eſpecially come thither: which his good purpoſe, if it were anſwered with like zeal on his part, there would thereof enſue the greateſt Unity and Friendſhip that ever was between any Mahometan Princes. Whereunto Amurath gave him no other anſwer, but that he ſhould thereof talk with his Viſier, and with him intreat of all matters concerning the Peace: and ſo he was by Amurath entertained and diſmiſſed both at one time.

1581 Amurath circumciſeth his eldeſt Son Mahomet.

Now had Amurath called to Conſtantinople his eldeſt Son Mahomet, (who afterward ſucceeded him in the Empire) being then about ſixteen years old, to circumciſe him, according to the Cuſtom of the Turks; following therein the inveterate Law of the Hebrews. Unto which Solemnity many Chriſtian Princes were ſolemnly invited; who accordingly ſent thither their Ambaſſadours with great Gifts and Preſents, in token of Peace and Confederacy; namely, Rodulphus the Emperour, Henry the III. the French King, Stephen King of Polonia, the State of Venice, the King of Perſia, the Moor Kings of Morocco and Fez, the Princes of Moldavia, Valachia, and others. With all Triumph and Joy was the Circumciſion of this young 1581 Prince ſolemniſed by the ſpace of forty days and forty nights, in the great market Place of Conſtantinople; where all the Ambaſſadours aforeſaid had their Scaffolds prepared and furniſhed according to their Degrees and States, and received ſuch entertainment as might be ſhewed at ſuch a kind of barbarous Spectacle: only the Perſian Ambaſſador, who had alſo his Scaffold ſeveral to himſelf, but not regarded as the reſt, rejoyced not at theſe Feaſts and Triumphs: for among ſundry other wrongs and ſcorn done by the Commandment of Amurath unto the Perſian Nation, (as by hanging up certain counterfeit Pictures of Perſians made of laths and ſticks, and then burning them, and in many ſcornfull ſorts abuſing them) the Turk, for the great diſpleaſure he had conceived for the harm done to Oſman Baſſa and the Turks in Siruan much about that time, and for the diſdain he had taken againſt Ebraim Chan (as one not condeſcending to the conditions of Peace which he expected, nor yielding to any more than the other Ambaſſador had done before, ſeemed to have come as a Spie to mark the Turkiſh Affairs, or to mock Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the Minds of the two mighty Princes) commanded the ſtanding, before appointed for him, in diſgrace of him to be caſt down, and himſelf and all his followers to be ſhut up as cloſe Priſoners in the houſe of Mahamet Baſſa at Conſtantinople; where he was ſo ſtraightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the Plague, which ſhortly after began to wax hot in the City, yet could he not obtain ſo much favour as to be removed into ſome other place, but there was inforced to tarry it out, untill that afterward order was taken, he ſhould be carried thence as Priſoner to Erzirum. To end theſe Solemnities, Mahomet the young Prince was circumciſed, not publickly, but in his Fathers Chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferiour Baſſaes, ſometime the Emperour Solymans Barber.

Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turc. p. 82.

Now whilſt Sinan, as great Viſier, ſat commanding in Conſtantinople, the Gariſons of Chars and Teflis (kept in by the Enemy, and having received none other relief than a little which Sinan before his departure from Erzirum had by good hap cauſed to be ſecretly conveyed unto them) were thought to be driven to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing leſt thoſe two places, which had with ſo much ado been both gained and maintained, ſhould for want of new Succours fall again into the hand of the Enemy: he both boldly and freely counſelled Amurath to ſend a new Garriſon to Van, for the ſafety of the Country thereabouts, and then, under the Conduct of ſome valiant Captain, to ſend Succours to Teſlis: upon which point Amurath asked Sinan his Opinion, and willed him to bethink himſelf of ſome fit man. Hereupon, Sinan propounded divers unto him, but none of them pleaſed him; for why, he was before reſolved, in deſpight of Sinan, and of his Counſel, to beſtow this charge upon Mahamet Baſſa, Nephew to Muſtapha the late Baſſa, and for his ſake hated of Sinan. This Baſſa Mahamet he ſent to Erzirum, with the Title of the Baſſa of that Province; honouring him withall with the name of General of the Army for Teſlis. And preſently gave commandment to Haſſan the Baſſa of Caraemit, to Muſtaffa, ſometime called Manucchiar the Georgian, to all the Sanzacks, the Curdi, and the Souldiers of Erzirum, that they ſhould reſort to the ſtandard of Mahamet their General, and ſo to follow him to Teſlis. Whereupon there aſſembled together out of all the ſaid places about five and twenty thouſand Souldiers, with all things neceſſary for the relief of the diſtreſſed Garriſon which was in Teſlis. Commandment was alſo given to the Baſſaes of Aleppo and Maras, to repair to Van with all their Souldiers, and there to abide till Winter; which they accordingly did, not moleſted nor troubled by any Enemy.

In the end of Auguſt, Mahamet Baſſa departed from Erzirum, with the Baſſa of Caraemit, and all his Army, carrying with him Money, Corn, and all other things needfull for the relief of Teflis, and in eight days came to Chars, and from thence to Archelec, not troubled by any. At Archelec he found Muſtaffa (otherwiſe called Manucchiar) the Georgian, with all his Souldiers, whom the General moſt joyfully entertained, and honoured him with Gifts, and withall admoniſhed him to continue in his Obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his Army the ſhorteſt and ſafeſt way to Teflis; for that ſome were of Opinion, that it were beſt to go by Tomanis; and ſome other, by the way of Muſtaffa his Country: wherein Muſtaffa did readily reſolve him, that the eaſieſt and ſhorteſt way lay through his own Country, being alſo in his Opinion the ſafeſt. This counſel of Muſtapha pleaſed Mahamet greatly, ſo that he made choice of him to be the guide of his Army, repoſing himſelf wholly upon his good direction; and ſo departed thence toward Teflis, paſſing through Altunchala and Carachala, both belonging to the ſaid Georgian, abounding with all things neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of man, neither were they ever diſturbed by any Enemy. Having paſſed Muſtapha's Country, they came to a friendly Caſtle called Gori, from whence they diſcovered in certain fields a great Army of the Georgians mingled with Perſians, but apparelled after the manner of Georgia; theſe were thoſe Captains of Perſia, ſent from the Perſian King (as in other years before) to aid the Georgians; who ſecretly conjoyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their Apparel, becauſe the treaty of Peace ſhould not be diſturbed, and their King accounted unjuſt of his Word; who under a colour of a treaty of Peace, whilſt Amurath attended nothing elſe but to ſuccour and defend his conquered Countries, without purpoſe to annoy any other places, went about to procure the deſtruction of the Turks. Theſe then, as ſoon as they ſaw the Turkiſh Army, and perceived that they alſo themſelves were by them deſcried, ſent Heraulds unto them with haughty words of defiance, and to offer them battel. With great Grief of Mind did the Baſſa receive this proud defiance; but having no other purpoſe but only to bring his Succours ſafe to Teflis, he diſmiſſed the Heraulds, and ſtudied by all means he could to ſhun Battel. That Evening he was favoured in his purpoſe by the great and continual Rain which then fell, and ſerved for a reaſonable excuſe of his delay: but the next day proving fair, and the Sun ſhining bright, both the Armies marched in ſight the one of the other all day, untill about four hours and an half before night, at which time the Turks arrived near to a River that ſeparated the one Army from the other. There the Baſſa fell in Conſultation with Muſtapha, whether they ſhould paſs over the River before Night, or ſtay on that ſide they were untill the next Morning: In which caſe Muſtaffa adviſed him to ſtay, as fearing leſt the Enemy ſhould ſet upon the Army, diſordered in paſſing the River, and ſo annoy them. Notwithſtanding the General diſliked this Advice of Muſtapha, having taken a ſtrong conceit, even upon the firſt diſcovery of the Enemy, that there was ſome intelligence and compact between Muſtapha and the Perſians, and that to that end he had maliciouſly perſwaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis; and therefore the Baſſa thinking, that if there were any ſuch Plot laid between Muſtapha and the Enemy, to ſet it in ſome confuſion, would not in any caſe follow the Counſel of the ſuſpected Georgian, to ſtay that Night; but commanded, that with the greateſt ſpeed that might be, all his Souldiers with their Treaſure and Corn ſhould paſs over the River, to the end, that before Night, he might on the other ſide of the River incamp his Army in ſome good place, to the ſcorn and deriſion of his Enemies. Mahamet his Lieutenant, a bold young man, and an hardy, was the firſt that ventured over, and after him the Carriages of Mony, and of Corn, and then the whole Army, with ſuch ſpeed, that ſome of the confuſed Multitude were drowned in the paſſage, being rather troden down with the Horſes and Camels, than brought to their deaths either by the depth of the Channel, or ſwiftneſs of the River.

Mahamet Baſſa refuſeth Battel offered by the Georgians and Perſians.

As ſoon as the Georgians perceived that the Turks had paſſed the River, without ſtaying untill they might ſettle themſelves in any good order, they in great haſte and fury ran upon them, and preſently aſſailed them, whilſt they were yet all in confuſion and out of order; by reaſon whereof the Turks, although they turned their faces upon their Enemy, and made ſome good reſiſtance, yet in ſhort time you might have ſeen the Banks of the River in many places ſtained with the Turkiſh Blood, and many Carkaſes of the Turks here and there ſcattered, without any apparent loſs among the Georgians and Perſians. Amongſt them that fell in this ſlaughter, were a number of Sanzacks, of the Curdi, and Meſopotamians; which the reſt perceiving, and by the overthrow of their own, conjecturing the loſs of others, turned their backs and fled; the like did the remnant of the Meſopotamians, and after them at laſt the whole Army: whom the Georgians preſſed ſo ſore in their flight, that many of the Turks, ſeeing no other way to eſcape, caſt themſelves into the River, and ſo (though hardly) eſcaped with their Lives. Great was the ſhame, great was the confuſion, but greateſt was the loſs they received, for that in the heat of the Battel, the Kings Mony and Corn was taken by the Georgians and Perſians, every man ſaving only ſo much for himſelf as he could ſecretly hide upon his own Body, or convey by the means of ſome truſty ſlave, which by the help of their ſwift Horſes, was preſerved rather by Fortune than by Valour.

The Turks diſcomfited, and the Treaſure and Corn taken by the Georgians and Perſians.

The Turks, thus diſcomfited and ſpoiled of their relief, the next Morning gathered themſelves together again one with another, curſing the Heavens, the King, and their adverſe Fortune: ſome of them alſo threatning the Georgian Renegate Muſtapha, as though all this miſchief had hapned through his treachery and ſecret Intelligence with the Enemy. Notwithſtanding, when they found that they had ſtill remaining ſo much Money, and other eaſements as might ſuffice to comfort the afflicted Minds of the Souldiers beſieged in the Fort, they reſolved to hold on their way towards Teflis; and in their Journey uſed ſuch ſpeed, that the day following they arrived there in the Evening. But when they of the Fort ſaw their Friends whom they had ſo long expected, arrived in ſuch bad ſort, and ſo evil furniſhed, they were aſtoniſhed and wonderfully grieved at this common loſs, and all in a confuſion proteſted to Mahamet, That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith neceſſary Proviſion made for them. But the General, after he had with large Promiſes mitigated their firſt Furies and Inſolencies, preſently in the Morning cauſed a Divano, or Counſel to be called in the Caſtle, where, having gathered together all the chief Men in his Army, he ſpake unto them in this manner;

The Oration of Mahamet Baſſa in the Caſtle of Teſlis.

FOR as much as it hath pleaſed God, that ſo great and important an occaſion of Victory, which was offered unto us for the Honour and Glory of every one of us, is now fallen out ſo unfortunately, that it hath not only not miniſtred unto us any matter of triumphing over our Enemies, as we ſhould have done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carry away from us both the Triumph, and alſo our Armour, our Horſes, our Slaves, and our Spoils; yea, and (the remembrance whereof doth moſt grievouſly trouble and afflict me) our Sultans Money, and our publick munition and forces ſolemnly delivered to our Conduct, is now become a booty and a prey unto them; that the Honour which might have made every one of us famous among noble and valorous Souldiers, is now fallen from our foreheads, and, to our great detriment, doth adorn the heads of Strangers, or rather of our Enemies: and that notwithſtanding all this, we are now come to thoſe couragious Souldiers, which with their great Valour have defended this Fort even in the midſt of their Enemies Weapons and Treacheries; and to whom we ſhould yield that aid and relief which the virtue of every one of their Minds doth deſerve, and which King Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither unto them: there is now no remedy, but to reſolve upon ſome good means, that we fall not wholly into the utter diſgrace of our Lord and King; and that is, To maintain theſe Souldiers in the cuſtody and defence of this Fort: and though it be with all our wants, and all our own diſhonours, to comfort theſe that have ſo long time looked for us, and ſo well deſerved all manner of relief. We cannot excuſe our ſelves, that our Enemies were better than we, either in number, or Inſtruments of War; for both in the one and the other we were far beyond them: neither yet can we ſay, that they ſet upon us by Night, or at unawares; for when we ſaw their number, their Weapons, their Horſes, and finally their approach, and their manner of aſſault, yet we would needs paſs over the River, and joyn battel with them: which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable unto us, becauſe we were more ready to take our flight, than to endure the fight; and to uſe our feet, than to occupie our hands. And therefore it is very requiſite, as well to ſatisfie the rigour of Juſtice, as to perform the Duty of Souldiers, that we ſuffer not our Lord and King to loſe his Money, which he truſted into our hands, and which we have loſt, not by ſtrength, nor by any treacherous ſtratagem of our Enemies, but by our own too too important fear, and too baſe a regard of our Lives, before which, it was the duty of every one of us to have preferred the care of Honour. For, if by fighting and courageous ſuſtaining the aſſaults of our Enemies, though they had been ſtronger, and better armed than we, this misfortune had hapned unto us, and that we could in any ſort have repreſented to the King and the World an honourable and bloody Battel, we ſhould not now have had any need to ſeek means how to repay this loſs, and to reſtore the thing that violently was taken from us by ſuch as were more mighty than our ſelves, and theſe honourable Souldiers ſhould more eaſily have digeſted with us this lamentable Calamity. But we have loſt that Money, and in very deed having as it were willingly beſtowed it upon the Georgians and Perſians, to redeem our Lives, and to ſave us from their Fury, are bound to repay it, or elſe for ever hereafter to be challenged as lawful debtors to the King for it. And therefore, my good Friends and Companions, if you will take a good courſe, let every one of us, without further Conſultation, put his hand into his private Purſe (if he have not fooliſhly caſt that alſo into the hands of the ravenous Enemy) and with our own Money let us ſuccour the Neceſſity of theſe men, and have regard to the Honour of our King. So ſhall we make our flight leſs blame-worthy, we ſhall juſtifie our Actions more honeſtly, and that which is of greateſt importance, we ſhall better pacifie the wrath of Amurath, which he might moſt juſtly conceive againſt us. I my ſelf before you all am moſt ready to disburſe four thouſand duckets towards it, if it ſhall pleaſe you all to follow me accordingly; we ſhall deliver theſe Souldiers from their great Neceſſity, and acquit our ſelves from the intricate bonds of moſt troubleſome diſpleaſures.

1581

There might a man have ſeen a thouſand Countenances changed a thouſand manner of ways; for one ſoftly whiſpered many a curſe and ſhame upon the King, upon Mahamet, yea, and upon God himſelf; another denied to disburſe any thing, another determined privily to ſteal away; and ſome ſaid one thing, and ſome another: but in the end every man was induced to follow the Example of Mahamet, and thereupon having made a Purſe according to every mans ability, there was collected thirty thouſand Duckets among them. And preſently after, word was ſent to Leuent Ogli at Zaghen, to ſend thither Grain, Muttons, and other neceſſary Proviſions, that they might the better continue the defence of the Fort.

The Turks among themſelves make a Purſe of 30000 Duckets for the relief of the Garriſon of Teſlis.

Two days only ſtayed Mahamet in Teſlis, and having changed ſuch Souldiers as deſired to be diſmiſſed, and alſo appointed Homar Baſſa Governour of Teſlis, inſtead of Giuſuf that there governed before, he departed. But before his departure Conſultation was had, Whether they ſhould keep the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the Country of Muſtaffa the Georgian: and in the end they reſolved to keep the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken that they ſhould all paſs the River. The Curdi were the firſt that went over, and had already pitched their Tents upon the farther ſide of the Water; when the General began to revoke his former order, and ſent them word, That they ſhould return, becauſe he was now determined to go back the ſame way he came. At which meſſage the Sanzacks were in a Rage, and in plain terms ſent him anſwer, That theſe mutabilities beſeemed not them, being men accuſtomed to War, but to be rather Childrens play, than manly Reſolution; and that for their parts they were minded not to change their Journey, but would go on the ſame way they had begun: and ſo forwards they went (ſay the General what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arrived at Chars long before Mahamet, who was much grieved at this their ſo great diſobedience: but ſeeing no other remedy, he with the Baſſa of Caraemit and Muſtapha the Georgian, put themſelves on their Journey, even by the ſame way they came to Teſlis. At laſt Mahamet arrived at Altunchala, the chief Caſtle of Muſtaffa the Georgian, and burning with the deſire of revenge of thoſe loſſes, (which he thought himſelf to have received by the Treachery of Muſtapha) or, as ſome thought, ſeeking by this means to make Amurath believe, that in truth all the forepaſſed miſchiefs had happened not thorough their cowardiſe, but through the treacherous and malicious devices of the Georgian, and ſo to make their received loſſes ſeem more pardonable, he deviſed with himſelf how to find out ſuch a plot, as that Muſtapha might upon the ſudden be taken away, as guilty of ſo foul a Treaſon. And that he had deviſed, was in this ſort; To call a Council into his own Pavilion, as if he had received ſome commandement from the Court; and having cauſed Muſtapha to come into that room, whilſt the ſaid counterfeit commandement ſhould be in reading, to cauſe his Lieutenant, with thoſe chief of his band that ſtood about him, to fall upon him, and preſently to cut off his head. This pretended Council was accordingly called, wherein ſat the Baſſa himſelf, and with him the Baſſa of Caraemit, certain Sanzacks, ſubject to the Juriſdiction of Erzirum, the Capagi Baſſa, or chief Gentleman Uſher, and the Generals Lieutenant; with whom he had upon their ſolemn oaths for ſecreſie, communicated his intended deceit. The Georgian Muſtapha was alſo called accordingly; who, both becauſe he was beloved of more than one, and had alſo uſed all diligent Circumſpection, but eſpecially having heard in the Army ſome private whiſperings of ſuch a matter, knew full well of all that was deviſed againſt him, and therefore provided alſo for his own defence. But as touching his going to the Counſel, he thought he might not deny ſo to do, leſt by his abſence he might ſeem guilty of the fault whereof he was (peradventure not without cauſe) ſuſpected; and thereby to leave his Cities for a prey to their Enemies, now in the heart of his Country. And therefore reſolving to go, he deviſed how ſo to do with moſt ſafety, and ſo, as if need ſhould be, he might be able to turn the miſchief intended againſt him, upon the head of the General himſelf. And therefore having choſen out fifty of his moſt faithful and reſolute Souldiers, he commanded them to follow him to the Counſel appointed in the Generals Pavilion; and being come thither, to ſtay there ready and attentive at his firſt and one only call, ſuddenly and forcibly to ruſh into the Pavilion with their Weapons; and rather than any wrong ſhould be done unto him, to ſhew their Valour againſt the Turks, without exception of any Perſon whatſoever. Theſe men, by Nature Enemies unto the Turks, underſtanding well his meaning, ſettled themſelves upon the Execution; and taking unto them ſome other alſo of their faithful and truſty friends, followed him even to the Pavilion of Mahamet; where Muſtaffa entring into the place of Counſel, deſired of the General to know what his pleaſure was; who preſently cauſed the counterfeit Commandement to be read; whereunto Muſtaffa gave an attentive Ear. But when the other Baſſaes and Sanzancks began to ſit down (contrary to the manner of the Turks, who, whenſoever any Commandement of the Emperours is in reading, uſe always to ſtand up, and not to ſit down untill it be full read) the Georgian took his leave, promiſing to be ever ready to perform, not only that order of the Kings, but alſo whatſoever elſe he ſhould command. And ſo being about to depart, the Capigi Baſſi (or great Uſher) of Mahamet came unto him, and plucking him by the ſleeve, would have forced him to ſit down. Then Muſtaffa crying out aloud, drew his ſword, wherewith he ſtruck Mahamets Lieutenant, that was right againſt him; and with his left hand having raught the roll from his pate, with his right hand ſuddenly (to the great aſtoniſhment of all that were preſent) at one only blow parted his Head, his Neck, and his Breaſt in twain, even to his very Stomach; ſo that he died (a ſtrange ſpectacle to behold) being thus cut in ſunder, with his cleft head and two ſhoulders hanging down upon their ſeveral ſides. After this firſt, he redoubled his ſecond ſtroke, aiming at the head of the Baſſa of Caraemit; but it being defended with the writhen rolls of the Turbant, it ſlipped down by his Ear; yet ſo, that with a piece of the ſaid Turbant it carried his Ear quite away, with a little alſo of the fleſh of his Cheek; and all enraged, eagerly aſſailed Mahamet Baſſa the General, (who now all in confuſion was riſen up in the tumult) and wounded him with five mortal Wounds; which were yet afterwards by cunning hand healed, when they had brought him even to Death's door. At the cry of this Georgian, all his People ruſhed in together; upon whoſe confuſed tumult, and the fear that Muſtaffa through his Fury had ſtruck into the Turks, the Camp was preſently raiſed; and every man with all ſpeed departing thence, put himſelf on his way towards Chars, whither alſo were brought the two wounded Baſſaes, and the reſt that were ill handled and greatly ſcared with theſe ſudden and uncouth ſtirs.

Muſtaffa notably revengeth himſelf of the Treachery intended againſt him by Mahamet the General.

Of all this Treachery intended againſt him, Muſtapha ſent preſent Information to the Turkiſh Emperour; finding himſelf greatly grieved, at the falſe ſuſpition that Mahamet had wrongfully conceived againſt him, to his great diſhonour: and wrought ſo cunningly, that Amurath, in token of his good liking and contentment, ſent him both Cloth of Gold, and a Battel-axe all gilt. Mahamet on the other ſide intermedling here and there with all the art that poſſibly he could deviſe, all hateful and injurious terms, ſent large advertiſements of all the misfortunes that had happened; and aggravated to the King, both the Treacheries of Muſtaffa, and alſo the ſlender ſecurity of thoſe Ways and Countries:

As ſoon as Amurath underſtood the Calamities of his Souldiers, the loſs of his Mony, the great diſhonour of his People, and the apparent danger wherein the Fort of Teſlis ſtood, when it was like to be abandoned; all inflamed with Rage and Anger, he called unto him the Baſſaes of his Court, (among whom ſat as chief, the proud and haughty Sinan) and rated them all exceedingly; reproving their leud Counſel, and recounting the loſſes that he had from time to time received, as if they had hapned through their defaults, and eſpecially Sinan, as the principal occaſion of all theſe Miſchiefs: who, like an improvident fool (as he ſaid) would needs relinquiſh the charge of his Army, and like a King, ſit idle at Conſtantinople, ſtanding (as it were) at ſome publick Triumph to behold and hear the Miſeries and Miſfortunes of others; having before, in the time that Muſtapha was General, moſt vainly boaſted, with the like power that he had, to fetch the Perſian King out of Casbin, and to deliver him in bonds to Amurath, but had in deed performed nothing worth the remembrance. Sinan could do no leſs but make anſwer to the wrathful King, yet not with ſuch Mildneſs and Modeſty as in ſuch a caſe he ſhould peradventure have done; but in proud and peremptory manner, without any reverence or regard, told him plainly, That as the laſt year, a little before his return to Conſtantinople, Succours had been conveyed to Teſlis without any loſs or trouble (as in truth they were) even ſo had they been this year alſo, if he had put his advice in Execution, as much as he deſpiſed and contemned it; for he did then give him to underſtand, that Mahamet Baſſa could not be a fit man for ſo great a charge; and that it was neceſſary to have choſen in his room ſome other Captain of Valour and Diſcretion; but ſeeing he would needs make choice of the ſame unfit man, he was not now to blame any other for his Errour, but only himſelf. As for his coming to Conſtantinople, it was a thing long before thought moſt needful; not only for his advice, how the matter of Peace might be brought to ſome good paſs; but alſo becauſe if that treaty came not to the deſired iſſue, then he had to talk with him how he might compaſs the overthrow of his Enemy: which thing as yet he had no fit time to declare unto him, but was now ready to reveal it, if it were ſo his Pleaſure. Wonderfully was Amurath grieved with this ſullen anſwer, when he conſidered that a ſlave of his own, ſhould ſo arrogantly and manifeſtly reprove him of folly and improvidence. Notwithſtanding, being deſirous to know of him what that ſecret and important matter was, which he had to reveal unto him, for the eaſie compaſſing of his commenced Enterpriſe; he diſſembled his diſcontentment conceived againſt him, and commanded him to diſcloſe thoſe his Devices which he had to utter. Sinan in brief, of all his Advices, propounded theſe two things; firſt, his Counſel was, not to proceed in this War as they had hitherto done; by ſeeking with Forts and Fortreſſes to hold and keep the Enemies Countries; for that their Treaſures were not able to yield ſuch ſtore of Money, as was ſufficient for the maintenance of ſo many and ſo great Garriſons: contrary to the Opinion of Muſtapha (of late dead) who with great pertinacy had perſwaded that dangerous, chargeable, and difficult manner of War. His ſecond Advice was, that the true means to bring this War to the wiſhed end, conſiſted eſpecially in the Reſolution of Amurath himſelf, who, if he would go in Perſon, and againſt ſo mighty a King oppoſe the Perſon of a King, then might he moſt aſſuredly promiſe unto himſelf all ſpeedy and honourable Victory, for that at the only name of his coming, the Perſians would eaſily come to any Agreement; or if not, he might then proceed in his Wars, and ſo obtain moſt glorious Conqueſts. This his Advice ſo little pleaſed the effeminate King, that inſtead of the great Opinion he before held of him, he now conceived an envious affection againſt him: and a further ſuſpition (foſtred by the great Ladies of the Court, eſpecially Amuraths Mother) That Sinan had thus Counſelled the King, himſelf to go in Perſon, not for any good could come thereof, but only that ſo he might find means for the Prince, his Son, to make himſelf King, and to drive out his Father. Which ſuſpition was in ſuch ſort nouriſhed in the Mind of Amurath, eſpecially being aſſured of the great affection which the Prince carried towards Sinan, and he likewiſe towards him, that he reſolved to rid him out of his ſight; and ſo depriving him of all charge, preſently baniſhed him the Court, and out of Conſtantinople to Demotica (a City of Thrace) from whence afterwards he by moſt humble Supplication obtained to be removed to Marmara, a little beyond Selymbria. And into his place of Viſierſhip, was preferred Sciaus Baſſa (who had married Amurath's Siſter) an Hungarian born, a goodly Perſonage, and of honourable Judgment; but above all men, a ſeller of Juſtice and Preferments, and yet a great friend to the Peace with the Chriſtian Princes, which Sinan had always moſt wickedly maligned.

Sciaus Baſſa made Viſier in Sinan's Place.

The Perſian Captains in the mean time, with their Spoils, and divers of their Enemies Enſignes, were with great Joy received at home in Perſia; but when the Diſcord that fell out between Mahamet Baſſa and Muſtaffa the Georgian was alſo reported, the former Joy was redoubled; every man being of Opinion, that theſe Diſcords might be great impediments unto the Turks further attempts into Perſia; which it was feared they would the next year attempt, to the great danger of Naſſivan and Tauris. Upon which occaſions, the Perſian King, perceiving that he could not have a fitter Opportunity to imploy himſelf againſt Abas Mirize his Son (then with him in diſgrace) determined with himſelf, to leave the matters on this ſide of his Kingdom in their preſent ſtate, and to march toward Heri: whereunto he was earneſtly ſollicited by his elder Son Emir Hamze Mirize, but eſpecially by Mirize Salmas, his Viſier. Upon which Reſolution, committing the defence of Reivan, Naſſivan, and that ſide of his Kingdom, to Emir Chan, Governour of Tauris; he ſet forward himſelf with his Army towards Casbin, and ſo marching through divers Provinces, arrived at length at Saſuar, being on that ſide the chief of all the Cities ſubject to the Juriſdiction of Heri: which City he took by force, and without delay cauſed the Governour thereof to be beheaded, although he alledged a thouſand excuſes for himſelf, and objected a thouſand Accuſations more againſt the ſeditious Viſier.

Mahamet the Perſian King reſolveth to go to Heri againſt his Son Abas Mirize.

The King after this, departing thence, and having alſo put to death certain Captains and Sultans, that were accuſed by the Viſier to be Confederates in the Rebellion of his Son, he arrived at laſt at the deſired City of Heri. Very ſtrong is this City by Scituation, compaſſed about with a good Wall, and watered with deep Channels of running Springs, conveyed into it by Tamerlane their Founder or Reſtorer: beſide that, there was in it many valiant Captains, Enemies to Mirize Salmas, ready to lay down their Lives in defence of themſelves, and of Abas their Lord; ſo that the winning thereof, could not but prove both long and difficult. As ſoon as the King approached the City, he felt in himſelf many troubled Paſſions ariſing of Grief and Pity; it grieved him to think that he ſhould beget ſo graceleſs a Son, who, inſtead of maintaining his State and Honour, ſhould ſeek his Ruine and Deſtruction: it grieved him alſo to remember the Blood of his Subjects, before ſpilt upon ſo ſtrange an occaſion; and ſcarcely durſt he enter into the Cogitation, thenceforth to ſhed any more of the Blood of his People. Nevertheleſs, being ſtill more and more ſollicited by his Viſier, he attempted to underſtand the mind of his Son; and (if it might be poſſible) to get him into his hands. But whiles the King, travelling with theſe thoughts, lay with his Army before Heri, Abas Mirize in the mean time, writ divers Letters to his Father and to his Brother; wherein he beſought them, That they would make known unto him the Occaſion of this their ſtir; for if deſire of Rule had moved them to ſeek the deprivation of him, being their Son and Brother, from the Honour he lawfully poſſeſſed, and which his Father himſelf procured for him of his Grandfather Tamas, they ought to abandon their Imagination; for that he was always ready to ſpend his Wealth and his Blood, together with his Eſtate, in their Service, and acknowledged his Father to be his good Father and King: but if they were not induced hereunto for this cauſe, but by a deſire to revenge ſome treſpaſſes that he had committed to the Prejudice of the Crown of Perſia, or his Fathers Honour, he was moſt ready to ſubmit himſelf to any amends; and with all reaſon, to yield unto them the Kingdom, yea the whole World, and even his own Life, the rather to ſatisfie their Minds with a more full Contentation. With twice and thrice reading over, were theſe affectionate Letters conſidered and digeſted: and at laſt, both the Father and the Brother, perceiving in them ſuch liberality of Words, and overcome with Pity, or if not with Pity, yet with great admiration and contentment, they determined to put the matter in practiſe; and moderating their deſire of revenge, to attempt the reducing of the young mans Mind to ſome good paſs. Whereupon they wrote back unto him, That no greedy deſire to uſurp his Government, had induced them to make ſo great a Voyage, to trouble ſo much People, and to ſhed ſuch abundance of Blood, but only his diſobedience and preſumption, in that he had cauſed himſelf to be called the King of Perſia; and had not ſent ſo much as one Captain to aid them in the late Wars againſt the Turks. Glad was Abas, the young Prince, when he underſtood the Accuſations that were laid againſt him; hoping to make it manifeſt before all men, how the King and his Brother were miſinformed in theſe particularities: and therefore incontinently did write back unto them, That if they would faithfully promiſe him, honourably, and without any outrage to receive his Ambaſſadors, he would ſend unto them ſuch evident matter, and ſo clear Information touching thoſe his Accuſations, as that they ſhould not only clearly perceive that there was never any ſuch kind of thought thought in him, but alſo that he had always deſired and laboured the contrary: and would moreover open unto them ſuch matter, as in reſpect of other men, and not of himſelf, might cauſe their coming to prove profitable and commodious to all the Kingdom of Perſia. Which his requeſt they both ſolemnly promiſed faithfully to perform, being very deſirous to underſtand what thoſe ſtrange Novelties ſhould be. Whereupon Abas Mirize ſent unto them two of his chief Counſellors, men of great account and reverence both for Years and Wiſdom, with full Inſtructions; who, after many Speeches, in the end ſwearing (according to their cuſtom) by the Creator that ſpread out the Air, that founded the Earth upon the Deeps, that adorned the Heaven with Stars, that poured abroad the Water, that made the Water; and briefly, of nothing, brought forth all things, ſwearing by the head of Ali, and by the Religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that ſuch perverſe thoughts never entred into the head of Abas Mirize: they alleged many Teſtimonies and manifeſt Proofs, that moſt loyally, in all due time, as well when he was advanced to the Kingdom of Perſia, as alſo in his Battels againſt the Turks, his Son had always cauſed devout Prayers and Supplications to be made to God for his Proſperity; neither ever deſired to hear any other, but happy and fortunate ſucceſs of him. They brought with them a thouſand and a thouſand Precepts and loyal Letters, which the young man had cauſed to be written, as occaſions required, to the Governours that were his Subjects, for the Government of the State, wherein he never named himſelf King of Perſia, but only, Your King and Governour of Heri. They prayed the King alſo, to cauſe a diligent Proceſs to be framed againſt his Son; and if there ſhould be found in him any ſign or ſhadow of ſo wicked a ſuſpition, then to take from him his Eſtate and Liberty; offering themſelves to remain as Hoſtages for him. But when all this ſhould be done, and Abas found altogether free from theſe unjuſt Accuſations, then (falling even to the Earth and kiſſing it) they beſought him, and as it were conjured him, not to leave the matter thus imperfect, to the Prejudice of his Blood; but returning to his Counſellor, to take information likewiſe, upon what mind and conſideration he had adviſed the King, to take upon him this unorderly and dangerous Voyage; where no doubt he ſhould find nothing in him, but malignant, ambitious, and wicked Affections; and ſuch as even deſerved, that with his Blood there ſhould be revenged all the Blood of thoſe, which till that hour had been brought to their unworthy and undeſerved Deaths. And for as much as nothing remained, whereof the Viſier had informed the King againſt his Son, but the commandment that was given by Abas Mirize to the Governours under him, That they ſhould not go to the Wars againſt the Turks: they confeſſed in Truth, that ſuch an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traiterous end and purpoſe as was reported to the King by his great Counſellor, but only in reſpect of an Invaſion juſtly feared in thoſe quarters by the Tartarian Jeſſelbas; who by divers inrodes had already done great harm in the Country about Heri, and put young Abas and his Counſellors in ſuch a fear, that they durſt not diſfurniſh their Cities of their Guards and Forces; and therefore had commanded the ſaid Governours, not to go to war againſt the Turks, but to ſtay and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing ſignified unto the Viſier himſelf; which he of a malicious mind had concealed, only to try, if in theſe common troubles he could bring to paſs, that Abas Mirize and the King might be taken away, and Emir Hamze ſucceed in his place; and ſo he himſelf remain the Superintendent of his Son-in-Law, and Moderator of that moſt famous Kingdom. Of which ſo treacherous a purpoſe, they (for all that) thought Emir Hamze the young Prince altogether ignorant, (knowing his honourable Diſpoſition and Love towards his own kindred) but imputed it only to the immoderate and ambitious deſire of the wicked Traitor Mirize Salmas.

Abas Mirize by his Ambaſſadours purged of Treaſon.

The Ambaſſadours of Abas accuſe Mirize Salmas the Viſier.

Of theſe grave Speeches of the Ambaſſadors, Mahamet the Father (by nature credulous) began to make great Conſtruction; and deeply to conſider of their ſo earneſt and important requeſts; which ſeemed unto him ſo upright and equal, as that he could not chuſe but hearken unto the ſame. And therefore, calling unto him the Governours, the Captains, the Judges, and Treaſurers of all the Cities that were ſubject to Heri: he demanded of them, how and in what ſort they eſteemed of Abas Mirize, and in what degree of Honour he deſired to be eſteemed of them; and of them all received one anſwer, That they held him for their Lord and Lieutenant to the King of Casbin, and that he himſelf had always deſired to be ſo taken and thought of: for proof whereof, every one of them brought in divers Letters, Precepts, and Orders, wherein he never cauſed himſelf to be honoured with any other Title, but only, Your King of Heri. He demanded further, Whether any ſuch Wars were attempted by the Tartarian Jeſſelbas, or not; whereof he received a large and ſolmen Information, that ſo it was, to the great detriment of all thoſe Territories. And thus the King was throughly perſwaded of the Innocency of his Son; who before was noted unto him by his Viſier, to be an obſtinate Rebel. Upon which Occaſion only, although he might juſtly have put him to Death, as Authour of ſo great troubles and bloodſhed; yet, becauſe he would be better informed of the truth of the Accuſations laid againſt him by the Ambaſſadors, he reſolved to make a curious and diligent inquiſition thereof: and therefore, firſt of all, in great ſecreſie he examined Emir Hamze, his eldeſt Son, wherefore he had adviſed this Journey againſt his Brother Abas, whom he had found guiltleſs of all thoſe Crimes that were objected againſt him? Whereunto the Prince anſwered, That he had no other certainty of the pretended evil behaviour of his Brother, but only that which proceeded from the great credit that he always gave to his Father-in-law Mirize Salmas, to whom, as to a chief Counſellor, his Father-in-law, and Protector of the Kingdom, he had always yielded aſſured credence; and ſo diſcharged the whole Tempeſts of all thoſe Miſchiefs upon the Viſier. Touching whom, the King made diligent Inquiſition, as well among thoſe of the Court, as of the Army; and thereby found him guilty of all that the Ambaſſadours of Heri had accuſed him: and that being always acquainted with the true Occaſions which reſtrained the Governours of Heri (ſubject to Abas Mirize) from going to the War againſt the Turks, he had moſt maliciouſly concealed the ſame, of purpoſe to hatch ſuch a ſtrange and dangerous diſcontentment, as had wrought the unworthy Death of many great men, and almoſt defiled the hands of the Father with the innocent blood of his guiltleſs Son. For which ſo foul a Treaſon the falſe Viſier was worthily condemned to die, and his wily head by the commandement of the King, ſtruck from his Carkaſs. Juſtly rewarded, with the ſame Puniſhment which he unjuſtly ſought to have converted upon others; and with his own deſtruction pacified the Diſſentions and Battels that were riſen between the two Princes. And ſo the two Brethren being reconciled together, and the Son to the Father; after that Abas had again promiſed his wiſhed Obedience,

Mirize Salmas the Viſier found guilty of Treaſon, and beheaded.

ence (which he afterwards moſt dutifully performed) King Mahamet returned with the Prince towards Casbin; where, by reaſon of new and unexpected Motions of the Turks, he had now been long looked for and deſired.

Amurath, through the rough Speeches of Sinan, was more and more ſetled in his purpoſe for the continuing of the Perſian War; accounting it ſo much the more to his own Glory, as it ſhould in happy ſucceſs fall out contrary to the Opinion of many: and thereupon began to bethink himſelf, whom he might chuſe for his General, to whom he might commit ſo great a charge. Among the Baſſaes of the Court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe years, but yet fierce of courage, tough in opinion, in counſel as hardy as might beſeem his age, ready for all ſudden and ſtrange adventures, but above all, a Vaſſal moſt devoted to the King; of this man, at laſt he was reſolved to make choice, to have the leading of his Army: and therefore calling him apart, declared unto him what he had in himſelf purpoſed; encouraging him to take the charge upon him, with a firm reſolution to perform all things anſwerable to ſo worthy an enterpriſe, with the opinion he had conceived of his Valour. Very willingly did Ferat accept of this new Office, and thought himſelf (as indeed he was) highly favoured by the King; and thereupon made him a large promiſe, to employ his ſtrength, his wit, and uttermoſt devoire, to put in execution whatſoever ſhould be offered unto him, either by occaſion, or by his Royal Commandment.

Ferat Baſſa choſen General of the Army in Sinan's Place.

At firſt Amurath had no other purpoſe to employ him any further, but only to aſſure the Paſſage to Teflis, and ſo into all Georgia; and to have deſtroyed the Country of Muſtapha the Georgian, who had ſo audaciouſly injured the Lieuteuant of Amurath, and put his whole Army in Confuſion; but being certainly advertiſed of the troubles in Perſia between the King and his Son, he changed his purpoſe, and commanded Ferat to employ all his Forces to erect a Fortreſs at Reivan, a place belonging unto Tocomac, and to aſſure the Paſſage from Chars to Reivan; for ſo they ſhould be revenged of many harms they had received by him, and lay open the way to the City of Tauris, to the great glory of Amurath. As for Muſtapha the Georgian, although he had well deſerved to be chaſtiſed for his raſh attempt againſt Mahamet Baſſa, being then his General, yet he willed Ferat to diſſemble his evil Opinion of him; and (if it were poſſible) ſo to work, as to uſe him as an Inſtrument to convey Treaſure and Succours to Teflis: for by this means the Paſſage being made ſafe, all Georgia would without any more Fortreſſes be ſubdued, and then the next year they might attempt the enterpriſe for Tauris.

Highly did Ferat commend the Devices of Amurath his Lord, and ſhewed himſelf ready for any attempt. And ſo the time being come wherein it behoved them to ſet on foot their important Deſignments, in the beginning of the year 1583, Commandments were ſent out to all the Cities of the Empire, which were wont to make their appearance at theſe Wars, That upon freſh ſummons, they ſhould be ready to return againſt the Perſians, and to put in Execution that ſhould be enjoyned them by their new General. The Fame whereof flew as far as Soria, Jurie, Paleſtine, Meſopotamia, Babylonia, to Balſara, to Sivas, to Maras, to all Bythinia, Capadocia, Cilicia, Armenia; yea and beyond Conſtantinople, to the Borders of Hungary and Græce, and in brief, to all the Regions that were wont to come to this War: all which ſent their Captains and Souldiers accordingly. And ſo at laſt General Ferat departing from Conſtantinople, and paſſing over to Scutari by the way of Amaſia and of Sivas, came to Erzirum, where he took a view of all his Army and Proviſion: and from thence in eight days arrived at Chars, conducted by the Perſian fugitive Maxut Chan; and from Chars, ſet himſelf on his way towards Reivan. Three days before he came to Reivan, of certain Ruins of an old Caſtle which the Turks call Aggia Chalaſi (or the Caſtle of Strangers) he erected a new Fortreſs, and left in it a Garriſon of four hundred Souldiers, with a Sanzack, and certain pieces of Ordnance, and then went to Reivan. This Country is diſtant from Tauris eight or nine days Journey; between which two places are ſcituate Naſſivan, Chiulfal, Marant, and Sofian; all enriched with goodly Gardens and pleaſant Greens: but in the way are many craggy Mountains to be climed, and ſundry hard Paſſages either for Army or Traveller.

He cometh to Reivan.

Here then did Ferat encamp himſelf with his Army; and taking advice of his chief Captains, where he ſhould build the Fort; they all with one conſent adviſed him to ſeiſe upon the Houſes and Gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, encloſing the Gardens with ſtrong Walls and deep Ditches round about, whereinto he conveyed Water from a certain River, that comming down from the Mountains, ran into Araxis. Which Work was performed with ſuch Expedition, that within the ſpace of fifteen days the Fortreſs was finiſhed, being in circuit ſeven hundred and fifty yards. It grieved Tocomac exceedingly thus to loſe his Country and Dwelling, and ſo much the more, becauſe it hapned ſo ſuddenly, and as it were unlooked for. He himſelf, as ſoon as he underſtood that the Turkiſh Army was coming to that Coaſt, having withdrawn himſelf and his Men of War out of the City he could not keep, ſought by all means to be revenged, if not altogether, yet in ſome part, of this ſo great an Injury. And therefore he wrote unto the King at Corazan, to Emir Chan at Tauris, to Simon in Georgia; he gathered Souldiers out of the Villages, and uſed all his poſſible indeavour to enable himſelf to annoy the Enemies Army: but from none of theſe places could he receive any help, the King being ſo far off in Wars againſt his Son, the Georgian being buſied by hindering any Relief to be brought to the beſieged in Teflis; as for Emir Chan (who by ſolemn promiſe unto the King before his departure to Heri, had undertaken the defence of that ſide of the Kingdom againſt the Turks) he either would not, or could not ſtir; neither ſent ſo much as one Souldier, having, as ſome ſuppoſed, ſecret Intelligence with General Ferat, not to diſturb him in this his Work. So Tocomac, deſtitute of all other help, and not able of himſelf to do much againſt ſo mighty an Enemy; yet ceaſed not to lay ſuch privy Ambuſhes for the Turks as he could, killing of them ſometimes 100, ſometime an 150, and ſometimes more, as they fell into his danger. And to eaſe his Stomach againſt Emir Chan, (who ſitting ſtill at Tauris, as it were to behold his Miſery, would not ſo much as ſhake a Sword againſt theſe ſpoiling Turks) he ſpared not to diſpatch certain Horſemen in haſte to the King at Corazan, and by eloquent Letters to amplifie the cowardiſe of Emir Chan; intermedling withall ſome cauſes of Suſpition, that he had ſome intelligence with the Turkiſh General.

Ferat in the ſpace of fifteen days buildeth a Fort at Reivan 750 yards about.

Ferat having thus built this new Fort at Reivan, as Amurath had commanded, and furniſhed it with Artillery, and all other things needful for the defence thereof; appointed Sinan Baſſa (the Son of Cicala, a Renegate of Genoa, and by Selymus the late Emperour, in the flower of his Youth created Aga, or Captain of the Janizaries) with a Garriſon 1583 ſon of eight thouſand Souldiers to keep the ſame. And ſo departing thence, by the way of Aggia Chalaſi, in ten days arrived with his Army at Chars.

Ferat had not long ſtayed at Chars, but ſtrange News were brought thither, That Muſtapha the Georgian (to whom Amurath had ſent thirty thouſand Duckats, by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to have by him been conveyed to Teflis for the Relief of them in the Fort) was revolted from the Turkiſh Obedience, and being now become a Rebel, had left that Fortreſs in manifeſt danger to yield, if by ſome other means it were not relieved. Which ſtrange Novelties exceedingly troubled the General; who, to know the certainty thereof, called before him all ſuch as were the Meſſengers of this Misfortune: by whom he was certainly informed, That Muſtapha, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, having put themſelves upon their way towards Teflis with the Treaſure, guarded with a Convoy of five hundred of his Souldiers, in the mid way had met with his Couſin Simon the Georgian; by whom he was perſwaded to return again to his antient Faith and Religion, which he had to the great Peril of his Soul ſo prophanely abandoned, and to ſhake off the Service of Amurath, which would yield him no other recompence than an hard and infamous Captivity, and in the end ſome fraudulent and treacherous Death: and that his Perſwaſion had ſo prevailed with Muſtapha, that he cauſed the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and preſently beheaded; and dividing the Treaſure with his ſaid Couſin, had with him and his other Kinſmen vowed a ſolemn and perpetual Confederacy; and ſo having withdrawn themſelves to their wonted Paſſages, lay there in wait for ſuch Succours as ſhould by the Turks be brought to Teflis.

When Ferat underſtood theſe and ſuch other Particularities, he all in a Fury ſwore that he would not return to Erzirum untill he had put all the Country of Muſtapha to Fire and Sword: yet firſt he thought it needful to relieve Teflis, which would otherwiſe be in danger to be yielded to the Enemy: and for that purpoſe made choice of Haſſan Baſſa, who in the laſt year of the Generalſhip of Muſtapha, had moſt courageouſly conveyed the like Succours, and taken Aliculi Chan. Unto him therefore did the General aſſign forty thouſand Duckets, with other Proviſion neceſſary for that Service; and for the more Security, appointed him fifteen thouſand of the moſt choice and valiant Souldiers in all the Army, to conduct the ſame. In ten days ſpace Haſſan Baſſa went and came from Teflis, having in his Journey to and fro had many Skirmiſhes with the Georgians, wherein he loſt ſome few men, without any other loſs worth the remembrance.

After this, the General ſent one Reſuan Baſſa with ſix thouſand Souldiers to ſpoil the Country of Muſtapha the Georgian, the late Renegate, but now become a Rebel to the Turk; which Reſuan, without any long ſtay over-ran all his Territory, burnt his Towns, and committed moſt uncouth outrages, which extended even unto the poor inſenſible Trees, and carried away with him many captive Souls, with much Corn and Cattel, like a raging Tempeſt deſtroying whatſoever came in his way. Now was the General alſo retired to Ardachan, whither came Reſuan to meet him with his foreſaid Booty. But becauſe they had now performed what they had before intended, and the approach of Winter perſwaded their return, they removed from Ardachan, and by the way of Olti retired to Erzirum, from whence all the Souldiers were licenſed to depart to their ſeveral Places of abode, and a memorial ſent to Amurath, of all the Actions had been performed; and eſpecially of the good ſervice done by Haſſan Baſſa; who for the ſame was now once again honoured by the King, with Cloth of Gold, a Battel-axe and Targuet all gilt.

Ferat cometh to Erzirum, and there breaketh up his Army.

1583 About this time, one Podolovius, a Gentleman of Polonia, ſent by Stephen King of Polonia, to Conſtantinople, by the leave of Amurath to buy certain Horſes in Anatolia; returning homewards with four and twenty goodly Horſes which he had bought, was notwithſtanding the Great Turks Paſs, by his Commandment ſtayed upon the way, all his men (in number four and thirty) ſlain, excepting one Boy, who getting into a Wood, eſcaped, and Podolovius his Head ſtruck off. The Horſes brought back to Conſtantinople, were by the appointment of Amurath, ſome beſtowed into his own Stable, and the reſt given among the Baſſaes, oftentimes pointed at with the Fingers of the Turks, in deriſion of the Polonian King. This Amurath commanded to be done, in revenge of an outrage done by the Polonian Coſſacks againſt the Turks; whereof News was but even then brought to the Court.

The Death of Hama Chadum, Amurath's Mother.

The nine and twentieth day of November of this preſent year 1583, died Hama Cadum, the Widow of the late Emperour Selymus the ſecond, and Mother of this Amurath, and lieth buried by her Husband Selymus, and his five Sons, ſtrangled by their Brother Amurath.

Ferat raiſeth a new Army.

The Perſian King with a great Army cometh to Tauris.

All the reſt of this year 1583, Ferat ſpent at Erzirum, and afterwards ſent out his ordinary Commandments to all the accuſtomed Cities, to ſummon the Souldiers againſt the next Spring in the year 1584, gathering together a greater number of Pioneers and Engineers than ever had been gathered in theſe Wars heretofore; and withall gave it out, That he would go to Naſſivan, and there do great Matters. At which report the Perſian was much moved, and began to caſt many things in their Heads about it; but above all others, the King, who underſtanding at Casbin of all that had before hapned at Reivan, and of the new Preparations of the Turks, began to fear that they would this year paſs to Tauris, or at leaſt (as was reported) to Naſſivan, and in thoſe places built new Fortreſſes, to the great danger of the Perſian Empire: and therefore, retaining ſtill ſuch Forces as he brought with him from Heri, and commanding as many more as he could out of all the Cities that were ſubject unto him, to follow him to Tauris, he arrived there with his Army, not long after the arrival of Ferat Baſſa at Erzirum. This unexpected coming of the Perſian King with ſo great an Army to Tauris, filled the World with Expectation of great Matters to have been done by him againſt the Turks; inſomuch that Ferat the General, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to advertiſe Amurath of the matter: declaring unto him, That his deſire was to go to Naſſivan, and there to build a Fortreſs, according to his Commandment, ſo to lay open a Paſſage to Tauris: but having received certain Intelligence, that the Perſian King was come to Tauris with an huge Army, and full Reſolution to encounter him; he thought it his Duty not to put in Execution his aforeſaid Determination, without his expreſs Commandment. Unto whom Amurath preſently wrote back, that the matter ſo ſtanding, he ſhould not go to Naſſivan, but only employ his Forces to aſſure the Paſſage to Tomanis and Lori, that ſo the Fort of Teflis might the year following be relieved by ſome ſmall Band, without ſending of any great Army for the conveying of Succours thither. This new Commandment of his Lord, Ferat kept ſecret to himſelf; cauſing the Rumour of his going to Naſſivan to be more and more increaſed; of purpoſe to feed the Opinion that the Perſians had before fore conceived of his coming thither; and ſo deluding them, with leſs danger to build the Forts he had intended, for the quieting of thoſe moſt dangerous Paſſages of Lori and Tomanis.

Upon this Reſolution Ferat having gathered together his People, with all things neceſſary for his purpoſe, removed with his Army from Erzirum towards Chars, where he ſtayed ten days to take a new ſurvey both of his Souldiers and Proviſion. And ſo departing thence, ſet forward toward Lori; ſending before him Haſſan Baſſa with five thouſand light Horſemen to ſcout the Country even to Tomanis, and to learn what he poſſibly could of the Enemies purpoſes, and the State of Georgia. Which thing Haſſan dutifully performed, ſpeedily ſcouring over all the Woods, and diſcloſing all the Paſſages from thence to Lori, and ſo to Tomanis, without meeting with any upon whom to aſſay his Valour, more than certain Robbers upon the high-way, whom he cauſed to be ſlain, (as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Perſian Affairs) and their Heads to be ſet on the tops of their Launces, and ſo returned again to Lori: where having ſtayed one day, he met with the General, to whom he recounted all that had happened in that his Excurſion. Ferat being come to Lori, there incamped his Army. This place did ſometime belong to Simon the Georgian, well ſtrengthned with an high Caſtle, compaſſed about with very deep Ditches, and a thick Wall almoſt a mile in circuit, but was then ſomewhat weakned with time: it is diſtant from Teflis about two days Journey of a Carriers pace. Upon this Caſtle Ferat ſeiſed; and having repaired the Walls, and ſtrengthned the breaches, he placed therein Ali Baſſa of Græce, with ſeven thouſand Souldiers for the defence thereof, and planted upon the Walls two hundred ſmall pieces of Ordnance. And ſo when he had ſeen all things there in good order, departed thence with his Army towards Tomanis, having before commanded Ali Baſſa, at ſome convenient time to fortifie Saitan Chalaſi a Caſtle about ten miles diſtant from Lori, and therein to place a convenient Garriſon of Souldiers and Artillery.

Ferat cutteth down a thick Wood at Tomanis, and buildeth a Fort upon the Straight.

Four days were they going from Lori to Tomanis, being ordinarily but one days work from the one place to the other: but now the General would needs ſo make it, to take the ſpoil of thoſe rich Fields, abounding with Corn, Cattel, and Fruit, and to leave unto the Country-People a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At laſt being come to Tomanis (in times paſt a Caſtle of Simons, but by reaſon of theſe Wars, by him then abandoned) he began to conſult with the other Captains, how and where the Fort ſhould be erected, for the aſſurance of that Country. But after many Diſcourſes, it was at laſt concluded not to fortifie in that Caſtle, as being too far from the Straight, to make that dangerous Paſſage ſafe and ſecure; but to go a little further, and to build a Fortreſs upon the very Mouth of the Straight. So the Army marching forward a few miles, at the very entrance of the narrow Paſſage found the Ruines of another Caſtle, and near thereunto ſtayed themſelves. This ſteep headlong Caſtle was ſo compaſſed round about with a thick Wood, which hindered all diſcovery afar off, that it was not convenient to found ſuch a Caſtle there, from whence their Ordnance could neither avail them to whom the defence thereof ſhould be committed, neither indamage thoſe that ſhould come to offend it. And therefore the General commanded, that every man with all his Endeavours ſhould lay to his hand for the cutting down of that thick Wood, and making way through thick and thin, to lay it for an open Campaign, that was before the Receptacle of a thouſand dangerous Treacheries. In very ſhort ſpace were the Trees laid along on the Ground, the place made lightſome and open, and a very commodious Scituation prepared for the Foundation of a Caſtle. The plot of the old ruined Caſtle was compaſſed about with a Wall of a thouſand and ſeven hundred yards, and in the midſt thereof was erected a ſtrong Keep, ſundry Lodgings and Chambers builded, and 200 pieces of Ordnance diſtributed upon the new Walls. After that, the General ſent Reſuan Baſſa, and the Baſſa of Caraemit, with 20000 of his moſt choice Souldiers, to convey Succours to Teflis: who marching cloſely together in the direct way, in one day arrived at the ſaid Fort; wherein they beſtowed their Supplies; and changing the Governour thereof, ſubſtituted in his room one Bagli, being then upon this occaſion only called a Baſſa. Whilſt Reſuan yet lay thus incamped under Teflis, Daut Chan, the Brother of Simon, who in the beginning of theſe Wars, at the coming of Muſtapha the Turks General into Georgia, had fled out of Teflis, came now with all his Family, and offered himſelf as a ſubject and devoted Vaſſal to the Turkiſh Emperour: whom Reſuan entertained with great Promiſes and large aſſurances of all good Succeſs, according to his deſire.

The compaſs of the Caſtle built at Tomanis by Ferat.

In the mean while News was brought to Simon, That General Ferat ſtaying at the Straights of Tomanis with his Army, had ſent Reſuan Baſſa with a far leſs number than indeed he had, to ſuccour Teflis: Upon which report he took Courage to encounter Reſuan, and to give him Battel. Upon which Reſolution without further delay, being accompanied but with 4000 Georgians, partly Subjects of his own, and partly of Manucchiars, he with all ſpeed poſſible went againſt Reſuan. But whilſt Simon was going thitherwards, General Ferat fearing the worſt, had already by chance diſpatched away the two Baſſaes of Caramania and Maras, with 10000 Souldiers, to the end that joyning themſelves with the Souldiers of Reſuan, they ſhould at all adventures be ſo much the ſtronger. Now Simon going reſolutely on, found Reſuan incamped with 6000 Souldiers only, at the foot of an Hill, on the back-ſide whereof lay all the reſt of the Army, and preſently gave a charge upon him; when the Souldiers behind the Hill being aware of his coming, were ready all at once with their Weapons to receive him. Who now perceiving his Errour, repented himſelf to have ſo raſhly aſſaulted his Enemies, ſeeing now no other Remedy but to be utterly undone. But ſeeing that he had now ſo far ingaged himſelf, as that he could not by flight but increaſe his Grief, and make the iſſue more lamentable; with theſe few Souldiers which he had, he indured the Fury of the great Army of Reſuan, ſo that on both ſides there was joyned a moſt cruel Battel: wherein the ſtrange and unuſual Valour of thoſe few Chriſtians was much to be wondred at. Yet in the end the huge number of the Turkiſh Swords and Spears ſo prevailed upon that ſmall number of the Georgians, as that they were brought to great Extremity; yea Simon himſelf having his Horſe ſlain under him, fell down headlong to the ground, and in his fall was very near to have been taken Priſoner, as was his Lieutenant, and many other his Followers, had he not been relieved by an unexpected and marvellous chance: for whilſt the Battel was even at the greateſt heat between them, Reſuan diſcovered the two Baſſaes of Caramania and Maras, who (as is before ſaid) were newly ſent by General Ferat to ſuccour him; but both by the ſaid Reſuan, and alſo by the reſt of his Army, were indeed thought to be Perſians; whereupon they were incontinently ſurpriſed with a ſudden fear, inſomuch that they now became very doubtful of the Victory, whereof they thought themſelves before aſſured. In this ſuſpence and doubtfulneſs of Mind the Battel was alſo intermitted, and the Victory by the ſight of thoſe their Friends diſturbed; whereby the Georgians, and eſpecially Simon, whoſe eſtate was almoſt deſperate, took the Opportunity to eſcape and ſave themſelves; leaving behind them moſt ſure ſigns of their Valour among the Turks, of whom many remained there ſlain, many wounded, and many filled with great marvail and unexpected fear. Thus eſcaped poor Simon with the remainder of his followers into his known places of Refuge, there to bewail the Death and Captivity of his Subjects. But Reſuan after he had diſcovered the Baſſaes approaching towards him, to be his known Friends and well Willers, fretted in himſelf exceedingly, that Simon had ſo eſcaped his hands; yet holding on his way to Tomanis, he arrived there in great Triumph, drawing the Standards of Simon all along the Ground, and cauſing many of the heads of the Georgians to be carried upon his Souldiers Launces, to the great joy of General Ferat, to whom he delivered all the Priſoners taken in the Battel, and wicked Daut Chan, who having in times paſt renounced his firſt Faith, was become a Perſian; and now again deſpiſing the vain ſuperſtition of the Perſians, had yielded himſelf to the vanity of the Turks, and made himſelf a voluntary Slave to Amurath.

Simon in danger to have been taken, eſcapeth by a ſtrange chance.

Now was the year ſo far ſpent, that every man began to fear the Winters approach; and therefore the General determined to remove thence, and to withdraw himſelf into places of more ſafety. And ſo having ſet all things in order in the new Fort, he appointed Haſſan to be the Baſſa of Tomanis, and left with him eight thouſand ſelect Souldiers choſen out of all the Army, for the defence of that Fort and the Country thereabout. Deeply had Ferat laid up the outrage committed by Muſtaffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manucchiar) in taking away the Kings treaſure, and killing the two Capigi and the Chiaus: and therefore he reſolved with himſelf, not to return to Chars or Erzirum, unleſs he had firſt paſſed into the Country of the ſaid Georgian, and in moſt cruel manner revenged thoſe notable injuries before received. In three days he arrived at Triala, and there incamped. But lying there, ſuch an unwonted Dearth and Scarcity of all things riſe in the Army, but eſpecially of Victuals, that every five buſhels and a half of Wheat was ſold for five hundred Duckats, to the univerſal calamity of the whole Army.

A wonderful dearth in the Turks Army at Triala.

From this place, the General was minded to go on forwards towards the Country of Manucchiar; but whilſt he was upon the raiſing of his Tents, one Veis Baſſa of Aleppo came unto him, and told him, That it was not good now to ſpend the time in wandring about thoſe Countries, for that there were three very great Enemies confederate together, to make this enterpriſe very difficult, and almoſt impoſſible and deſperate: one was the ſeaſon of the year, being now full of Snows, Froſt, and Tempeſt; another was, the want and ſcarcity of all things neceſſary, eſpecially of Victual; the third was, the People of Georgia, who by a common uniting of themſelves together, and peradventure aided by the Perſians, might work ſome notable miſchief againſt the Army. This Speech of Veis ſo much offended the General, that he moſt ſharply rebuked him, and with bitter termes reproved him, telling him flatly, That he well perceived that he was brought up among Mountains and Villages, and of a Villain (as he was) upon ſome ſuperfluity of grace, or fooliſh importunity, advanced to the honour of a Baſſa, and that therefore he ſhould not have preſumed ſo much as to think it lawful for him, ſo impudently and malapertly to come and give him ſuch advertiſements; whereas it had been his duty rather to have held his peace, and to have hearkened to the commandments of his betters and ſuperiours, yielding himſelf obedient and devoted with all his power to perform the ſame. With this rebuke the General paſſed on to Archelech, burning, and in a manner deſtroying the Country before him, though indeed it was in amity and confederacy with the Turks. But the Inhabitants of Archelech upon the coming of the Turks had abandoned the City, and for fear withdrawn themſelves into the Mountains. In Archelech Ferat incamped, and ſtayed the ſpace of four days among the rocky craggs, and in a barren ſoil, yielding neceſſary ſuſtenance neither for man nor beaſt; ſo that every man there endured unſpeakable miſeries: yet for the ſpace of four days the Souldiers with patience endured this ſo great a Calamity. But in the end, the fall of a huge Snow being added to theſe Extremities, did ſo greatly increaſe their griefs, that all the Janizaries and Spaoglans of Conſtantinople aroſe in a Tumult, and coming before Ferat, in deſpightful and contemptuous manner, with very haughty and reſolute terms ſaid unto him:

The inſolent ſpeech of the mutinous Souldiers againſt Ferat their General.

AND how long ſhall we endure this thy tedious and inſolent Government? Where is the due Commiſeration that thou oughteſt to bear toward the Vaſſals of thy Sovereign, thou ruſtical and unreaſonable Captain? Doſt thou think happily, that we keep our Harlots as thou doſt, under thy ſumpteous Pavilions, all fat and in good plight, with delicate Viands, whilſt others live in Miſery? Doſt thou believe that we have as thou haſt, our dainty Sugars, Spices, and Conſerves, whereby to reſtore us, in the common Calamity of others? And that we have at command, Meat and precious Wines, which thou mingleſt with thy clear and pleaſant Water, partly provided for thee by the Art of the cunning Doctors, and partly brought to thee from far Places? From this day forward it will be no longer endured, that ſo much People ſhould continue in this Famine, afflicted with Nakedneſs, and many other Inconveniencies: and therefore get thy ſelf up and return toward Erzirum; otherwiſe we ſhall be inforced to do that which will breed more diſpleaſure unto thee, than to any man living.

The General in a great Agony preſently called a Councel, wherein it was concluded, That they ſhould all ſend their ſtrong ſumpter Horſes to Ardachan, and the reſt to follow him into Manucchiars Country, whether he had appointed to go only to make an inrode, and with the ſpoil and booty of that Country to refreſh the Minds of his Souldiers, afflicted with the Miſeries both paſt and preſent. This Commandment of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as well becauſe he promiſed them a ſpeedy Voyage, as alſo for that every man deſired the ſack of Altunchala and other the Territories of Munucchiar. So Ferat holding on his Journey thorough certain low Vallies between the high and craggie Mountains, continually accompanied with great Famine and Scarcity, at length brought his Army to Cliſca, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for fear of the Turks quite abandoned and forſaken by the Inhabitants; who with their Wives and Children, and all the beſt ſtuff they had, were fled into remote and ſafe places untill the Fury of the Enemy was overpaſſed. In the Fields near unto this place (bounding with Corn and Cattel, and plenty of Fruit) the General refreſhed his whole Army; and hoping that all the Souldiers would like it well to ſtay a while in that ſuch eaſe, determined with himſelf to erect a Fort in that Place. And with this Reſolution gave commandment to Reſuan Baſſa to go up to the Tower, and in the top thereof to ſet up an Enſign, with a Proclamation and publick Report, That he would in the Name of Amurath there erect a Fort, and fortifie it as he had done the other Forts before. Reſuan accompanied with Amurath the Baſſa of Caramania, according to the commandment of the General, in the top of the Tower ſet up an Enſign or two; which as ſoon as the Souldiers had eſpied, the forenamed Janizaries and Spaoglans, thinking themſelves too much abuſed by the General, ariſing again all in an uprore, repleniſhed with Fury and Indignation, ran up in a rage to take down the Enſigns that were ſet up upon the Tower, and taking them in their hands, rapt the ſaid Reſuan once or twice about the pate, diſcharging withall a thouſand injurious and deſpightful Words upon him, and ſharply rebuked him. And then returning to the General (who was now come thither himſelf to countenance the Action of Reſuan) with Geſtures full of deſpight, contempt and diſdain, reviling him with many ſhameful and ſcornful Terms, they proteſted unto him;

The mutinous Souldiers again threaten their General.

That they were not come to the Wars to exerciſe the Occupation of Maſons and Dawbers, and to be employed in ſuch vile and diſhonourable Offices; but only to manage their Weapons, and thereby to demerit their ordinary Wages, and to purchaſe to themſelves Glory and Renown at the Kings hand. And therefore if he loved his Head, and would not ſee thoſe Armes turned againſt himſelf, which hitherto had been the Revengers of the Enemies Injuries, he ſhould reſolve with himſelf, to leave theſe new Buildings, and theſe unſeaſonable Deſignments, and giving place to the contrary ſeaſon of the year, to have due care of their common Deſires and Neceſſity.

Whilſt they were yet thus expoſtulating the matter with him, one more bold than the reſt, and more forgetful of his Duty, did not ſtick to aſſault the General, and to threaten him to wreak his Fury upon him; which in that Tumult had happily been done, had not the Baſſa of Caramania lent the General his own Horſe, and ſo conducted him to his Pavilion. Yet was he nevertheleſs ſtill purſued by the tumultuous Souldiers, and again ſharply accuſed for the ſtay that he made there, and for not reſolving preſently to remove thence; and at laſt after many reproachful Speeches, told expreſly, That if he did not the next morning remove out of thoſe quarters, without all fail he ſhould loſe his Life for it. For all that, Ferat diſdaining to yield to them, that ſhould of Duty have been ready and obedient at every beck of his; and ſeeking by all means (notwithſtanding all this ſtir) to ſtay there ſo long time as ſhould be ſufficient to build a Fort, that would ſo much offend Manucchiar; anſwered them again:

The ſtout anſwer of Ferat.

That he made no account of their threatning him with his Life, which he had always offered to lay down for any ſervice of his King. But if they had no care to ſerve their Soveraign in this new Building, they might go their wayes; as for himſelf he was reſolutely minded to obey his Lord in whatſoever he had commanded him; for the honour of whom every one of them ought to think their Lives very well beſtowed.

Upon this anſwer there followed divers railings and curſings againſt the King, againſt the General, and againſt them all; and in this confuſed tumult every man betook himſelf to his Weapons; in every corner was heard grumblings and whiſperings full of Wrath and Indignation; ſo that there was a great fear of ſome dangerous event, but greater was the Suſpition of the Generals Life. And now every man had withdrawn himſelf to the guarding of ſuch things as he eſteemed moſt; when ſuddenly and in a trice you might have ſeen the Pavilions of all the Baſſaes and Captains fall down flat to the Ground, all the Cords thereof being cut inſunder by the wrathful Souldiers; and as it were in a moment, all the Muttons and other Cattel the General and Baſſaes led with them for their ordinary uſe, were ſeiſed upon by the ſame Souldiers, and guarded with all diligence poſſible. And ſo far was it off that any man durſt challenge or revenge this their Inſolency, that they themſelves turning afreſh upon their General, being now in a maze and deadly fear, began now the third time to threaten him, That if he did not forthwith remove from thoſe Countries, and turn his Journey towards Erzirum, thoſe Vallies and Fields ſhould without all fail become the Sepulchres of the Baſſaes, and thoſe Hills retain the eternal Memory of ſo bloody a day.

The Souldiers overthrow the Generals Tents, and threaten to kill him.

With a little Liberality might the General have done with this People whatſoever he had liſted, but being loth to gratifie them in any thing, he was inforced to perform their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great ſhame, to obey them, whom with right uſage he might have made obedient to himſelf; and therefore to avoid their deſpightful Threats, to his exceeding great reproach, he was glad even as they had commanded, to remove out of thoſe quarters. The firſt day he arrived at Ardachan, with the great trouble of all his Souldiers; for whereas the Journey was wont to be two days work ordinarily, as well in reſpect of the length of the way, as the difficulty of the Paſſage; the General would now needs have it done in one, the rather thereby to grieve his Souldiers. But of this his wilfulneſs he received even the ſame day the juſt reward; for that the Chariots wherein his Women rid were conveyed away, together with the Eunuchs that were their Keepers: ſome ſay by the Georgians that lay in wait for ſuch a Prey; others ſay by the Janizaries, who the more to diſhonour their General, wrought him this Injury.

Great was the reproach that Ferat received in the Army, but far greater at Conſtantinople, when theſe News were there known; but there was no remedy, he muſt now perforce indure it, and diſcontented as he was, keep on his way towards Erzirum. In Ardachan he took a ſurvey of his Army, and there gave his Souldiers leave to depart: himſelf afterwards arriving at Erzirum, hated of all his Souldiers, envied by his Captains, derided for the loſs of his Women, and fallen into the diſgrace of every man. No leſs than the reſt was the Turkiſh Emperour diſcontented with him alſo; firſt for that he had done nothing worth ſpeaking of, in revenge of the ſhameful Injury done by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet ſo mightily diſcontented his Souldiers: and ſecondly, for that without any care he had ſuffered Aliculi Chan the Perſian Priſoner to eſcape away, about whoſe flight it was thought he could not chuſe but have ſome Intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the Court, to divert his Journey from Naſſivan, to the Straights and narrow Paſſages of Georgia, being deſirous to be throughly informed of thoſe dangerous ways; in this ſecond year when he removed from Erzirum, took Aliculi Chan out of Priſon, of purpoſe to uſe him as his guide in thoſe dangerous Straights, and therefore carried him under a Guard (whatſoever it was afterwards) of his moſt faithful Vaſſals, ſtill intreating him well, and taking ſuch order as that he wanted nothing; at laſt being come to the Straights of Tomanis in Georgia, where the Caſtle (as it was before ſaid) was erected, he from thence ſecretly eſcaped into Perſia. The manner of his eſcape is diverſly reported; ſome ſay, Ferat at Ardachan breaketh up his Army.

1584 That Ferat in diſcharge of his Promiſe, for his good Direction had gratified him with his Liberty. Others ſay, That Ferat corrupted with Money, gave him Opportunity to eſcape; ſome others (with more probability) That his eſcape was made neither for Money, nor diſcharge of promiſe; but by the only Vigilancy of Aliculi himſelf, and the ſleepineſs of his Keepers; and that watching the Opportunity of the Night (a friend to all eſcapes) he ſtarted away. Howſoever it was, in fine, he was delivered from his long Captivity, to the diſcredit of Ferat, and returned into Perſia, to perform ſuch Interpriſes againſt the Turks, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

The dangerous Paſſage from Reivan to Teſlis ſecured unto the Turks.

General Ferat (before his departure out of Georgia) had commanded Aly, the Baſſa of Græcia (whom he left, as is before declared, in the new Caſtle of Lori) to fortifie a certain Caſtle called Saitan Chas (in our Language, The Caſtle of the Devil) which he with great Diligence performed, and left therein fifty pieces of Artillery, and a thouſand Souldiers under the charge of a Sanzack; and ſo quieted the Paſſages from Fort to Fort, as that all the ways from Reivan to Chars, and from Chars to Teflis, were made eaſie and ſafe; and all the means taken away whereby the Enemy might be able to plot any new Treachery upon thoſe Paſſages, which was no ſmall piece of good Service.

The Perſian King in the mean time lying at Tauris with his Army, underſtanding that the Turks had changed their purpoſe from Naſſivan to Georgia, ſo that there was no further need to imploy his Army againſt them for the defence of Tauris or Naſſivan; at laſt reſolved with himſelf to licence his Souldiers to depart, and to apply himſelf to remove private Revenges. For calling Emir Chan unto him, whom he had left Governour of Tauris, and General for that part of his Kingdom; he required of him the occaſion, why he had not performed the great Promiſes which he had made to him before his departure to Heri, nor done his indeavour to hinder the Turks Fabrick at Reivan; and why he went not out with other Souldiers appointed for that purpoſe, and namely with the Turcomans (as he had promiſed) to revenge ſo great an Injury, and in beſt manner he could, to have indamaged the Turkiſh Forces? Sundry excuſes did Emir Chan alledge for the colouring of his manifeſt default, but none ſufficient to clear him of the Crimes objected againſt him by the King and the Sultans; wherefore he was by the King adjudged to have his Eyes burnt out with an hot Iron; and ſo deprived of his ſight, to be diſpoiled of all his Goods, and ſhut up in cloſe Priſon. Which heavy doom was without further delay accordingly put in Execution; whereof within the ſpace of a few Months, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous Souldier) miſerably died in Priſon. Whoſe Death ſo highly offended the Turcoman Nation, (who had him always in great Eſtimation) that they abſolutely denied their defences for the Crown of Perſia: and the more, when they heard that the King had beſtowed the room of Emir Chan upon Aliculi; who although he had in many reſpects deſerved all Preferment, yet for that he was an ancient Enemy to certain Turcoman Captains, they would not in any wiſe indure that he ſhould be exalted to ſo great an Honour. And therefore they waxed more diſdainful and ill affected towards the King, whereby the Perſian Forces became the more weakned and divided.

Emir Chan* having his Eyes put out, dieth miſerably in Priſon.

The Turks notwithſtanding the League yet in Force betwixt Amurath and Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour that now is, did many times make Incurſions into the upper part of Hungary, burning the Country Villages, and carrying away the People into Captivity; but in their return, they were oftentimes cut off by the Emperours Souldiers and ſlain. Which being reported at Conſtantinople, much moved the Turkiſh Tyrant: but when he underſtood that his men had without any cauſe made thoſe inrodes into the Territory of the Chriſtians, and ſo received the foreſaid Loſſes, he was again appeaſed, and in the beginning of this year 1584, renewed the League betwixt him and the Emperour for eight years more. 1584

Amurath* ſendeth for Oſman into Siruan.

Ferat from Erzirum advertiſed Amurath of all that had hapned in his late Expedition; deſiring him to command what he would have taken in hand the next Spring. But beſides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like alſo, although in another manner: declaring unto the King (and that in an odious ſort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the eſcape of Aliculi Chan, the ſhameful loſs of his Women, his Quarrels with the Janizaries, his falling out with Veis Baſſa, a man well regarded of Amurath himſelf, the Diſorders of his whole Camp for his want of Diſcretion; and to be ſhort, the particularities of all ſuch Actions as had not altogether ſo honorably been by him performed that year: Cauſes of themſelves ſufficient to induce the King to remove the ſaid Ferat from his Generalſhip. To which occaſions, were alſo added ſundry other ſecret reſpects: for ever ſince the laſt departure of Ferat from Erzirum, Amurath had ſtill in his head, the next year following to attempt the Enterpriſe of Tauris, and thereby to ſtir up through the World a famous Report of his Conqueſt correſpondent to his Greatneſs. Now among the Captains whom he eſteemed to be worthy men, to whom he might with truſt commit this ſo great an enterpriſe, he bethought himſelf of Oſman Baſſa, left at Sumachia in Siruan by General Muſtapha in the firſt year of this War: who having in that Province remained ever ſince, had without any help of the Tartarians, by his own Induſtry and Valour, to the great Contentment of Amurath, brought that large Country into a reaſonable Obedience to the Turkiſh Empire; and that which moſt of all pleaſed the Turkiſh Emperour, had in a Country ſo far diſtant, maintained his Army, wherewith he had done all this without any Expences at all to his King; having now a good while levied his Souldiers Stipends upon the Lands and Territories of that Region; and ſtill exerciſed a kind of Government and Soveraignty over thoſe Places. Of all which his good Proceedings, he had cauſed Intelligence from time to time to be ſent unto the Court; by which means, and other Favourers which he had about the King, there was foſtred in the mind of Amurath a wonderful good Opinion of him; ſo that now without delay he reſolved to ſend for him to Conſtantinople; and for that purpoſe, before Ferat was arrived at Erzirum, he had diſpatched certain Capigi and Chiaus to call this famous warriour unto him: yet wanted there not ſome (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) that went about to hinder both his coming to the Court, and alſo theſe Deſignments of ſo great importance. For Sciaus the chief Viſier (who rather for the comelineſs of his perſon and alliance with the King, than for any other his Virtues, was mounted to that high room) did greatly fear, leſt Oſman, whoſe courſe it was to ſit next unto him in the order of the greateſt Baſſaes, partly for his experience in matters of War, and partly for the good Affection the King did bear unto him, ſhould at his coming to Conſtantinople perſwade the King to what he liſted, and ſo peradventure take from him the chiefeſt Office, and get into his hands the whole Government of the Empire, whereby ſo great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to rid himſelf of theſe Fears, he caſt about by all means to keep him from coming to the Court: but becauſe that to attempt the ſame openly, might prove a matter both difficult and dangerous, he thought it better to make trial of a more commodious and ſecret means. This Sciaus in conſideration of many Gifts beſtowed upon him by Mahamet the Cuman-Tartar King, had many times excuſed him to Amurath of divers Accuſations which Oſman by his Letters had laid to his charge; for not aiding him in the ſubduing of Siruan, as he was both by promiſe and duty bound: and for all his overſights alleadged ſuch reaſons in his behalf, as if they did not altogether perſwade Amurath to be kind unto him, yet at the leaſt not to carry a mind of revenge againſt him; and had ſo far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian King, that there was betwixt them confirmed an interchangeable Amity and mutual Confederacy. Him Sciaus imagined to find willing and ready by all means poſſible, to hinder the coming of Oſman his Enemy to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciaus, as ſoon as he underſtood the certain Reſolution of Amurath, to call Oſman to the Court, ſecretly wrote to the Tartarian King, who lay incamped near to the Haven of Caffa upon the Fens of Meotis; certifying him, That Oſman was to come to the Court; and that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an Enemy he had been to him, and how much he had indeavoured by Letters to Amurath, to return all his Hatred and Diſpleaſure againſt him; and withall, That if he was able to do ſo much by Letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with very reaſonable Excuſes, the King had executed his wrathful Indignation upon him to his great danger; he ſhould then imagine with himſelf, what Oſman ſhould be able to do, when he ſhould come in Perſon to the Preſence of Amurath, and without any Mediator, between themſelves determine of all matters what they ſhould think convenient. Theſe, and peradventure worſe Letters which Sciaus wrote to the Tartar, miniſtred matter enough unto him to reſolve to do what he might, not to ſuffer ſo pernitious an Enemy of his to arrive at Conſtantinople; and eſpecially perceiving that Sciaus, in whoſe breaſt he repoſed all his Hope and all his Protection, did ſo greatly fear his coming. Wherefore to rid himſelf of that Fear, he commanded twelve thouſand Souldiers, that changing their Weapons and Apparel, they ſhould go and lie in wait for Oſman in the Borders between Cholchis and Iberia, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way he was to come; and ſo making an aſſault upon him, to bereave him of his Life. Hoping that ſuch an outrage once done, could not, or would not, be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Muſcovites, or to the Robbers by the High-way; and to be ſhort, rather to any body elſe, than to him. This Commandment of the Tartar King, was accordingly by the Souldiers put in Practice; who without further ſtay joyned themſelves together, and ſo rode towards the Place appointed.

The Tartar King ſendeth 12000 Tartars to lie in wait for to kill Oſman.

And now were the Meſſengers ſent from Amurath, come to Oſman, who preſently put himſelf on his way towards Conſtantinople, having left behind him at Derbent and Sumachia, two Baſſaes, thought to be the moſt ſufficient men in Seruania; having alſo appointed very good orders in the ſame, and an aſſured eſtabliſhment of all thoſe Countries and Places which Muſtapha firſt had ſubdued, and he himſelf had afterwards maintained under the Obedience of Amurath. He had alſo provided for the ſafety of his own Perſon, in paſſing thoſe troubleſome and dangerous Paſſages through which he was to travel, by chuſing out four thouſand Souldiers which he had tried in divers Battels, and brought up under his own Diſcipline; through whoſe Valour he doubted not ſafely to paſs through the Treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous ſquadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from Derbent, and coaſting along the Rocks of Caucaſus (that at all times of the year are all white and hoary with continual Snows) leaving on his left hand Media, Iberia, and Cholchis; and on the right hand, the famous Rivers of Tanais and Volga, even at his firſt entrance unto the Shores of the Euxine Sea, he was by the above named twelve thouſand Tartarians, being apparelled like Theeves that lie upon thoſe ways, ſuddenly aſſailed and fought withall. But like as an huge Rock lying open to Tempeſts and Waves, ſtanding faſt and unmoveable in it ſelf, reſiſteth the thunderings and ruſhings of the great and fearful Billows: ſo ſtood Oſman faſt and firm, and couragiouſly ſuſtained this treacherous aſſault, turning the bold Countenances of his reſolute Souldiers, againſt the rebellious multitude of thoſe traiterous Squadrons; who, as is their manner in the beginning, uſed great force, but finding ſo ſtout reſiſtance in thoſe few, whom they had thought with their only looks and ſhoutings to have put to flight, they began at length to quail. Which Oſman quickly perceiving, couragiouſly forced upon them, and in a very ſhort ſpace, and with a very ſmall loſs of his own, put thoſe Tartarians to flight, killing a number of them, and alſo taking many of them Priſoners; by whom Oſman was afterwards informed (as the truth was) that their King for fear that he had conceived, leſt when he came to Conſtantinople he would procure his Deſtruction from Amurath, had ſent this Army to ſeek his Death. Of which Treaſon Oſman cauſed a perfect proceſs to be made, together with the Diſpoſitions of the Tartarian Priſoners, which he ſent the ſhorteſt way he could deviſe to Amurath at Conſtantinople, with Letters declaring all that had paſſed, inflaming him to revenge ſo dangerous an Injury, and ſo wicked a Practice. Amurath receiving theſe Advertiſements from Oſman, according to the Neceſſity of the matter, took order that Vluzales his Admiral with certain Gallies well appointed, ſhould paſs over to Caffa to fetch Oſman; and withall to carry with him Iſlan, a Brother of the Tartar Kings, commanding Oſman by Letters, that he ſhould (to the terror of others) put to death the treacherous King, and place his Brother in his room.

Oſman overcometh the Tartars.

This Tartar King was one of thoſe mighty Princes, who baſely yielding to the Othoman Power, led under them a moſt vile and troubleſome Life, as their Tributaries and Vaſſals, always at command; whoſe younger Brother Iſlan, (preſuming of the ſufficiency of himſelf and the favour of the People) going to Conſtantinople, became a Suiter unto the Turkiſh Emperour, to have his eldeſt Brother thruſt out of his Kingdom, as a man for his evil Government hated of his Subjects, and to be placed himſelf in his room. Which his ſuit was ſo croſſed by the Ambaſſadors of the King's Brother (who ſpared for no coſt in the behalf of their Maſter) that the ambitious Youth was ſent from the Turks Court to Iconium, and there clapt faſt up in Priſon; where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his Life altogether conformable to his Miſery, with ſuch a kind of external Innocency, as if he had been void of all hope or ambitious deſire of a Kingdom, but rather like a forlorn and unhappy wretch with vain Affliction and impious Devotion to prepare himſelf to a laudable and honourable Death. But whilſt he thus lived, ſequeſtred from all worldly Cogitations, upon the diſcovery of the King his Brothers Rebellion, he was in more than poſt haſt ſent for to Conſtantinople, and put into the Gallies bound for Caffa, with Letters to Oſman of the tenour aforeſaid. Now in the mean time Oſman had by cunning means got into his hands this Tartar King, being, as is reported, betrayed by his own Counſellors, corrupted by the Turks Gold; whom with his two Sons Oſman upon the receit of the aforeſaid Letters from Amurath, cauſed to be preſently ſtrangled with a Bow-ſtring, and Iſlan his younger Brother to be ſaluted King in his Place, yet as Vaſſal to Amurath. This ſhameful death, the uſual reward of the Turkiſh Friendſhip, was thought juſtly to have hapned unto his Tartar King, for that he long before, ſupported by Amurath, had moſt unnaturally depoſed his aged Father from that Kingdom, juſt revenge now proſecuting his ſo great Diſloyalty.

Oſman embarked himſelf at the forenamed Gallies at the Port of Caffa, paſſing over the Euxine Sea, and entering into the Thracian Boſphorus, arrived at Conſtantinople; where he was received with great Pomp and ſingular ſignifications of good Love. But with moſt evident and expreſs kinds of Joy was he ſaluted by Amurath himſelf, when by his own Speech and Preſence he declared unto him every particularity of the matters that had hapned in his long and important Voyage, and in lively manner repreſented unto him the Perils and Travels that he had paſſed, and the Conqueſts that he had made in Siruan. After all which Diſcourſes, Amurath who longed after nothing more, than to ſee the Perſian King ſomewhat bridled, and the famous City of Tauris brought under his own Subjection, began to enter into Conference with Oſman about that Enterpriſe, and in the end would needs know throughly of him, what iſſue he could promiſe him of this his deſire: and in what ſort by his Advice and Counſel the Forces ſhould be imployed, and the Armies diſpoſed for the ſubduing of that City, which over all the Nations of the World was ſo famous and ſo great an honour to the Perſian Kingdom. To all which demands his Anſwer and Reſolution was, That forſomuch as the matters of Georgia were now well ſettled, the treacherous Paſſages by the new built Forts aſſured, and the Province of Siruan under his Obedience eſtabliſhed, there was now no cauſe why he ſhould any longer foreſlow ſo famous an Enterpriſe, but by the Conqueſt of Tauris, and erecting of a Fort in that proud City, to bring a Terrour upon all Perſia, and to raiſe a glorious renown of ſo mighty a Conqueſt among the Nations of Europe; for the accompliſhment whereof, he thought that either the ſame Army, or at the moſt a very little greater would ſuffice, ſo that it were raiſed of the beſt and choiceſt Souldiers.

Amurath demandeth Oſmans Opinion concerning the Enterpriſe of Tauris.

Oſman's Reſolution.

By reaſon of one of the Letters which Sciaus Baſſa had written to the late Tartar King, and by the Inſtigation of the young Sultan Mahomets Mother (jealous of the near alliance of the great Baſſa with her Husband, as prejudicial and dangerous to her Son) Amurath had in the open Divano deprived the ſaid Sciaus from the Office of the chief Viſier, and hardly pardoning him his Life, at the Interceſſion of his Wife, being his Siſter had baniſhed him the Court, ſo that he lived afterwards about Calcedon, upon the Borders of Aſia, not far from Conſtantinople, in a cloſe Palace he had there built for his own Pleaſure; in whoſe room he appointed Oſman to be chief Viſier; and to honour him the more, nominated him the General of his Army againſt the Perſians. Such Power hath Virtue, that even from the very ſcum of the raſcal ſort, and out of the ruſtical rout of Mountain Peaſants (which notwithſtanding cannot be truly juſtified of this Oſman, his Father being Beglerbeg of Damaſco, and his Mother, the Daughter of the Beglerbeg of Babylon) it doth oftentimes in the courſe of this variable World draw divers men into Princes Courts, and advance them to the higheſt Dignities. Truth it is, that from a private Souldier, though well born, he by ſundry degrees grew up to the higheſt Honour of that ſo great an Empire, and was at one inſtant created the chief Counſellor and General of the Othoman Forces. Great was the Joy that Oſman conceived hereat; and great was the deſire he had to make himſelf worthy of ſo honourable Favours; and the greater Confidence he perceived that Amurath had repoſed in him, the more eagerly was he ſpurred on to any thing poſſible whereby he might ſhew himſelf to have deſerved the ſame. And therefore adviſing with himſelf, that foraſmuch as the greatneſs of the Enterpriſe required a greater Army than was levied in former years, ſo it was neceſſary alſo for him the ſooner to ſend out his Advertiſements into all his ſubject Provinces, and by his own example to ſtir up the other Captains and Souldiers even in the Winter (though it were as yet ſomewhat troubleſome) to paſs over to Scutari, and from thence to Angori, to Amaſia, to Sivas: and there in thoſe Territories to drive out the time, untill his Souldiers which were ſummoned, were all gathered together. And becauſe upon this his great ſpeed it might peradventure fall out, that the Enemy miſdoubting his purpoſe for Tauris, might provide a greater Army than they would otherwiſe, he cauſed it to be given out, That he muſt go for Naſſivan; to the end, that the Perſians ſo beguiled, ſhould not regard the gathering of ſo mighty an Army as they could have done if they ſhould have heard of the Turks coming to Tauris; and ſo the General couſening Rumour flew, not only through all the Cities ſubject to the Turks, but into the Countries of the Perſians alſo; who notwithſtanding being very jealous of the City of Tauris, and fearing that the matter would fall out, as indeed afterward it did, ceaſed not make moſt curious and diligent inquiry about it. And although the diſgrace offered to his Ambaſſadour at Conſtantinople, diſſwaded him from ſending any other for treaty of Peace: yet to ſpie out the Secrets of the Turks, and to underſtand the certainty of their purpoſe for Naſſivan or Tauris, he ſent divers Meſſengers to Oſman, as if he had meant to feel his mind touching a Peace; but in very deed for nothing elſe but to ſound his Deſignments: which for all that, he could not with all the cunning he could uſe poſſibly diſcover, but ſtill remained doubtful as at the firſt, the Fame ſtill running for Naſſivan.

Oſman Baſſa made chief Viſier and General of the Army.

In the beginning of this year, now growing towards an end, Amurath ſent one Muſtapha, one of the meaneſt of his Chiaus, unto Stephen King of Polonia, to excuſe the Death of Podolovius (ſo ſhamefully murthered as is before declared) as if the ſame had hapned by the Inſolency of certain Souldiers, and not by his Commandment; who the better to colour the matter, had brought with him two baſe Fellows, as Authours of that outrage, for the King to take revenge upon; but were indeed no ſuch men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for ſome other Fact worthy of Death, and now ſent thither to ſerve that purpoſe: for whom the Chiaus (in proud and threatning manner in the name of his Maſter) required to have preſent Reſtitution made of all ſuch goods as the Polonian Coſſacks had not long before taken from the Turks, and the Captain of the ſaid Coſſacks to be delivered alſo unto him, to be carried to Amurath; and ſo hardly urged the matter, that (notwithſtanding the unworthy Death of Podolovius and his Followers, and the taking away of his Horſes) all the goods taken by the Coſſacks, were forthwith reſtored red; which the Chiaus almoſt in triumphant manner preſented unto Amurath at Conſtantinople.

This Summer alſo, Amurath diſporting himſelf with his Mutes, was almoſt dead. Theſe Mutes are luſty ſtrong Fellows, deprived of their Speech; who nevertheleſs certain by ſigns can both aptly expreſs their own Conceits, and underſtand the meaning of others: theſe men for their Secreſie are the cruel Miniſters of the Turkiſh Tyrants moſt horrible Commands; and therefore of them had in great regard. With theſe Mutes mounted upon fair and fat, but heavy and unready Horſes, was Amurath, upon a light and ready Horſe, ſporting himſelf (as the manner of the Turkiſh Emperours is) riding ſometime about one, ſometime about another; and ſtriking now the Horſe, now the Man, at his Pleaſure, when ſuddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling Sickneſs, his old Diſeaſe; and ſo falling from his Horſe, was taken up for dead: inſomuch, that the Janizaries ſuppoſing him to have been indeed dead, after their wonted manner fell to the ſpoyling of the Chriſtians and Jews, and were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or Captain to reſtrain their Inſolency, to the Terror of the reſt, hanged up one of them taken in the manner, and certain others in the habit of Janizaries. Nevertheleſs, Amurath ſhortly after recovered again, and to appeaſe that Rumor of his Death (openly upon their Sabbath, which is the Friday) rid from his Palace to the Temple of Sophia; where I with many others ſaw him (ſaith Leunclavius) his Countenance yet all pale and diſcoloured.

A moſt barbarous outrage committed by Petrus Emus a Venetian.

This year alſo hapned ſuch a chance as had like to have raiſed new Wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians; which, foraſmuch as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in ſilence to paſs over. The Widow of Ramadan Baſſa, late Governour of Tripolis in Barbarie, with her Son, her Family, and a great number of Slaves of both ſorts, being about to depart from Tripolis to Conſtantinople, had rigged up a fair Gally for the tranſporting of her ſelf and her Subſtance, reported to be worth eight hundred thouſand Duckats; upon which Galley for her more ſafety, ſhe had joyned two others, as Conſorts. Thus embarked, ſhe came to the Mouth of the Adriatick; where ſailing by Curſu, ſhe was by force of Tempeſt driven into the Gulf of the Adriatick. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senators, with certain Gallies, had the charge for the keeping of that Sea againſt Pirats, and all other Enemies whatſoever. He hearing of the Turks coming into the Gulf, without delay ſet upon them; and being too ſtrong for them, took them all; and having them now in his Power, exerciſed moſt barbarous Cruelty, as well upon the Women as the Men: for having ſlain the Men, in number two hundred and fifty, and the Son of Ramadan in his Mothers lap, he cauſed the Women, being before raviſhed, to have their Breaſts cut off, and afterwards to be caſt overboard into the Sea, being in number about forty. The Brother of Emus chancing upon a beautiful Virgin, was by her moſt earneſtly intreated to have ſpared her Honour; and the rather, for that (as ſhe ſaid) ſhe was a Chriſtian, taken Priſoner about twelve years before in Cyprus; ſince which time ſhe had lived in moſt miſerable Captivity among the Turks; and being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetian, was in good hope to be ſet at Liberty inviolated; which ſhe moſt humbly beſought him for the love of God to do, and not to imbrue his hands with her guiltleſs Blood, or to diſhonour himſelf by forcing of her. But all ſhe could ſay prevailed nothing with the cruel and unbridled Youth, who after he had at his Pleaſure abuſed her, caſt her with the reſt into the Sea. It is thought that Emus ſuffered this ſo great an outrage (and ſo far unbeſeeming the Honour of the Venetians) to be done, to the intent that none ſhould be left alive to bewray the greatneſs of the Booty, or of the Villany there committed; which was nevertheleſs (God ſo appointing it) revealed by one of the Turks, who ſaved by a Surgeon of Crete which knew him, and afterwards coming to Conſtantinople, openly declared the ſame. With the odious report whereof, the Turks were ſo enraged, that in every corner of the City a man might have heard them threatning unto the Venetians moſt cruel Revenge; yea they had much ado to hold their hands from the Bilo or Governour of the Venetian Merchants in Conſtantinople, and to forbear to ſpit in his Face, as he went in the Streets. At that time was one Johan. Franciſcus Maurocenus (or as they commonly call him, Moreſin) Bilo at Conſtantinople; who underſtanding that Amurath in his Rage was about to ſend one of the great Gentlemen of his Court, whom the Turks call Zauſii, (the great Turks uſual Ambaſſadors) to Venice about that matter, found means to have him ſtayed at Conſtantinople, and another of leſs Authority ſent to expoſtulate the matter with the Senate, and in the Name of Amurath, to require to have the Offendor puniſhed, and the Gallies with the Slaves and Goods reſtored; ſo ſhould the League betwixt him and them continue firm; whereas otherwiſe he ſhould be conſtrained by force of Arms to revenge the Wrongs done to his Subjects. This Meſſage being by the ſaid Meſſenger delivered at Venice, the Senators after diligent Examination of the matter, returned this anſwer; That the Widow of Ramadan with her Family coming to Zacynthus, an Iſland of theirs, was there honourably entertained, and preſented with certain courteous Preſents; but departing thence, and coming to Cephalenia, another of their Iſlands, her People running on Land, contrary to the Conditions of the League, made ſpoil of whatſoever they could light upon, ſparing neither Man nor Beaſt; of which their Inſolency their Proveditor underſtanding, and making after them, found them in Arms within the Gulf; and coming near unto them, was neither by them ſaluted, as the manner at Sea is, neither was any top-ſail ſtruck, in token that the command of that Sea belonged unto the Venetians, all which they ought by the League to have done; for which their outrages and proud Contempt, their Proveditor had taken ſo ſharp a Revenge; nevertheleſs, they promiſed in that caſe to do what beſeemed them in Reaſon and Juſtice to do, for the ſatisfying of his deſire. With which ſo reaſonable an anſwer, Amurath ſeemed to be well contented; but being indeed loth to intangle himſelf with Wars againſt that mighty State at Sea, his Wars againſt the Perſians being not yet finiſhed; yet ſhortly after, Emus was for his diſhonourable and cruel dealing with the Lady and her Family, worthily condemned and beheaded, and the Gallies with all the Goods and Slaves reſtored. This great Woman had in thoſe Gallies four hundred Chriſtian Slaves, all which upon the taking of the Gallies were (as the manner is) ſet at Liberty, for whom the Venetians made Reſtitution of as many others of the Turks.

Ramadan Baſſa, the Husband of the aforeſaid great Lady, was Governour of Tripolis in Barbary, and of the Country thereabouts; who having Wars with one of the barbarous Kings of the Moors, went out againſt him with all his Forces, wherein were certain Companies of Janizaries, ſent by Amurath from Conſtantinople. Now in this Country, as in many other places of Africk, are great and deſart Sands, over which whoſoever is to paſs, muſt provide himſelf both of Victuals and skilful Guides; without which they are not without danger to be paſſed. Ramadan with his Army unprovided both of the one and the other, having entred theſe Deſarts, was at length brought to that caſe, that he could neither go forward, neither without loſs of his men, return. Yet at length he retired, and got home, but not without the loſs of ſome of his People, and the manifeſt danger of his whole Army; for which his improvidence the Janizaries fell into ſuch a rage, that not reſpecting the honour of the man, or regarding the diſpleaſure of their Sovereign, they fell upon him and ſlew him. At which their Inſolency if Amurath did wink, and paſs it over unpuniſhed, let no man marvel; for why, the antient obedience of thoſe martial men is not now as it was in former times, when they were with a more ſevere Diſcipline governed; but now grown proud and inſolent (as the manner of men is living in continual pay) with Weapons in their hands doubt not to do whatſoever ſeemeth unto themſelves beſt, be it never ſo foul or unreaſonable. Which although it be in many places of this Hiſtory to be ſeen; yet for the more manifeſtation thereof, I thought it not amiſs here briefly to ſet down an Example or two of their notorious Inſolency.

Achmetes Baſſa Governour of Cyprus, ſlain by the Janizaries.

Not many years before, the Janizaries in Cyprus with like Inſolency ſlew Achmetes Baſſa, Governour of that Iſland; pretending for the colour of ſo foul a fact, that he had defrauded them of their pay, and oppreſſed them of the Country with intolerable exactions. Amurath highly offended with this their Diſloyalty in killing their General, whom they had never before complained of; thought it much to concern the Majeſty of himſelf, and the repreſſing of the like Inſolency in others, not to ſuffer it to go unpuniſhed; and for that purpoſe ſent another new Governour into Cyprus, with ten Gallies furniſhed as well in other neceſſary Proviſion, as with ſuch a convenient number of Souldiers as might ſuffice to chaſtiſe the Inſolency of the chief Offendors. This new Governour arrived in Cyprus, diſſembling the ſecret Commandment he had for the executing of the Tranſgreſſors; by certain truſty men gave it out among the Janizaries, That Amurath was ſo far from being angry with the death of Achmetes, as that he thought him worthily ſlain by the Janizaries, for defrauding them of their Wages, and oppreſſing of his other Subjects. Which report the new Governour had of purpoſe given out, to put them in Security, and without further trouble to bring them into his danger. Hereupon the Janizaries chearfully and with all due Reverence received their new Governour; but ſhortly after to be ſure, they by an unexpected guile when as nothing was leſs feared, compaſſed in all the new come Souldiers, and ſlew them every Mothers Son; and not ſo contented, ſeiſed alſo upon the Gallies that brought them. Which ſecond outrage, though Amurath took in evil part, as ſeeing his Majeſty therein contemned, yet was he content to paſs it over, being loth to add edomeſtical Troubles to the great War he had in hand with the Perſian.

Busbeq. Legationis Turcice, Epiſt. 3.

But to end this matter with the Opinion of their own greateſt Baſſaes, concerning theſe maſterful men. It fortuned that whilſt Busbequius (Ambaſſador for Ferdinand the Emperour, unto Solyman) lay in the Turks Camp, at ſuch time as Solyman in Perſon himſelf was gon over the Straight in Aſia, to countenance his eldeſt Son Solymus againſt his younger Brother Bajazet, That upon a light Quarrel (though heavily taken) between the Followers of the ſaid Ambaſſador, and certain Janizaries waſhing themſelves at the Sea-ſide, the Ambaſſador for the quieting thereof was glad to uſe the help of Ruſtan the great Baſſa, Solyman's Son-in-Law; who underſtanding of the matter by a Meſſenger ſent of purpoſe, adviſeth the Ambaſſador to cut off all occaſion of Contention with thoſe moſt naughty Fellows; asking him further, if he knew not that it was now the time of War, in which time they ſo raigned, as that Solyman himſelf was not able to rule them, but ſtood in fear of them. Which ſpeech fell not raſhly from Ruſtan, a man right well acquainted with his Lord and Maſters Grief; for that moſt notable Prince feared nothing more, than leſt ſome ſecret and dangerous Treaſon ſhould lie hidden among the Janizaries, which breaking out upon the ſudden, might work his final Deſtruction; whereof he needed not to ſeek for any further Example, than to his Grandfather Bajazet. For, as true it is, That great are the Commodities of a perpetual Army of a Princes own; ſo are the Incommodities alſo not ſmall, if they be not carefully met withall; but eſpecially for that the Prince is ever in doubt of Rebellion; and that it is ſtill in the Power of thoſe armed Souldiers, at their Pleaſure to tranſlate the Kingdom to whom they liſt. Whereof there have been many great Examples, although there are many ways for the remedying of the ſame.

But now that we have by occaſion of the Occurrents of that time a little ſtept out of the way, let us return again unto the Wars of Perſia, the chief Object of Amuraths haughty Deſigns. Now according to the Commandments gon out through all the Cities of the Empire, the Souldiers of all ſorts began to flock together; and all thoſe that were either deſirous to be eſtabliſhed in their former Charges and Governments, or ambitiouſly ſought to be now promoted, repaired to Oſman, as unto a King, and the ſovereign Moderator of the Turkiſh Empire, preſenting him very large and liberal Gifts, whereby he gathered together a huge heap of infinite Treaſure; and ſo entertaining them with all affable Courteſie, and promiſing both Rewards and Honours to ſuch as would follow him in his purpoſed Expedition, he levied a wonderful great number both of Men and Monies. And now was the time come that called him away to go towards Erzirum, where he was greatly expected of his huge Army there aſſembled together. And notwithſtanding the great dearth of Victual that commonly raigneth in thoſe quarters, yet thither he muſt, where he arrived about the latter end of the Month of July, in the year 1585: and there taking a view of his whole Army, and of all the Proviſion neceſſary for ſo important and famous an Enterpriſe, he daily laboured to haſten his departure. In this City of Erzirum were met together all the Souldiers of the Provinces that were wont to ſend help, but yet in greater number than ever was gathered by any General before: for that every man forſook his own private Buſineſs, and upon aſſured hopes of new Rewards and unwonted Honours, were all induced to follow the Fame of this their new Viſier and General: only the People of Egypt and Damaſco were buſied with other more private Quarrels at home, whereof becauſe they were both of great Importance, and alſo fell out at this very inſtant (leaving Oſman with his Army for a while at Erzirum) I will in as few words as I may, make a brief rehearſal.

Haſſan Baſſa the Queens Eunuch ſent to Caire to govern there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Haſſan Baſſa the Eunuch out of the Seraglio, from the charge he had there to ſerve in the Queens Court, and at her inſtance ſent him as Baſſa to Caire the great City of Egypt. Which great Office, beſide the Honour belonging unto it, is alſo beneficial to them whoſe good hap it is to be advanced thereunto; the Riches, the multitude of People inhabiting therein being ſo great, that it ſeemeth not to be one City, but rather to contain within the large Circuit thereof, many Cities. This man being exceeding covetous, and therefore deſirous to handle the matter in ſuch ſort, as that he ſhould little need to ſeek for any more ſuch grants at the Kings hands, ſought by all manner of means to oppreſs the whole Nation, and by all Importunities to wring and extort from them Rewards and Bribes, without regard of Honeſty or Reaſon. By which his ſiniſter and corrupt dealing he had now made himſelf ſo odious and intolerable to the People in general, that they in great number, and many times, began to go to Conſtantinople, and with humble petitions to requeſt the King to take from them ſuch a cruel and unjuſt Governour; ſo that generally in the Court there was no talk but of the Villanies and Miſchiefs that were reported of the covetous Eunuch. At laſt Amurath ſeeing theſe publick Exclamations went daily ſo far, as that he could not for ſhame let them go any further without due Puniſhment, he reſolved with himſelf to call him to the Court; and having ſent unto him certain Meſſengers, admoniſhed him ſundry times to return home. But the Eunuch loth to leave ſo fit an occaſion to enrich himſelf, did ſtill delay his return, alledging divers feigned Excuſes for his longer ſtay. Which thing when Amurath underſtood, thinking himſelf thereby deluded, he determined to provide for ſo great a diſorder, and by puniſhing of the miſchievous Eunuch, to ſatisfie in ſome part the diſcontented Minds of his oppreſſed Subjects in Caire.

Ebrain Baſſa in ſpeech to Mary Amurath's Daughter.

There ſate at that time among the chief Baſſaes of the Court, one Ebrain (or as moſt call him, Ibrahim) by Nation a Sclavonian, a young man of the age of thirty two years, or thereabouts, of very fair Conditions, and of a reaſonable Judgment; upon whom Amurath himſelf had determined to beſtow his own Daughter to Wife, and ſo to make him his Son-in-law. And therefore being now minded to remove the Eunuch from his Office, and to ſatisfie the City; and being alſo willing withall to give means to his ſaid Son-in-law to enrich himſelf, he reſolved to ſend him as General Sindick and ſovereign Judge into Egypt; giving him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his Predeceſſor had dealt before him. And ſo this new Baſſa took his Journey towards Egypt, although there ran before him a great Rumour of his coming, and of the great Authority wherewith he was ſent. At which Report, as the Egyptians reſted content and joyful, ſo the Eunuch waxed very ſad and ſorrowful; perſwading himſelf, that this alteration could not but engender ſome ſtrange iſſue and effect againſt him. Whereupon adviſing himſelf to provide better for his own Affairs and ſafety of his Life, he reſolved not to ſtay the coming of the new Governour; but departing out of Egypt, he with great Care and Circumſpection for fear of meeting with Ebrain, travelled towards Conſtantinople in hope to appeaſe the Kings Wrath, or at leaſt by mediation of Bribes, and by the Interceſſion of the Queen, to find him more favourable than he ſhould find Ebrain; who without doubt would not have ſpared any Extremity or Cruelty, to have bereaft him both of his Goods and Life together. Amurath advertiſed from Ebrain, of the ſudden flight of the Eunuch Baſſa out of Egypt, and hearing withall, that he kept not the high way from Caire to Conſtantinople, began to fear, leſt when he came into Soria, he ſhould flie into Perſia to the King, and ſo work him double and treble damage; as one that had already gathered a huge Treaſure, and having long lived in the Court, knew the moſt ſecret Affairs thereof, and had learned all the privie Devices and Faſhions of the Seraglio. Whereupon he with all Diligence diſpatched his Imbrahur Baſſi (whom we call Maſter of his Horſe) with forty of his Capigi (all Gentlemen Uſhers, and Officers of moſt ſecret and neareſt Rooms about him) with charge and commandment, that if they met him they ſhould bring him to the Court; uſing all the Aid and Aſſiſtance of his People that might be requiſite: and for that purpoſe delivered unto him very effectual and large Letters, after the beſt manner of the Court. This Meſſenger with his appointed train departed, and without any extraordinary inquiry, found the Eunuch in Soria, incamped in the Plains near unto the City now called Aman, but in times paſt Apamea, the principal City of that Country. As ſoon as the Eunuch underſtood of the coming of the Imbrahur himſelf, he gave order to his guard of Slaves, which in great number with Spears and Harcubuſes did ordinarily keep his Pavilion, that they ſhould not grant entrance into his Tent to any, but only unto the Imbrahur himſelf, and if need were, by force to keep the reſt of the Capigi from coming in. Which order was in very good time given; for as ſoon as the Kings Officer had diſcovered the Tents of the fugitive Baſſa, in all haſt he ran towards the ſame, and ſeeking out the greateſt among them, went preſently thither, to have entred with all his Followers; but the Slaves being in Armour, oppoſed themſelves againſt them, and permitting only the Imbrahur to enter in, entertained the reſt of his Train without. The Imbrahur being come in, read unto him the Commandment which he had from the King to bring him to the Court; and moſt inſtantly moved him, that without any further reſiſtance, he would quietly go with him. To whom the wary Eunuch anſwered, Behold, how without any calling of the King, or conducting by you, I come of my ſelf, well aſſured to find not only Pardon and Pity, but alſo Favour and Grace in the ſight of my Lord; whoſe upright and mild Nature the wicked Treacheries of my falſe Accuſers cannot abuſe, to the Prejudice of me an Innocent. And ſo without more ado they went all to Conſtantinople; the Eunuch ſtill ſtanding upon his Guard.

The warineſs of the crafty Eunuch.

The politick and crafty Eunuch had in this mean time diſpatched divers Poſts with Letters to the Sultan Ladies, certifying them of his coming, and principally beſeeching the Queen to protect him, and to appeaſe the Kings wrathful Indignation that happily he might have conceived againſt him; and ſo at length they arrived at Scutari. As ſoon as Amurath underſtood of his coming thither, he cauſed all the Treaſure which he had gathered, to be taken from him, with all the reſt of his private Subſtance, and the wretch himſelf to be clapt up in Priſon in the Jadicula or ſeven Towers. Where after he had languiſhed many Days, ſtill fearing ſome deadly blow, he at length received from the Queen, an unexpected, but moſt welcome Advertiſement, That he ſhould be of good chear and quiet himſelf, for that his Wealth had already ſaved his Life, and that ſhe hoped in ſhort time to procure him alſo his Liberty. Which indeed ſhe brought to paſs; for ſhe her ſelf made earneſt Petition to Amurath her Husband, that foraſmuch as he had bereaft her Eunuch of all his Goods, he would yet at leaſt deliver him out of Priſon, and reſtore him unto her again. Which Requeſt of the Queens was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged; but the Treaſure that he ſo unjuſtly ſcraped together in Egypt, that remained ſtill among the Gold and other Jewels of the Kings.

The Eunuch caſt in Priſon at Conſtantinople, and his evil gotten Goods confiſcated.

But Ebrain Baſſa with his new Commiſſion now arrived in Egypt, had in ſhort ſpace by far more ſiniſter means than had the Eunuch before him, ſcrap'd together ſuch an infinite heap of Riches, as was able only of it ſelf to make him worthy of his promiſed Wife, and therefore he was called home to the Court, to accompliſh the intended Marriage. With this Commandment to return to Conſtantinople, he received alſo in charge, to make his Journey through the People of Druſia; and ſuch as he ſhould find loyal, to confirm them in their due Obedience, and to make them pay their antient Duties; but ſuch as he ſhould find ſtubborn and diſobedient, he ſhould quite root them out and deſtroy them. This Commandment Ebrain preſently put in Execution, and having packed up together all the Riches he had gathered in the time of his Government, and raiſed good ſtore of Souldiers in that Province, he took with him thirteen Sanzacks, that were ordinarily accuſtomed to ſit as Aſſiſtants under the Government of the Baſſa in the ruling of the populous Territories of Caire, and ſo ſet forwards towards Gaza, paſſing over thoſe vaſt and huge Wilderneſſes of Sand that lie between Caire and Gaza. From Gaza, joyning the Sanzack thereof with him, he went to Jeruſalem; and from thence, cauſing the Sanzack there alſo to follow his Train, he turned by Saffetto, by Lezium, by Naplos (called in times paſt Samaria) ſtill taking with him the Sanzacks of all thoſe places, and at laſt turned himſelf towards Damaſco; ſo that before he joyned with the band of Damaſco, he had gotten together eighteen Sanzacks, with all their Squadrons of Souldiers and Slaves. Beſides theſe, he had alſo his own private Court, which was wonderfully populous, and two hundred Janizaries of Conſtantinople, whom Amurath would needs have him to take with him at his departure from the Court, ſo that he had in his Army almoſt twelve thouſand Horſemen. From Damaſco, Veis the Baſſa was come as far as Jeruſalem to meet him, with all the Souldiers under his Government, in number about two thouſand Perſons. Beſides that, there came unto him by the way of Sidon, the Aga of the Janizaries of Cyprus, with all the band of that deſolate and deſtroyed Iſland; which Captain with his Souldiers was tranſported over into the Main, in thoſe Gallies that by the Kings appointment were ſent to fetch Ebrain; who, now ſtrengthned with all theſe Souldiers, had purpoſed the utter ruine of the diſobedient Druſians, and the raiſing of his own Glory, by triumphing over them.

The Druſian People what they are.

Theſe Druſians, againſt whom theſe great Preparations were now made by this new Captain, and of whom the Turkiſh Emperour is ſo ſuſpicious and doubtful, are ſuppoſed to be by deſcent Frenchmen, the reliques of thoſe that with great Devotion did in times paſt fight thoſe memorable and Chriſtian Battels in Jury, and recovered the holy City; but being afterwards brought low, partly by the Plague, and partly by the Fury of the Barbarians, mingled their Seed with the circumciſed Nation, and ſo together with their Authority and Command, loſt alſo their firſt Faith and Religion; yet ſo, that they grew into an hatred of the Turkiſh Superſtition, and abhorring the Circumciſion of the Jews, betook themſelves to a new Prophet of their own called Iſman, whoſe Doctrine they follow. The right Druſians live uncircumciſed, neither do they forbear Wine, as do the Turks; they make it lawful among them (moſt unlawfully) to marry with their own Daughters; the Turkiſh Government they have ſought by all means to eſchew, notwithſtanding all the Endeavours and Attempts of the Turkiſh Tyrants, but eſpecially of Selymus the ſecond, yet have they always been ſubject to their own natural Princes, and would never admit any Captain or Governour of the Turks within the Countries which they poſſeſſed. They are a People very warlike, ſtout, reſolute, and religious obſervers of their own Superſtitions; in Battel they uſe the Harquebuze and Scimitar, yet ſome of them at this day do ſerve with Lances and Darts; they are apparelled after the manner of the Eaſtern People, with a Turbant on their Heads, and Breeches they never wear, but inſtead thereof they cover thoſe parts with their Coat, which reacheth down to their Knees, buttoning it up before; their feeding is groſs, and of Mountain Meats; they inhabit all the Country that is invironed within the Confines of Joppa, above Cæſarea and Paleſtina, and within the Rivers of Orantes and Jordan, ſtretching it ſelf even to the Plain of Damaſco, near to the Hills that compaſs it about upon the Coaſt of Mount Libanus. They were all in times paſt good Friends and Confederates, ſo that they were greatly eſteemed; but now being at variance, through greedineſs and covetouſneſs, they were divided among themſelves, one ſeeking the Deſtruction of another. At this time they were governed by five chief Captains or Governours; one of them was called Ebne-Man, and of the Turks Man-Ogli; another Serafadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-Manſur; the fourth Ebne-Frec; and the fifth Ali-Ebne-Carfus, by the Turks called Ali-Carfus-Ogli. Under theſe (who indeed carry the Title and Authority of an Emir, that is to ſay, King or Chief) there are divers their Lieutenants or Deputies, whom they call their Macademi or Agents. Ebne-Man or Man-Ogli inhabited the Mountains and Fields that are contained under the Juriſdictions of Cæſarea, of Ptolemaida, of Tyrus, and of Sidon, and had his reſidence for moſt part upon the Hill, in a Town called Andera; he was very mighty in Men and Armour, and ſince the time that by Treachery his Father was Murthered by Muſtapha then Baſſa of Damaſco, always a deadly Enemy to the Name of the Turks. Ebne-Frec, Ebne-Carfus, and Ebne-Manſur were always great Friends; but now eſpecially at the coming of Ebrain Baſſa they ſhewed themſelves more ſtraightly confederated together. Serafadin and Man-Ogli were ever oppoſite againſt them; ſo that the one ſide procuring the overthrow of the other, they loſt their Strength, and left no means to defend themſelves againſt the Turks, who had not long lain in wait for their Liberty. Now as ſoon as the News came among them, That Ebrain being departed from Caire, was coming into Soria to ſubdue them; the three Confederates above named reſolved among themſelves to go and meet this great Baſſa, and to ſubmit themſelves unto him, of purpoſe to turn all the intended Miſchief upon Serafadin and Man-Ogli their Enemies. And ſo having packed up great ſtore of Money, Cloth of Silk, Cloth of Woollen, and Cloth of Gold, with many Loads of Silks, and other things of exceeding Value, every one of the three being accompanied, one with about two thouſand, another with about three thouſand men, they put themſelves upon their Journey towards Ebrain, and met him at Jeruſalem, where he was already arrived. This their coming Ebrain took in wonderful good part; and courteouſly accepted thoſe their rich and great Preſents which they brought him; and by the offers of their Fidelity, and the grievous Accuſations they made againſt the other two Druſian Lords their Enemies, began to conceive great hope of his intended enterpriſe; for why, he ſaw that nothing could more eaſily compaſs their overthrow, than this their Diſcord. Being thus accompanied, he came by the way of Damaſco to the Champaign of Bocca, and there incamped. This was in the Month of July this year 1585. The whole Army that was with Ebrain, reckoning alſo the Souldiers of the three Druſian Lords, was about the number of twenty thouſand Horſemen ſtrong. In this place there came People out of all the quarters thereabouts, abouts, with Preſents to honour the Baſſa; to whom he likewiſe yielded ſuch ſmall Favours as his covetous Nature could afford them.

Serafadin cometh with Preſents to Ebrain.

From this place alſo Ebrain preſently ſent Letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby he invited them to come unto him, to acknowledge their Obedience unto the Sultan; for that otherwiſe they might aſſure themſelves to be in ſhort time deprived both of their Eſtates and Lives. For all that, Man-Ogli would not by any means come in. But Serafadin being poor both in Wealth and Forces, reſolved to come, in hope by rich Preſents to purchaſe his Attonement with the great Baſſa. And therefore having packed up together divers loads of Silk, great ſtore of Money, and many Cloaths of good Value and Beauty, and alſo attended upon with divers of his Subjects, he arrived at laſt at the Pavilion of Ebrain, with theſe his rich Preſents; which were there readily received, and he himſelf with great Attention heard; whoſe Speech in effect tended to no other thing, but only to perſwade the Baſſa, That he had always been a devoted Vaſſal unto Amurath, and that he had carried a continual deſire to be imployed in any his Service; and that now being led by the ſame Affection, and aſſured of his Favour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his Letters, he was come to ſhew himſelf unto him to be the ſame man, and ſo proferred him whatſoever lay in his ſlender Power to perform. Whereunto Ebrain made no anſwer at all, but only asked him the cauſe why he lived continually in Diſcord and Brawls with the three Emirs (who alſo ſate at that time in the ſame Pavilion.) Whereunto Serafadin anſwered, That it was not long of him, who as one deſirous of Peace, had not long time taken up Arms, but in the juſt defence of himſelf, againſt the Injuries of thoſe his Enemies, who becauſe they were more mighty than he, ſought continually to oppreſs him. Hereat the three Conſpirators aroſe, and with their grim looks bewraying their inward hatred, falſly charged him to have been ever the Authority of thoſe Brawls; adding moreover, That his Inſolency was at that time grown ſo great, as that no ſtrange Veſſel durſt for fear of him arrive at the Ports of Sidon, Tyrus, or Berito; nor any Merchant or Merchandiſe paſs over the Plains; but that thoſe Countries, as though they were a prey and ſpoil to the Theeves of Arabia, were generally ſhunned of all Travellors both by Sea and Land, to the great hinderance of the Sultans Cuſtoms. Serafadin would hereunto have gladly replyed, but prevented by Ebrain, and ſurcharged with many injurious Words, was committed to the Cuſtody of the two hundred Janizaries of Conſtantinople. And ſo being by them brought into a rotten Tent that was appointed for him, was every Night from thence forward put in the Stocks faſt chained, and continually guarded with a truſty Guard of the ſame Janizaries. In the mean time came the anſwer of Man-Ogli, who wrote back unto the great Baſſa Ebrain, as followeth;

A Letter of Man-Oglies, to Ebrain Baſſa.

TO the Lord of Lords, Sovereign above the Great Ones, the mighty, the noble Captain Couſin to the grand Lord, and worthieſt among the elect of the Prophet Mahomet, the noble and famous Lord Ebraim Baſſa; God give good ſucceſs to his haughty Enterpriſes, and Proſperity in all his Honour. I wiſh (even as thou doſt lovingly invite and exhort me) that I might come before thee, and follow thee, and ſerve thee always in any occaſion that it may happen thee to ſtand in need of my help. For I know that thou wouldeſt reſt aſſured of the Reverence that I bear towards thy Lord, and of the moſt fervent deſire wherein I live to ſerve him, and to imploy both my Life and my Subſtance in his Service: whereof I have alſo given ſome Teſtimony, though but ſmall, in the managing of his Cuſtoms that I have received; wherein I have always ſo carried my ſelf, as that I am not his Debtor of one aſpre; a thing I wis that Ebne Manſur (who is now with thee) hath not done. For although by his coming to meet thee even as far as Jeruſalem, he would make a ſhew of his Fidelity, yet doth he uſurp more than two hundred thouſand Duckats of the Kings, which he doth moſt unjuſtly detain from him of his Cuſtoms. But my hard Fortune will not grant me the Favour that I may come unto thee; for there are at this time preſent with thee three of mine Enemies, who (I know well) being not contented to have always diſquieted and troubled my eſtate, do now ſeek to bring me into ſo great hatred with thy heart, that if thou haddeſt me in thy hands, thou wouldeſt without any Conſideration bereave me of my Life. And I am aſſured, that this ſending for me importeth no other thing, but only a deſire thou haſt to impriſon me, and ſo to kill me; for I know how much thou art given to great Enterpriſes. Beſides this, my coming is alſo hindered by mine antient Oath that I took; when being as yet but a Child, I ſaw mine own Father ſo villainouſly betrayed by the murthering ſword of Muſtapha, being at that time the Baſſa of Damaſco; who under the colour of unfeigned Friendſhip, got him into his hand, and traiterouſly ſtruck off his Head. For in truth I carry the Image of my Fathers reverend Head, all pale, and yet as it were breathing, imprinted in my Mind, which oftentimes preſenteth it ſelf unto me, as well ſleeping in the Darkneſs of the Night, as alſo waking in the Light of the Day; and talking with me, calleth to my remembrance the Infidelity of the murthering Tyrant, and exhorteth me to keep my ſelf aloof from the hands of the mighty. And therefore I neither can nor may obey thy Requeſts, and in that reſpect it grieveth me, that I ſhall ſeem diſobedient unto thee, being in any other Action, and in all my Cogitations wholly addicted to do any Service not only to thee, who art moſt worthy to be reverenced of far greater Perſons than I am, but alſo to every the leaſt Vaſſals of Amurath. Thou wilt pardon me I hope, and thou ſhalt well perceive, that if there be any thing near me that may be acceptable unto thee, all that I have whatſoever, though in reſpect of thy ſelf it may ſeem vile and baſe, yet is it thine, and is now reſerved wholly for thee, and not for me. Farewell, and command me, and hold me excuſed upon theſe juſt Cauſes which thou heareſt, for my being ſo backward in coming to honour thee, as my Duty requireth.

The poor and the leaſt among the Slaves of the grand Lord,

The Son of Man.

Ebrain burneth 24 Towns of Man-Oglies.

Ebrain perceiving by this Letter the Reſolution of Man-Ogli, reſolved alſo in himſelf to go upon him with all his Army, and either by force or ſleight to get him into his Hands; or at leaſt to draw from him ſo many Harquebuzes, and as great Gifts and Tributes as poſſibly he might; and therefore riſing with his Camp, and turning himſelf toward the Country of Man-Ogli, he burned and deſtroyed four and twenty of his Towns, and ſo mounting up certain Rocks of Libanus, upon the top of a large Hill (that ſtandeth over Andara and other Places belonging to Man-Ogli) he incamped himſelf. But whilſt the Army was thus marching forward, Veis Baſſa of Damaſco with a great part of his People, and his ſon the Sanzack of Jeruſalem, with his Souldiers likewiſe, to the number of fifteen hundred Perſons, having ſeparated themſelves from the reſt of the Army in manner of a rereward; as they were buſie in raiſing their Tents, upon the ſudden were furiouſly aſſaulted by a great band of Druſians of the Faction of Man-Ogli, and diſcomfited. Which Victory the Druſians ſo proſecuted, Veis Baſſa and his Son diſcomfited by the Druſians.

that they became Lords of the Pavilions, the Wealth and Armour of the Turks; and leading away with them their Horſes and their Carriages, put to the Sword five hundred Perſons, and ſcarce gave any leiſure of eſcape either to the Baſſa the Father, or the Sanzack his Son, who fled ſtraight to Jeruſalem, and never returned again to Ebrain; but Veis his Father ſtill followed the Army with thoſe few men which he had left, and was thought worthy of all men to be pitied.

Ebrain ſendeth for Harquebuzes to Man-Ogli.

The notable diſſimulation of Ebrain Baſſa.

Upon the Hill aforeſaid, Ebrain continued twenty four days together, with abundance of all things neceſſary for Victual; during which time he attended nothing elſe, but to try all Devices how he might draw Money and Preſents from Man-Ogli, or how he might train him into his Hands. For the compaſſing whereof, he diſpatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Manſurs Agent) to Man-Ogli, being in Andrea; to tell him, That foraſmuch as he would not give credit to the promiſe which he made him, nor to adventure himſelf into the hand of his Friend, he ſhould ſend unto him all the Harquebuzes he had; for that the Sultans Pleaſure was, that his People that went not to the Wars in his Service, ſhould not be furniſhed with ſo great ſtore of Weapons, to the danger of their Neighbours, and of the Subjects themſelves. With great Grief of Mind did Man-Ogli behold the Meſſenger, as the Man whom he well knew to be the Agent of his deadly Enemy; yet in regard of him that ſent him, he forbore to do him Injury, or to give him any Reproach; telling him, That all his People and Weapons were diſperſed abroad over his Territory, ſo that he could not tell what Harquebuzes to ſend him; with which cold Anſwer Gomeda returned. Which thing when Ali Baſſa of Aleppo underſtood, he offered himſelf to the General, that he would go unto him, and that to ſome better purpoſe. Many Reaſons did Ali Baſſa uſe to perſwade the wary Druſian to come and yield his Obedience to Ebrain, ſwearing that no harm ſhould be done unto him; and withall promiſing him great and honourable Favours. But never could he remove the reſolute and provident Mind of Man-Ogli, or win him to yield himſelf into the hands of a Man, whom he thought to be ſo murderous; yet at laſt with much ado, he prevailed ſo much with the Druſian Lord, that in ſign of the Reverence he did bear towards the General, and of his Obedience towards Amurath, he was content to ſend a Preſent to Ebrain. And thereupon gave him 320 Harquebuzes, 20 packs of Andarine Silks, and fifty thouſand Duckats to carry to the Baſſa for a Gift, and to reconcile him unto him. For the better effecting whereof, he ſent his own Mother to the great Baſſa, who in the behalf of her Son performed a very worthy Meſſage, excuſing him as well in reſpect of his Enemies that ſate there ſo near unto him, as alſo in regard of his Oath which he had ſolemnly ſworn, That for the Treachery of Muſtapha he would never commit himſelf into the hands of a Turk; and therefore beſought him to accept of the Gifts that were ſent him; and withall a Mind and Heart moſt ready to ſerve and obey the King in all Occaſions; and that he would hold him excuſed, for that his Excuſes were both juſt and reaſonable. Whereunto the Turk replyed, That although ſhe had found ſo foul a Fault in Muſtapha, who under the aſſurance of his Promiſe and Fidelity had betrayed her Husband; yet for all that ſhe ought not to fear any ſuch wicked or infamous Act at his hands, who ſtood upon his Honour and the Word of a Souldier; and ſo by Oath proteſting all faithful and conſtant Friendſhip towards him, in token of his ſincere meaning, he caſt a white vail about her Neck, and put another upon himſelf, and the third he gave her in her hands; willing her to report to her Son the Oaths he had made, and to carry him that Vail, and bring him with her, proteſting no otherwiſe to intreat him, but as a Friend and a Brother; the peaceable old Woman went her way accordingly; but ſhe neither could nor would go about to alter the purpoſe of her Son, but returned to Ebrain ſuch anſwer as did not greatly pleaſe him. After which time, he ſought more than ever he did before, to get the wary Druſian into his hands, or at leaſt, without regard of ſhame to draw from him more Preſents and Weapons. And therefore once again he ſent the crafty Gomeda, to exhort him upon Faith and Promiſe given, to come unto him; but for all the craft and lying Speeches that the treacherous Meſſenger could cunningly uſe, he could obtain nothing of the Druſian Lord, but good words only. Yet at laſt after much fineneſs he prevailed ſo much, as that Man-Ogli was contented by him to ſend another Preſent to Ebrain, with an expreſs Condition notwithſtanding, that he ſhould cauſe Ebrain to depart out of thoſe quarters, and that he ſhould not himſelf return any more to requeſt any thing farther of him. Which he very largely promiſed, only deſiring him to ſend a good number of Harquebuzes, thereby to content the Baſſa fully; ſo he gave him fifty thouſand Duckats more, and four hundred and fourſcore Harquebuzes, with a thouſand Goats, an hundred and fifty Camels, an hundred and fifty Buffes, a thouſand Oxen, and two hundred Weathers. With this rich Preſent came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring unto him that this he had got from him, upon promiſe that he ſhould not moleſt the Druſian any more. For which promiſe ſo made, Ebrain ſharply reproved Gomeda, and threatned to make him know what it was to take upon him ſo dangerous a Liberty; and for the greater deſpight both to the one and to the other, Ebrain would needs have Gomeda himſelf to return again with like Meſſage to trouble the Druſian. Whereunto although he went in great fear of ſome Miſchief by the hands of Man-Ogli, yet was there no remedy but needs he muſt follow the command of him, in whoſe Power it was to take from him both his Honour and Life; and therefore on he went. But as ſoon as Man-Ogli ſaw Gomeda (thinking as truth was, that he came again about his wonted Requeſt) he was with the very ſight of him ſo far moved, as that he was even at the point to have thrown a dart at him, and ſo to have diſpatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects ſtaid his fury; yet ſpared he not with ignominious words and deadly Threats to disburden his Choler. Notwithſtanding Gomeda could do no leſs but accompliſh the effect of his fraudulent Requeſts; and ſo wrought with him, that he drew from him four Burbens more of Harquebuzes, ten Swords, and ten gilt Daggers, certain ſilver Belts, ten packs of Silk, and ſome few pence; cauſing him withall to proteſt unto him, never to ſuffer himſelf to be perſwaded to come again unto him; for if he did, he threatned to kill him, happen after what might of it. With exceeding Joy and Triumph did Ebrain receive this Preſent, and thinking now with himſelf that he had gotten a ſufficient booty from him, he determined to riſe with his Army, and to ſack all the reſt of Man-Oglies Country. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir Ebne-frec, burnt Andrea, the place of Man-Ogli's Reſidence, and in two days burned and deſtroyed nineteen other of his Towns, with unſpeakable Cruelty committing all things to Fire and Sword. After all this ſacking and raſing, Ebrain ſent divers Meſſengers to Man-Ogli, to try whether he would yet be perſwaded to come unto him; but nothing could move the reſolute Druſian to commit himſelf into his hands, but rather increaſed his Conſtancy to avoid a moſt certain Death. Now the great Baſſa ſtill thirſting after Blood and Revenge, underſtanding by a Spie, that the Captain of Andrea (being one of the Factors of Man-Ogli) with three hundred and fifty Souldiers was got up to a certain Hill, into a Place of great Security, he ſent Emir Ebne-frec to entice him, and to tell him, That ſeeing his Lord Man-Ogli would not come and yield himſelf, he ſhould come unto him; which if he would do, he would aſſuredly in deſpight of Man-Ogli, make him a Sanzack of ſome of thoſe Places which he moſt deſired. The ambitious and unheedy Macademo ſuffered himſelf to be eaſily perſwaded, and being accompanied with his three hundred and fifty Followers, went with the ſaid Ebne-frec, and came at laſt to the Pavilion of Ebrain, having firſt cauſed his aforeſaid men to ſtay, being in a Valley two or three Miles off. But Ebrain would not ſo much as ſee the Macademo, although both in reſpect of the nimbleneſs of his Perſon, and alſo the fierceneſs of his Looks, he was worthy to be looked upon; but commanded him to keep in a ſeveral place from Serafadin, and in the mean time deviſed how he might with leaſt loſs of his own men, put to death thoſe three hundred and fifty the Macademoes Followers; which was by training them, by means of the ſaid Ebne-frec, into a certain Vine-yard, and ſo having brought them into a Straight, ſuddenly to ſet upon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed; for being by the treacherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their ſlaughter, fearing nothing leſs, they were ſuddenly incloſed by the Turks Sanzacks or Janizaries, and ſlain every Mothers Son. This Maſſacre thus finiſhed, Ebrain commanded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to be ſtripped and flaied quick; who being come, ſtoutly upbraided Ebrain with his Promiſe and his Oath; and amongſt other Speeches which he uttered whilſt they ſtripped him; ſaid, Cut me off my Members, and firſt putting them into the Privities of that infamous Ebrains Wife, put them afterwards into the Mouth of himſelf; for ſo (I trow) he will be contented and ſatisfied with my Fleſh. And to them that were the Executioners of his painful Death, he ſaid, It is your great good Fortune indeed, that with ſuch Violence and needleſs Deformity, you are now able to ſpill my Blood, and to take my Life from me; whereas none of you all had been able, or once durſt, man to man, to have drawn one drop of it from me, no nor to have indured my Countenance. But go too, proceed in your wicked and unſatiable deſire of my Blood, and fulfil the cruel command of your Viſier; for in the end there will alſo light upon you the juſt reward of this ſo villanous a Fact. With theſe and other ſuch like Speeches the miſerable wretch was ſtripped, and three great ſlaſhes made on his Back, where they began to flea him; he in the mean time not ceaſing to blaſpheme their Religion, and to curſe their King, and their falſe Prophet alſo. But the barbarous Souldiers proceeding in their cruel Action, made other like gaſhes upon his Breaſt and Stomach; and ſo drawing the Skin downward, could not bring it to his Navel before he was with the Extremity of the Pain, dead. After this, Ebrain cauſed the Followers of Serafadin (in number about a hundred and fifty) to be cruelly ſlain, and all his Country to be moſt miſerably waſted, he himſelf ſtill remaining in Chains.

The Macademo by the Commandment of Ebrain ſlain quick.

Whilſt the Fire and Sword thus raged in the Druſian Country, Ebrain by ſpeedy Poſts ſent to Sidon, where his Gallies lay at rode, commanded, That diſbarking four thouſand Souldiers, they ſhould ſack all thoſe Countries along the Sea-coaſt, even as far as Cæſarea in Paleſtine, ſparing neither Age nor Sex, nor any Perſon of Condition whatſoever. Which his cruel command was preſently put in Execution; and three thouſand Souls brought away Captives, great Booties made of much rich Merchandiſe, many Towns burnt, ſundry Caſtles raſed and laid even with the Ground; and to be ſhort, all the whole Country of Serafadin and Man-Ogli laied utterly waſte and deſolate.

Ebrain notably diſſembleth with Ebne-Manſur.

Ebrain was now in readineſs to depart for Conſtantinople, where he was by Amurath expected; as well for his Gold, as the accompliſhment of the Marriage. But bethinking himſelf, that whatſoever hitherto he had done, would be accounted either little or nothing, unleſs he provided in ſome ſort for the quieting of thoſe People under the Turkiſh Obedience, he determined to nominate one of the three Druſian Emirs that came to him to Jeruſalem, to be Baſſa of all thoſe Regions. And becauſe Emir Aly Ebne-Carſus was the richeſt and moſt obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge unto him, and honoured him with that Dignity; yet not without a Bribe, but for the price of an hundred thouſand Duckats. Wherefore he apparelled him in Cloth of Gold, gave him a Horſemans Maſe, and a Sword all gilt, and delivered unto him the Kings Commiſſion, cauſing him withall, to ſwear Faith and Obedience to Amurata. And ſo having (at leaſt to ſhew) ſet in order the Affairs of thoſe Mountains, which an hundred of the Turks great Captains had in former time vainly attempted, he returned to Damaſco, where he ſtaied 12 days, by ſhameful ſhifts extorting Money from divers Perſons. At laſt having no more to do in thoſe parts, he turned himſelf towards Gazir and Baruto, Places under the Government of Ebne-Manſur, where he arrived with all his Army, and found the Gallies which he had left in the Port of Sidon, now in the Haven of Baruto, as he had before commanded. Now upon a certain Hill above Baruto near unto the Sea, Ebrain had pitched his own Tent only, and none other; and having ſent all the reſt of his beſt and goodly things which he meant to carry with him to Conſtantinople aboard the Gallies, ſhrowded himſelf only under that narrow and baſe Tent. Thither he called Ebne-Manſur; and in pleaſant manner told him, That now it was time for him to make payment of the Debt of an hundred and threeſcore thouſand Duckats which he owed the King's Lord for the Cuſtom of Tripoli and Baruto; for that he could not longer ſtay in thoſe quarters, but was to return to Conſtantinople, which he knew how to do, unleſs he carried with him the diſcharge of that Debt. Whereunto Ebne-Manſur made Anſwer, That it would not be long before his Macadamoes would come with his Monies, and that then he would without further delay make Payment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be an excuſe, and therefore determined with himſelf to thruſt him into the Gallies; and becauſe he could not carry the Money unto the King, yet at the leaſt to bring him his Debtor. But foraſmuch as he doubted to put this his Determination openly in Execution, for fear of ſome Inſurrection amongſt the People, as well for that he was within the Territories of the ſaid Ebne-Manſur, as for that he ſaw him greatly beloved and favoured of the other two Druſian Lords, Ebne-frec and Ebne-carſus, he therefore thought it better Policy by concealing this his purpoſe, to ſhew him in his outward Actions all good Countenance, and by ſecret and ſubtil means to take him Priſoner. Whereupon he deceitfully told him, That foraſmuch as he was to ſtay there for his Buſineſs that Night, and was reſolved the next day to make a road into the Country of Man-Ogli, he therefore prayed him to do him the Favour to be his Guide, and for that purpoſe, when he ſhould ſend for him at Midnight, that he would come unto him very ſecretly, becauſe he was minded to depart without any ſtir, only with five hundred men in his Company. The Druſian Lord verily believed the matter that ſo it was, and withall was in good hope by that means to find ſome way to eſcape his hands. Whereupon being called up at Midnight, he readily went to the Tent of Ebrain, who preſently charging him (whom all men thought he had eſpeciall affected) with many abominable and foul terms, cauſed a Chain to be caſt about his Neck, and his Armes; and ſo faſt bound to be carried into the Gallies. And yet not ſo contented, took the ſpoil of all his Country, whereby there was levied ſuch a Prey as was marvellous to behold; for beſides Money (whereof there was a very huge ſum) the ſtore of Cloths of Silk and Gold, was ſuch, and ſo great, as might better beſeem ſome great Prince, than ſuch a mountain ruſtical Lord as he was. When the Baſſa had conveyed all this into his Gallies, he ſailed to Tripoli, where he found Serafadin in the Cuſtody of Veis Baſſa and Aly Baſſa; and having ſtayed there ſome few days, wherein he committed ſundry villainous and abominable Robberies, he cauſed the ſaid Serafadin to be put into the Gallies, with all his Silks and other Wealth, and ſo departed for Conſtantinople; where at ſuch time as he entered into the Channel of the City, accompanied with four and twenty Gallies, he was encountered and received by a wonderful number of his Friends and Favourites, and ſaluted with an honourable Peal of Artillery out of the Seraglio. John Thomas Minadoi the beſt Reporter of this Hiſtory, as alſo of the late Wars betwixt the Turks and the Perſians, being then at Conſtantinople, and having (as he reported of himſelf) good means to ſee the bountiful and beautiful Preſents which the ſpoiling and ravenous Baſſa gave the Turkiſh King; reporteth the ſum thereof to have been a million of Gold, beſides the yearly Revenue of Caire, amounting to ſix hundred thouſand Duckats, with threeſcore Horſes moſt richly garniſhed, of ſingular beauty, but eſpecially of the Arabian Race, a live Elephant, and a live Giraffle (which is a beaſt like a Camel and a Panther) two great Crocodiles dead, a Chair of maſſie Gold richly ſet with precious Stones; a Caſket alſo beſet with precious Stones and Gold, many Packs of moſt fine Cloaths, Wollen, and Silks, certain other Cloaths with Fringe of Gold and Silver, and the Barbarian cut-work, moſt fine Linnen of Alexandria, and all the Harquebuzes taken from the Druſians; beſides ſundry rich Preſents given by the proud Baſſa to the great Ladies of the Court, reported by Leunclavius to have been worth two hundred thouſand Sultanines.

But now foraſmuch as we have before made mention of the Sanzack of Jeruſalem, and his flight, it ſhall not be altogether impertinent to our Hiſtory (though ſomewhat out of time) in few words to declare what paſſed between him and the Arabians of Paleſtine, a little before the coming of Ebrain the great Baſſa into thoſe quarters; by which little, the deſirous Reader may eaſily perceive the woful and troubleſome ſtate of that ſome time moſt bleſſed and fruitful, but now moſt miſerable and barren Land of Jury, and of thoſe Places in Holy Writ ſo much renowned.

The Land of Jurie much troubled with the Arabian Theeves and Robbers.

In the Confines of Sodom, and in the Places that lie not only between the Lake Aſphaltites and Damaſco, but alſo in the Plains and in the Vallies of Jericho and of Samaria, and in other Places about Bethlehem, Emaus, Bethanie, Bethſage, Capharnaum, Nazareth, Levir, Bethſaida, Naplos, and other Towns of Name thereabouts, there do haunt and live certain Arabian Captains; who ſpreading themſelves even as far as Rama and Joppa, over-run at their Pleaſure all the Countries there round about, and continually commit grievous outrages as well againſt the ſaid Cities, as alſo upon the Goods and Wealth, not only of the Inhabitants there, but alſo of the Strangers; yea and their Inſolency oftentimes groweth ſo great, that they dare to aſſault the fenced Cities, beſide the ſpoiling of Travellers, that by reaſon of their buſineſs have occaſion to paſs from one City to another. They are good Horſe-men, but uſe no Armour; their Horſes are very ſwift to run, and ſpare of Diet, and are themſelves bold and adventurous Theeves. Theſe Arabians having had Intelligence, that the aforeſaid ambitious Youth, appointed Sanzack of Jeruſalem, was in mind to raiſe all the Sanzacks thereabout; and joyning himſelf with them, and his Father the Baſſa of Damaſco, to reſtrain their inſolent Liberty, and to work their Deſtruction, reſolved with themſelves not to ſtay, untill he and his Confederates were ready; but rather by ſundry Invaſions by him, even unto the Gates of Jeruſalem, to provoke him to come out into the Field. And the rather to induce him ſo to do, they compacted with a certain Subbaſſi of Bethlehem, their Friend, to encourage and animate the Sanzack thereunto, by promiſing unto him good Succeſs and proſperous Events. The ambitious young man, ſeduced with the glorious Perſwaſions of the falſe Subbaſſi, of whom he made good reckoning, and provoked by their Inſolencies, reſolved (as they had wiſhed) to iſſue out of the City into the open Field; and thereupon having armed an hundred of his Vaſſals, and raiſed all the Horſemen that were under his Government, to the number of ſix hundred, he made a road towards Jericho, ſending before defiance unto them; againſt whom the Arabians came accordingly, and with their Arrows and Indian Canes overwhelming his Harquebuzes, as if it had been a raging Flood, wrought him great wo; when in the very nick, the Battel yet being at the hotteſt, the traiterous Subbaſſi fled towards Bethlehem, and left the Souldiers of Jeruſalem in the hands of the Arabians, who put moſt part of them to the edge of the Sword, and ſcarcely gave Liberty to the Sanzack to ſave himſelf by flight. The Sanzack certainly informed of this Fraud of the diſſembling Subbaſſi, to be revenged upon him, began alſo in like manner to diſſemble with him, feigning that he would once more try his Forces againſt the ſame Arabians; and ſo uſed the matter, that the Subbaſſi arming himſelf, came unto him, without any Suſpition of the Miſchief intended againſt him. But as ſoon as he was come, the Sanzack took him alive, and preſently cauſed him in moſt cruel manner to be ſlain quick.

The Subbaſſi of Bethlehem ſlain quick.

Thus having paſſed over the Troubles that ſtayed the People of Egypt and Damaſco, and the Countries thereabouts, from reſorting to Oſman the Turks great General at Erzirum; let us again return thither where we left him, taking a view of the Preparations againſt the Perſian; and proſecute thoſe Affairs, which of all others moſt exerciſed the Forces of the two mightieſt Mahometan Monarchs; and with the Expectation thereof, filled the World from the Eaſt to the Weſt.

The ſtraight Commandment from Amurath, together with the Fame and Reputation of Oſman the General, had drawn together ſuch a world of People of all ſorts to Erzirum, as that it ſeemed not the Power of one King alone, but rather the united Forces of many Kings. Whereſore Oſman perceiving that he had gathered together too great a number of People, and too huge an Army, and that it might ſo fall out that he might want Victual for ſo great a Multitude (neither ſo greatly fearing his Enemies Forces, as that he needed to lead ſo populous an Army againſt them) determined to diſcharge a great number of ſuch as he thought moſt weak, and leaſt able to endure travel; ſo that out of this great Multitude he drew out about forty thouſand Perſons, who liberally, according to every mans Ability, redeeming the ordinary Perils of the Wars, returned home to their own dwellings. And ſo in Oſmans Army remained the number of an hundred and fourſcore thouſand Perſons, or thereabouts. With this Multitude the General departed from Erzirum (about the eleventh of Auguſt this year 1585) towards Tauris, continuing for all that, the Speech for Naſſivan. But he had ſcarce marched two days, when divers Souldiers of Græcia and Conſtantinople preſented themſelves before him, upbraiding him with great Improvidence, and telling him, that they began already to feel the want of Victual, by wanting the ſame day their ordinary allowance of Corn for their Horſes; ſo that if in the beginning, and as it were in the entrance of ſo long a Journey, they felt ſuch want, they could not tell with what Judgment or Diſcretion he meant to lead ſo great a Company ſo far as Naſſivan; nor by what cunning conceit he had preſumed to ſuſtain ſo great an Army in the Service of their Lord. Oſman quietly heard their Complaints, and preſently provided for them, by cauſing ſuch ſtore of Barley to be diſtributed among them, as they deſired; and ſeverely puniſhed the Officers that had the charge for the allowance of Corn, who moſt covetouſly began to make Merchandiſe of the common Proviſion, by converting it to their own private Uſes. And having thus quieted their troubled Minds, he proceeded on his Journey, and by the way of Haſſan Chalaſſi and of Chars, arrived upon the Calderan Plains, famous for the memorable Battels there fought between Selymus and Hyſmael. In theſe Plains he took a general review of his Army, wherein there wanted a number, that by reaſon of Sickneſs being not able to continue the Journey, were inforced to ſtay behind, ſome in one Place, ſome in another. Removing thence, he took the way, not to Naſſivan, as he had ſtill hitherto given it out he would, but now directly to Tauris. Which ſo ſudden an alteration of the Journey, as ſoon as the Souldiers of Græce and Conſtantinople heard, they fell into a great Rage, and coming again before the General, revelled with him in this ſort to his Face.

The number of Oſmans Army.

The moſt inſolent Speech of the Souldiers of Conſtantinople and Græce, unto Oſman their General.

AND what are we, thou Villain, thou Turk, thou Dolt, whom thou handleſt in this ſort? We are neither Oxen nor Sheep of the Mountains, for the leading of whom thou thinkeſt thou art come out; neither can we brook theſe thy Lies and Deceits. If thou haſt publickly profeſſed to lead us to Naſſivan, and by that ſpeech haſt trained us from the fartheſt bounds of Græcia, to what end now, after thou haſt wearied us ſo much, doſt thou deceive us with ſuch Vanities, and prolong our Journey, and ſet before us ſuch ſtrange and important dangers as our Minds never once thought on? But if this was thy firſt purpoſe and intent, and that now, not fooliſhly or by chance, but upon Premeditation and good Advice thou changeſt thine Opinion, why diddeſt thou diſmiſs ſo many Souldiers, as might have made the Army more terrible and ſtronger for the enterpriſe of Tauris? Doſt thou think that by ſuffering others to redeem their Liberties, and ſo to increaſe thy Riches, thou ſhalt ſet our Lives to ſale, and to make us ſlaves to the Perſians?

Oſman wiſely appeaſeth his mutinous Souldiers.

At theſe arrogant Speeches, the General was exceedingly troubled; ſeeing his good meaning, and the earneſt deſire he had to advance the Majeſty and Glory of his King, taken in ſo evil part, and thoſe his beſt Souldiers ſo highly offended. And although he could indeed have readily uſed the ſharpeſt and hardeſt Proviſions and Remedies for it, that in ſuch Occaſions are ordinarily applyed; yet upon good Advice he forbare ſo to do, and inſtead of Rigour and Puniſhment, reſolved to work by more eaſie means. Whereupon, cauſing many of the Captains and chief men among thoſe ſeditious Souldiers to come before him, he firſt perſwaded them, That the former ſpeech for Naſſivan was not raiſed at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to go for Tauris; but all that was done, he had done to fulfill the Commandment of the Sultan, who had charged him ſo to do, to the end to leſſen the Perſian Preparations; which they would undoubtedly have made far greater, if the ſpeech had been given out at the firſt for Tauris. Which his princely Care of their Safety, they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in ſo doing they ſhould ſtill preſerve that great Opinion which both the King and the World had conceived of their Valour and Fidelity. Neither needed they to fear that the Souldiers which were diſmiſſed might weaken the Army, for that they themſelves were not only ſufficient to pierce into Tauris, and to open the way upon the Enemies, but to daunt them even with their Looks; and that thoſe which were diſcharged, had but purged the hoaſt of all Cowardiſe, and left nothing in it but Virtue and Courage. By this mild anſwer of the General, the tumultuous Souldiers were ſufficiently pacified, but much better apaied and contented they were, as ſoon as he put his hand to the common Purſe, and beſtowed among them all a ſmall quantity of Monies; for by this his kind uſage, all their Stomacks were overcome, and they themſelves became ſo willing and ſo courageous, that now they durſt venture not to Tauris only, but to Casbin, yea even to the fartheſt parts of all the Perſian Kingdom.

Theſe important outrages thus appeaſed, the General turned himſelf with all his Army towards Coy, a City ſcituate beyond Van, in the midſt between Tauris and the Martian Mere, where he refreſhed his Army with all things he could deſire. From Coy he paſſed to Marant, a City ſubject to the Perſians; plentiful alſo of all things needful for Man or Beaſt. From thence he leaned down towards Soffian; a fruitful Place, ſubject alſo to the Perſians; from whence he began to diſcover Tauris. Great was the Joy of the whole Camp, and now the mutinous Souldiers of Græce and Conſtantinople could highly commend the Advice of the General, or rather of Amurath himſelf, in giving out the Rumour of Naſſivan for Tauris, as the only means whereby they were in quiet come ſo far, the Perſians being wholly occupied (as they ſuppoſed) about Naſſivan; inſomuch that every man being waxen courageous, and repleniſhed with Joy, without any fear at all began proudly to plot unto themſelves nothing but Sackings, Pillings, taking of Priſoners, Raviſhments, Robberies, and all thoſe inſolent and outrageous Actions that uſe raſhly to proceed from the greedy Affections of thoſe barbarous Victors; eſpecially they of the Vauward, who being deſirous of Booty, and to diſcover the Enemies Country, deſcended down towards certain pleaſant Gardens full of all ſorts of Trees, Springs, and Fruits; where having ſatisfied their Appetites, they withdrew themſelves to a certain little River near to a Bridge called The Bridge of Salt-water, and there ſtaied at pleaſure attending the coming of the Army. But even whilſt they were thus injoying the Water, the Fruits, the Shade, the green-Graſs, and other Delights of the Place, the Perſian Prince Emir Hamze, King Mahamets eldeſt Son, who with ten thouſand good Souldiers had cloſely couched himſelf, watching ſtill when ſome of the Enemies Bands ſhould come down to thoſe reſting Places, ſuddenly ſet upon them with ſuch Speed, Courage and Fury, that as if it had been a lightning, and in a manner without any reſiſtance he over-ran all thoſe Turks, and diſperſed them, putting to the Sword about ſeven thouſand of them. And ſo leading away with him many Priſoners, Horſes, Slaves, with ſundry Enſigns and Turkiſh Drums, he withdrew himſelf back towards his blind Father, who lay then encamped about twelve miles from Tauris, with fifty thouſand Souldiers or thereabouts; Aliculi Chan Governour of Tauris being left in the City with 4000 Souldiers only. A greater Army than this, not exceeding the number of threeſcore and four thouſand Men, was not the Perſian K. able to levie; the principal occaſion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman Nation being waxen rebellious and diſobedient, would not by any means be brought to defend that City, whereof Aliculi Chan their Capital Enemy was now Governour; and from Cheilan and Heri there came not ſo much as one Souldier to relieve the Neceſſities of Perſia. So that with theſe ſmall Forces in compariſon of the Enemies, the Perſian King had no ſtomach to meet the Turkiſh Army in plain Battel, but ſought how he might with as little loſs to himſelf as poſſibly he could, make trial of his Forces, and by all politick means to weaken and annoy his ſtrong Enemy.

Oſman ſendeth two Baſſaes with 14000 Souldiers to overtake the Perſian Prince.

Oſman underſtanding of this diſcomfiture of his Vauward, forthwith diſpatched Sinan Baſſa the Son of Cicala, and Mahamet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with fourteen thouſand Souldiers to purſue the victorious Prince: who in their purſuit uſed ſuch Expedition, that at length they overtook him in the way towards his Fathers Camp. But as ſoon as the Prince ſaw the Turks ſo near him, that without a dangerous and ſhameful flight he could not avoid the Battel, couragiouſly he turned his Face, and joyned with them a moſt bloody conflict; which being begun two hours before Night, was moſt fiercely maintained until that the Darkneſs of the Night bereaving them of the uſe of their Weapons, enforced both the one ſide and the other to retire. Which was done with the notable loſs of the Turks, who in this ſecond conflict (as it was commonly reported) loſt ſix thouſand men; and had (as it was thought) ſuffered a general ſlaughter, had not the Night interrupted ſo uncouth an Action, well worthy of a thouſand Day-lights. So that hitherto the Turks ſuſtained the loſs of more than ten thouſand Souldiers, and yet had ſcarce diſcovered or ſeen the City which they ſo greedily longed after.

The next Morning the Turks Camp removed and came within two Miles of Tauris, where they incamped. But whilſt they were ſetting up their Tents, Aliculi Chan iſſuing out of the City with all his Garriſon and ſuch of the Citizens as were fit to bear Arms, ſet upon the Face of the Vauward, being now renewed, and with many cunning turnings and windings ſo charged them, that with great loſs he forced them to retire even unto the main Battel; where after he had eſpied the great Artillery, he without hurt withdrew himſelf again to the City. The Confuſion of the Turks in this Skirmiſh was notable, for in a very ſmall time the Vauward was diſordered, and almoſt three thouſand ſlain. But Aliculi not ſo contented, in the ſhutting in of the Evening ſallied out of the City the ſecond time, and ſwiftly running along that ſide of the Army that lay towards Tauris, ſlew the Baſſa of Maras, and did great harm in that quarter; which done, without any ſtaying he fled to the Kings Camp, and forſook the Defence of that ſorrowful City which he could not hold. Nevertheleſs the Tauriſians, as many of them as remained in the City, gathered themſelves together to the Gates of the City, well armed, prepared to make a bloody entrance for the Turks whenſoever they ſhould come. All the Night was ſpent in watching without reſt on either ſide, and yet nothing attempted; but upon the break of the day, a great multitude of the ſervile ſort of the Turks, and of the common raſcal rout, without any order from their Captains, armed with Corſelets, Spears, and Swords, went to the City with Reſolution to have ſacked it, and ſo to have enriched themſelves with the Spoil and Pillage of that wealthy City. But when they came to the guarded Gates of the City, they found there contrary to their Expectation, a terrible Reſcue, and were inforced there to joyn an hard and mortal Battel; ſo that the Walls, the Entrance, yea and all the Ground thereabouts was bathed with Blood, and as it were, covered with Weapons and dead Carkaſſes. And yet for all that, though the Perſians ſtood faſt and firm at the arrival of this ſervile rout, at laſt they were conſtrained to yield the entrance, being overcome by the Multitude of them that out of the Camp flowed in upon them like a Flood; and retiring into the City, now aſtoniſhed and amazed on every ſide, they fortified themſelves in their Houſes under the Ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the Streets; from whence with their Arrows and ſome few Harquebuzes, they did the Turks that entred, great harm. Yet were they not able to kill and deſtroy ſo many of their Enemies, but that at the laſt they were too mighty for them, and wrought many grievous Miſchiefs in that woful City. And ſo a great number of this raſcal People that remained alive, returned to the Turkiſh Camp, carrying away with them too manifeſt Tokens of the poor oppreſſed City; wherein the miſerable Woman and impotent Souls ſtood embracing and ſtraining the Doors and Poſts of their Houſes, and kiſſing their native Soil, with Prayers, Mournings, and Complaints, bewailing their preſent Miſeries, and yet fearing worſe to come. Oſman the General now made acquainted with theſe Calamities, cauſed Proclamation to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould be ſo hardy as to moleſt the Tauriſians, and in the mean time went himſelf about the City, viewing throughly the Scituation of it, and ſurveying the Place wherein he might both incamp himſelf ſafely, and with better Foundation and greater Security erect a Caſtle or Fort, for the more aſſurance of that conquered Country.

The Deſcription of Tauris.

The City of Tauris ſeated at the foot of the Hill Orantes, about eight days Journey from the Caſpian Sea, and is ſubject to Winds, Cold, and Snow; yet of a very wholeſome Air, abounding with all things neceſſary for mans Life; and wonderful rich, with perpetual concourſe of Merchandiſe brought thither out of the Eaſt, to be conveyed unto the Weſt; and alſo of others brought out of theſe Weſtern Parts, to be diſperſed into the Eaſt: It is very populous, ſo that it feedeth almoſt two hundred thouſand Perſons; but yet open to the Fury of every Army, without Walls, and unfortified. The Buildings (after the manner of thoſe of the Eaſt) are of burnt Clay, rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the Name, and was the Place of the Perſian Kings Reſiſtance, until ſuch time as that the late King Tamas removed his ſeat from thence further into his Kingdom to Casbin; nevertheleſs both before and ſince, although it had been ſundry times moleſted by the Inrodes and Fury of the Turkiſh Emperours, yet was it ſtill in great Eſtimation and Renown.

Of this City Oſman Baſſa having taken diligent view, cauſed his Tents to be pitched on the South ſide thereof, where was a ſpacious Garden all flouriſhing and beautiful, repleniſhed with ſundry kind of Trees and ſweet ſmelling Plants, and a thouſand Fountains and Brooks derived from a pretty River, which with his pleaſant Stream divided the Garden from the City of Tauris; and was of ſo great Beauty, that for the delicacy thereof it was by the Country Inhabitants called Sechis Genet (that is to ſay) the eight Paradiſes; and was in times paſt the ſtanding Houſe of their Kings, while they kept their Reſidence in this City; and after they had withdrawn their Seat from thence to Casbin, became the Habitation and Place of aboad for the Governours of Tauris. Of theſe Gardens and Places Oſman made choice to build his Caſtle in; whereof he gave the model himſelf, and commanded that all the whole Circuit of thoſe pleaſant Greens ſhould be invironed with Walls, and Trenches digged round about them to convey the Water from the aforeſaid River. Which was accordingly begun with the greateſt care that poſſibly might be; the Foundation of the imbattelled Walls laid, the Ditches digged fourteen foot broad, and a mans height in depth; and in the ſpace of ſix and thirty days the whole work finiſhed and brought to an end; great ſtore of Artillery mounted upon the Walls, and divers Baths, Lodgings, and ſuch other Houſes neceſſary for the Turkiſh uſes, built within the Caſtle. The firſt day of this building Oſman fell ſick of a Feaver, with a bloody Flux; which haply was the cauſe both of the ſlowneſs of the Building, and of many other loſſes that afterwards hapned, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

The Caſtle of Tauris built in 36 days.

Eight Janizaries with certain Spaoglans found ſtrangled in a Bath at Tauris.

Five days after the building of the Caſtle was begun, News was brought into the Turkiſh Camp, That eight Janizaries and divers Spaoglans were ſeen ſtrangled in a Bath within the City of Tauris. Whereupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Janizaries came preſently unto the General, declaring unto him, That although he had with too much Clemency given order, That no man ſhould hurt or moleſt the Tauriſians, and that according to his Pleaſure, every man had uſed Modeſty towards them, and Obedience to him; yet the Tauriſians themſelves had moſt audaciouſly ſtrangled in one of their Baths eight Janizaries, and certain Spaoglans, which Injury and Inſolency (they ſaid) in their Judgment was not to be ſuffered. This outrage ſo moved the General, that without any further delay he commanded the City to be ſacked, leaving it wholly to the Pleaſure of his Souldiers; who forthwith ſo uſed the matter, not as if they would have revenged an Injury, but rather at once have brought an utter Deſtruction upon the whole City. Every place was filled with Slaughter, Raviſhment, Rapine, and Murther; Virgins were defloured, Men-children defiled with horrible and unſpeakable Sins; Yonglings ſnatched out of their Parents Arms, Houſes layed even with the Ground and burnt, Riches and Money carried away, and in brief, all things ruinated and waſted. Neither were theſe Miſchiefs committed once only, but the ſecond followed worſe than the firſt, and the third upon that worſe than the ſecond; ſo that it was a miſery almoſt inexplicable, to behold that City ſo populous, ſo rich, ſometimes the Court and Palace of the Perſian Kings, and honour of that Empire, now ſubject to the Fury of the Turks, plunged in Calamity and utter Deſtruction.

The Miſery of the Tauriſians.

The woful Advertiſement hereof ſore troubled the Perſian King, but the young Prince his Son much more; who, moved with the Paſſions of moſt inward Grief, Diſdain, and Deſpair, and deſiring nothing more than Revenge, reſolved to attempt any thing whereby to requite ſo great a Wrong. In which Reſolution having confirmed his Army, he commanded 500 of his Horſemen to preſent themſelves even to the very ſight of the Enemies Tents, and as it were to dare them to Battel. Which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant ſhew of themſelves. At the diſcovery whereof, the Turks imagining that the Perſians were come in great number to aſſail the Army, order was given by the ſick General, That Cicala Baſſa and Mahamet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with the People of Græcia, and all their own Forces, ſhould go to encounter the Enemy; who preſently, with their Enſigns diſplaid, under which there ſtood about four and thirty thouſand ſtrong, beſides a number of ſervile People, yet men exerciſed in Labours and Perils, in all, well near forty thouſand, ſet forward. Now the five hundred Perſians, with a marvellous cunning kind of skirmiſhing, dallied with the Turkiſh Souldiers, and drew them forward for the ſpace of eight Miles and more; and being brought ſo far on, and now forewearied with the skirmiſh, were luſtily aſſailed by the Perſian Prince, who with part of his Army (to the number of about twenty thouſand Perſons) courageouſly ſet upon the two Baſſaes, and joyned with them the deadlieſt and cruelleſt Battel that ever was written of. Wherein the Perſians, having given a moſt perillous Onſet, and done great harm, it was thought that they would have contented themſelves with ſo lucky an Encounter, and ſo retired; which the Turks minding to prevent, and not to return without a notable Victory, hardly preſſed upon them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and ſo to give them a bloody and deadly overthrow. But the Perſians, having quietly and with great aſſurance for a reaſonable ſpace endured their charge, at laſt as if they had been freſh men, made head upon them afreſh, and began a moſt terrible Battel anew, wherein the Baſſa of Caraemit (above named) was put to flight, and being wholly diſmaied and diſcomfited, fled back again to the Camp, carrying with him the moſt manifeſt tokens of the unhappy iſſue of the Battel. Cicala, the other Baſſa, notwithſtanding valiantly and with great cunning ſtill ſuſtained the Fury of the Perſians, labouring by all means to encourage his Souldiers, and to have reſtored the Battel; but when he had done what he could, overcome at laſt by greater Valour, he was inforced to betake himſelf to flight alſo; and ſo altogether diſcomfited, came to the Camp without any Enſign, having left behind him eight thouſand of his Souldiers dead upon the Ground.

Eight thouſand Turks ſlain.

The Perſian Prince, encouraged with this ſo fortunate a Victory, by ſpeedy Heraulds ſent to the ſick Viſier (whom he thought notwithſtanding to have been in Health) and gave him to underſtand, that if he were willing to fight, he was ready for him, and in what ſort ſoever it pleaſed him to accept of Battel, to make him good account of his Valour; and to cauſe him to know, not only that Amurath his Maſter had moſt unjuſtly raiſed this War, but alſo that it had been good for himſelf not to have taken the ſame in hand. Of this offer Oſman accepted; but being not able himſelf to go and anſwer the Prince in Perſon hand to hand, by reaſon of his Sickneſs, which every hour mortally increaſed, he ſent out all his Captains with his Army to dare him Battel.

The Prince lay ten miles or thereabouts diſtant from the Camp of Oſman, towards whom the Turks ſet forward in this manner; The main Battel was guided by the Baſſa of Caraemit and Sinan Cicala, with all the Souldiers of Aſſiria and Babylon; the left Wing was led by the Baſſa of Natolia, with the Band of Græcia; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Baſſa of Caramania, with the People of Soria; to the number of threeſcore thouſand, beſide ſuch as were left behind at Tauris, with the truſty guard of the Janizaries, and the Artillery, for the ſafeguard of the Sick Viſier. In this order they confronted the Perſian Prince, who was himſelf in the midſt of his Army, with all his

People in very good order; having on the one ſide the Souldiers of Perſia and Hircania, and on the other them of Parthia and Antropatia, in all, to the number of forty thouſand. The Turks feared nothing more, than that the Perſians fetching a great compaſs about, ſhould with all Celerity and Fury ſet upon their Tents, and the Riches they had laid up together in their Pavilions; and therefore at every motion of theirs they continually feared this ſudden out-road; whereof they had ſuch eſpecial care, that retiring themſelves as much as they might, and feigning as if they had given Place to the Perſians, it wanted not much but that they had brought them even within the juſt level and mark of their Artillery. Which the Perſians perceiving, without any further dallying hardly began to aſſail the main Body of the Battel. The Prince himſelf being entred amongſt the Souldiers of the Baſſa of Caraemit (who as General ſuſtained the Place of Oſman) and preſſing into the midſt of the Battel, diſpatched every man that came in his way; and having ſingled out the Baſſa from the reſt, ſmote off his Head, and gave it to one of his Followers to carry upon the top of his Launce. Which being openly deſcried, brought a great Terrour upon the Turks, and exceedingly encouraged the Perſians, who embrued with the Blood of their Enemies, and intermingling themſelves more and more among them, made of them a moſt confuſed and general ſlaughter; wherein beſide the Baſſa before-named, there died alſo the Baſſa of Trabſzonda, the Sanzacke of Bruſia, with five other Sanzacks, and as it was commonly reported, twenty thouſand Turks more. It fell alſo to the Lot of Amurath Baſſa of Caramania to be there taken Priſoner, with divers other common Souldiers. But Night coming now on, and the Perſians being come ſomewhat too nigh the Turkiſh Artillery, they gave over the fight, and withdrew themſelves back to the Place where the King lay incamped with the reſt of his Army.

The Baſſa of Caraemit ſlain by the Perſian Prince, and his head cut off.

But now were divers days ſpent, wherein the new Fortreſs at Tauris (as we have before ſaid) was fully finiſhed, when the Souldiers of Græcia and Conſtantinople, wearied to ſee their Friends and Fellows thus ſlain before their Faces, and having alſo ſafely laid up in their own Cuſtody ſuch Preys and Booties as they had gotten in the ſack of the City, reſolved with themſelves to procure their own departure, and ſo much the rather, for that the Winter was now faſt coming on. And foraſmuch as the General was through the immoderate flux of blood brought weak, and in deſpair of Life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his Phyſicians, and therefore not to be ſpoken withall, they were fain by the Mouth of ſuch as were their truſty Friends about him, to repreſent unto him the Neceſſity of their return, and withal after many reverend Intreaties, cauſed it alſo to be ſignified unto him, That if he ſtood obſtinate, and would needs ſtay dallying out the time in thoſe dangerous Places where no ſuch need was, they ſhould be inforced to withdraw themſelves, and to forſake him. Oſman, who had now nothing elſe to do in thoſe Countries, but only to leave ſome convenient Garriſon in the new Fortreſs at Tauris, liberally promiſed to ſatisfie their Requeſts, by departing thence the next Morning. So calling unto him Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa of Tripolis, a man of a crafty and cruel Nature, made him Governour and Keeper of the new built Fortreſs at Tauris. And the more to incourage him to take that charge upon him, he gave him freely for the ſpace of three whole years, not only the Office and Authority, but alſo the Rents and Revenues of the Baſſa of Caraemit, lately ſlain by the Perſian Prince, and withal honoured him with the Title of a Baſſa of the Court; ſo that having finiſhed his three years Office of Caraemit, he was then to go and ſit among the ſovereign ſeats of the Baſſaes of the Porta. The Baſſa ſeeing ſo fair and ſo high a way for him to mount to thoſe high honours (greater than which there is none in the Turkiſh Empire) readily accepted the offer, and diſpatching his Lieutenant to Caraemit, to the Government of thoſe Countries in his Abſence, with an hundred of his own Followers, ſetled himſelf in the ſaid Fort with a Garriſon of twelve thouſand Souldiers, furniſhed with all neceſſary Proviſion until the next Spring. The General having thus ſet all things in order, and carefully provided for the ſafety of the Fortreſs, departed according to his Promiſe, and the ſame Morning (which was the fourſcore and ſeventh day after his departure from Erzirum) came to a Place called Sancazan, ſeven Miles diſtant from Tauris.

Giaffer Baſſa of Tripolis, an Eunuch, made Governour of Tauris.

Oſman the General departs from Tauris, and comes to Sancazan.

The Turks were now upon the point of their incamping, in a confuſed diſorder and hurliburly, when thoſe that were hindermoſt in the Army heard the neighng of Horſes, and the noiſe of Drums and Trumpets, as if it had been the coming of an Army. Which when the whole Camp underſtood, they ran headlong and diſordered as they were, to the reſcue, on that ſide where the noiſe of the Horſes and warlike Inſtruments was heard. But whilſt the Turks were thus intentively buſied on that ſide to expect the coming of the Enemy, the Perſian Prince without any ſign or token of Battel, with 28000 Horſemen was ready upon them on the other ſide; who having diſcovered the Camels and other Carriages, whereupon their Booty, their Spoils and their Riches were laden, which they had taken in Tauris, beſide much of their Proviſion of Victuals for the ſuſtenance of the Army, he turned upon them, and with a provident and ſafe Convoy had taken for a Prey eighteen thouſand of the Camels and Mules well loaden with the ſame Booties and Victuals; which the Prince ſent preſently away with ſix thouſand of his Souldiers, and he himſelf with his two and twenty thouſand Perſians entred into the Turks Army, who now to withſtand his aſſault, had on that ſide alſo made head againſt him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to ſee what a mortal Battel was made, what ſingular Proweſs ſhewed even preſently in the fore-front of the Battel; for in a moment you might have ſeen the Tents and Pavilions turned upſide down, and their incamping Lodgings repleniſhed with dead Carkaſſes and Blood, victorious Death ranging and reigning in every Corner. The Turks themſelves were aſtoniſhed and marvelled to ſee their Enemies (ſo few in number, and intermingled among ſo populous an Army of warlike People) more like fatal Miniſters of Death, than mortal men, to brandiſh their Swords over them, as if it had lightned, and to make ſo general a ſlaughter; and do to this day with great Admiration recount the Valour and Proweſs of the Perſians. But they all now doubting leſt the Enemy in this Fury ſhould forcibly have entred the very Lodgings of the ſick Viſier, it was commanded (not by himſelf, for he lay now at the laſt gaſp, but by him who at that time commanded in his Name) That without delay the Artillery ſhould be unbarred and diſcharged: which in that Medly and Confuſion of both Armies, without any Exception or Diſtinction of Perſons, overthrew both Friends and Foes, and did more harm perhaps among the Turks themſelves, than among the Perſians: for at the firſt thundring noiſe thereof the Prince with all ſpeed retired; after whom preſently followed all the reſt: ſo that the Turks which remained behind, were more annoied with the deadly ſhot, than were the Perſians, who flying away, could not feel the damage, but that the Turks muſt firſt be well payed for their Labour. The Turks purſuing the flying Perſians, made ſhew as if they would gladly have overtaken them; but Night coming on, they feared to proceed any further than they might without Danger return. In this Battel of Sancazan were ſlain twenty thouſand Turks, without any notable loſs of the Perſians.

Twenty thouſand Turks ſlain.

Oſman the Viſier and General dieth at Sancazan.

Among the reſt, in the ſame place died the Viſier Oſman, General of the late dreadful, but now deſolate Army; not by the hand of the Enemy, but conſumed with the vehemency of an Ague, and flux of Blood. Whoſe Death notwithſtanding was kept ſecret from the whole Army, every man verily thinking, that it was but only the continuance of his Sickneſs, becauſe the Charets wherein he lay, were ſtill kept cloſe; and in his Name Cicala Baſſa (for ſo he had appointed in his will) gave out Anſwers and Commandments to the whole Army. Nevertheleſs it was diſcloſed to the Perſians by means of three young men, who in the Life of Oſman having charge of his Jewels and Treaſure, were with the beſt thereof and the faireſt of his Horſes fled to the Perſian King, to whom they revealed the Death of the General. The Perſians, who before had thought it not poſſible for ſo great cowardiſe and diſhonourable kind of fighting and ordering of an Army to have proceeded from the Virtue and Valour of Oſman, of whoſe worth they had too manifeſt a trial and experience in times paſt, now underſtanding of his Death, were thereby incouraged to attempt the utter overthrow of the Turkiſh remnant, and ſo to give them an honourable farewel. Whereupon the Perſian Prince with 14000 men followed the Turks, who had now raiſed their Camp, and were removed to a certain River of Salt-water, not far from Sancazan, where the Prince cauſed a few Tents to be pitched, about four or five miles diſtant from the Turkiſh Camp, the aforeſaid Brook running in the midſt between the two Armies. Now the Prince had purpoſed to have aſſailed the Turks in the Morning, whilſt they were lodging their Carriages, hoping in that Confuſion to have wrought them ſome notable Miſchief; which his deſignment was revealed unto the Turks by one of his Spies whom they had caught. And therefore they did neither riſe ſo early in the Morning as their manner was, nor load their ſtuff until ſuch time as they were all armed, and on Horſeback ready to receive their Enemies. By which their wary and unuſual manner of riſing, the Perſians perceived that their purpoſe was by ſome means diſcovered. And yet conſidering that if they ſhould loſe this occaſion, they ſhould find no other good Opportunity to annoy them before the next Spring, they utterly reſolved to adventure the aſſault; and having obſerved that the Enemies Artillery was on the right ſide of the Army, they in the ſight of every man began to enter on the left. But the Turks preſently ſo uncovered and unbarred their Artillery againſt the aſſailants, as was to their great loſs and danger. Howbeit they were ſo nimble and ſo quick to ſhroud themſelves under the Enemies Army, and to avoid the miſchievous Tempeſt, that being come now very near the Turks Squadrons, they muſt needs joyn Battel with them. The Perſians had purpoſed before, as ſoon as they ſaw the Turks begin to ſtir, to retire, and ſo to draw them on into a very filthy and deep mariſh; which being then dry, was not feared or doubted of any, but only by thoſe that were acquainted therewithal, or born thereabouts. Which their policy the Rebel Maxut Chan, and with him Daut Chan (as being well acquainted with thoſe places) perceiving, gave notice thereof to Cicala Baſſa, who preſently cauſed a great compaſſing wing to be made, commanding them to ſet upon the Perſians, and to charge them home; which was forthwith put in Execution, ſo that their fore-front opened it ſelf with very large and ſpacious corners upon the Prince; who no ſooner ſaw this their unwonted order of coming on, but by and by he perceived that his purpoſe was diſcovered; and thereupon without any ſtay he began to retire, calling his People after him; which could not ſo ſuddenly be done, but that three thouſand of them remained behind, all miſerably ſtifled, overtrodden in the mire; with very little loſs to the Turks. And this only battel of five that were fought under Tauris, and in thoſe quarters, was leſs hurtful to the Turks than to the Perſians.

The Prince returned to the King his Fathers Camp, returning unto him the whole Action, together with the departure of the Enemy. And ſo the Turks came to Salmas, where the Death of the General was publiſhed; from Salmas they went afterwards to Van, where they took a ſurvey of their Army, and found wanting therein about fourſcore and five thouſand Perſons, or as ſome ſay more. At Van all the Souldiers were diſmiſſed; and Cicala from thence gave notice to Amurath at Conſtantinople, of all that hapned. Where firſt was publiſhed the Death of Oſman the General, (for whom were made many ſigns of great ſorrow) and together with his Death, were blazed the bloody and mortal Actions that were in that Expedition performed; ſo that the whole City ſeemed to be greatly diſcomforted; and in many places were heard much ſecret railing upon the King, many Curſes of this War, and inſolent Maledictions of theſe manifold Miſchiefs. After that, was diſperſed the great Fame of the new Fortreſs erected at Tauris, of the ſacking of the City, and of all the loſs that had hapned therein; and a general Edict publiſhed in the Kings Name, That through all the Cities of his Empire they ſhould make ſolemn Feaſts, with other expreſs Tokens of Joy and Rejoycing; which was accordingly done both in Conſtantinople and other Places. There was alſo word ſent to the Ambaſſadors of Hungary, of France, of Venice, and of other Countries, That they ſhould do the like; but they all with one accord anſwered, That it was never the Cuſtom of Ambaſſadours to make any ſuch ſigns of Rejoycing, but only when the King himſelf in Perſon returned from any the like Victories.

The Turks Army diſcharged at Van.

In the mean time Conſultation was held at Van, for the ſending of Succours to Teflis in Georgia; unto which important Service, Daut Chan to deſerve ſome Reward at Amurath's hand, offered himſelf; unto whom Cicala Baſſa delivered thirty thouſand Cecchini to be conveyed to the Fort at Teflis. Which piece of ſervice the Renegate performed, and without trouble relieved the Souldiers in the Fort; which was ſo well accepted of Amurath, that he for the ſame good Service honoured him with the Dignity of the Baſſa of Maras. Maxut Chan alſo the other Perſian Rebel, that guided the Turkiſh Army to Roivan, and afterwards to Taurio, was in like manner by the ſame Amurath honoured with the great rich Office of the Baſſa of Aleppo.

The Miſeries the Turks Army endured at Tauris.

The Miſeries the Turkiſh Army endured in this Expedition for Tauris, beſide the Loſſes before rehearſed, were wonderful; for as the Sanzack of Aman (a City of Soria, called in ancient time Apamea) preſent in all this Action, reporteth in a Letter which he wrote to Ali Baſſa of Aleppo, there was ſuch a dearth in the Turks Army, that they were enforced to give their Camels Biſquet and Rice, and when that failed, they gave them their pack-Saddles to eat, and after that, pieces of Wood beaten into Powder, and at laſt the very Earth; which dearth endured untill they arrived at Van. And at Tauris, whilſt the Fortreſs was in building, they were of neceſſity conſtrained to give their Horſes their Dung in very drie Powder. By reaſon whereof there followed a grievous mortality of Horſes, Camels, Mules, and Men; and the ſtink which grew of this Mortality was ſo great, that every man was fain to carry a piece of a ſtrong ſmelling Onion under his Noſe, to avoid the heavineſs thereof.

The Fort ſo lately built in the Royal City of Tauris, exceedingly grieved the Perſians in general, but eſpecially the King and the Prince his Son; to let it alone, they reckoned it too great a ſhame, and how to demoliſh it they knew not well, finding themſelves not only deſtitute of Artillery, but alſo of ſuch ſufficient ſtrength as was requiſite for performance of ſo great an Enterpriſe; yet, prick'd on with deſire of Glory, and the neceſſity of the Cauſe, they determined even in the depth of Winter to gather new Forces, and with Trenches of Earth to approach the Ditch, and to try if they could advance a Countermure as high as their Walls, and ſo to attain to the Conqueſt thereof. But in the gathering of their Men they diſcovered new Difficulties; for, to hire any Souldiers either from Heri or Cheilan, was denied them by Abas and Amet Chan; and their Turcoman Nation, which might have been the readieſt and the neareſt at ſuch a need, for the late Death of Emir Chan, and for the Succeſſion of Aliculi, were grown very contumatious; ſo that neither the King, nor the Prince, nor the Preſidents and Governours of that Kingdom, could tell which way to turn themſelves. At laſt, for the common ſafety, they determined to draw the Turcomans to a Reconciliation; hoping that by promiſing them any honeſt Satisfaction for the wrong wherewith they challenged themſelves grieved for the Death of their Captain, they would become more tractable to do them Service in their common Neceſſities. Whereupon the King ſent kind Letters to the Heads and Captains of thoſe Nations, and principally to Mahamet Chan, and to Chaliſe the Sultan; declaring plainly unto them the Perils of his State, and of the Liberty of the whole Kingdom, with the Confidence he had in their Valour; and that therefore forgetting all that was paſt, as done not in ſhame or ſcorn of their Nation, but only for Zeal and Love to the Kingdom, they would demand ſuch Satisfaction as they deſired, and that he would be ready to agree to any juſt requeſt they ſhould make. To which Letters they readily anſwered, that they would come unto him, to put in Execution whatſoever he ſhould for the common Neceſſity or Honour of his State command. Now they had craftily amongſt themſelves already concluded not to ſuffer any other to ſit in the room of Emir Chan their late Governour, but only young Tamas the Kings third Son. Which Concluſion they had plotted to themſelves, with a Reſolution in the end, to cauſe him to be accepted for King at Casbin, in deſpight of the King himſelf and of the Prince Hamze; nothing regarding, that by this Action far greater Troubles would ariſe in Perſia than ever were yet heard of; but only being wholly bent to revenge the Death of one only Emir Chan. With this malicious and fraudulent Reſolution, they to the number of ten thouſand (under the conduct of two Captains, Mahamet and Caliſe) went to the King, in all Reverence offering themſelves with all readineſs to be employed in the enterpriſe whereunto they were called. The old credulous King, not ſuſpecting any miſchief plotted by theſe ſecret Rebels, was greatly comforted at their coming; and although by ſome of his Sultans that had felt ſome inckling of this Conſpiracy, he was adviſed to deal circumſpectly and warily with them, and not commit any matter of importance to their truſt; yet did he think every hour a thouſand untill he had offered them Satisfaction; promiſing them, that what Captain ſoever they would deſire in the room of Emir Chan, if it were poſſible, they ſhould have him. Whereunto the diſſembling Mahamet Chan made anſwer, That their deſire above all things, was to do him Pleaſure and Service; not doubting but he would appoint them ſuch a Chieftain, as ſhould be valorous, noble, and acceptable unto them. The King could ſtay no longer, but frankly declared unto them, That to aſſure them of his good will, and to give them an Hoſtage in pawn thereof, he had made choice of young Tamas his Son, to ſucceed in the room of Emir Chan their late Governour. As ſoon as Mahamet Chan heard this Reſolution of the King, who beſide all expectation, voluntarily of himſelf yielded them the means to put in Execution what they had maliciouſly before contrived againſt the Peace and Liberty of the Kingdom; he became more jocund than he was wont to be, and outwardly ſhewed himſelf ready for whatſoever the King would command him; and in the Names of the reſt, yielded alſo large Promiſes of Fidelity and Obedience, ſo that the matter might be performed for which he had now given his Word.

Ten thouſand Turcomans offer their Service unto the Perſian King.

The King, who deſired nothing more than to ſee the Fort of Tauris raiſed (which could hardly be done without the help of thoſe Turcomans) contrary to the Advice of the wiſeſt of the Sultans, and of the Prince, ſecretly, and as it were by ſtealth, gave his young Son Tamas into the hands of Mahamet, as chief of all the Turcomans. Who, to nouriſh the good Opinion and Credulity of the King, and to ſecure the Prince and the Sultans, gave a luſtie beginning, by the help of his Followers, with Trenches and Rampiers to approach the Fort. Neither was there any great time ſpent therein; for they had now almoſt made their Trenches and Mounts even with the Enemies Wall, and the Ditch it ſelf was almoſt filled up with Earth, ſo that there wanted but little more Labour to begin the deſired aſſault; when, contrary to all Mens Expectation, the falſe and wicked Traitor Mahamet Chan with all his Turcomans, leading away with them the Child Tamas, departed in the Night-time, and upon a ſudden, from ſo noble and honourable an enterpriſe; and, blinded with deſire to put in Execution his ill-hatched purpoſe, covertly and without any noiſe, removed from the beſieged Walls, and put himſelf on his way towards Casbin; ſtill terming Tamas by the Name of the King of Perſia, and ſundry ways abuſing and mocking the poor old King and the Prince. This ſo ſudden and ſo dangerous a Rebellion, whereby not only ſo honourable and ſo neceſſary an enterpriſe was to be abandoned, but the whole ſtate of the Kingdom like to be indangered, exceedingly grieved all good men, but moſt of all the old King and the Prince his Son; who, no leſs careful of his rightful Succeſſion, than was the aged King of his preſent Eſtate, both now hazarded by this Rebellion; wholly incenſed with Grief and Anguiſh of Mind, began to caſt a thouſand Devices in his troubled Head, what courſe to take, and what to reſolve upon. To abandon the ſiege it grieved him above meaſure, and to ſuffer ſo pernicious a Rebellion to go forward, ſeemed too dangerous for the State of Perſia; and to provide for both theſe Miſchiefs at once, was altogether impoſſible. In theſe huge Waves of contrary Thoughts, he reſolved at laſt to turn himſelf againſt the Turcomans, and to ſuppreſs that Rebellion, as moſt dangerous to the State. And ſo with twelve twelve thouſand Souldiers, and a part alſo of the Kings ordinary Guard, all couragious and hardy men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans; and marching directly toward Casbin, he overtook them at a place called Caliſteza, a daies Journey on this ſide Casbin, and there joyned Battel with them. Wherein, many of them being ſorry for that they had done, would not ſo much as draw their Swords againſt the Prince; many others fled alſo away for fear, ſo that he eaſily obtained a wiſhed Victory over them. The ſeditious Mahamet Chan was taken Priſoner, and by the Princes Commandment preſently beheaded; ſo was alſo Caliſe the Sultan, and divers other Captains of this peſtilent Conſpiracy. Young Tamas was alſo taken, and by the Direction of the Prince ſent to the Caſtle of Chabaca. Five thouſand Turcomans of the late Followers of the Rebel Mahamet, fled out of the Battel towards Babylon by the way of Siras, and yielded themſelves to Solyman, Baſſa of that City; who afterwards repenting themſelves of their Folly, ſought to return again into the Favour of their King, but all in vain; ſo that being become Rebels to the one, and ſuſpected to the other, they did at one time loſe their Country, their Liberty, their Honour, and the Favour of all Men, as well Friends as Foes. The Prince after this Victory held on his way to Casbin, and there ſtaying, laboured to gather the diſperſed Turcomans, eſpecially thoſe that (moved with the honeſty of the cauſe) would not bear Arms in ſo unjuſt an Action; intending afterwards to return to Tauris, to attend the beſieging and conqueſt of the Fort. This was the end of this dangerous Rebellion, the chief cauſe that Tauris was not again recovered out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakning of the Perſian Kingdom.

The Turcomans diſcomfited, and Mahamet Chan and Caliſe the Sultan beheaded.

Giaffer Baſſa ſendeth to Cicala Baſſa for Aid.

Now Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa Governour of the Caſtle of Tauris, fearing leſt the Perſian Prince would with a greater Army again return to the ſiege; perceiving himſelf to wax every day weaker and weaker, by reaſon that many of his men ſecretly fled from him, beſide them that periſhed with Sickneſs, and others ſlain in adventuring too boldly to go abroad to ſeek for Victuals; ſent Advertiſement thereof to Cicala Baſſa at Van; ſignifying further unto him by Writing, That if the Prince ſhould again return to aſſault the Fort, he ſhould of Neceſſity be enforced to yield it; and that therefore, as he tendered the honour of his Sultan, he would be careful to ſend him Succour, whereby he might be able to maintain the Fort; adding moreover, That now it was moſt eaſily to be done, becauſe there was no Forces of the Enemies in thoſe quarters, ſaving only a few which remained about the King, lying twelve miles off from Tauris. Cicala, moved with the importance of the enterpriſe propounded, and withal deſirous to gain ſome credit of Glory and Renown with his King, entertained the Advices of Giaffer, and getting him to horſe with a train of three thouſand Harquebuzers, and good ſtore of Munition, ſet forward toward Tauris. The Perſian King advertiſed thereof, ſent out Spies to learn what way they held, meaning to meet them and to ſet upon them; but theſe Spies coming near to Salmas, were apprehended by the fore-runners of Cicala, and being put to Torture, revealed at laſt, how that their King was in Arms, and on his way towards Sancazan. At which News Cicala was greatly aſtoniſhed, as well for the danger whereinto the Forces and Munition which he had with him were likely to fall, as alſo for that by any loſs which his Troops ſhould ſuſtain in this Expedition, the City of Van (being indeed the greater and moſt noble frontier Town in all thoſe Countries) muſt needs be in hazard to be loſt, having left in it but his Lieutenant with a very few Souldiers. Whereupon he determined to relinquiſh this dangerous enterpriſe, and to withdraw himſelf back to the Defence and Preſervation of the City committed to his Truſt and Government. But although theſe expected and deſired Succours were not conveyed to Tauris as was intended, yet had Giaffer as good Fortune as he could wiſh; for the Preparations of the Prince were ſo long and troubleſome, and his return ſo much prolonged, that there was time enough yielded unto the Turks great General, now newly choſen (as by and by ſhall be declared) to go with a ſtrong Army into thoſe quarters, and ſo to preſerve all that which the only Expedition and Celerity of the Enemy might have put in great hazard, and almoſt have brought to a deſperate caſe.

In the mean time, Amurath the Turkiſh Emperour was greatly troubled at Conſtantinople in making choice of a new General; on the one ſide, Oſman Baſſa having by his laſt Will left Sinan Cicala to be his Succeſſour, as a man of approved Valour; and the many dangers he had run through in the late Service about Tauris, with the great favours he had in the Court, did not a little incline the King to his Election: on the other ſide, he heard of a publick Rumour ſpread amongſt the Souldiers, that they could by no means indure to be commanded by ſo young a Captain; and that ſome in plain tearms ſhould ſay, That they would not obey him: Which cauſed Amurath to doubt, that ſome dangerous diſcord might thereof enſue in the Army, if he ſhould proceed to make choice of him. Then there was alſo Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man which had already ſuſtained the charge before Oſman, who now very ambitiouſly ſought again for this Honour, having of late performed ſome good Service to the good liking of the King. Of any other to make better choice he had none, ſo that he ſtood in great doubt what to do. In the end, becauſe he was in good time to provide for his Affairs, he made choice of Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man whom he had before made proof of: a man of great Fidelity, of an honourable Carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commanding of ſuch an Army, to whom he granted the ordinary Authority, to mannage at his pleaſure ſuch Affairs of the Empire as concerned his Journey. Upon this Reſolution, general Precepts were ſent out to all Cities within the Kingdom, to the Baſſaes and other Governours, with ſpecial Commandment, That all their Souldiers, together with their Taxes, Tenths, Munitions, Victuals, Armour, Artificers, and to be ſhort, all their neceſſary Furniture and Proviſion ſhould be ready and in order, upon the firſt warning ſhould be ſent them the next Spring. Great proviſion of Money was made, and in Soria (beſides the ordinary ſum that is beſtowed upon the yearly pay of Souldiers in Reivan, Erzirum, Lori, Tomanis, Teſlis, and Chars, which ſwallow up all the Revenue of that Country, and of the City of Tripoli, amounting to the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand Duckats) there was taken up in preſt of private Merchants in the City of Aleppo only, the ſum of threeſcore thouſand Cecchini, to be repaied unto them with the firſt Monies that ſhould be received by the Officers of his Cuſtom-houſes. A matter that moved an extraordinary grudging among the People, for that it ſeemed to every man a very ſtrange and intolerable Exaction, beſide ſo many grievances laid upon them, for Corn, for Carriages, for Pioneers, and for Workmen, to endure this burden alſo of lending their Money, without hope of Reſtitution thereof: yea and indeed every man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill-adviſed, to make it known to the Chriſtian Princes what ſcarcity and want of Money they had. The General had alſo with him four hundred pieces of Artillery, and did beſide ſo work the matter, as that Maxut Chan (who was appointed Baſſa of Aleppo) was granted unto him to be the guide of his Army, as he had been of Oſmans; and that Cicala Baſſa of Van (ſcarce his good friend) was removed from thence, and ſent farther off out of his way as Baſſa to Babylon.

Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople, and cometh to Sivas.

And thus having put all things in readineſs, he departed from Conſtantinople in the Month of April, in the year 1586, and paſſing over the Strait into Aſia, came to Sivas ſomething later than he ſhould have done, being hindred partly by the Plague, which then raged exceedingly in Conſtantinople, and partly by other occaſions incident to ſuch Actions. At Sivas he ſtaied ſo long for the coming together of his Army, and in muſtering Men, that it was the latter end of July before he departed thence; ſtaying indeed the longer at Sivas, by reaſon of the exceeding Dearth and want of Victuals at Erzirum: which Dearth was alſo ſo great in Aleppo, that a Venice buſhel of Wheat was ſold for twelve Cecchini.

Ferat yet making his abode at Sivas, but ready to depart, was advertiſed by certain Poſts ſent from Giaffer the Baſſa of Tauris, how that the Perſian Prince was hourly expected with a great Army, and that if he did foreſlow to ſend Succours, and to prevent the coming of the Prince, and ſo give him time and leiſure to aſſault the Caſtle, he doubted greatly how he ſhould be able to hold the ſame. Upon which Advertiſement Ferat preſently removed, and ſo haſted his Journey, that about the beginning of Auguſt he was at Erzirum; and ſtill hearing more and more of the Princes coming, ſtaied not there, but haſted to Van; where having gathered together all his Souldiers, and taken a new Survey of his Army, he departed thence; and being preſently come into the open and large Champains, to make proof of the readineſs of his Souldiers, he marſhalled them in ſuch ſort as if he ſhould forthwith have joyned Battel with the Enemy, and ſo in ſeemly order marched on.

The Turkiſh General continually feared, leſt the Perſians ſhould come upon him with ſome ſudden aſſault; beſides that, the conſtant report of the Princes coming to Tauris with his Army, much increaſed his troubled Thoughts. But on the other ſide, he repoſed great Confidence in the Conſpiracy that was now plotted againſt the Life of the Prince, with the privity of Aliculi Chan the Protector and Champion of Abas Mirize of Heri, who under the colour of accompanying the Prince to aſſiſt his Forces, had reſolutely concluded with himſelf, and abſolutely promiſed Abas (having alſo given Intelligence thereof to the Turks General) to rid the Prince Hamze of his Life; or at leaſt (which he thought might more eaſily be brought to paſs) in the ſundry Revolutions and variable Chances of the Battel, at ſome time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and ſo to ſettle his Lord and Maſter Abas in his Eſtate. Upon theſe Treacheries Ferat grounding himſelf, began with greater Confidence to diſpoſe his Deſignments, and ſomewhat leſs to fear the Fame of the huge Preparations of Perſia againſt him. Which Preparations in truth, as by moſt wicked Devices and malicious Conſpiracies they were turned quite contrary from that end whereunto the Prince Hamze had continually appointed them; ſo if they had been employed with ſuch Faith and Fidelity as ſo righteous a cauſe required, without all doubt the Writers of our time ſhould have had matter enough in this 86 year to ſhew and repreſent unto the World ſuch Accidents as ſhould be nothing inferiour to thoſe of the year before-going. But foraſmuch as Rebellion and Diſcord, the two inferiour Miniſters of the Devil, have for the utter undoing and overthrow of the Glory of Perſia, continually favoured the Turks Army, no marvel it is that the Perſian Nation cannot vaunt of any Revenge taken for the Indignities offered them by their Enemies; and that our Writers cannot chuſe but write of the true and undoubted Victories of the Turks, and the bare Shadows of the Perſian Exploits; which notwithſtanding many Chriſtians vainly believe, becauſe they moſt earneſtly deſire them to be true, although they do ſee to the contrary, the manifeſt proſpering and evident Conqueſts which the Turks have in divers their States and Countries.

The Glory of the Perſian Kingdom overthrown by Rebellion and Diſcord.

The Perſian Prince about the latter end of July arrived at Tauris with the greateſt part of his Army, where he (contrary to the Opinion of all men) ſtaied not, for what cauſe is uncertain. But underſtanding that Zeinel Baſſa of Salmas, by Nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the City, who of a Perſian was become a Turk, and had done great harm againſt the State of Perſia; he determined ſuddenly to ſet upon him, and to chaſtiſe him for his Rebellion. According to which Reſolution, being accompanied with twelve thouſand Souldiers, he rode to Salmas, where finding Zeinel with all his People encamped as he had been before informed, he gave him the aſſault. Zeinel more ready to flie than to fight, and his Souldiers as ready as he, fled preſently, and fell before the Perſians, ſo that the Baſſa himſelf with a few others had much ado to eſcape and ſave themſelves in the cloſeſt Corners thereabouts, leaving the City committed to his charge, for a prey unto the angry Enemy; who entering into the ſame, ſacked and ſpoiled it, exerciſing thereon all ſuch Cruelties, as partly the natural deſires of Souldiers uſe to practiſe, and partly ſuch as the Turks themſelves ſhewed unto them in that miſerable and moſt lamentable ſacking of Tauris the laſt year. The like Spoils did the Perſian Army in all thoſe quarters round about, and ſo would have peradventure returned to Tauris, but that certain Spies arrived upon them, with Advertiſement, That the Baſſa of Reivan being iſſued out of his Fortreſs with fifteen hundred Harquebuſiers, had committed the like outrages in the Villages and Fields thereabouts, as the Prince had done about Salmas. With which News the Prince was greatly moved; and immediately riſing with his Army, and marching towards Reivan, not far from the City encountered the Baſſa; who diſcovering the Enemies Forces afar off, began in great diſorder to flie and retire into his Fort, leaving the greateſt part of his Souldiers (making not ſo much ſpeed in flight as himſelf) to the Fury of the Prince, who put them all to the Sword, and did what harm he poſſibly could in all the Places thereabouts.

At the very ſame time great Troubles aroſe in the Druſian Country; for Man-Ogli the valiant Druſian (of whom we have before ſpoken) in Revenge of the Injuries done unto him and his People by Ebrain Baſſa, and by a valiant kind of Reſtitution to recompence himſelf of all thoſe Bribes and Preſents, which by ſo many ſhifts and ſubtilties were by the covetous Baſſa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken up Arms, and having waſted and ſacked all the Territory of Ebne-Manſur, and of his other Enemies who had yielded their Obedience unto the Turks, without lett forced all that Country with ſudden Invaſions and Inrodes, even very near unto the Cities of Balbecke and Tripoli, and did there exceeding harm. For redreſs whereof, Amurath was glad to diſpatch away from the Court Ali Baſſa born at Aleppo, with the Title of the Baſſa of Damaſco, and with Authority to muſter freſh Souldiers, and ſo wholly to attend the utter Subverſion of Man-Ogli. But coming thither, he found all again quiet, ſo that his 1586 Preſence in that Country ſerved rather for a Reconciliation and Peace-making amongſt them, than for the proſecuting of any further War; which at that time was moſt neceſſary for the Turks to be avoided, as well for want of Money in the common Treaſury, as for the exceeding ſcarcity of Victuals.

Now the Perſian Prince having made an end of the Outroads and Spoils before-mentioned, retired himſelf to Tauris, and ſo towards his Fathers Camp, where the reſt of his Army was now arrived, to the number of about forty thouſand; of whom the Prince diſpatched away the Souldiers of Heri, to the number of eight thouſand, under the conduct of the traiterous Aliculi Chan their General; and part alſo of the Turcomans, under the leading of Emanguli Chan; with ſpecial charge, That they ſhould by the way, in places of moſt advantage, meet and receive the Enemies Army, and in thoſe narrow and troubleſome Paſſages to do them what miſchief they poſſible could. Which the Prince thus appointed, thinking by this means to weaken the Enemies Forces, and ſo at their arrival at Tauris, to come upon them with all his Power, and ſo utterly to deſtroy them.

Aliculi and Emanguli Chan perform nothing againſt the Turks, as was by the Prince expected.

Both theſe Captains departed accordingly, making ſhew that they would with all Affection accompliſh the Commandment of their Prince; yet never was there heard any ſervice of moment put in Execution by them; for Aliculi full of Treaſon, after their departure began to alledge many forced Reaſons and Excuſes, Why they ſhould ſurceaſe from meeting with the Turks; and Emanguli as yet utterly ignorant of the wicked Purpoſes and miſchievous Treachery of Aliculi, ſuffered himſelf to be miſled by him alſo. By the Delays and Negligence of theſe two Perſian Captains, the Turkiſh General took leiſure, without any loſs or hinderance at all, to arrive at Tauris, and to put the deſired Succours into the Fort; at what time the Perſian Prince by good hap had got Knowledge of the Treachery of Aliculi, and of the Deſignments which many of the Sultans had lately contrived, for the betraying of him alive into the hands of the Turkiſh General. Of which Suſpition he being greatly afraid, durſt not only not truſt himſelf to perform thoſe Battels that he had before determined to have performed, but quite abandoning this noble and honourable enterpriſe, wholly employed all his Care and Study for the ſafety of his own Perſon, and ſo left the Triumph of the Matter in the Power of the Turks. And thus thoſe great Hopes and Expectations which the Perſians had conceived of great Exploits to have been done againſt the Enemy, did not only prove vain and come to no good iſſue, but contrariwiſe by this diſcovery were converted into moſt ſtrange Diſturbances, and all Perſia thereby endured ſundry Alterations and Revolutions of moſt important Conſequences. For both Aliculi Chan and his Complices were purſued by the Prince, as Rebels and Traitors; and alſo Abas Mirize of Heri was manifeſtly diſcovered for a wicked and treacherous contriver of his Brothers Death; whereby the common Miſchiefs were encreaſed more than ever they were before, and the publick Calamities yielded greater hopes unto the Turks, than they had ever before conceived in all the courſe of theſe Wars.

Ferat putteth Succours into the Fort at Tauris.

When Ferat had thus relieved them in the Caſtle of Tauris, leaving for the Cuſtody thereof Giaffer the Baſſa with his former Companies, he returned towards Erzirum, having firſt cauſed a Fort to be erected at Curchive Tauris, a Place near unto Tauris; another at Coy, and the third at Cum; in every one of which Forts he left a convenient number of Souldiers, with all things neceſſary and ſufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the Places they were to keep. He ſent alſo Succours to the Fort at Teflis in Georgia, which they had long expected, and now moſt joyfully received. But the Perſian Prince having hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of Tauris, thought himſelf now wholly delivered from the great fear of Treaſon and Rebellion, wherein he of late lived; and therefore in as great haſt as he could, put himſelf on his Journey towards Genge; in which place having gathered together a good number of Souldiers, he determined to remove thence, to intercept the Succours that were by the Turks to be brought to Teflis. Now he had always found Emanguli Chan to be both faithful and wiſe, and in him he repoſed an aſſured Confidence for performing any enterpriſe that he had in hand, and communicated with him every Device that he had conceived in theſe Wars. And therefore he made head and joyned with him; and lodging moſt familiarly in his City, he ſtayed there for the ſetting in order and diſpoſing of his aforeſaid Deſignment, being very deſirous not to let ſuch an Opportunity to overſlip, without Signification unto the World of ſome notable Novelty, which might be correſpondent to the Fame that of matters paſſed and performed the year before, was now ſpread and publiſhed abroad over all the World. But when he was even at the very faireſt to have put this his deſire in Execution, and leaſt of all feared any Treachery or Treaſon, upon a ſudden in the Night-time as he ſlept upon a Pallat he was miſerably ſtrucken through the Body, by an Eunuch of his that attended upon him, and ſo the moſt reſplendent and bright luſtre that ever ſhined in Perſia, was utterly extinguiſhed. What was the occaſion thereof, and who procured his Death, divers and ſundry are the Opinions of Men. Some think that his Brother Abas Mirize of Heri, who had before conſpired to have had him betrayed into the hands of the Turkiſh General, had now by force of Money and Gifts induced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to have been done without the privity of his Father, as more deſirous to prefer Abas Mirize his other Son unto the Kingdom. Divers others do diverſly reaſon of the matter; ſo that to affirm of a certainty, that thus or thus the Death of ſo worthy a Prince was procured, were great raſhneſs; and therefore we leave it, with the further proceſs of the Perſian State, unto the further diſcovery of Time, the antient Mother of Truth.

The Perſian Prince ſlain by one of his Eunuchs.

Notwithſtanding the League betwixt the Chriſtian Emperour Rodolph the ſecond, and Amurath the great Turk, many ſharp Skirmiſhes oftentimes fell out betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, upon the Frontiers of their Territories and Dominions, eſpecially in Hungary, Croatia, and Stiria; as now in the latter end of this year 1586. in the Month of December, the Turks, after their inſolent manner making an inrode into the Borders of Croatia, received a notable overthrow by the Chriſtians, being in number much fewer; where amongſt others, the Baſſa of Boſna with his Brother was ſlain, whoſe Head with certain Priſoners was ſent to Vienna to Erneſtus Arch-duke of Auſtria, the Emperours Brother. This Baſſa of Boſna and his Brother, ſlain in this Conflict (as we have ſaid) are reported to have been the Sons of Muhamet the late great Viſier, by one of the Daughters of Selymus the ſecond, Amurath's Siſter. For divers years following, Amurath did no great matter worth the Remembrance, contenting himſelf (as it ſhould ſeem) with that he had already got from the Perſians; and holding his league in ſome reaſonable ſort with the Chriſtians: yet not ſo, but that many a bloody broyl, tending at laſt even to the breach of the League, paſſed betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians; which for the Continuation of the Hiſtory we will briefly ſet down, as they are unto us by the Writers of our time reported.

The Caſtle of Koppan in Hungary ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians.

In February the year following, which was the year 1587, the Chriſtians, provoked by the often outrages of the Turks, ſetting upon the Caſtle of Koppan, not far from the lake of Balaton, being then frozen, by good fortune ſurpriſed it. There was at that time in the Caſtle three of the Turks Sanzacks, and about a thouſand Turks, of whom an hundred and ninety of the better ſort, with ſeventy Women, beſides divers of the meaner ſort, fell into the hands of the Chriſtians; the reſt ſaving themſelves by flight, or by creeping into ſecret corners; an hundred Horſes for ſervice were there taken alſo, and ſo much Booty as was eſteemed to be worth forty thouſand Duckats. Of the three Sanzacks that were there preſent, Alis Sanzack of Koppan was taken, and brought firſt to Vienna, and afterward preſented to the Emperour; Another of them ſtanding upon his defence in a vault under Ground, was there ſmothered; the third eſcaped by flight, but was afterwards the ſame year taken with divers others, as ſhall be forthwith declared.

The eighth of Auguſt following, four of the Turks great Commanders in Hungary, viz. The Baſſa of Ziget, the Sanzacks of Mohas, of Quinque Eccleſia, and the new Sanzack of Koppan, with five thouſand Souldiers, brake into the borders of the Chriſtians, and in moſt cruel manner deſtroyed ſeventeen Country Villages about Limbach; carrying away with them all the miſerable Country People, with the ſpoil of the Country. Whereof George County Serinus (Son to that moſt valiant County Nicholas Serinus ſlain at Ziget) Commander of the Garriſon of Caniſia, underſtanding, with as much ſpeed as was poſſible raiſed ſuch Forces as he was able out of his Territory betwixt the Rivers of Drauus and Mura, and calling unto his aid the County Nadaſti, the Lord Bathianius, and ſome other valiant Captains that had the charge of thoſe Frontiers; with ſuch diligence took the Streights and Paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs return among the Mariſhes, that the Turks coming back again that way with a very rich Prey and many Priſoners, being in the break of the day hardly charged by thoſe moſt expert and reſolute Souldiers, in thoſe ſtreight and troubleſome Paſſages about a mile from Caniſia, were at length diſcomfited and put to flight with ſuch a miſerable ſlaughter, that many of them yielded up their Scimiters, pittifully crying for Mercy; other ſome fled back into the Woods and Forreſts, and many running headlong into the Mariſhes, there periſhed, or ſticking faſt in the deep mud, cried together for mercy and help of their Enemies. In this Conflict Muhamet the Sanzack of Quinque Eccleſia (Son to Haly Baſſa, ſlain in the Battel of Lepanto) was taken Priſoner. Sinan Beg Sanzack of Mohaz, thinking to eſcape through the Mariſh, ſtuck faſt with his Horſe, and was ſhot through the Head with a ſmall ſhot, and there died. The Baſſa of Ziget, with Chaſan the new Sanzack of Koppan, ſeeing all deſperate and loſt, fled betimes out of the Battel; but he of Koppan, wandering up and down in the Woods, was the next night after the Battel with others taken; the Baſſa of Ziget, almoſt ſpent with Hunger and Grief of Mind, eſcaped on foot ſeven days after to Breſenza. There were taken of the Turks a thouſand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their Wounds. In this Battel there was ſlain of the Turks, with them that periſhed in the Mariſhes and Woods, about 2000, and of the Turks Horſes were taken about 1500. All the Prey before taken by the Turks, with the miſerable Captives, was again recovered. The number of them that performed this notable Service, was in all but fifteen hundred foot, and five hundred horſe; of whom there was but eleven ſlain, but moſt of the reſt wounded. Four hundred heads of the ſlain Turks were (after the manner of thoſe bordering Souldiers) carried for ſhew to Caniſia, with five hundred Priſoners. The Chriſtian Souldiers, with the help of the Country People, ceaſed not for certain days to hunt after the Turks that were fled into the Woods, as after wild Beaſts, of whom they found a great number; divers others alſo ſeeing no means to eſcape, came forth of their lurking Places, and yielded themſelves.

Sinan Baſſa again received into Favour.

Amurath underſtanding of all theſe Troubles that had ſo happened, commanded Aly the Baſſa of Buda to be ſtrangled, for that he had broken the League, and not reſtrained the Inſolency of his Sanzacks, whom he might have commanded; and in his ſtead placed Sinan Baſſa, whom, before in diſgrace, he had now at the requeſt of his Wife again received into Favour, and reſtored to his former Dignity. About this time alſo Sigiſmund (the King of Sweden's Son) now after the Death of King Stephen choſen King of Polonia, and Maximilian the Emperous Brother rejected; even in the beginning of his Reign ſought to renew the League which Stephen's Predeceſſor, and other the Polonian Kings had before made with Amurath and his Predeceſſors, the Turkiſh Sultans. And to that purpoſe writ unto him as followeth.

Sigiſmund the Third, King of Polonia, unto Amurath the Third, Emperour of the Turks, ſendeth greeting.

Sigiſmund the Polonian King's Letter unto Amurath.

THE Almighty long keep and preſerve your Majeſty in Health and Honour. Moſt Mighty Prince, our beſt beloved Friend and Neighbour, after that we by the Grace and Goodneſs of God were choſen to govern the Kingdom of Polonia, and the Ambaſſadors of that Kingdom had ſignified ſo much unto us; we, providing us of Neceſſaries, came to Danſke the eighteenth of October, from whence we ſend John Zamogil our Secretary, to give your Majeſty to underſtand of this our coming. For being told by the Polonian Ambaſſadors, That we were choſen unto the Government of that Kingdom, upon Condition, That according unto the Cuſtom of our Predeceſſors the Polonian Kings, we ſhould keep Love and Friendſhip with the moſt excellent * Muſſulman Emperours; we promiſe unto your Sovereign Majeſty, that we are willing with the like or greater Zeal and Devotion, to continue that Amity and Friendſhip with your moſt excellent Majeſty and the Othoman Emperours your Succeſſors. For confirmation whereof, ſo ſoon as we ſhall come unto Cracovia the regal City of Polonia, and there be crowned, we will forthwith ſend our great Ambaſſador unto your Majeſty. In the mean time we moſt earneſtly requeſt your Majeſty, that our Kingdom may on your Majeſties behalf reſt in Safety and Peace; which we perſwade our ſelves you will eaſily grant. So wiſhing unto you all Health and Happineſs, we bid you farewell. From Danſke the 18th of October, in the year 1587, and of our Reign the firſt.

* The Turks deſire to be called Muſſulman, which in their Language ſignifieth a true believer.

Unto which the Kings Requeſt and Letters, Amurath not long after returned this Anſwer in Writing.

Amurath the Third, Emperour of the Turks, unto Sigiſmund King of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath's Anſwer unto the Letters of Sigiſmund.

I Take it well, and as a token of your Love, that your Ambaſſador John Zamogil came with your Letters unto our moſt high and glorious Court, the refuge of diſtreſſed Princes; wherein you have given us to underſtand, how that inſtead of the moſt excellent and famous King Stephen, of worthy Memory, late King of 1587 Polonia; you, deſcended of the ſame noble Stock and Race of the Polonian Kings, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous Kingdom of Polonia, and the great Kingdom of Lithuania; choſen King of Polonia; and being ſent for by lawful Ambaſſadors, by the Favour and Goodneſs of God, to be come unto the City of Danske, and from thence to be about to go unto Cracovia, the chief City of the Kingdom of Polonia. And when you are there arrived, to ſend your Ambaſſador unto our moſt high and glorious Court, to confirm, preſerve, and eſtabliſh the League and Amity commodious and neceſſary for both our Kingdoms, honoured and kept by your antient Predeceſſors, with our Grandfathers and Great-Grandfathers; yea, and that with greater Zeal and Devotion than any your noble Anceſtors. And therefore your Ambaſſador in your Name requeſteth, That no Invaſion on our behalf be made into the Borders of the Kingdom of Polonia, or any harm there done; and that the moſt noble Tartar Prince Isbam Gerai (whom God bleſs) ſhould be warned, that he neither make nor ſuffer any Incurſion to be made into the Confines of the Kingdom of Polonia. All which things in your Letters contained, with the reſt which your Ambaſſador hath by word of mouth delivered, are with ſpeed orderly by us conceived. Know you therefore our moſt ſtately and magnificent Court to be always open unto ſuch as reſort thereunto, and that from thence never man had repulſe, neither ſhall hereafter have; wherefore it beſeemeth you, as ſoon as theſe our Letters ſhall be brought unto you, to open your Eyes, and to beware that nothing be on your part done againſt the Majeſty of our Court, and the League; and that our Peace and Amity be neither in much or little diſturbed, but as beſt beſeemeth, well and ſincerely kept; and ſo perſwade your ſelf it ſhall on our part alſo be moſt inviolately obſerved. Our Letters are alſo directed unto the moſt excellent Tartar Prince Isbam Gerai (whom God bleſs) ſtraightly charging and commanding him, not to make or ſuffer any Inourſion to be made into the Borders of Polonia. In brief, the League and Amity ſhall on our part be religiouſly kept; and whoſoever ſhall preſume to do any harm unto the Kingdom or Confines of Polonia, ſhall therefore without fail receive from us due Puniſhment. So on your part alſo it is requiſite that the ſame be done, and that in Declaration of your Love, you forget not oftentimes to intimate unto our moſt high and glorious Court, ſuch certain Occurrents and News as ſhall happen in thoſe parts, which ſhall be unto us a ſign of your ſincere Love and Friendſhip. So know you, and give credit unto this our Seal from Conſtantinople.

Neither was King Sigiſmund unmindful of this his Promiſe before made for the ſending of his Ambaſſadour; but being poſſeſſed of the Polonian Kingdom, ſent Chriſtopher Dziercius (his Secretary) Ambaſſador unto Amurath for the confirming of the League; which he hath ever ſince ſo firmly kept with the Turk, that he could never by any Entreaty of the Emperour, or of the Princes Electors, or others, or in reſpect of the common danger, be drawn into the Fellowſhip of this long and religious War, ſo hardly maintained by the Emperour and ſome few other Chriſtian Princes his Confederates; firſt againſt Amurath, whilſt he lived. and ever ſince againſt Mahomet his Son, which now reigneth; the iſſue whereof, God grant it prove not as well unto the Polonians as others farther off, in fine, lamentable.

The year following, Ferat (yet the Turks General in Perſia) took the City of Genge, being before for fear of the Turks quite abandoned and forſaken by the Inhabitants; who yet, upon his Faith given for their Safety, returned again, yielding to pay unto the Turk a yearly Tribute of five thouſand Duckats. But when he would have gone further into the Enemies Country, having part of his Army cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous Souldiers fouly entreated, wounded, and enforced to retire. Cicala Baſſa alſo paſſing over the River Euphrates, had in thoſe quarters divers bloody Skirmiſhes with the Perſians, ſometime carrying away the better, and ſometime the worſe, as the Fortune of the Field ſerved. Until at length, Amurath himſelf, no leſs weary than his People of that long and chargeable War, and the Perſian King alſo inclining to Peace; he, by the perſwaſion of Sinan Baſſa (but lately before received into Favour) was now contented to be intreated to hearken unto the ſame; moved thereunto, as well by reaſon of new Troubles then in other Places ariſing, as for the great Famine and Plague then raging in Conſtantinople. And conſidering withal what a great Territory he had won from the Perſians, and how neceſſary it was for him by Peace to confirm himſelf in thoſe his new Conqueſts, and by the building of certain ſtrong Forts for the Succour of one another, and by the placing of his Timariots therein, to aſſure the ſame unto him; all which without Peace he could not poſſibly do, as the old Baſſa right wiſely told him. For which Reaſons he yielded to Peace; and ſo Ambaſſadors paſſing to and fro, a Peace was at length agreed upon betwixt theſe two great Mahometan Princes; the Turk covenanting to keep unto himſelf the Places he had already gained; namely, Tauris, Genge, Siruan, and Chars, with all the Profits thereof ariſing, for the maintenance of his Garriſons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new ſtirs would preſently ariſe; the Turks grown inſolent of their late Victories, being not able to content themſelves with the Conditions of the League; and the Perſians not willing to live in continual fear of the Turks, eſpecially ſeeing themſelves to be daily by them more and more oppreſſed; and withal doubting leſt the Turks, after they had taken faſt footing in thoſe new conquered Countries, and ſo grown ſtrong, and gotten better Knowledge of the Paſſages, ſhould, (after their ambitious manner) ſeek to poſſeſs themſelves of the reſt; not keeping the Covenants agreed upon betwixt them, nor at all regarding the Capitulations of the League. Which was nevertheleſs (as we ſaid) on both ſides for the ſpace of ten years orderly confirmed, with all due Circumſtances and Ceremonies, in like Occurrents by the great Potentates of the World uſed; and for the more aſſurance thereof, one of the Perſian King's Sons, or, as ſome others ſay, one of his Nephews, given unto the Turks in Hoſtage, as Amurath required. 1588

The Janizaries in a Tumult at Conſtantinople.

Theſe long Wars thus ended, ſhortly after a great Sedition was raiſed at Conſtantinople by the Souldiers of the Court, which, returning out of Perſia, with great Inſolency demanded their Pay. For the ſatisfying of whom, by the conſent of the great Sultan himſelf, the Value of the Coin was inhanſed, and a new kind of Subſidy for levying of Money impoſed upon the Subjects in general, none excepted; who, ſtanding upon their antient Liberties and Priviledges, refuſed to pay it, eſpecially the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court. Whereſore their Aga or Captain was commanded to appeaſe them, and to perſwade them to pay the demanded Tribute; in attempting whereof he was in danger to have been ſlain by the inſolent Janizaries; and yet nevertheleſs for prevailing no more with them, was in diſpleaſure thruſt out of his Office, and another placed in his room, that ſhould have married Amurath's Daughter; of whom for all that, the Janizaries would not accept in any caſe, but threw Stones at him, and threatned to kill him. The next Night a great Fire aroſe in the City, for the quenching whereof, the Janizaries were commanded (as their Duty was) to put to their helping hands; which they not only moſt obſtinately refuſed to do, but alſo kept back others that brought Water for the quenching thereof, and, together with the other Souldiers of the Court, did what they might to make it burn the faſter. With the rage of this Fire were conſumed ſeven of their Temples, twenty five great Inns, fifteen thouſand Houſes, with many Warehouſes and Shops. To appeaſe this dangerous ſtir, and to prevent further miſchief, commandment was given to the Beglerbeg of Gracia and David Paſſy a Jew (the firſt Authors of this new Impoſition) that they ſhould either gather the aforeſaid Tribute by them deviſed, and pay the Souldiers, or by ſome other means to give them Contentment. But here began the Prieſts publickly to perſwade the People from payment of this new Tribute, or any other ſuch like; perſwading them in any caſe to defend their antient Liberties and Cuſtoms; whereupon the Churches were by the Prieſts ſhut up, publick Prayers for the Health of the Sultan intermitted, the Baſſaes Houſes aſſaulted, and all the City on a new hurly burly. For the appeaſing whereof, Amurath was glad to yield unto the Janizaries, to pay the Souldiers out of his own Treaſury, to revoke his Mandates given out for the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliver the two Perſwaders thereof to the Pleaſure of the Janizaries; who drew them up and down the Streets at Horſes Tails, and afterwards cutting off their Heads, in ſcorn toſſed them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had been Tenniſe Balls.

Sinan Baſſa of Buda invadeth the upper part of Hungary.

About the latter end of September, Sinan, Baſſa of Buda, having with the aſſiſtance of the Sanzacks about Fille, raiſed an Army of eleven thouſand Souldiers, with purpoſe to have ſpoiled all the upper part of Hungary, came the ſixth of October before the Caſtle of Putnoc, and gave thereunto ſummons; but finding them in the Caſtle better provided and more reſolute than he had before ſuppoſed, he departed thence, and paſſing the River Schayo, came to Sixo, a Town of about five hundred Houſes, which after a ſore battery he took, and burnt it down to the Ground. In the mean while, Claudius Ruſſel, General for the Wars in that part of Hungary, having aſſembled his Forces, came upon him, and after a hard fight put him to the worſe, when he had ſlain of his Turks about two thouſand five hundred, beſides three hundred other drowned in the River Schayo. Shortly after, the Chriſtians in like manner breaking into the Frontiers of the Turks, took from them the Caſtles of Blavenſtein, Geſtes, with ſome other ſmall Forts thereabouts in the upper part of Hungary.

Sinan, for that he had contrary to the League, and without the Commandment of Amurath, ſo unfortunately attempted War in Hungary, was the next year in great Diſpleaſure ſent for to Conſtantinople, and Ferat, Baſſa of Boſna (late General of the Turks Army againſt the Perſians, and now but newly come home) placed in his room at Buda.

Amurath, before not ignorant of the great Preparation that Philip the King of Spain had made, and of the invincible Armado (as it was termed) by him ſet forth for the Invaſion of England (the Fame whereof had long before filled a great part of the World) as alſo of the evil Succeſs thereof the laſt year, viz. 1588; and of the purpoſe her Majeſty of England had for the troubling of his rich Trade, eſpecially into the Weſt Indies, and for the relieving of Don Anthonio, by him driven out of Portugal; wrote unto her about this time concerning thoſe and ſuch like matters as had been moved by her Agent, as followeth:

Nicholaus Reuſnerius Epiſt. Turcic. lib. 12. pag. 42.

Amurath's Letters unto the Queen of England.

Amurath the Third, Emperour of the Turks, unto Elizabeth Queen of England, France, and Ireland, greeting.

MOST Honourable Matron of the Chriſtian Religion, Mirror of Chaſtity, adorned with the Brightneſs of Sovereignty and Power amongſt the moſt chaſt Women of the People which ſerve Jeſu, Miſtriſs of great Kingdoms, reputed of greateſt Majeſty and Praiſe among the Nazarites, Elizabeth Queen of England, to whom we wiſh a moſt happy and proſperous Reign. You ſhall underſtand by our high and Imperial Letters directed unto you, how that your Orator, reſiant in our ſtately and magnificent Court, hath preſented unto the Throne of our Majeſty a certain writing, wherein he hath certified us, how that about four years ago you have made war upon the King of Spain, for the abating and breaking of his Forces, wherewith he threatneth all other Chriſtian Princes, and purpoſeth to make himſelf the ſole Monarch both of them and all the World beſide. As alſo, how that the ſame King of Spain hath by force taken from Don Anthonio (lawfully created King of Portugal) his Kingdom; and that your Intention is, that his Ships which go and come into the Indies may from henceforth be embarred and ſtayed from that Navigation; wherein are yearly brought into Spain, precious Stones, Spices, Gold and Silver, eſteemed worth many millions, wherewith the aforeſaid King, as with a great Treaſure enriched, hath means to moleſt and trouble all other Chriſtian Princes; which if he ſhall ſtill proceed to do, he will make himſelf daily ſtronger and ſtronger, and ſuch an one as may not eaſily be weakned. After that, your aforeſaid Orator requeſted our Highneſs, in the beginning of the next Spring to ſend out our Imperial Fleet againſt him, being aſſured that the King of Spain could not be able eaſily to withſtand it, for that he had now already received a great overthrow by your Fleet; and being ſcarce able to withſtand you alone, if he ſhould be on divers parts invaded, muſt needs be overcome, to the great benefit of all the Chriſtian Princes, as alſo of our Imperial State. Beſides this, that whereas the aforeſaid Don Anthonio is by force driven out and deprived of his Kingdom, that we (to the imitation of our noble Progenitors of happy Memory, whoſe Graves the Almighty lighten) ſhould alſo give the Aid and Succour of our magnificent State, as did they unto all ſuch as had recourſe unto their high Courts and Pallaces for relief. In brief, all theſe things, with many others which your aforeſaid Orator hath at large declared unto our Imperial Throne, we have well underſtood, and laid them up in our deep remembrance. But foraſmuch as we have for many years paſt made Wars in Perſia, with a full Reſolution and intent utterly to conquer and ſubdue the Kingdom of that accurſed Perſian Heretick, and to joyn the ſame unto our antient Dominions; and now by the Grace of God, and help of our great Prophet, are now upon the point for the ſatisfying of our deſire; that once done, due Proviſion ſhall be aſſigned unto all ſuch things as you have of us requeſted or deſired. Wherefore, if you ſhall ſincerely and purely continue the bond of Amity and Friendſhip with our high Court, you ſhall find no more ſecure Refuge or ſafer Harbour of good Will or Love. So at length all things ſhall go well and according to your Hearts deſire in your Wars with Spain, under the ſhadow of our happy Throne. And foraſmuch as the King of Spain hath by Fraud and Deceit got whatſoever he holdeth, without doubt theſe deceitful Deceivers ſhall by the Power of God in ſhort time be diſpatched and taken out of the way. In the mean time we exhort you not to loſe any Opportunity or Time, but to be always vigilant, and according to the Conventions betwixt us, favourable unto our Friends, and unto our Enemies a Foe. And give notice here to our high Court, of all the new Wars which you

ſhall

1589 ſhall underſtand of concerning the ſaid King of Spain, for the behoof both of your ſelf and us. To be brief, your Ambaſſador, after he had with all care and diligence diſpatched his Ambaſſage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardon his Deputy and Agent, now by our leave maketh his return towards your Kingdom, being for the good and faithful Service he here did, worthy to be of you eſteemed, honoured, and before others promoted; who when he hath obtained of you all thoſe his deſerved Honours and Preferments, let him or ſome other principal Ambaſſador without delay be appointed to our Imperial Court, to continue this Office of Legation. This we thought good to have you certified of under our moſt honourable Seal, whereunto you may give undoubted Credence. From our Imperial Palace at Conſtantinople, the 15th of this bleſſed Month * Ramazan, 1589.

* September.

Yet for all theſe fair ſhews, it may ſeem unto him that looketh more near into the ſtate of the Turkiſh Affairs at thoſe times, and that which hath enſued ſince, that Amurath, glad of the Diſcord of theſe two ſo great Chriſtian Princes, and not well aſſured of his new Conqueſts in Perſia, had no great mind to the Invaſion of Spain, as too far from the ſtrength of his Empire, an Enterpriſe not to be ſo eaſily managed by Sea, as were the Wars he ſhortly after undertook againſt the Chriſtian Emperour Rodolph by Land; wherewith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his Life, as did alſo his Son Mahomet that reigned after him.

The Polonian Coſſacks invade the Tartarians and Turks.

About this time alſo the Polonian Borderers (whom they call Coſſacks) a rough and warlike kind of People, after their wonted manner making an inrode upon the Turks and Tartarians, upon the ſudden ſurpriſed Koſlaw, a Port Town within a days Journey of Caffa, where they had the ſpoil of many rich Warehouſes of the Turks Merchants, and the rifling of certain Ships lying there in Harbour; and having taken their Pleaſure, burnt the reſt, and ſo with a great booty returned to their lurking Places. With which Injury the Tartars, provoked and ſet on by the Turks, to the number of forty thouſand, brake into Podolia and the Provinces near unto Polonia, and reſting in no place, but burning the Country before them, ſlew the poor Country People without Mercy, and making havock of all that they light upon, beſides the ſpoil, carried away with them many thouſands of moſt miſerable Captives; the greateſt part whereof for all that the Polonians reſcued, with the notable ſlaughter of the Enemy, ſurpriſed in their return. Whereupon ſuch unkindneſs riſe between the Turkiſh Emperour and Sigiſmund the Polonian King, that it was thought it would have broken out into open Wars, had not the Polonian by his Ambaſſadors and the Mediation of the Queen of England, wiſely appeaſed the angry Turk, and ſo again renewed his League.

The Reaſons wherewith the Viſier Baſſaes perſwade Amurath to make War.

Amurath, now at Peace with the World, from which he by Nature abhorred not, and ſitting idle and melancholy at home, was perſwaded by the Baſſaes his Counſellors, to take ſome new War in hand; for that great Empires (as they ſaid) could not without the continual uſe of Arms long ſtand or continue; as appeared by the Roman State, which ſo long as it was at Wars with Carthage, or their great Captains and Commanders occupied in arms againſt their Neighbour Princes, ſtill remained triumphant, and commanded over a great part of the World; but giving it ſelf to Eaſe and Pleaſure, and the Martial Men not after their wonted manner imployed, it in ſhort time by Civil Diſcord fell, and of the Miſtreſs of the World, became it ſelf a Prey even unto the baſeſt Nations. Which old Cato in his great Wiſdom foreſeeing, cryed out in the Senate, That the Souldiers and Men of War were to be kept ſtill buſied in Arms far from home, for that in ſo doing, all ſhould go well with the State, and the Glory thereof increaſe. Whereunto the Othoman Emperours, his noble Progenitors, having reſpect, propounded not Peace as the end of their Wars (as do other weak Princes having their own Forces in diſtruſt) but as invincible Conquerours, ſtill ſowed Wars upon Wars, making one Victory the beginning of another; whereby they not only brought that their Empire unto that greatneſs it was now of, but by ſuch continual Imployment made their Souldiers more courageous and ready, and alſo kept them from Rebellions and Tumults; whereunto in time of Peace, and living at eaſe, theſe Martial men are moſt commonly inclined, learning (as all others do) by doing nothing, to do that is evil and naught. Every thing (as they ſaid) was by the ſame means to be maintained, whereby it was at the firſt increaſed; and that therefore great Empires, as they were by Wars begun and augmented, ſo were they by continual Wars alſo to be from time to time eſtabliſhed; whereas otherwiſe the Souldiers living in Peace, and forgetting their Martial Proweſs, would for moſt part grow cowardly, as giving themſelves over to the Love of their own Dwellings, of their Wives, and of their Children, and other Pleaſures; or elſe, converting their Studies to Merchandiſe, or other profitable Trades, would in time forget the uſe of Arms, and be thereunto again hardly drawn; unto the great weakning of his ſtrength both by Sea and Land, and the diminiſhing of the number of his great Commanders and expert Captains, not to be had without the continual uſe of War. With theſe and ſuch like Reaſons, the great Baſſaes of the Court perſwaded Amurath, That he muſt of neceſſity take ſome new Expedition in hand, and not to ſuffer his valiant Souldiers, but now lately returned out of Perſia, to grow lazie or inſolent for lack of Imployment. Which they did not ſo much for the Love of their Prince, or Zeal unto the State, as for their own particular profit? eſpecially the two old Baſſaes Sinan and Ferat, the envious Competitors the one of the others Honour; who, although they both, much and almoſt all commanded both in Peace and War, yet was their Honours greater, and their Profit far more, in commanding of the Turks great Armies abroad, than in ſitting in the Divano at home; unto which no leſs honourable than profitable Preferment they both with like Ambition aſpired, accompanied with the hot deſires of their great and many Favorites both at home and elſewhere. Theſe Perſwaſions well pleaſed Amurath; who although he were himſelf no Souldier, yet was he deſirous of new Conqueſts, and to increaſe his Name; accounting it no leſs honour unto himſelf, by his Servants at his appointment to perform great things, than it was unto his Anceſtors to do that they did themſelves in Perſon.

The Cauſes why Amurath would not ſudenly reſolve upon War.

But in this ſo ſerious a matter, and of ſo great conſequence, Amurath at the firſt could not tell what beſt to reſolve upon; not for that he was not deſirous of Wars, but becauſe as yet he certainly knew not againſt whom he might with greateſt Profit and leaſt Difficulty and Danger convert his Forces; upon which point his Counſellors agreed not, but for divers Reaſons were of divers Opinions. Which, foraſmuch as they contain matters of greateſt importance of all things then in the World done, but eſpecially concerning the Profit of the Chriſtian Common-wealth, I ſhall not think it unworthy my Labour, to ſet them down in ſuch order as I find them credibly reported; having moreover in them many Letters and moſt weighty matters not yet come to all mens Knowledge; as alſo opening the Devices of the Turkiſh Tyrant againſt the Chriſtian Princes; a motive not only for them to joyn in Counſel together how to withſtand him, but for the common Chriſtian Commonweals ſake to forget and forgive all their private Diſpleaſures, and with their united Forces and Power honourably and courageouſly to make War upon him, and ſo at length by the Mercy of God to overthrow him, together with his tyrannical Empire, the greateſt Terror of our time.

Eight ſeveral Opinions of the Viſier Baſſaes, concerning the War to be taken in hand.

The great Baſſaes, concerning the intended War, were of eight ſundry Opinions; whereof the firſt was, That the Wars againſt the Perſian ſhould be renewed; the ſecond, For the Invaſion of the King of Morocco and Fez; the third, For War to be taken in hand againſt the King of Spain; the fourth, For the beſieging again of Malta; the fifth was, To ſet upon the Venetians; the ſixth, For the invading of ſome part of Italy; the ſeventh, For the King of Polonia; the eighth and laſt was, For War to be made upon the Emperour and the Kingdom of Hungary. With all the which aforeſaid Princes, except the Spaniard, although the Turk were then in League, and could not with all or any of them make War, without the notable breach of his Faith and Honour; yet was that never made queſtion or ſcruple of, but only, which might beſt ſtand with the Profit of his State for him to ſet upon; his barbarous Law allowing him that Liberty, for the more aſſuring of his State, or inlarging of his Empire, to break all Faith and Promiſe, eſpecially with the Chriſtians; not more in any thing to be pittied, than in repoſing any Credit or Confidence in the Faith of ſuch a miſcreant.

The firſt Opinion and Reaſons of them that would have the Wars renewed in Perſia.

The Reaſons the great Baſſaes alleged for the renewing of the Perſian War, were, For that the Perſian King was of himſelf like to break the League ſo lately with him concluded, ſo ſoon as he ſhould know the Turks entangled in any other War; moved thereunto, as well for the recovery of his Country, to his great diſhonour loſt, as alſo in Revenge of ſo many and ſo great Injuries to him of late done by the Turkiſh Emperours. Beſide that, the Chriſtian Princes would perſwade him and prick him forward thereunto; eſpecially the Spaniard, who for the nearneſs of India might without his great charge procure him ſo to do, and alſo conveniently furniſh him with great Ordnance and Canoneers, which it was well known he of late did. The Countries alſo but lately conquered, were not yet (as they ſaid) in quietneſs or ſafety, and the Fortreſſes therein but of late built, together with the Garriſons therein, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way, and difficulty of the Paſſage, not to be ſtill ſpeedily relieved; inſomuch, that if the Perſians did them no other harm, but only to forrage and waſte the Country about them, they ſhould bring the Inhabitants into ſuch diſtreſs, as that thoſe new conquered Countries were again by the Defendants to be forſaken, or elſe they muſt themſelves with hunger periſh. True Glory (they ſaid) conſiſted not ſo much in conquering, as in the uſe of the Conqueſt, and the Proſecution of the happy Victory; and that therefore Amurath ſhould take heed, that he provoked not the Wrath and Indignation of the great Prophet Mahomet againſt him; who having by his good Favour and Guide obtained more Victories than any of his Predeceſſors againſt the Enemies of his Religion, ought as a religious and devout Prince ſeverely to revenge the wrong done by them both to God and man. Unto which religious War Vsbeg Han the Tartar King, as alſo the Prince of Geilan offered their ready help; as for the event of the Victory, now as good as in his hand, he was to judge by the ſucceſs of his former Wars. Neither that he need to fear the Perſian Horſemen, although they uſed Arabian Horſes, being by his men many times ſhamefully put to flight; or yet to doubt leſt the Georgians, in favour of the Perſians, ſhould take up Arms, for that many of them were already under his Obeiſance, and ſubject unto the Baſſa of Teflis, and other his Commanders; the reſt were his Vaſſals, or elſe ſuch, as following the Fortune of their Princes Simon and Alexander, ſought after no greater matter, but contenting themſelves with their own Country, although but ſmall, thought themſelves well if they might keep and defend the ſame; by Nature and Scituation ſo ſtrong, as that there is ſcarce any way unto it, by reaſon of the high and broken Mountains, the thick Woods, and ſtreight Paſſages.

The ſecond Opinion, for making of War upon the King of Fez and Morocco, and the Reaſon thereof.

The ſecond Opinion which was delivered, was for the Tranſportation of his Wars into Affrick, againſt the King of Morocco, commonly called the Seriphe; and that for theſe Cauſes moſt, It would be a great ſhame and reproach (as they ſaid) unto the Othoman Empire, that it was not yet able to ſubdue theſe Moors and People of Affrick, in number but few; neither was it leſs ſhame or diſhonour unto the Othoman Emperours, to have ſo ſmall a Territory in Affrica, being the third part of the World, which by reaſon of the nearneſs unto Italy, had long time held Wars with the Romans. Beſide that, Algiers and Tunis could never be ſafely kept by the Turks; neither that the Subjects and Pirats which inhabited thoſe Cities would ever be contented or at quiet, untill they had again got that Kingdom into their hands. The Promontory of Aguero, and Port of Larace (two Ports without the Streights) were (as they ſaid) to be taken, as Places very commodious for the Turks Friends, ſeeking in thoſe Seas after Booty; and for the ſecuring of their Trade. And although the Seriphe were himſelf a Mahometan, and held his Kingdom as a Tributary unto the Othoman Empire; yet had he ſecret Intelligence with the Spaniard and the Knights of Malta, whereby they not long ſince had upon the ſudden almoſt ſurpriſed Tripolis, he in the mean time as it were winking thereat. And that altho' the Spaniard poſſeſſed in Affrick, Maraſchebir, Oran, Pegnon, Tanger, Arzilia, Mazaga, Ceute or Septa, Places whereby he might help and aſſiſt the Moors; yet might his Force and Attempts by a ſtrong Fleet be eaſily hindered, and Spain it ſelf infeſted. Beſide that, the Spaniards had yet in ſuch freſh remembrance the loſs of Tunis and Guletta (Places by them thought inexpugnable, and yet by Sinan Baſſa to his immortal Praiſe taken) as that they would not for the Moors ſake eaſily ſeem to attempt any great thing againſt the victorious Turks.

The third Opinion, concerning the Conqueſt of Malta.

The third Opinion was concerning the War to be made againſt them of Malta, which was by a ſtrong Fleet to be performed; for that the Gallies of Malta did daily great hurt, as well unto the Turks Merchants, as unto ſuch as for Devotion-ſake travelled by Sea unto Mecha. And that therefore the War was thither to be transferred, not only for religions ſake and to aſſecure the Paſſage thither from the Incurſions of the Malteſes, but in Revenge of the old and late Injuries by them done; and eſpecially to blot out the Infamy and Diſgrace which the great Sultan Solyman had incurred, at ſuch time as he had in vain beſieged that Iſland; and to requite the loſs by him there ſuſtained. Beſide that, they alſo alleged the common Complaints of the Subjects; for that there were many which pitiouſly lamented the Miſery and Calamity, ſome of their Friends, ſome their Kinſfolk, whom they knew to live in moſt woful Servitude with thoſe Knights, and whom they moſt earneſtly deſired to have now ſet at Liberty; complaining his Subjects to have been ſo far from ſuffering of any ſuch things from thoſe Knights in the time of his Anceſtors, as that contrariwiſe they themſelves were by them driven out of the Iſland of the Rhodes, the ſtrongeſt Bulwark of the Chriſtian Common-weal toward the Eaſt. Being moreover worthy alſo to be chaſtiſed, for that they had holpen the rebellious Moors with all kind of Munition, and had themſelves attempted to have ſurpriſed Modon.

The fourth Opinion, For War to be made againſt the King of Spain, and the Reaſons thereof.

In the fourth place were they which were of Opinion, that it were beſt for him to make War upon the King of Spain. Theſe men alleged it to be impoſſible for the Turkiſh Empire to aſpire unto the Monarchy of the whole World (whereunto all the Turks Actions and Devices were always as at a certain mark directed) except the Spaniard's great Strength and Power were firſt weakned, wherein he ſeemed to ſurpaſs all other the Chriſtian Kings and Princes; and that there was no fear leſt he ſhould beſiege Algiers, which he knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the Emperour Charles the fifth. And that although the Spaniards without ceaſing beſought their King for the undertaking of that Expedition, by reaſon of the new Loſſes and Harms which they daily received from the Pyrats of Affrica; yet would he not hearken unto their Requeſt, for fear of the Danger imminent both to himſelf and his Subjects from the Enemies Fleet, which he ſhould in ſo doing draw into the Spaniſh Seas; neither would the Spaniſh Gallies eaſily come into the Turks Countries in the Eaſt, for being too far from their own Country, which for the moſt part ſtood in need of their help. And that the King of Spain was with the Multitude of his Buſineſs, or other his urgent Affairs ſtill ſo hindred, as that he could not ſuddenly put in Execution what his Counſel for the Wars ſhould decree. As alſo how much it was to be gathered by that which hapned not long ſince at Preveza and Navarinum, That the Spaniards ſhunned the Othoman Forces; as alſo how warily the King dealt in all his Affairs, leſt at length againſt his Will he ſhould be enforced to enter into Wars with the Turk, was moſt manifeſt; as was to be ſeen when as of late about the end of the Perſian War he refuſed to give Aid unto the Perſian King whom he might have holpen, and was ſo before wont to do. And in caſe that he would ſtand upon his Guard, and by force ſeek to repel force; yet ſhould he ſcarce have ſo much Strength as (beſide thoſe Wars which he now maketh in divers Places) to be able to undertake alſo a new War, and to find ſo many Souldiers, with ſo much Coin and other things neceſſary for ſo great a War. It ſtood him in hand (as they ſaid) to defend the Low-Countries, and to recover again the Provinces there loſt, which of themſelves wonderful ſtrong, both by reaſon of the Sea and the Multitude of the Rivers, were alſo with wonderful Courage and Pertinacy defended by the Inhabitants, for their Liberty and Religions ſake. Whereunto the Engliſh (at deadly hatred with the Spaniard) might many ways give great help, if they ſhould invade Portugal, or with their Ships lie in wait for his Indian Fleet, or make Incurſions into other his Kingdoms, as they did not long ſince at the Groine and Cadez; Places moſt fit to trouble Spain, and to hinder his Traffick into the Indies or other Places. Beſide that, he was at that time ſo intangled with his Wars in France, as that he could ſcarce find how to diſpatch himſelf thereof, without the loſs of his Honour and Credit. And admit he ſhould make Peace with the aforeſaid Princes, in ſuch ſort as that he ſhould not from thenceforth from them receive any harm; yet were other means to be ſought and taken in hand for his farther diſturbance, as by troubling his rich Trade for Spices and other Merchandiſe, whereof he reapeth great Profit; as alſo if need were, by driving his Ships out of the Perſian Gulf, by the help of thoſe Gallies which ſtill lie at road at Poſſidium, which we now call Suez. And that the Fortreſſes and ſtrong holds he there poſſeſſeth, were to be ſet upon, and if it might be, taken from him; as was once attempted againſt the Portugals at Diu and Ormuz; the like whereof Alphonſus Albuquercius (the King of Portugal's Viceroy in India) attempted, when as with his light Horſemen running through that Country, he thought upon a ſudden to have ſpoiled Mecha, and to have robbed the Sepulchre of Mahomet (as had hapned under the Empire of the Sultans) and as Trajan the Emperour had long ſince in like manner attempted to rage and ſpoil. Thoſe Places which he poſſeſſed in Affrick were (as they ſaid) to be ſet upon, and the Coaſt of Spain towards the Mediterranean to be infeſted; ſo at length, to gratifie the Moors his Subjects, who ſtill inſtantly requeſted the ſame, that ſo they might more ſafely traffick and travel, and that ſo the Moors might at length be delivered from the imperious command of the Spaniards; of which exploit Sultan Selymus, lately before dead, was in his life time well perſwaded; but might now at this time be much more commodiouſly done, for that the Mooriſh Nation was now greatly increaſed, and much oppreſſed by the Spaniards; and having got great Wealth by the Trade of Merchandiſe, even by Nature or Religion, had conceived a mortal hatred againſt the Spaniards; whereunto might not a little avail the Ports in Affrick, whereinto the Turks Fleet might at all times in ſafety retire. And in brief, that which was of greateſt importance to the better ſucceſs of this War, the French King and the Queen of England, had of their own accord promiſed the Continuation of their Wars, and that the French King ſhould invade Navarre, and by force of Arms recover the right he pretended unto that Kingdom; whilſt in the mean time the Queen of England ſhould not only trouble him in the Weſt Indies, and other Places of the Ocean toward the North and Weſt, but might alſo ſtir up new Broils in the Kingdom of Portugal, where moſt part of the People with great impatience bear the proud command of the Spaniard; as perſwaded (and that truly) all their Proſperity and Quietneſs to have been loſt, together with their laſt King, their true and lawful Soveraign. For he, at Peace with the Kings of France and England, exceedingly thereby enriched his Subjects by Traffick; whereas, ſince they fell into the Hands of the Spaniard, they daily complain of their new Loſſes and Dangers by Reaſon of his perpetual Wars. Moreover, that there was to be found great ſtore of exiled Spaniards diſperſed here and there, which being malecontent and weary of the Spaniſh Government, were fled not only out of Portugal, but even out of Arragon and other parts of his Kingdom; which now living in France, England, and Conſtantinople, both ſecretly and openly, liberally offered great helps; the like whereof many of the Moors alſo promiſed. All which together ſeemed to promiſe a moſt eaſie Expedition and certain Victory, if any ſhould upon the ſudden invade Spain; for that there was almoſt no uſe of Arms, the Inhabitants at home ſeldom times exerciſing themſelves therein; neither in Places needful having any ordinary Garriſons, and but few Horſes fit for Service. And that in fine it was to be conſidered, Spain to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and courageouſly to manage Arms, for the often choice they make of them, which almoſt moſt daily tranſported into the Indies, Italy, and the Low-Countries, whereby the ſtrength of his Country muſt needs be exceedingly impaired; ſo that if they ſhould be invaded with any ſtrong and mighty Army, they might ſeem hardly able to be holpen or defended by their own People, but ſhould need the Aid and help of the other near Provinces ſubject unto this Kingdom; which if they ſhould be either letted, or ſtay to come in good time, they ſhould leave ſo much the more eaſie Victory unto their Enemies.

The fifth Opinion for the Invaſion of the Venetians, and the Reaſons why.

In the fifth place were they which went about to perſwade Amurath to break his League with the Venetians; uſing Reaſons rather probable than true, although they might ſeem unto the Turks leſs doubtful, for that men eaſily and willingly believe ſuch things as they themſelves deſire. Theſe men went about to prove no Expedition to be leſs difficult than this, as judging of things preſent, by the event of former Wars paſſed; wherein the Turks had always taken ſomething from the Venetians: who to redeem their Peace, were divers ways enforced to ſatisfie the Turks. That the Venetian Common-wealth was afraid of the Turks, and abhorred War, was manifeſt (they ſaid) in that, that in all Actions it had propounded unto it ſelf Peace, as the end thereof; and after the manner of their Anceſtors, never entred into Wars, but enforced thereunto: and would happily upon the firſt denouncing of Wars, willingly depart with certain Places, for fear of greater harm, or to be utterly overcome, as it appeared they did in the yielding up of Cyprus. The Power and Force whereof was not ſo great, as that it could alone ſtand againſt the great Sultan; and to confederate it ſelf with others, would require no ſmall delay, for the great and many Difficulties which commonly uſed to ariſe in making of Leagues; not being now ſo conjoyned with the Spaniard as in times paſt, of whoſe aid it being of late deſtitute, was conſtrained to make an hard Peace with Selymus. And if ſo be the Spaniard would needs joyn himſelf unto the Venetians againſt the Turks, yet that he could by no means afford unto them ſuch Aid and Supplies as were of neceſſity to be required unto ſo great a War, he himſelf being in his Wars otherwiſe ſo intangled; as for all other Confederation they could make without him, to be but weak and to no purpoſe. That which the Pope could do herein, to be but little; for albeit he ſhould according to his Duty exhort other Chriſtian Princes to give Aid, and to ſtir them up unto this War, yet that beſide ſome little ſupply of Money hardly drawn out of his own Coffers, and the Eccleſiaſtical Revenues, he could ſcarcely perform any thing more; or when he had done his uttermoſt devoir, could but joyn five Gallies of his own unto the Venetian Fleet; which, with the Gallies of the Duke of Savoy, of the Knights of Malta, and of the Florentines, could but make a Fleet of ſome twenty Gallies, which was but a ſmall matter. Beſides that, the Turks were perſwaded, that betwixt the Venetian State and the other Chriſtian Princes was no ſuch Friendſhip and good Agreement, as the greatneſs of the imminent Danger of that War, and as the neceſſity of the cauſe would require; and that hitherto their Treaſures had been ſo exhauſted in paying the Debt they were run into in the laſt War, and in building of Fortreſſes, that happily they were not now ſo furniſhed with Coin, as was requiſite for the defraying of ſo great a War. And unto this War againſt the Venetians, conſented almoſt all the Viſier Baſſaes; differing only in this, Where, or againſt what Place of the Venetian Territory this War were to be firſt begun; ſome naming one place, and ſome another (for divers Reaſons them thereunto leading) which for brevity we paſs over.

The ſixth Opinion, for the attempting of Italy, and the Reaſons thereof.

Otherſome of the Baſſaes in the ſixth place, rejecting all the former Opinions concerning the War to be taken in hand, would have had all the Forces of the Othoman Empire, as well by Land as Sea, to have been converted againſt Italy; for that otherwiſe the Turks ſhould never come unto the Monarchy of the whole World (whereunto as at a mark they had directed all their Actions) except they did firſt ſubdue Italy. For that this Country, as the Center of the whole World, was wont to give both Counſel and Aid unto the reſt of the Limbs, whereby the Devices of others were croſſed; and that the Romans had at length commanded over all the World, eſpecially for that they held in Poſſeſſion this Country. Hereat did the Hunnes, the Alani and Gothes, the Vandales, the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Saraſins, direct all their Thoughts and Cogitations. In fine, they concluded, That no Expedition could be taken in hand more honourable or profitable than this; for that Italy was a Queen amongſt other Provinces, for commodious Scituation, the wholeſomneſs of the Air, the plenty of all things neceſſary for Mans Life, for great, fair, and moſt rich Cities, for the antient Glory and Majeſty of the Roman Empire, and many other Cauſes alſo. Neither that this Expedition was to be deemed of much Difficulty, for that Italy was under the Rule of divers Princes, unto whoſe command moſt of their Subjects unwillingly obeyed; as alſo, for that the Inhabitants of that Country had now for many years lived in continual Peace, and were therefore the more effeminate and fearful, and ſo unfit for the Wars; and that if that Expedition were in one or divers places taken in hand before the Corn were full ripe, the Turks in that ſo fruitful a Country could never want Neceſſaries for them to live upon; whereas the Inhabitants in great number wanting the ſame, and ſhut up within the Walls and Fortifications of their Cities and ſtrong Towns, ſhould be brought into extream wants; which was the more evidently to be ſeen, for that at this time wherein they were at Peace, they had not Corn ſufficient in the Country for ſuch a multitude of People to live upon, but were glad to have it brought unto them from other Places, eſpecially from Peloponeſus, Conſtantinople, and the Cities upon the Coaſt of the great Ocean. Furthermore, that it was to be conſidered, that moſt part of the Italians lived by no other means than by their handy Labour, or the trade of Merchandiſe; of which means if they were deprived, they ſhould in ſhort time be brought to that point, as to be glad to accept of ſuch Conditions as the Victor ſhould propound unto them, or as Tributaries, to ſubmit themſelves unto the Othoman Government. Neither that the Souldiers would unwillingly be drawn unto that War; for that they were not to paſs through barren Regions of the Enemy, frozen with Ice, or deſolate, either by rough Woods or inacceſſible Mountains; but were all the way thither to travel through their own Country, and as it were in the ſight of their own Houſes; and if the Turks could oftentimes enter ſo far, when as they had their Confines more remote, and their Paſſages more difficult, that the ſame might now much more eaſily be effected, when as they had a far greater Opportunity, and their Enemies ſo near at hand.

The ſeventh Opinion for War to be made againſt the Polonian, and the Reaſons thereof.

The ſeventh Opinion was theirs which thought it beſt to have the War transferred into Polonia, and from thence into Hungary and Germany; for which they alleged theſe Reaſons: Firſt, for that they thought it a diſgrace unto the Majeſty and Reputation of the Othoman Empire, That the King of Polonia had ſometime refuſed to pay his Tribute due (for ſo the Turks account of all ſuch Preſents as are unto their Sultan uſually ſent by their Neighbour Princes, of Courteſie) and that therefore he was by force of Arms to be compelled thereunto.

Which they thought would the more eaſily be obtained, for that there was much ſecret hatred and heart-burning amongſt the Polonian Nobility. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous War to be taken in hand; foraſmuch as Polonia was confined with Moldavia, the Tartars, and the Sanzacks of Acherman, Bendera, and Voſia; and moreover, for that the Turks could never have any aſſured or full Poſſeſſion of Moldavia or Valachia, except the Inſolency of the Polonians were repreſſed; the Vayvods of which Countries, when they had enriched themſelves with much Wealth, uſed ſtill to flie into the Kingdom of Polonia. Beſides that, they ſhould thereby revenge themſelves for the Injuries done them by the Coſſacks, and have more free and ſafe Traffick into Muſcovia, and bring a Terrour upon the Duke of Muſcovia, by reaſon of the nearneſs of the Country; which great Duke was an Impediment unto the Othoman Emperour, that he conquered not the whole Kingdom of Perſia. And when they had by this means by little and little drawn unto Germany, happily it might ſo come to paſs, as that the Chriſtian Emperour ſhould thereby receive ſome notable loſs, his Empire being ſtill more and more expoſed and environed with the Turks Forces and Garriſons. Polonia they ſaid to be a plain and open Country, neither to have any ſtrong Places for to withſtand them, and the Inhabitants to have ſmall skill in Martial Affairs, for that they had now long lived in Peace. For as for the War that they had with Maximilian the Arch-duke of Auſtria, it continued not long, and King Stephen in the late Wars he had with the Muſcovite, uſed for moſt part the Hungarian Souldiers, and ended thoſe Wars rather by beſieging than fighting.

The eighth Opinion, for War to be made againſt the Emperour, and the Reaſons thereof.

They which in the eighth and laſt place delivered their Opinions concerning the intended War, perſwaded to have it converted upon the Chriſtian Emperour; whom the Turks call the King of Vienna. The Cauſes they alleged for the beginning of this War was, For that the Uſcocchi were grown ſo inſolent as to make good priſe of the Turks both by Sea and Land; in ſuch ſort, as that not only for the harms which they did, but even for the Majeſty and Honour of the Othoman Empire, their Inſolency was not longer to be ſuffered. By whoſe Injuries it was eſpecially brought to paſs, that the Merchants, to their great hinderance in private, and the Sultans great loſs in common, having left the Town of Narenta or Narona in the Turks Dominion, had removed their Mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a Town of the Venetians; and that yet for all that was not ſo ſufficiently provided for the Security of the ſaid Merchants, although there were Peace betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians; for that theſe unruly men for moſt part living upon the ſpoil, troubled all both by Sea and Land with their Robberies, driving away mens Cattel, burning the Villages, and taking away the young Babes out of the Mothers Arms and Laps. Whereby it was eaſily to be ſeen what mind they were of; and that it was not to be doubted, but that if Occaſion ſhould ſerve for them to ſurpriſe any of the Turks ſtrong holds upon the Frontiers, they would with all their Power attempt the ſame; which, what a Diſhonour and Infamy (not to ſpeak of the loſs) it would be unto the whole Othoman Empire, every man might eaſily gueſs. Neither that it was unknown, how little the Chriſtian Emperour had eſteemed of the Turk, at ſuch time as he was in War with the Perſian, paying his Tribute too late at his Pleaſure; an evident ſign rather of violating than of eſtabliſhing the League. And that the good Succeſs of this War was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtful; for that the attempt might be given both by Croatia, Hungary, and Auſtria, Countries abounding with all things neceſſary for the maintenance of a great Army; as alſo for that they were almoſt to travel all the way in the Turks own Territory. Beſide that, the chief Fortreſſes of Hungary, namely Belgrade, Buda, and Alba Regalis, with many other ſtrong places, were already holden by the Turks Garriſons, whither their Armies might in all caſes of Extremity in ſafety retire, or out of the ſame Garriſons repair their Loſſes, if any ſhould be. The Roman Empire (as they ſaid) was more deſirous of Peace than War; and the Princes, of nothing more careful, than how to heap up and preſerve their Treaſures; and the People of Germany, for that of long they had had no Wars, to be leſs fit now to bear Arms, and worſe to be commanded by their Captains; always having in diſtruſt the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that thoſe Nations are not beloved, but rather hated of the Germans, being not at Unity among themſelves, but divided, eſpecially about matters of Religion. Neither that it was to be feared, leſt foreign Princes ſhould give Aid unto the Emperour in this War; The Polonian and Tranſilvanian, to live now in peace with the Turk, and therefore would by no means turn the heat of this War into their own Boſoms; as alſo, for that the Polonians were afraid, leſt in ſo doing, they ſhould be driven out of their Country, and enforced to remove themſelves toward the frozen Sea; and the Tranſilvanian, having received his Sovereignty from the Turk, no leſs in fear (if he ſhould ſo do) to be of him again ſtript and ſpoiled of the ſame; as for the King of Spain, although he were of ſuch Power, as might afford unto the Houſe of Auſtria great Aid, yet that he was in other Places now too much buſied: and that the Biſhop of Rome could not in all Places be ready to ſerve his turn; the Princes of Italy would not ſpend their Subjects and Treaſures to pleaſure another man; and that the Venetian State would not raſhly ſtir up the Turks Arms againſt themſelves, but rather at eaſe expect the event of the War, than to entangle themſelves with other mens Dangers. Theſe were the chief Opinions of the great Baſſaes concerning the War to be taken in hand, not ſo much proceeding from any ripe or ſound Advice, (as commonly they do) but rather from a certain barbarous Inſolency and Contempt of others; wherewith, they moved, do oftentimes vainly perſwade them of the eaſie performance of divers Expeditions; which in proof they find to be not only moſt difficult, but unto themſelves alſo moſt pernicious.

Amurath reſolveth to make War upon the Emperour, with the Reaſons moving him thereunto.

In this ſo great diverſity of Opinions, Amurath ſtood long in doubt what to reſolve upon; deſirous he was in all places to ſhew his Power, and (if it were poſſible) to exceed the Glory of his Predeceſſors, as he thought himſelf to have already done in Perſia; having, as he boaſted, by his Servants there performed more than they could themſelves in Perſon with their mighty Armies. Wherefore, contenting himſelf with that he had already done in the Eaſt, he reſolved now to turn his Forces againſt the Chriſtian Emperour towards the Weſt, and that for divers reſpects. Firſt, it grieved him to ſee the Honour of the Houſe of Auſtria, and that it durſt to make head againſt him; beſides that, to make War upon a Country confining upon his own, would be a thing of far leſs Difficulty than was the Perſian War, where his Armies were now ſtill to be led through his own peaceable Countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieved with Victuals and whatſoever elſe they needed. In which Opinion he was alſo confirmed by Sinan Baſſa, who having in vain perſwaded him to have made War againſt the Venetians, furthered now this War; in hope 1590 thereby to recover his Credit and Reputation (before greatly impaired abroad by the little he did in Perſia, as alſo at Conſtantinople, by the diſcord betwixt him and Ferat Baſſa, commonly called the Black Serpent) as alſo to increaſe his Wealth and Riches; which ſhortly after ſorted to his deſire, being by the great Sultan Amurath appointed General for thoſe Wars. But above all others, Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna furthered this matter, in hope thereby to have gained great Riches, (as the Turks manner is) together with the greateſt Honours of the Field, as he was moſt vainly perſwaded by his cold Prophets, to whom he gave no ſmall credit. He therefore daily certified Amurath of the harms which the Vſcocchi and other the Arch-duke's Servants and Subjects did upon the Frontiers of his Territories; telling him of their Burnings, Spoilings and Robbings, inciting him to begin his War in Croatia, and ſo to continue the ſame either againſt the Emperour, or the Venetians, or elſe upon the ſudden that way to break into Italy, as had ſometime the like been done in the time of Mahomet, Bajazet, and Solyman, his noble Progenitors; whereby to bring a great Terrour upon all the Princes of Italy, and to enrich his Souldiers with rich Spoils. By which his importunity he (as a moſt mortal Enemy not onely unto the Houſe of Auſtria, but unto all Chriſtendom) got leave to begin thoſe ſtirs in the Frontiers of the Empire, which were firſt fatal unto himſelf, and have ever ſince even until this day notably exerciſed the Arms of theſe two laſt Othoman Emperours Amurath and Mahomet; as alſo the Chriſtian Emperour, with others his Friends and Confederates. Yet unto this leave granted unto the Baſſa, was this Condition at the firſt annexed, That he ſhould not ſeem to do it by the Commandment of Amurath, but of himſelf, under colour to reſtrain the Vſocchi; who, as well by Land as by Sea (as he pretended) ſpoiled both the Chriſtians and Turks, by the great liberty of the Princes of Auſtria, having ſmall care to chaſten them.

Now was it no great matter for Haſſan Baſſa to do what Amurath his great Lord and Maſter had commanded, for the diſturbing of the Peace betwixt him and the Chriſtian Emperour; the Turks Leagues with their neighbour Princes being ſeldom ſo religiouſly kept, but that as well their Souldiers in Garriſon upon their Frontiers by Land, as their Adventurers by Sea, might, to keep themſelves doing, upon a Military Inſolency (as the Turks term it) now and then at their pleaſures make incurſions for booty both by Sea and Land: which, anſwered with the like from their Neighbours ſo moleſted, there never wanted new Grievances, and juſt cauſes of Complaint, to the ſtirring up of greater troubles, even amongſt the greateſt Princes. 1591 The Venetians thus wronged at Sea, and their Merchants robbed; by their Ambaſſadors complained at Conſtantinople of the Injuries done them by the Turks Pirats, requiring to have them called home and Juſtice done upon them. In like manner the Emperour alſo, ſeeing many things both this year and the next attempted by Haſſan Baſſa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungary, contrary to the League, to the great diſturbance of his Subjects in both thoſe Countries, by his Ambaſſador then lying at Conſtantinople complained of theſe Outrages, deſiring to know whether they were done by the conſent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, then to require that order might be taken for the reſtraining thereof; which was accordingly done, and thoſe Incurſions for a while ſtayed, and the former Peace continued. Amurath ſtill making ſhew as if he were willing that the League agreed upon for eight years, ſhould not be in any wiſe on his part infringed. At which time the Perſian King's Son (the League not long before concluded) died in the Turks Court, where he lay in Hoſtage; whoſe dead body Amurath cauſed to be honourably ſent home to his Father into Perſia, with an Apology in defence of himſelf, againſt the ſuſpicion conceived by ſome, That he ſhould have been the cauſe of the untimely death of that young Prince; ſtill urging withal the confirmation of the League, which by the death of the Prince was like enough to have been broken. Whereof Amurath was the more deſirous, for that perſwaded by his Baſſa's (as is aforeſaid) to make Wars with the Emperour (although he notably diſſembled the ſame) he was in hope thereby to add unto his Empire the reliques of Hungary, with ſome good part of the Territory of the Houſe of Auſtria alſo, and ſo to open himſelf a way into the heart of Germany. For which purpoſes he now cauſed very great preparation to be made, and a ſtrong Army to be raiſed; and at the ſame time put a great Fleet of Gallies into the Archipelago, for the ſafety of his Iſlands in that Sea.

1591 The Perſian Hoſtage dieth in the Turks Court.

1592 According to theſe Deſignments, the Baſſa of Boſna, by the Commandment of Amurath, with an Army of fifty thouſand entred into Croatia, and without reſiſtance, burnt and deſtroyed the Country before him, ſparing nothing that came in his way. And not ſo contented, laid ſiege to the City of Wihitz, being the metropolitical City of that Country, ſtrongly ſcituate as it were in an Iſland, compaſſed about with the River Una. Which City, after he had ſore battered and twice aſſaulted, was by the diſtreſſed Defendants (now deſpairing of relief, and unable longer to hold it out) yielded unto the Baſſa upon Compoſition, That the German Souldiers there in Garriſon, might in ſafety with bag and baggage depart; and that ſuch of the Chriſtian Citizens as would, might there ſtill remain without hurt from the Turks, either in Body or Goods. Which Conditions the Baſſa faithfully performed to the Garriſon Souldiers, whom, in number but four hundred, he ſent with ſafe convoy into their own Territory: but afterwards, contrary to his faith and promiſe, exerciſed all manner of Turkiſh Tyranny upon the poor Citizens. The Emperour, troubled with this unexpected Invaſion of the Turks, ſent the Lord Petzen (whom he had many times imployed in Embaſſages to the Turk) to pray Aid of the German Princes againſt the common Enemy. Who, according to the greatneſs of the danger, in large terms promiſed their help. The firſt that made head was Erneſtus, Arch-duke of Auſtria, the Emperour's Brother, who with five thouſand Souldiers came from Vienna to Savaria, commonly called Greis, the Metropolis of Stiria; to whom repaired daily more ſtrength out of Carinthia.

Wihitz the Metropolitical City of Croatia yielded to the Turk.

In the mean time, the Turks Army daily increaſing in Croatia, incloſed ſix thouſand Foot-men and five hundred Horſe-men of the Chriſtians, who had taken the Mountains, Woods, and ſtreight Paſſages, and ſo hardly beſet them, that of all that number few eſcaped with life: amongſt whom many valiant Souldiers and expert Captains were ſlain; namely James Prants, George Pleſbach, and John Welverdurff. The Baſſa, after the barbarous manner of the Turks, to make his Victory ſeem more famous, laded ſix Waggons with the Heads of the ſlain Chriſtians. The Turks thus raging in Croatia, brought a general fear upon all Hungary, Bavaria, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Sileſia, and the reſt of the Provinces thereabouts. Whereupon the Emperour, calling together the States of Sileſia and Moldavia, declared unto them the imminent danger; perſwading them to joyn their Forces with the reſt, for the repulſing of ſo dangerous an Enemy, and ſo imminent a Danger.

The Chriſtians overthrown.

After long delay, Erneſtus the Arch-duke, the tenth of Auguſt came to the Emperour his Brother, with the Ambaſſadors of Hungary; and the ſeventh day after were called together the Embaſſadors of the Kingdoms and Provinces of the Empire; where it was throughly debated, how the Turks were to be reſiſted, and their attempts infringed; as alſo from whence Forces, Money, and other Warlike proviſion was to be raiſed. For now it was manifeſtly ſeen, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous, and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg or great Commander of Grecia, with threeſcore thouſand ſelect Souldiers both Horſe and Foot, of long time exerciſed in the Perſian War, was e're long expected; who, joyning with the reſt of the Turks Army, might do great matters both in Hungary and the Places adjoyning. For preventing of which ſo great and manifeſt dangers, they ſate daily in Counſel in Prague, yea oftentimes even from morning untill night; for the Hungarians, and eſpecially the Lord Nadaſti, a moſt noble and valiant Gentleman amongſt them, inſtantly urged to have Succours ſent into Hungary; foraſmuch as the Turkiſh Emperour, if he ſhould get into his hands the reſt of the Towns and Caſtles yet holden by the Chriſtians in Hungary, it was to be feared leſt he ſhould in ſhort time after endanger the whole ſtate of Germany: the ſtrength whereof the Turk feared not ſo much, as he did thoſe poor reliques of Hungary. Others were no leſs careful of the dangers of Croatia and Stiria, as more proper to themſelves, the Enemy now there raging. In theſe ſo great dangers, the Hungarians, with the reſt of the diſtreſſed, cried upon the Emperour for help; and he likewiſe called upon the Princes of the Empire. Divers Aſſemblies were made in Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, Sileſia, and the other Provinces of the Emperours, and Embaſſadors ſent from almoſt all the German Princes to the Emperour: all was full of Conſultation, but as for help that came in very ſlowly; yet ſuch as was to be had, was forthwith ſent into Croatia, to defend the Fortreſſes there againſt the further attempts and proceedings of the furious Enemy.

Certain vain attempts of the Turks.

The eighteenth of September, the Turks, with all warlike Proviſion upon the ſudden by Night aſſaulted the ſtrong Caſtle of Toccay in the upper Hungary, in hope to have ſurpriſed it; but finding it a matter of more Difficulty than they had before imagined, they departed thence, and attempted the leſſer Comara, which, ſtanding in a mariſh Ground, was alſo eaſily defended. At which time alſo the Baſſa of Buda with his Power entred into the Frontiers of the Chriſtians, but having well viewed the Cities, Towns, Caſtles, and Forts upon thoſe Borders, and finding nothing for his purpoſe, he without any thing doing returned again to Buda.

Turopolis ſpoiled by the Turks.

The ſix and twentieth day of September, Haſſan, the Baſſa of Boſna, incamped with his Army betwixt the Rivers of Kulp and Sauus, and in the Darkneſs of the Night paſſing over part of his Army into Turopolis, with Fire and Sword moſt miſerably ſpoiled all that pleaſant and fertile Iſland; the Lord of Bonny, to whom the keeping thereof was committed, labouring in vain to defend the ſame.

About the end of this Month, the Baſſa of Ziget, with the Sanzacks of Mohas, Koppan, and Quinque Eccleſiæ, and other Turks of great name, came with a ſtrong Army, and encamped between Ziget and Rodeſto. And ſhortly after News was brought to the Emperours Court, that Kanyſia, a City of Stiria (not far from the River Zala) was hardly beſieged by the Enemy, and that the Turks in coming thither had taken many Chriſtian Captives, whom they had ſent to be ſold at Conſtantinople; and that there was in the Turks Army about an hundred and ſixty thouſand men. But foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Army daily increaſed alſo, and was now grown to the number of threeſcore thouſand men, began to hope well that the Enemies Rage would be ſtayed from any further proceeding. About the ſame time, Erneſtus, the Arch-duke, appointed General of the Army, with the Marqueſs (Son to Ferdinand the Arch-duke) his Lieutenant, came both unto the Army.

In theſe Preparations, about the beginning of October, heavy News was brought unto the Emperours Court, how that 7000 men, whom he but a little before had ſent into Croatia under the Conduct of Thomas Artelius Beane, George Gleichſpacher, and Dionyſius Denke, to hinder the Courſe of the Turks Proceedings, being incamped betwixt Wibitz and Carolſtat, and having the twelfth of September diſcovered from an high Hill certain Companies of the Turks, (which were indeed of purpoſe come thither to view the Army of the Chriſtians) ſent out fifty Horſemen to diſcover the Turks Army where it lay, and what it attempted. Who, finding no more of the Turks than thoſe whom they had before ſeen from the Mountain, returned again unto the Army with ſuch ſimple Intelligence: whereunto the Chriſtians giving Credit, became ſecure in their Tents, as Men out of Fear of the Enemy, and ſo kept but negligent Watch. But in this ſo great Security, the Enemy on a ſudden came upon them, and with an hundred thouſand men brake into their Trenches; where the Chriſtian Foot-men for all that, for the ſpace of four hours maintained a notable fight, wherein many were on both ſides ſlain. But the poor Chriſtians being beſet round, and oppreſſed with the Multitude of their Enemies, were ſlain almoſt all; yet the Captains ſeeing the Danger, by ſpeedy flight ſaved their Lives; for which their Cowardiſe and careleſs Negligence, they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almoſt all the common Souldiers were there ſlain; yea ſuch as fell alive into the hand of the Enemy, were moſt cruelly cut in pieces. The ſpoil alſo of the Tents of the Chriſtians fell unto the Enemy; wherein, beſide the abundance of other things, they found ſixty thouſand Dollars, brought but two days before from Lintz for the Souldiers pay. The Turks, after their barbarous manner, in Oſtentation of their Victory, laded fourteen Waggons with the Heads of the ſlain Chriſtians, which they ſent unto divers places thereabouts. This was indeed a great Victory, but gained by the Turks with much Blood; for the Chriſtians, fighting as men deſperate, ſlew of their Enemies about twelve thouſand, and died themſelves as men rather with number oppreſſed, than with true Valour vanquiſhed.

The Caſtle of St. George ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The Night following, the Turks upon the ſudden in the dead time of the Night ſurpriſed the Caſtle of St. George, and without reſpect of Age or Sex, cruelly put to the Sword all them that were therein, except an hundred and fifty Perſons, whom they carried away Captives; and ſo ſetting the Caſtle on fire, departed. At the ſame time divers Companies of the Turks were ſeen about Siſeg, who led away with them about ſix hundred Chriſtians into moſt miſerable Captivity. And that nothing might be wanting unto the Calamities of this ſo miſerable a waſted Country, three hundred Waggons charged with all manner of Proviſion, ſent out of the Provinces thereby for the Relief of the Garriſon Souldiers in Croatia, were all intercepted by the Turks, and ſo carried away.

The Emperour prayeth Aid again of the German Princes.

The Emperour, conſidering theſe Proceedings of the Turks, and that their Strength daily increaſed, gave notice by Writing, to all the Princes and States of the Empire, what Incurſions the Turks had of late made into Croatia and the Frontiers of Hungary, with other Places near unto them; and that the Beglerbeg of Gracia, with the Baſſaes of Boſna, Buda, and Temeſwar, without regard of the League yet in Force, had taken divers Cities, Towns, Caſtles, and ſtrong Places, and ſo extended the bounds of their Dominion above forty German Miles, having ſlain or carried away into Captivity the poor Inhabitants of thoſe Countries; and now to be grown to that height of Pride, that except their farther Proceedings were with like Forces repreſſed, they would in ſhort time ſet Foot into Germany it ſelf, and poſſeſſing themſelves of Stiria and Carinthia, would from thence daily more and more incroach upon the Empire; which to hinder, was not in his Power only, but required their help in general. Wherefore he requeſted them now at length, in ſo publick a Danger to open their Coffers, and to ſend out their Forces againſt the common Enemy. Which Requeſt of the Emperour, with the due Conſideration of ſo great a Danger, moved not only the Princes and States of the Empire, but others alſo farther off, to yield liberal Contribution unto ſo neceſſary and general a Cauſe.

The Turks now hearing of the great Preparation of the Chriſtian Princes, beſide the Army which was already in the Field, and that they had made a ſtrong Bridg over the River of Dravus, which they had alſo fortified, thereby in ſafety at their Pleaſure to tranſport their Army; without further delay furniſhed ſuch Places as they had gotten with ſtrong Garriſons, and ſo withdrew themſelves into their own Territory; which they did the rather, for that the Plague then raged ſore in Conſtantinople, inſomuch that there died a thouſand a day. Which Contagion had alſo taken hold of the Turkiſh Army; ſo that the Chriſtians for fear of Infection, forthwith ſlew what Turk ſoever fell into their hands. And thus ended the Troubles of this year, being as it were an Introduction for greater to enſue the year following.

Divers Incurſions of the Turks into the Frontiers of the Chriſtians in Croatia and Hungary.

The Turks, together with the beginning of the new year, began alſo their wonted Incurſions into the Frontiers of the Chriſtians. They of the Garriſon of Petrinia, (a ſtrong Fort, but lately, and contrary to the League, built by the Turks upon the River of Colapis or Kulp, for the further Invaſion of Croatia) made daily. Incurſions out of that new Fort, and entring into the Iſland Turopolis, ſpoiled and burnt the Town and Baſtle of Beck-Vochobinam, and having made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them 400 Priſoners. And in Hungary the Turkiſh Garriſons, to ſupply their Wants, made divers Inrodes upon the Chriſtians, and did exceeding much harm; of which Adventurers, ſix hundred in paſſing over the frozen Lake, were all drowned in the midſt thereof. In another place, three thouſand of them near unto Nuhuſe, divided themſelves into two Companies; whereof the one ſhewed it ſelf in the ſight of the Towns-men, the other ſtill lying in ambuſh. They of the Town, upon the ſight of theſe Turks, ſallied out, and cauſing them to retire, followed them ſo far, that they were paſt the Place where the reſt of the Turks lay; who preſently ſtarting up, ran with all ſpeed toward the Town, in hope to have ſurpriſed it, and wanted not much of that they deſired; for there was ſcarce an hundred of the Germans there in Garriſon left in the Town, who had ſcarce ſo much time as to draw up the Bridges; which done, they with the great Ordnance from the Walls, enforced the Turks to retire and forſake the Town. About the ſame time alſo, the Turks in Garriſon at Petrinia, ſallying out upon the ſudden, took the Town of Martenize, which they ſpoiled; and having ſlain and taken about ſeven hundred Perſons, ſet fire on the Town, and ſo returned, having loſt in this Exploit not paſt an hundred and fifty of their own Men. Not long after, the ſame Garriſon Souldiers of Petrinia took another Caſtle three miles diſtant from the River of Kulp, whereinto the Chriſtians dwelling round about had for fear of the Enemy conveyed all their Wealth, with great ſtore of Victuals; all which the Turks took, and having ſlain ſix hundred men in the Caſtle, returned with an exceeding rich booty to Petrinia; which they bought with the Lives of five hundred of their Fellows, ſlain in taking of the Caſtle. With like Inſolency did alſo the other Garriſons of the Turks rage in all the other parts of Hungary. About Saſſovia in the upper Hungary, they carried away about three hundred Chriſtian Captives. And in the nether part of Hungary, they took the ſtrong Caſtle of S. Hedwig, upon the Lake of Balaton, which they ſpoiled and burnt; and ſo likewiſe the Caſtle of Iſna: but attempting the leſſer Comara, they were by the Garriſon Souldiers valiantly repulſed. They alſo fortified the Caſtle of Stock, which they had but a little before taken, that ſo it might ſerve for a ſafe Refuge for their Adventurers. Which their manifold Outrages, contrary to the League, evidently declared the deſire they had to begin that bloody War which preſently after enſued; and was indeed the more ſuſpected, for that at the ſame time the Emperours Ambaſſador, Frederick Corcowitts, was by the Commandment of Amurath ſhut up cloſe in his Houſe at Conſtantinople, and not ſuffered to ſpeak with any man, neither to write or to ſend any Meſſenger to the Emperour; which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect ſome great matter to be by the Turk intended, and therefore began to raiſe new Forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians alſo ſeeing their Towns and Caſtles thus taken, their Provinces ſpoiled, infinite number of People led away into Captivity, and the Enemy daily increaſing in ſtrength; at length agreed upon their own Charges to maintain a certain number both of horſe and foot, for the repreſſing of theſe the Turkiſh Incurſions.

Now although the Emperour knew right well all theſe Outrages of the Turks, contrary unto the League, could not be done without the knowledge and good-liking alſo of Amurath (as before informed thereof by his Ambaſſador from Conſtantinople) yet, to ſhew himſelf willing to have the League on his behalf kept, as alſo to make a further proof of Amurath his Reſolution for Peace or War, he wrote unto him as followeth:

Rodolph the Second, Emperour of the Romans, unto Amurath the Third, King of the Turks,

The Emperours Letters unto Amurath.

‘WHereas nothing is hitherto on our behalf omitted for the preſervation and continuance of the League and Amity betwixt your moſt Excellent Majeſty and Us, by the renewed Capitulations of Peace; and that we have with all ſincerity and love performed, and are hereafter ready to perform whatſoever is on our part to be performed and done; and as we have hitherto, ſo for ever hereafter alſo make offer of the ſame; we moſt aſſuredly promiſe unto our ſelves on your Majeſties behalf, that you in like manner will not ſuffer any thing on your part to be wanting; but gladly and willingly to do all things which ſhall be meet and needful for the preſervation and keeping of this our mutual love and friendſhip. Upon which good hope grounding our ſelves, to declare our plain meaning and ſincerity indeed, we will cauſe our honourable Preſent (which is now ready) to be brought unto ‘your moſt Royal Majeſty, at ſuch time as ſhall be agreed upon betwixt our Ambaſſador and you; unto whom in all ſuch matters as he by our Commandment ſhall have to deal with your moſt Excellent Majeſty, your Viſiers, or Servants, we requeſt you to give full Credence. In the mean time, your Excellency ſhall do well to provide, that as we have now ſeverely commanded our Subjects to keep the Peace upon our Frontiers, ſo that your Souldiers alſo make no Incurſions as Enemies into our Territories, nor do in them any harm, but to endeavour themſelves alſo to Peace and Quietneſs; and eſpecially, that all ſuch things, as contrary to the Capitulations of the League have been there of late taken from our People, or otherwiſe unjuſtly poſſeſſed, may be again reſtored, the Loſſes recompenced, the new Fort of Petrinia demoliſhed, and the Baſſa of Boſna and others, the Authours of breaking of the League, puniſhed and diſplaced; whereby we ſhall gather your Royal Majeſties moſt noble and kind affection towards Us and our State, which, as it ſhall be a thing moſt juſt, ſo ſhall it be a ſingular Confirmation of our League. But concerning theſe Matters, and others to the ſame belonging, our Ambaſſador is to declare our Mind more at large, that ſo our preſt deſire for the continuance of our League and Friendſhip with your Majeſty, may more plainly be known. So wiſh we all Health and Proſperity unto your moſt Royal Majeſty. From Prague the eighth of March, 1593.

The Emperour alſo, at the ſame time, and to the ſame purpoſe, writ to Sinan Baſſa in this ſort:

Rodolph the Second, Emperour of the Romans, to Sinan Baſſa, the Chief Viſier, greeting:

The Emperours Letters to Sinan Baſſa.

‘WE write at this preſent unto your moſt Excellent Emperour, our moſt honoured Friend and Neighbour, concerning ſuch matters as we thought fit for the Preſervation of the Peace and League betwixt us, leſt haply otherwiſe we might ſeem to have forgotten our Duty. Now it ſhall well-beſeem your uprightneſs and good will, which we have at other times proved, for the high Place and Authority which you hold (and which we rejoyce to be again reſtored unto you) to give unto theſe things ſuch eaſie paſſage before his Majeſty, as that we may acknowledge your kindneſs and favour, and have occaſion therefore to ſhew our ſelves unto you thankful. Firſt, we offer our ſelves moſt ready to continue the Peace, and to perform whatſoever is according to the conventions of the renewed Peace on our part to be performed; as alſo to ſend the honourable Preſent (which is not as yet by us ſent) when as our Ambaſſador ſhall have with you appointed any certain time wherein it may be ſent. And we alſo aſſuredly hope ſo to prevail with your Emperour, that on your part the Places within our Territories, by your People forcibly poſſeſſed, together with all ſuch things as have been wrongfully taken away, may be again reſtored, and the Fort of Petrinia razed. The Baſſa of Boſna alſo (who we think would have been kept within the compaſs of Duty, if you had at that time held the Place of the chief Viſier) and whoſoever elſe, guilty of the wicked breach of the League, to be worthily according to their deſerts puniſhed and diſplaced, and your Souldiers ſeverely charged not to make any farther Incurſions, nor to do any thing that may tend to the breach of the League; as we likewiſe ſhall with new and ſtrait Commands moſt carefully reſtrain our Garriſon Souldiers upon our Frontiers, from all ſuch Incurſions and Enemies Actions. But of theſe things our Ambaſſador is more fully and at large to entreat with you; unto whoſe Speech we deſire ſuch Credence to be given as unto our own; and we will ſo provide, that you ſhall have good proof of our great good will towards you. From Prague the eighth of March, 1593.

Unto which the Emperours Letters, Sinan returned anſwer as followeth:

Sinan Baſſa, Chief Viſier to Amurath the Third, Emperour of the Turks; unto Rodolph the Second, Emperour of the Romans, greeting.

Sinan Baſſa his Letters to the Emperour.

‘BY theſe we give your Majeſty to underſtand, That two of your Majeſties Letters were brought hither before we were choſen and confirmed Chief Viſier in this moſt Royal Court; wherein your Majeſty excuſes your ſelf, and ſhews the cauſes why the ſending of the wonted Preſents hath been ſo long deferred, by laying the fault upon the Inſolency of our Garriſon Souldiers in Boſna, and the breach of the publick Peace; Which your Letters being by us read before our moſt mighty Emperour, his Highneſs in great choler burſt out into theſe words, And thy Son, the Beglerbeg of Buda, hath ſtill hitherto writ, and given us to underſtand, that the uſual Preſents would certainly come, and that the King of Vienna would not in any caſe conſent unto the breach of the League, or of the Amity betwixt us and him; and yet for all that, the Preſents are not hitherto come; wherefore thy Sons Writings and Relations are not true. But now the Baſſa of Boſna hath ſent word unto the Court, That your Majeſty will not ſend them, and all your doings to be but meer deceit and fraud. For which cauſe our moſt Mighty Emperour hath removed my Son from his Place in Buda, and rewarded the Baſſa of Boſna with honourable Garments, whereas my Son is for your Majeſties ſake diſplaced. Now on our behalf nothing is done againſt the Peace, but our Souldiers as with a Bridle kept in; whereas on your Majeſties part excurſions and harms into the Territories of our Emperour never ceaſe, eſpecially into Boſna, whereinto your Souldiers have of late in warlike manner broken, although they were by our Garriſons over-come, their great Ordnance taken, and brought hither unto the Court. Wherefore, ſeeing the caſe ſo ſtandeth, your Majeſty is to reſolve us upon two points; whereof the firſt is, Whether you be minded to keep friendſhip with us as beſeemeth; and to ſend hither the two laſt years Preſents, or not? And the ſecond, Whether you will ſet at liberty our Captive Sanzacks, or no? Now if your Majeſty ſhall be content to keep the League, and within theſe two Months next, to ſend the two years Preſents, as alſo to diſmiſs our Sanzacks; the League ſhall on our part be likewiſe undoubtedly kept, your Territories ſhall be in no caſe moleſted, ſuch Chriſtian Captives as your Majeſty ſhall require, be inlarged, and a moſt firm and ſure Friendſhip by us continued. Whereas if you ſhall upon any cauſe or excuſe longer delay the ſending of thoſe honourable Preſents, and unto theſe our Demands ſend us nothing but certain vain and windy Anſwers; let God on High be therefore for ever praiſed: for now our moſt Mighty and Victorious Emperour, who wanteth neither Ability nor Power, hath Commanded, That we our ſelf ſhould in Perſon go in this War; and putting our Confidence in the Higheſt, with the Army of the right-believing Turks to come into thoſe Parts.

‘And therefore aſſure your Majeſty, that we will ‘not fail there to encounter you; at which time ‘ſhall appear unto the World, what is by God our ‘Creator (whoſe Holy Name be for ever bleſſed)
‘in his deep Wiſdom pre-ordained and ſet down
‘for Us. Wherefore, ſeeing that all which concerneth
‘the League, together with the ſafety and ‘quiet of our People on both ſides, is unto your ‘Majeſty thus declared; you are to conſider the ‘End, and to follow our good Advice; whereas ‘if otherwiſe you ſhall be the cauſe of the breach ‘of this ſo wholſom a Peace and Unity, (which we ‘hitherto have ſo ſincerely and firmly kept) the ‘excuſe thereof both in this World and in the ‘World to come, ſhall lie upon your ſelf. Now
‘we requeſt of you no more, but forthwith to ſend
‘us anſwer of theſe our Letters. As for the reſt, ‘well may he ſpeed that taketh the right way.

* Which is the 16th of March, in the year of Christ 1593.

Yet for all theſe fair offers of Peace thus made by Sinan Baſſa in his Letters, was his purpoſe nothing leſs than to have performed the ſame, ſeeking onely to have drawn the two years Preſents from the Emperour, amounting to a great ſum of Money, and ſo nevertheleſs to have proſecuted the intended War; the Emperour being the onely man of whom Amurath his great Maſter had, amongſt all the Chriſtian Princes, made choice of to exerciſe his force upon. Of all which things the Emperour was not ignorant, being thereof (as we ſaid) fully before by his Ambaſſador advertiſed from Conſtantinople.

Theſe Troubles of the Spring thus paſt, enſued the Summer much more troubleſome, for Haſſan, Baſſa of Boſna, chief author and deviſer of theſe Broils, ceaſed not, for the increaſe of his Credit, to work what miſchief he could againſt the Chriſtians that bordered upon him. This great Baſſa mortally hated the Governour, or as ſome call him, the Abbot of Siſeg, a ſtrong Caſtle ſcituate upon the borders of that part of Croatia, yet holden by the Chriſtians, where the River Kulp falleth into the famous River of Sauus or Saw, (and was indeed the very Bulwark of that Countrey) the cauſe of which his hatred is reported to have been this. The year before, the Baſſa had ſent a Meſſenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliver the Caſtle or Monaſtery unto him; which Meſſenger for certain days the Abbot entertained with many honourable Speeches, learning in the mean time of him ſo much as he poſſibly could of the Baſſaes intention, with what Power, in what Place, and with what Engines he had determined to beſiege the Caſtle. In the mean time it was diſcovered, that his Steward had long before plotted with the Turk to have betrayed the Caſtle, and had for certain years paſt received of him a yearly Penſion. Upon which occaſion, the Abbot cauſed both the Meſſenger and his own Steward to be apprehended, and ſo faſt bound hand and foot, to be caſt out at a Window of the Caſtle into the River of Saw. The Baſſa ſeeing his Meſſenger not to return, ſent another to the Abbot; grievouſly threatning him, if he did not ſend him back again his Meſſenger; Whereunto the Abbot anſwered, That he had diſmiſſed him certain days before, and therefore marvelled if he were not as yet returned; nevertheleſs concerning his demand, That he was reſolved to yield the Monaſtery unto the Baſſa, againſt whoſe Forces he ſaw himſelf unable to hold it; requeſting only, that it would pleaſe him to ſend ſome men of account to receive it at his hand, for that it would be no ſmall diſhonour unto him to deliver it up unto common Souldiers. The Baſſa, glad of this meſſage, ſent forthwith certain principal men of great account, hoping now without any loſs to have that ſtrong Place yielded unto him, which had ſo long time ſtood in his way. Three days after, certain Troops of Horſe-men, ſent from the Baſſa, came to the Monaſtery, as was appointed, and finding the Gates open, entred, firſt the Noblemen, and after them five hundred others, or thereabouts; who were no ſooner within the Gates, but that the Portcullis was let fall, and certain murthering Pieces (ſecretly placed in the Court for that purpoſe) diſcharged; with the violence whereof, the Turks that were already entred, were moſt miſerably rent in pieces, their Heads, Arms, and Legs, flying in the Air; when preſently the Garriſon Souldiers, ſtarting out of their lurking places, made a quick diſpatch of all them that had eſcaped the fury of the great Artillery. The reſt of the Turks, ſhut out, hearing the noiſe and cry of them within, turning their Horſes, betook themſelves to ſpeedy flight. The great Baſſa, hearing of this ſlaughter of his men, and how he had been deceived, ſwore in great rage by his Mahomet, to raze this Monaſtery down to the ground, and to pluck the Abbot's skin over his ears: and ſo by threatning Letters gave him to underſtand, as followeth:

Haſſan, Baſſa of Boſna, unto the Abbot of Siſeg.

The threatning Letter of Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna unto the Abbot of Siſeg.

IT is not to thee unknown, how often we have ſent unto thee our Meſſengers with Letters, declaring unto thee our Love and good Will; requeſting thee in friendly ſort, and without further reſiſtance, to yield up unto us thy Fortreſs of Siſeg, not longer to be by thee holden. Unto which our Requeſt thou haſt hitherto moſt wilfully at thy Pleaſure oppoſed thy ſelf, not without the ſlaughter of our men; and in ſo doing, haſt given cauſe unto the great Sultan to overthrow and raze that thy Fortreſs, whereof thou for the Emperour wilt needs be the chief. Thinkeſt thou it will be for thy good, or yet well taken, that thou haſt ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly circumvented and ſlain our Ambaſſadors and Servants ſent unto thee? Nay, aſſure thy ſelf, that if Mahomet grant us Life, we will never give over the ſiege of that thy Fort, wherein thou ſo much truſteſt, until I have before thy Face overthrown it, and (if thy God ſhall give thee alive into my hands) have pluck'd thy Skin over thine Ears, to the great reproach and ſhame of the Chriſtians; for I am fully reſolved, not to depart from this place, but to continue the ſiege thereof until I have it. Let a little time yet paſs, and thou ſhalt ſee thy ſelf on every ſide beſieged, thy Fort with more and greater pieces of Artillery than ever, battered, and our Power ſtrong enough to conſtrain thee. Thou haſt hitherto put thy greateſt hope and comfort in the * Banne Erodius, for whom, by the help of Mahomet we are too much ſtrong. In brief, we are of nothing more careful than how to get thee into our Power; which if we do, look not for any Mercy at our hands.

* The Hungarian Bannes are Noblemen, in Power much like unto the Turks Baſſaes.

Haſſan Baſſa invadeth Croatia.

Neither was the Baſſa unmindful of his Promiſe, or of the loſs he had received, but now in the beginning of June, with an Army of thirty thouſand Horſe and Foot, came and beſieged the Fortreſs of Trenſchiin, which with continual Battery and often Aſſaults he at length took, ſacked the Town, ſlew moſt part of the Inhabitants, except 800, or thereabouts of the younger ſort, which he carried away with him into Captivity. And being proud of this Victory, removed thence by a Bridge which he had made, paſſed over the River, and ſo the twelfth of June, came and incamped before the Monaſtery of Siſeg; and after vain ſummons given to the ſame, the next day cauſed his great Ordnance to be planted, and with great Fury thundering againſt the the Walls, in ſhort time overthrew the new Tower; in the fall whereof two of the Chriſtian Canoneers periſhed. This furious Battery he maintained by the ſpace of ten days without intermiſſion, giving no time of reſt unto the beſieged; ſo that it ſeemed not poſſible for the Monaſtery to be any long time defended, if it were not with ſpeed relieved. The Biſhop of Zagrabia, and Rupertus Eggenberg, General of the Emperors Forces that then were at Zagrabia, gave knowledge thereof to Andrew Lord Averſberg, Governour of Caroſtat, craving his aid and counſel: who calling together his own Forces, raiſed a good number of good Horſe and Foot, and called alſo unto him the bordering Horſemen of Karnia and Carainia; who the 17*th* day of June met all together not far from Inſtawitz, and there tarried that night. The next day, paſſing over the River Sauus near unto Zagrabia, they joyned themſelves with the Emperors Forces, and marched the 19*th* day in good order to Sceline, where they expected the coming of County Serinus. The 20*th* day Peter Herdelius with his Huſſars, and the Lord Stephen Graſwein, came into the Camp, with many of thoſe light Horſemen whom the Hungarians called Uſcocchi. The 21*ſt* day they lodged at Gradium, ſtill expecting the coming of the County Serinus, who, otherwiſe buſied, could not come. The next day after, a Souldier ſent out from the beſieged, came into the Camp, who gave the Captains to underſtand, that except they made haſte that day to relieve the diſtreſſed Monaſtery, it would undoubtedly be loſt, for that the Enemy had made it aſſaultable, and would that night give the aſſault; and the defendants doubting how they ſhould be able to maintain the Place, began before his departure thence to think of compoſition with the Enemy. Upon which news, the Captains forthwith began to conſult among themſelves, what courſe to take in ſo doubtful and dangerous a caſe: where Averſberg was of opinion, that it were beſt to march on, and to give the Enemy Battel; with whom alſo agreed the Lord Rederen: the reſt of the Captains being of a contrary mind, for that the ſtrength of the Chriſtians compared to the Turks, was too weak; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whilſt they yet might, than to hazard unto moſt manifeſt peril the lives of ſo many valiant men, at ſo great odds. At which counſel Averſberg was at the firſt much moved, but afterwards (as he was a man of great eloquence) plainly ſet before them the neceſſity of the Cauſe, and with lively Reaſons cheared up the fearful Croatians; notably perſwading them all in general, to put their whole truſt and confidence in God, to whom it was as eaſie to give Victory by few, as by many: and to fight like valiant men, for their Religion, their Countrey, their Lives, their Wives, their Children and Friends, and whatſoever elſe they held dear, againſt that cowardly Enemy, whoſe valour never brought him into the Field, but only the vain truſt he had in his multitude; and would therefore no doubt eaſily be put to flight, if he ſhould contrary to his expectation find himſelf but a little hardly laid unto. With theſe and other like Reaſons he prevailed ſo much, that they all yielded to his opinion, and with one conſent reſolved to go againſt the Enemy, and to do what they might to relieve their beſieged Friends. So upon a ſign given, the whole Army (in number not above 4000) forthwith removed, and with great ſpeed haſted towards the Enemy; and being come within a mile of the Camp, put themſelves in order of Battel. The Turks by their Eſpials underſtanding of the approach of the Chriſtians, brought all their Horſemen over the River of Kulp, by a Bridge which they had made, and having put themſelves in order, came on to joyn Battel with the Chriſtians: who had in their Vauntgard placed the Croatians and Huſſars; in the left wing them of Caroſtat, and the Haſquebuſiers of Karnia; in the right wing the borderers of Carainia, all Horſemen; in the main Battel the reſt of the Souldiers, with the Horſemen of Sileſia, under the conduct of Sigiſmund Paradiſe; the Rereward was incloſed with three Companies of the Emperors Souldiers. The Croatians and Huſſars in the Vantgard gave the firſt charge upon the Enemy: but having for a good ſpace made a great Fight, they were about to have retired, and, diſcouraged with the multitude of the Enemies, were even upon the point to have fled: when Averſberg (General of the Chriſtian Army) came on with his Squadron, and not only reſtored the Battel, but ſo reſolutely charged the main Battel of the Turks, that the Baſſa was conſtrained at the firſt to retire, and afterwards to fly, after whom all the reſt of the Army followed. The Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, purſued them with great ſpeed, and coming to the new made Bridge before them, took from them that paſſage, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks; who ſeeing the miſerable ſlaughter of themſelves, and no way to eſcape, ran headlong ſome into the River Odera, ſome into Kulp, and were there for the moſt part drowned; the reſt were all ſlain by the Chriſtians, before determined not to take any Priſoners. In the mean time, the Turks that remained at the Siege, underſtanding of the overthrow of their fellows, ſet fire on their Powder and other Proviſion, and ſo in great fear betook themſelves to flight. Whoſe Tents the Chriſtians immediately after took, and in them nine great pieces of Artillery, and good ſtore of great Shot of 44 and 45 pound weight apiece, with the ſumptuous Pavilion of the Baſſa, and much other rich Spoil, which was all carried into the Monaſtery of Siſeg. The number of the Turks ſlain in this Battel, and drowned in the Rivers, is of divers diverſly reported, but moſt agree upon 18000. And amongſt them was Haſſan Baſſa himſelf, found in the River near unto the Bridge, known by his moſt rich and ſumptuous Apparel; and near unto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmet-Beg. In other places were alſo found the dead Bodies of Saffer-Beg, the Baſſaes Brother, of Menibeg, Haramatan-Beg, Curti-Beg, O perd Beg, and Goſchus, the Baſſaes chief Counſellor, and Maſter of his Houſhold. But of all others, the untimely death of Sinan-Beg, Amurath's Nephew, his Siſters only Son, ſent thither to have learned the Feats of Arms under Haſſan the great Baſſa, was of the Turks moſt lamented. Of 20000 Turks that came over the River Kulp, ſcarcely 2000 eſcaped. This ſo great a Victory obtained, all the Army of the Chriſtians went thrice about the Monaſtery, and every time falling all down upon their knees, gave unto God moſt hearty thanks for the ſame, as by him miraculouſly given, and not by themſelves won; and afterwards made all the ſhew of joy and gladneſs they could poſſibly deviſe.

A great Battel betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

Siſeg relieved.

Eighteen thouſand Turks ſlain.

Siſeg thus delivered, and the Turks Army overthrown, the Chriſtians with all ſpeed laid ſiege to Petrinia, the ſtrong new Fort of the Turks, which they for the ſpace of five days moſt furiouſly battered: but hearing that the great Governour of Græcia (whom the Turks call the Beglerbeg of Romania) was with a great power coming to the relief of the Fort, they raiſed their Siege, brake up their Army, and returned every man to his wonted charge.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing at Petrinia, a Poſt came from Conſtantinople to Buda, who brought thither the firſt news of the overthrow of News of the overthrow of the Turks at Siſeg, brought to Buda.

Siſeg;

1593 Siſeg; for the report thereof was not as yet come to Buda; wherefore the Baſſa called unto him the Meſſenger, Authour of ſo bad News, and diligently examined him of the truth thereof; who told him, That at his departure from Conſtantinople, nothing was there known of that loſs, but that upon the way as he came, he met with divers Horſemen, but lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter, who told him of a certainty, that the Baſſa was ſlain, and his Army deſtroyed. Whereunto the Baſſa of Buda replyed, That he was happy in his Death, for that if he had by chance eſcaped, he ſhould for his Indiſcretion undoubtedly have ſuffered ſome other more ſhameful Death at the Court.

When News of the aforeſaid Victory was brought to the Emperour at Prague, he commanded publick Prayers, with thankſgiving to Almighty God to be made in all Churches; and ſent a Meſſenger with Letters to Amurath, to know of him how he underſtood theſe inſolent Proceedings of his Souldiers, and eſpecially this late Expedition of the Baſſa of Boſna and his Complices, contrary to the League, yet in force betwixt them. After which Meſſenger he ſent alſo the Lord Popelius, with the yearly Preſent (or rather Tribute) he uſed to ſend unto the Turkiſh Emperour at Conſtantinople; yet with this charge, that when he was come as far as Comara in the Borders of Hungary, he ſhould there ſtay until the return of the aforeſaid Meſſenger; who, if he brought Tidings of Peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his Journey to the Turks Court; otherwiſe, to return again with his Preſent; as he afterwards did. For Amurath, enraged with the notable loſs received at Siſeg, and prick'd forward with the Tears and Prayers of his Siſter (deſirous of nothing more than to be revenged for the death of her Son) the ſeventh of Auguſt cauſed open War to be proclaimed againſt the Chriſtian Emperour, both at Conſtantinople and Buda. The managing whereof he committed to Sinan Baſſa, the old Enemy of the Chriſtians, his Lieutenant-General, and perſwader of this War; who, departing from Conſtantinople with an Army of forty thouſand, wherein were 5600 Janizaries, was by Amurath himſelf and the great Men of the Court brought a mile on his way; having in charge from the great Sultan, by the aſſiſtance of the Beglerbeg of Grace, the Baſſaes of Buda and Temeſware, and other his Sanzacks and Commanders in that part of his Empire, to revenge the Death of his Nephew, and the Diſhonour received at Siſeg;

This War Amurath with great Pride denounced unto the Chriſtian Emperour, and the reſt of the Princes his Confederates in this ſort.

Amurath the Third, by the Grace of the great God in Heaven, the only Monarch of the World, a great and mighty God on Earth, an invincible Cæſar, King of all Kings, from the Eaſt unto the Weſt, Sultan of Babylon, Sovereign of the moſt noble Families of Perſia and Armenia, triumphant Victor of Hieruſalem, Lord poſſeſſor of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, Subverter and ſworn Enemy of the Chriſtians, and of all them that call upon the Name of Chriſt.

The proud and blaſphemous Denunciation of War given out by Amurath againſt Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour.

WE denounce unto thee, Rodolph the Emperour, and to all the German Nation taking part with thee, unto the great Biſhop alſo, all the Cardinals and Biſhops, to all your Sons and Subjects; we earneſtly (I ſay) by our Crown and Empire denounce unto you open War. And give you to underſtand, that our purpoſe is, with the Power of thirteen Kingdoms, and certain hundred thouſands of men, Horſe and Foot, with our Turks and Turkiſh Armes, yea, with all our Strength and Power (ſuch as neither thou nor any of thine hath ever yet ſeen or heard of, much leſs had any proof of) to beſiege you in your chief and Metropolitical Cities, and with Fire and Sword to perſecute you and all yours, and whoſoever ſhall give you help, to burn, deſtroy, and kill, and with the moſt exquiſite Torments we can deviſe, to torture unto Death, and ſlay ſuch Chriſtian Captives as ſhall fall into our hands, or elſe to keep them as Dogs, Captives in perpetual Miſery; to empale upon Stakes your faireſt Sons and Daughters; and, to the further ſhame and reproach of you and yours, to kill like Dogs your Women great with Child, and the Children in their Bellies; for now we are fully reſolved to bring into our Subjection, you which rule but in a ſmall Country, and by ſtrong hand and force of Arms to keep from you your Kingdom, as alſo to oppreſs, root up, and deſtroy the Keys and See of Rome, together with the golden Scepter thereof; and we will prove whether your crucified Jeſus will help you, and do for you as yours perſwade you. Believe him ſtill, and truſt in him, and ſee how he hath holpen his Meſſengers which have put their Confidence in him; for we neither believe, neither can we endure to hear ſuch incomprehenſible things, that he can help, which is dead ſo many Worlds of years ago, which could not help himſelf, nor deliver his own Country and Inheritance from our Power, over which we have ſo long time reigned. Theſe things, O ye poor and miſerable of the World, we thought good to ſignifie unto you, that you with your Princes and Confederates may know what you have to do and to look for. Given in our moſt Mighty and Imperial City of Conſtantinople, which our Anceſtors by force of Arms took from yours, and having ſlain or taken Priſoners all their Citizens, reſerved ſuch of their Wives and Children as they pleaſed, unto their Luſt, to your perpetual Infamy and Shame.

1593 Sinan, with his Army thus ſetting forward, kept ſtill on his way towards Buda, but the Beglerbeg of Græcia with a far greater Power marched towards Croatia, as well to relieve the Forts diſtreſſed by the Chriſtians, as again to beſiege the ſtrong Caſtle or Monaſtery of Siſeg; which he with his huge Army at his firſt arrival compaſſed about without reſiſtance, and with continual Battery overthrew the Walls thereof; giving no time of reſt unto the Defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, and with reſtleſs Labour notably repaired; the very fearful Women bringing Tables, Stools, and whatſoever elſe came to hand, that might any wiſe help to keep the Enemy out, of whom a great number was in the breaches ſlain; but what was that handful againſt ſuch a Multitude? At length, the third day of September, the Turks by main force entred the Monaſtery, and put to the Sword all the Souldiers therein; among whom were 200 Germans, of whom the Turks cut ſome in pieces, and the reſt they threw into the River Kulp. One religious man there found among the reſt, they did flea quick in Deteſtation of his Profeſſion, and afterward cutting him in ſmall pieces, burnt them to Aſhes. So taking the ſpoil of all that was there to be had, and leaving a ſtrong Garriſon for the keeping of the Place, they paſſed over Sauus, burning the Country before them, and carrying away with them about a thouſand poor Chriſtians into perpetual Captivity. Theſe Invaſions of the Turks, cauſed the Emperour to crave Aid both of the States of the Empire, and other foreign Princes farther off, which was by ſome eaſily granted, but not ſo ſpeedily performed.

Siſeg taken by the Turks.

About this time, Peter, ſirnamed le Huſſar, (for that he commanded over thoſe Horſemen, whom the Hungarians call Huſſars) Captain of Pappa, by the appointment of Ferdinand, County Hardeck Governour of Rab, lay in wait for the Turks Treaſurer in Hungary, who had the command of 5000 Turks; him this Hungarian took at Advantage, as he was muſtering and paying certain Companies of his Souldiers, miſtruſting no ſuch danger, and deſperately charging him, ſlew him with divers of his men, and put the reſt to flight; and ſo with the ſpoil, and ſome few Priſoners, he returned again to his Caſtle, carrying with him the Treaſurer.

Sinan Baſſa beſiegeth Veſprinium.

Now Sinan, the General, being come with his Army to Buda, reſolved with himſelf to begin his Wars in that part of Hungary, with the ſiege of Veſprinium. This Epiſcopal City was by Solyman, the great Turk, taken from the Chriſtians in the year 1552, and again by them recovered about fourteen years after, about the year 1566; ſince which time untill now, it had remained in the hands of the Chriſtians. Sinan, without delay marching with his Army to Veſprinium, compaſſed the City round, and encamping as he ſaw good, planted his Battery, wherewith he continually thundered againſt the City. The Chriſtians there in Garriſon, eaſily perceiving that the City was not long to be holden againſt ſo great a Power, placed divers Barrels of Gun-powder in certain Mines they had made under the Walls and Bulwarks of the Town, with Trains that ſhould at a certain time take Fire. Which done, they departed ſecretly out of the City in the dead time of the Night, hoping ſo in the Dark to have eſcaped the hand of the Enemy; which they did not ſo ſecretly, but that they were by the Turks deſcried, and moſt of them ſlain. Ferdinand Samaria, Governour of the City, after he had for a ſpace valiantly defended himſelf, fell at laſt into the Enemies hand, and ſo was taken alive, together with one Hofkirke, a German Captain. The Turks entred the City the ſixth of October, ſtriving who ſhould get in firſt, for greedineſs of the Prey, when ſuddenly the Powder in the Mines took fire, and blowing up the very foundations of the Walls and Bulwarks, ſlew a number of the Turks that were within the Danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the City.

Palotta yieldeth unto the Turks.

From Veſtrinium the Baſſa removed with his Army to Palotta, and gave ſummons to the Caſtle; but receiving ſuch anſwer as pleaſed him not, he laid ſiege unto it with all his Power. Which at the firſt, Peter Ornand, Captain of the Caſtle, chearfully received; but being afterward without any great cauſe diſcouraged, (the Caſtle as yet being but little ſhaken, and but one man ſlain, and the reſt of the Souldiers ready to ſpend their Lives in defence thereof) he ſent unto the Baſſa, offering to yield the Caſtle unto him, ſo that he with his Souldiers might with Bag and Baggage in ſafety depart. Of which his offer the Baſſa accepted, and granted his Requeſt. But he was no ſooner come out of the Caſtle with his Souldiers, and ready to depart, but the faithleſs Turk, contrary to his Oath and Promiſe, cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlain, except only the Captain, and two other. After that, the Baſſa without any great Labour, took in all the Country thereabouts, near unto the Lake of Balaton.

Now at laſt, though long firſt, about the middle of October, the Chriſtians began to muſter their Army, in number about 18000, all good and expert Souldiers; with which Power they ſhortly after paſſing over Danubius, at the firſt encounter with the Turks, put them to the worſe, ſlew a great number of them, and reſcued a number of poor Chriſtian Captives.

Alba Regalis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

In the latter end of this Month, County Hardeck, Governour of Rab, and General of the Chriſtian Army in that part of Hungary, departing from Comaria with all his Power, came and laid ſiege to the ſtrong City of Alba Regalis, which by the Force of his Artillery he in ſhort time made aſſaultable; but in aſſaulting the Breaches, was by the Turks there in Garriſon notably repulſed. So having made ſufficient proof both of the Strength and Courage of the Defendants, and perceiving no good could be done without a long ſiege, for which he was not as then provided; after Conſultation had with the reſt of the Captains, he reſolved to raiſe his Siege, which he did the ſecond of November; removing that day but half a mile from the City, becauſe he would be ſure of all his Army. But as he was about the next day to remove, News was brought him by his Eſpials, that the Enemies Power was at hand, and even now almoſt in ſight, which proved to be ſo indeed. For the Baſſa of Buda, by the command of Sinan Baſſa the General, was come forth with thirteen Sanzacks, and twenty thouſand Souldiers, thirty Field-pieces, and five hundred Waggons laden with Victual and other Warlike Proviſion, to raiſe the Siege, and to relieve the City; and was now even at hand, comming directly upon the Chriſtians; whereupon the County, aſſiſted by the County Serinus, the Lord Palſi, the Lord Nadaſti, Peter le Huſſar, and other valiant Captains of great Experience, with wonderful Celerity put his Army in order of Battel, and ſo courageouſly ſet forward to encounter the Enemy. The Baſſa, ſeeing the Chriſtians marching towards him, took the Advantage of the higher Ground, and from thence diſcharged his Field-pieces upon them; which, mounted too high, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Chriſtians for all that, deſirous of Battel, and nothing regarding the Diſadvantage of the Ground, but calling upon the Name of the Almighty, mounted the Hill, and joyning Battel with the Turks, by plain force conſtrained them to flie. In this Army of the Turks, being for moſt part Horſemen, were about five thouſand foot, and many of them Janizaries, who in flying, oftentimes made ſtands, and wounded many, and yet nevertheleſs were almoſt all there ſlain, with many others; amongſt whom were three great Men, the Sanzacks of Strigonium, Setchine, and Novigrade; ſeven Chiaus, and many other men of mark, the moſt valiant Captains of the Turks Borderers. The Lord Nadaſti, with ſome others, taking view of the Turks that were ſlain and loſt in this Battel, deemed them to have been at the leaſt, in number eight thouſand; few Priſoners were ſaved, all being put to the Sword, with cauſed Sinan to ſwear by his Mahomet, never more to ſpare any Chriſtian. All the Turks Artillery, Waggons, and Proviſion, became a Prey unto the Chriſtians; many Enſignes were there found, and Weapons of great Value. It is hard to be believed, how much this Victory encouraged the Chriſtians, and daunted the Turks. Whereupon the County with great Joy brought back his Army to Alba Regalis, and encamped near the Bulwark called Stopaſch, where the Turks moſt feared to be aſſaulted, Palſi, Nadaſti, and ſome others, earneſtly perſwaded with the County, not to depart from the City before he had won it; but he, conſidering the hard time of the year, the ſtrength of the City, (which was now full of Souldiers, by reaſon of them that were fled in thither from the late overthrow) with the want of things neceſſary in his Army to maintain a longer Siege; and fearing alſo after long lying, to be enforced with Diſhonour to forſake it, would not hearken to their Perſwaſions, but calling a Council, reſolved to raiſe his Siege, and to content himſelf with the Victory he had already gotten; which was afterward imputed unto him for more than an overſight. So ſetting Fire upon the Suburbs of the City, he roſe with his Army, and departed thence the fifth of November, and returned to Rab.

Sabatzka taken by the Lord Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Chriſtopher Lord Teuffenbach, the Emperours Lieutenant in the upper part of Hungary, who lay encamped at Caſſovia, with his Army of fourteen thouſand Souldiers removed thence, and marching along the Country two days, came and laid ſiege to Sabatzka, one of the Turks ſtrongeſt Caſtles in thoſe quarters, out of which they uſually did much harm among the Chriſtians. This Caſtle of Teuffenbach, battered in three places, and having at length made it aſſaultable, took it by force the nineteenth of November, and put to the Sword all the Turks there in Garriſon, in number about two hundred and fifty, and inſtead of them, left a ſtrong Garriſon of his own; whereby all the Country thereabouts was reſtored to great quietneſs.

Filek beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Sabatzka thus taken, the Chriſtian General removed with all ſpeed to Filek, a ſtrong City of the higher Hungary, which Solyman the Turkiſh Emperour took from the Chriſtians in the year 1560, and placed therein a Sanzack, under the command of the Baſſa of Buda. The General encamping before this City, the next day after planted his Battery, and in moſt terrible manner without intermiſſion thundered againſt the Walls and Gates of the City. The Sanzack, Governour thereof, conſidering the Power of the Chriſtians, got out ſecretly by Night with a few Souldiers, to acquaint the other Turkiſh Sanzacks his Neighbours with the coming of the Chriſtians, and the number of their Army; and further to conſult with them, how the City might be relieved. The Baſſa of Temeſware, with the Sanzacks of Giula, Hadwan, Scantzag, and Scirme, undertook the matter; and thereupon the Baſſa ſent for eight hundred Janizaries, of late left by Sinan Baſſa in Garriſon at Buda and Alba Regalis; who all flatly refuſed to go to this Service; ſaying, That they would not be led as Beaſts to the ſlaughter, as were their Fellows but a little before at Alba Regalis; nevertheleſs, they enforced the Armenians, whom Sinan and his Son had brought thither, to go; but of Buda, Alba Regalis, and Scamboth, were ſent only fifteen hundred common Souldiers. For all that, the Baſſa, with the Sanzacks his Followers, firm in their former Reſolution for the Relief of the diſtreſſed City, having made great Preparation, and raiſed an Army of 18000 ſtrong, with many Field-pieces, by Night drew near unto Filek, and ſtaied within two miles of the City. But the General of the Chriſtians, with Stephen Bathor, and the other Captains, underſtanding of their coming, with 7000 good Souldiers choſen out of the whole Army, went out preſently againſt them, and the one and twentieth of November, ſuddenly aſſailing them in their Tents, overthrew them, and put them all to flight, whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued with a moſt terrible Execution. In this fight and flight there was ſlain 6000 Turks, and but few or none taken. The Baſſa himſelf, with the Sanzack of Filek, and many others of great Name, were found amongſt the Bodies of the ſlain Turks. This Victory, gained with little or no loſs, yielded unto the Chriſtians a rich Prey, many gorgeous Tents and fair Enſigns, much Cattel, and 29 Field-pieces, with 200 Waggons laden with Victual and other Proviſion; all which they carried into the Camp at Filek, and ſo more ſtraightly beſieged the City than before. The ſame day the Lord Palfi and Martin Laſa came to the Camp with ſix thouſand Souldiers, and forthwith three Trumpeters were ſent to them of the City, That if without further reſiſtance they would forthwith yield the City, they ſhould have leave in ſafety to depart with Life and Goods, although the Turks had of late in like caſe broken their Faith with the Chriſtians at Palotta; but if they refuſed his Grace, and would needs hold it out to the uttermoſt, then to denounce unto them all Extremities. For all this, the Turks, nothing diſmaied, refuſed to yield; whereupon the battery began afreſh, and in more terrible manner than before; ſo that though the City was moſt ſtrongly fortified both with Walls and Rampiers, yet had the Chriſtians in three days ſpace with continual battery made a fair breach into it, whereby they, in deſpight of the Enemy, entred without any notable loſs the four and twentieth of November, ranſacked the City, and burnt a great part thereof. The ſame day they alſo took the uttermoſt Caſtle, wherein the Sanzacks Palace ſtood. This Caſtle ſtandeth upon a very high hill, ſtrengthned both by Art and Nature, and had in it a ſtrong Garriſon of valiant Souldiers, who ſpared not luſtily to beſtow their ſhot amongſt their Enemies, of whom they ſlew a great number. Nevertheleſs the Chriſtians, after they had for the ſpace of two Days and two Nights, with a moſt furious battery ſhaken the Walls, by plain force entred the Caſtle the ſix and twentieth of November, and put to the Sword all the Garriſon Souldiers, except ſuch as had in good time forſaken this Caſtle, and retired themſelves into another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred, with their Wives and Children, without hope of Relief, and ſeeing the Cannon now bent upon them, ſet out a white Enſign in token of Parley; which granted, it was agreed that they ſhould depart with Life, and ſo much of their Goods as every one of them could carry. Upon which Agreement the Caſtle was yielded the eight and twentieth day of November, and the Turks with a ſafe Convoy brought unto the Place they deſired. In this Caſtle was found a great booty, many pieces of Artillery, and much other warlike Proviſion, but of Victuals ſmall ſtore. The General, with the reſt of the Captains, entring the Caſtle, fell down upon their Knees, and with their Hearts and Hands caſt up to Heaven, thanked God for their Victory, and for the recovery of that ſtrong City; but eſpecially for the delivery of ſo many Chriſtians out of the Turkiſh Thraldom: for it is reported, that there were above eight hundred Country Villages ſubject to the Juriſdiction of Filek, the poor Inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkiſh Servitude, by the taking of this only City. The Chriſtians forthwith repaired the Walls, Bulwarks, and Trenches, and ſtrongly fortified every place againſt the Enemy; and ſo leaving a ſufficient Garriſon in the City and Caſtles, departed with their Army, now in number about twenty thouſand, towards Sodoch, ſix miles from Filek. But as they were upon the way, News was brought unto the General, how that the Turks had for fear abandoned the Caſtles of Dijwin and Somoske; whereupon he ſent out certain Companies of Souldiers to take in both thoſe places; who coming thither, found them indeed forſaken by the Enemy, but yet many pieces of Artillery, and other warlike Proviſion there ſtill left.

Filek taken by the Chriſtians.

Setſchine, Blavenſtein, and Sallek, abandoned by the Turks.

In the latter end of November the General marched with his Army towards Setſchine, a ſtrong Town in the Dioceſs of Agria; but the Turks in that place had two or three days before prepared themſelves to flie, and ſent their Wives, their Children, and the beſt of their Subſtance, ſome to Hatwan, ſome to Buda; and now hearing of the approach of the Chriſtian Army, ſet Fire on the Town, and fled. The Chriſtians immediately entring, did what they could to quench the Fire, and ſaved a great part of the Town; ſo leaving there a convenient Garriſon, he haſted with ſpeed to Blavenſtein, which the Turks did alſo ſet on fire, 1593 and betook themſelves to flight. The Chriſtians coming thither the next day after, namely the fourth of December, found a great part of the Town yet unburnt, wherein they left a ſtrong Garriſon; and from thence marched to Sallek, which Town they alſo took, being forſaken by the Enemy, and put thereinto a good Garriſon. The General was of nothing more deſirous than to have proſecuted this ſo happy a courſe of Victory; but ſuch was the foulneſs of the Winter weather, that he could not travel with his great Artillery, without which no great matter was to be done againſt the Enemy, ſtill keeping himſelf in his ſtrong hold. And his Army in that waſted and forſaken Country, began now to feel the want of Victuals, ſo that many had withdrawn themſelves out of the Army unto their dwelling Places.

At the ſame time alſo, the Lord Palſi going to Dregel and Palanka, and finding them forſaken by the Enemy, furniſhed both Places with Garriſons of his own Men. Certain other ſtrong Places were alſo this Month recovered from the Turks, as Ainacke, Sollocke, Weſtke, and others, and ſo much Territory gained by the Chriſtians, as was in circuit thought equal with the lower Auſtria. The joyful News of the aforeſaid Victories, with the recovery of ſo much of the Country, and ſo many ſtrong Towns and Caſtles, made great rejoycing both at Vienna and Prague; for which cauſe publick Prayers, with Thankſgiving to Almighty God, were made in both Places, with many other tokens of Joy and Triumph, both there, and in divers other Places of the Empire. Yet were not the dead Bodies of the Turks, ſlain at Alba-Regalis, buried; whereof roſe ſuch a loathſome and noiſome ſmell, that no man could abide to come near the place, to the great trouble of the Inhabitants thereabout. At length, certain Turks out of Buda and Alba-Regalis, to the number of three hundred and fifty, met together, to have buried thoſe loathſome Carkaſſes. Upon whom it chanced a Captain of the Huſſars to light with his Horſemen, who fiercely aſſailing them, left moſt part of them there dead for others to bury, and carried away the reſt Priſoners.

The Turks in burying their dead, ſlain by the Chriſtians.

The Baſſa of Buda had cauſed Murat, Sanzack of Palotta, to be ſtrangled, for that he ſuſpected him to have had Intelligence with the Chriſtians; in whoſe room he placed another, who coming with 600 Turks, to take Poſſeſſion of the Preferment, was by the way ſet upon by Peter le Huſſar, with the Garriſon Souldiers of Pappa and Thurne, and ſlain with moſt part of his Followers; 35 of them were taken alive, with all the Sanzacks rich Furniture. To end this year withal, the Turks in Garriſon at Petrinia, Siſeg, Caſtrowitz, and other Places thereabouts, met together in number about 3000; who, the 19 of December, paſſing over the River Sauus, began to ſpoil the Frontiers of thoſe Countries. But before they were gon far, they were ſo incountred hy the Lord Graſwin, and the Borderers thereabout, that five hundred of them were left dead upon the Ground, divers of good account taken Priſoners, and almoſt all the reſt drowned in the River; ſo that of all them that came over, few eſcaped with Life. In the latter end of this Month great numbers of Souldiers were taken up in Saxony, and other Places of Germany; whereof ſome were ſent to Prague, and ſome to Vienna in Auſtria; and in Hungary the Chriſtians increaſed their Strength with new Supplies. In Auſtria alſo a new Army was raiſed, and two and twenty great pieces of Artillery ſent down the River of Danubius to Comara, and new Preparation made in every Place for the next years Wars.

1594 Amurath, the Turkiſh Emperour, going out of the City of Conſtantinople January the 11*th*, to muſter the Army he had prepared againſt the Chriſtians for this year, was ſuddenly overtaken with ſuch a Tempeſt of Wind and Rain, that it overthrew his Tents, his Chariots, yea, his Horſes and Men had much ado to withſtand it. Wherewith he being (as with an ominous prodigy) exceedingly troubled, returned with his Army into the City, and oppreſſed with Melancholy, caſt himſelf down upon his Bed as a man half ſick. Where falling aſleep, he dreamed he ſaw a man of an exceeding Stature, ſtanding with one of his feet upon the Tower of Conſtantinople, and the other over the Streight in Aſia; who ſtretching out his Arms, held the Sun in one of his Arms, and the Moon in the other; whom, whilſt he wondered at, the Monſter with his foot ſtruck the Tower, which forthwith fell down, and in falling, overthrew the great Temple, with the Imperial Palace. Amurath awaked (as he thought) with the noiſe, and much troubled with the Dream (for the Turks are in ſuch Vanities very ſuperſtitious) ſent for all his Wizards and Interpreters of Dreams, to know the meaning of this his ſo ſtrange, or rather ſo melancholy a Dream. Who hypocritically anſwered him, That foraſmuch as he had not with all his Force, as a Tempeſt impugned the Chriſtians, their great Prophet Mahomet threatned by that Dream, to overthrow the Tower, the Temple, and the Imperial Palace, that is to ſay, the Religion and Empire of the Turks. Which vain and feigned Interpretation ſo much moved the ſuperſtitious Tyrant, that he ſwore from thenceforth to turn all his Forces upon the Chriſtians, and not to give over War until he had done what he might to ſubdue them. This the Turks Dream, with the Interpretation thereof, and the ſolemn Vow he had made for the Deſtruction of the Chriſtians, was publickly read in the Churches of Tranſilvania, and many godly Exhortations made unto the People, to move them by Prayer, and all other good means, to avert that ſo threatned Thraldom.

A great Tempeſt at Conſtantinople.

Amurath dreameth.

A fair Preſent of the ſpoil of the Turks, ſent unto the Emperour.

Of the rich ſpoil taken from the Turks, in the late Victory near unto Alba-Regalis, the Chriſtian Captains made a Preſent for the Emperour and the Arch-duke Matthias, his Brother, which they ſent by the Lords Gall and Brun; and was by them preſented unto the Emperour and his Brother the eleventh of January at Vienna, in order as followeth; Firſt went the Maſter of the Ordnance of Rab, on both ſides attended upon with the other Officers of the Artillery; after them were drawn thirty great pieces of Ordnance taken in the Battel. After theſe Pieces followed three Turkiſh Horſes with rich Saddles and Furniture ſtudded with Gold, the Stirrups and Bridles being of Silver, gilt and moſt curiouſly wrought; after them were carried 22 of the Turks Enſigns, three of them were very rich, and the other right fair. Then followed the two Ambaſſadors aforeſaid, with each of them a gilt Mace in his Hand, ſuch as the Turks Baſſaes uſe to carry; after them were brought many Inſtruments of War, gilt Scimitars, Gleaves, Bows and Arrows, Targuets, and ten of the Janizaries Drums. Two of the aforeſaid Horſes were preſented to the Emperour, and the third to the Arch-duke. The Field-pieces brought to the Caſtle-gate, and orderly placed upon the Plain, were all, at ſuch time as the reſt of the Preſents entred the Caſtle, forthwith by the Canoneers diſcharged; and there for certain Days left upon the Plain for the People to feed their Eyes upon. The Ambaſſadours, diſcharged of their Preſent, and rewarded by the Emperour with Chains of Gold and other Gifts, returned to the Camp. Notwithſtanding that it was now deep Winter, yet many ſharp Skirmiſhes daily paſſed upon the Borders betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians. The fifteenth of this preſent Month, 2000 of the Turks aſſembled together, were making an Inrode into the Country about Filek; whereof the Lord Teuffenbach having intelligence, lay in wait for them, and ſetting upon them fearing no ſuch danger, ſlew and took of them fifteen hundred.

Matthias, Arch-duke of Auſtria, now Governour of Stiria, Carinthia, and the Countries thereabout, by the departure of Erneſtus his Brother (but a little before by Philip King of Spain made Governour of the Low-Countries) was now alſo by the Emperour appointed General of the Chriſtian Army againſt the Turks; who, to be near unto the Enemy, and to farther the new War, departed the ſix and twentieth day of February from Vienna to Rab; after whom daily followed the Forces newly raiſed in Sileſia, Moravia, and Hungary, with others alſo ſent from Prague and Vienna. He conſidering to what ſmall purpoſe it would be to have the laſt year taken ſo many ſtrong Towns and Caſtles, except the ſame alſo were well manned and furniſhed with all needful Proviſion; by the perſwaſion of the Lord Teuffenbach, ſent County Schilke with a thouſand Horſe to Filek, for the more ſafety of that Place and the Country thereabout ſo lately gained from the Turks.

It fortuned, that about this time, a Souldier of the Turks taken not far from Dregel, and brought into the Camp; among other things whereof he was examined, confeſſed, That in Novigrade (a ſtrong Town and of great Importance, but one mile diſtant from Vacia, and three from Buda) was left but a weak Garriſon of about eight hundred Souldiers, who there lived in great fear to be beſieged; and that the Turks doubting ſuch a matter, had brought thither much Proviſion for the better fortifying of the Town. Upon which Intelligence the Chriſtians began to remove with their Army, and being come betwixt Dregel and Novigrade, underſtood by the Country People, that it was true that the Turk had reported: wherefore they reſolved that Night to lay ſiege unto the Town. So forthwith ſome were ſent to Dregel, to fetch thence certain pieces of Artillery, whom certain Troops of German Horſemen went to meet; who uſed ſuch diligence, that the eighth of March, a little before the riſing of the Sun, the whole Army, with the great Ordnance, was come before Novigrade. That day the Chriſtians ſpent in pitching their Tents, and incamping themſelves; yet before Night they had planted certain great pieces upon an high Hill, from whence they might ſee into the Caſtle; whereof the Maſter of the Ordnance cauſed three of the greateſt about the going down of the Sun, to be diſcharged againſt the Caſtle, to give the Turks to underſtand that they wanted nothing for the ſiege. The ſame Night alſo the Chriſtians caſt up a great Mount in the Valley, from whence they preſently ſent ſix great ſhot into the Caſtle: but early in the Morning, the Sun being yet ſcarce up, and all things now in readineſs, they began to batter the Caſtle, and that Day out of ten great Pieces, diſcharged 300 great ſhot againſt the Caſtle, but to ſmall purpoſe; for the Caſtle was built upon a moſt ſtrong Rock, fortified with high and thick Walls, and a deep Ditch hewen out of the main Rock, which compaſſed the Caſtle round; and for the more ſtrength thereof was ſo fortified with Pallizadoes made of ſtrong Timber, as that there was no acceſs unto the Walls; yet by the Commandment of the General, certain Companies of the Chriſtians prepared themſelves to aſſault the Breach, ſuch as it was; who beſides their Weapons, carrying with them dry Faggots, and ſetting them on fire, burnt the Pallizado in divers places, and ſo opened the way unto the Walls; and encouraged with the ſucceſs, aproached nearer, and ſlew divers of the Turks upon their Rampiers. Who diſcouraged with their own weakneſs, and the forwardneſs of the Enemy, faintly defended themſelves, and yet ſlew divers of them, beating them down from the Walls with Stones, Timber, Fire-works, and ſuch like. This Aſſault given in the Night, was continued until four a Clock in the Morning, and ſo given over. Shortly after came the Arch-duke with a 1000 Horſe into the Camp, and cauſed the battery to be again renewed; whereby it chanced that the chief Canoneer in the Caſtle (being a Renegade German) was taken with a great ſhot and ſlain; whoſe death ſo diſmaied the reſt of the Defendants, that they preſently ſet forth three white Flags in ſign of parley; which for all that, the Chriſtians ſeemed not to regard, but ſtill continued their battery. The Turks then pitifully crying out, named two Captains, whom they deſired to have ſent unto them, with whom they might fall to ſome reaſonable Compoſition; ſo for a while the battery ceaſed, and thoſe Captains being ſent unto the Town, brought nine of the beſt of the Turks in the City with them unto the Arch-duke; who by their Interpreter declared, That they well conſidered the force of the Criſtians, and ſeeing no relief to come from the Baſſa of Buda, as he had promiſed, thought themſelves to have already diſcharged the parts of good Souldiers, and ſeeing no other remedy, were contented to yield the Caſtle; yet ſo, as that with Bag and Baggage they might in ſafety depart. Whereunto the Lord Palſi (taking upon him the Perſon of the Arch-duke, for that he himſelf would not be known) anſwered, That foraſmuch as they had not yielded at the firſt ſummons, but holden it out to the loſs of many of his Mens lives, and his great charge, they were unworthy of any favour; yet of his own Clemency he would receive them, if they would abſolutely, without any farther condition, yield themſelves to his mercy. This anſwer being reported to the Sanzack, Governour of the Town, pleaſed him not, and therefore ſaid he would ſtill ſtand upon his own defence. Whereupon the Chriſtians were about to have began a freſh Aſſault; but after a new Parley, it was at laſt agreed, That the Turks yielding the Town unto the Arch-duke, ſhould in ſafety depart with their Apparel and Scimiters only: With which agreement two of the Turks were ſent back into the Caſtle, and the reſt detained. Four hours the Turks in the Caſtle delaied the time, as men doubtful what to do; but being earneſtly called upon for a reſolute Anſwer, and ſeeing the Chriſtians ready again to aſſault them, they for fear yielded; and ſo 450 of them came forth, amongſt whom was the Sanzack, Governour of the Town, with his Wife and Daughter, the Sanzack of Selendre, (ſent thither to have aided him) and one Chiaus, lately come from the Court. Theſe great men bravely mounted, were commanded to alight from their gallant Horſes, and had in their ſteads other bad Jades given them to ride upon; and as they paſſed by, as well the Women as the Men, were ſearched, that they carried with them nothing more than their Cloths; if any thing elſe were found, it fell unto the Souldiers ſhare for good booty. This ſtrong Town of Novigrade had continued in the poſſeſſion of the Turks about ſixty years, and ſerved as it were for a Bulwark to Peſth and Buda; which now recovered out of their hands, opened a way unto their farther harms. The keeping of this Town was by the Arch-duke committed to the Lord Rebei, a Nobleman of Hungary, and Kinſman to Palſi, with a ſtrong Garriſon, and certain Troops of Huſſars.

Novigrade beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Novigrade yielded unto the Arch-duke

The Sanzack of Novigrade, after he had loſt the Town, coming to Buda, was preſently apprehended by the Baſſa, and laid in Priſon; who, although he excuſed himſelf, by alledging

that

1594 that the Town was not poſſibly to be holden with ſo ſmall a Garriſon, againſt ſo great a Power; and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of Buda, for not ſending relief in time; and therefore appealed unto the further hearing of Amurath himſelf: yet all ſerved him not, but was by the Baſſaes Commandment, in the Night hanged upon a Tree near unto the Gate of the City, and afterwards cut in pieces.

The Sanzack of Novigrade hanged at Buda.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, the Emperour ſent his Ambaſſador to the great Duke of Muſcovia, the King of Polonia, and the Prince of Tranſilvania, to prove how they ſtood affected towards thoſe his Wars againſt the Turk, and what Aid he might procure from them. Into Muſcovia was ſent one Warkutſch, a Gentleman of Sileſia; who, coming to Muſco, found in that Court the Ambaſſadors of the Tartar, the Turk, the Perſian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all theſe, the Ambaſſadors of the Tartar and the Turk could have no Audience, but were with contumelious words rejected as Miſcreants. The Emperours Ambaſſadour was honourably entertained, and after the manner of that Country, a large proportion of Wine, Mede, Aquavitæ, Fleſh, Fiſh, and Fowl of ſundry ſorts allowed him daily all the time of his abode. At length, having Audience, he declared unto the great Duke the cauſe of his coming, and in the Name of his Maſter, requeſted his Aid againſt the Turk. Whereunto the Duke anſwered, That he would give the Emperour towards the maintenance of his Wars againſt the common Enemy, 500000 Duckets, and allow him yearly 400000 during the time of that War; requeſting him not to make any Peace with the Turk, and alſo promiſing to ſend him Aid of Men in this War, if he ſhould ſo need. The Perſian Ambaſſador alſo honourably feaſted the Emperours Ambaſſador, and had with him great conference concerning the Wars of the Chriſtians with the Turks, and in his Maſters Name promiſed the continuation of his Wars againſt the Turk, ſo that the Emperour would likewiſe promiſe not to have any League with him, ſo to give him lieſure to turn all his Forces again into Perſia. This Ambaſſador, after he had almoſt tarried four Months in Muſcovia, returned to the Emperour. At which time Doctor Wacker, the Emperours Ambaſſador into Polonia, returned alſo with joyful news, how that the Polonians, with an Army of eight and twenty thouſand, had ſtopped the Paſſage of an hundred thouſand Tartars, whom the Turk had ſent for againſt the Emperour; and that if he needed, he ſhould be aided with the Polonian Coſſacks; but unto the reſt of his Requeſts he could have no anſwer of the States of that Kingdom, for that the King was then abſent in Sweden, and was therefore referred to be further anſwered at his return.

Certain Caſtles of the Turks upon the Borders of Stiria, taken by the County Serinus.

At the ſame time, County Serinus, with three hundred Harquebuſiers, and certain Troops of Horſemen, and the Footmen of Stiria, and the Countries thereabouts, aſſembled to the number of ten thouſand, departed from Caniſia, to beſiege Breſenza, a Caſtle of the Turks. But they underſtanding before of his coming, conveyed away the beſt of their ſubſtance, and ſetting the Caſtle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The Earl coming thither, took the forſaken Caſtle, and put thereinto a Garriſon of his own Souldiers. In like manner he took alſo Sigeſta, forſaken of the Turks, where he alſo placed a Garriſon of the Chriſtians. And ſo going on to Baboſtcha, beſieged it; which Caſtle, although it was ſtrongly ſcituated in a Mariſh, and could not eaſily have been won, was for all that, for fear, abandoned by the Turks, and ſo taken by the County; by recovery of which Places, there was a ſafe and eaſie way laid open even to Ziget, the Baſſa whereof ſtood in no ſmall doubt to have been even then beſieged. 1594

Amurath, intending by all means he could to vex the Emperour, had determined to ſend his Fleet into the Adriatique, to beſiege Zegna, a City of the Emperours, ſcituate upon the Sea-coaſt, in the Bay Quernero, called in antient time Flanaticus Sinus. Which the better to effect, he ſent one of his Chiaus Ambaſſador to the Venetians, to requeſt them, That his Fleet might by their leave paſs along the Adriatick, and have the uſe of their Ports and Harbours, as need ſhould require. Which his requeſt the Venetians hearing, refuſed in any caſe to yield thereunto; fearing (and not without cauſe) the unfaithfulneſs and treachery of the Turks, whoſe Oaths and Promiſes are no longer ſtrong, or by them regarded, than ſtandeth with their own good and profit; nevertheleſs, they moſt honourably uſed the Ambaſſadour, and ſo ſent him away without obtaining of that he was eſpecially ſent for.

Hatwan beſieged by the Chriſtians.

In the upper part of Hungary, Chriſtopher Lord Teuffenbach, the Arch-dukes Lieutenant, having gathered an Army of twenty thouſand Souldiers, the ſixteenth of April layed ſiege to Hatwan, a ſtrong Town ſix miles from Buda, fortified with a tripple Ditch and Bulwarks of exceeding ſtrength. Againſt which, although the Chriſtians could not do much either by Mines or Mounts, (by reaſon it was ſo environed with water) yet they ſo ſhut up all the Paſſages thereunto, that nothing could be brought or carried in or out of the Town. They of the Town ſeeing themſelves thus block'd up, by ſecret Meſſengers certified the Baſſa of Buda in what caſe they ſtood, praying Aid of him; who with ten thouſand choſen Souldiers, which he had then in readineſs, and the Sanzacks of Sirnah, Giula, Lippa, Lerwoge, and Tſchangrad, with five thouſand more, forthwith ſet forward toward Hatwan, to raiſe the ſiege; and the laſt of April, being come within ſight of the Chriſtian Army, about one of Clock in the Afternoon encamped on the ſide of the River Sagijwa; but when he could not, or elſe durſt not, for the deepneſs of the way, the abundance of the Water, and the nearneſs of the Enemy, adventure to paſs the River, he retired back again to paſs over at Jaſperin (otherwiſe called Jasbrin) where the River was joyned with a Bridg, and not far off a good Foord alſo to paſs over at; thinking ſo to have come upon the backs of the Chriſtians, and with more ſafety to have relieved the beſieged Town. But Teuffenbach perceiving his purpoſe, forthwith after his departure paſſed the River with much Difficulty, and overtaking him with his Army the next day, being the firſt of May, about one of the Clock in the Afternoon, between Zarcha and Fuſcaſalva, with his great Ordnance diſordered the rereward of the Enemies Battel; and coming on courageouſly with his whole Army, began a moſt cruel fight; which the Turks a great while endured with wonderful Reſolution; but now, deſtitute of their wonted multitude (their greateſt confidence) and hardly layed unto by the Chriſtians, they in the end turned their backs and fled; whom ſix thouſand Hungarians and Germans fiercely purſued, and had the killing of them almoſt to Buda. In this Battel the Chriſtians took all the Enemies great Ordnance, with ſeventeen Enſigns, and alſo the Caſtle of Jaſperin, which the Turks had for fear abandoned; wherein was found good ſtore of Victuals, certain great Pieces, with much other warlike Proviſion. Of this ſo notable a Victory, Teuffenbach by Letters preſently advertiſed the Arch-duke, after he was again returned to the ſiege of Hatwan. Which Letters, becauſe they contain many Particularities and Circumſtances of this Battel, I have thought it not amiſs here to inſert.

The Copy of the Letters of the Lord Teuſſenbach, to Matthias the Arch-duke, General of the Emperours Army againſt the Turks.

*A*lthough (ſaid he) I have by a ſpeedy Meſſenger upon the very Kalends of May, certified your Excellency of the notable Victory, which God of his great Goodneſs gave unto us the ſame day over our hereditary Enemy; yet afterward, upon diligent Inquiſition, we underſtood many Particularities, as well of the Captives themſelves, as of the Inhabitants about Zolnocke, Peſth, and Buda; whereof I thought good to advertiſe you. The Captives themſelves confeſs, That the Baſſa of Buda, with the Sanzacks of Zolnocke, Zarwacke, Giula, and Tſchangrad, Cippaio, Gennie, and others, had with great Celerity raiſed an Army of thirteen thouſand Souldiers, amongſt whom were many Tartars, with purpoſe to have relieved the beſieged Town of Hatwan, and upon the ſudden to have oppreſſed us in our Tents. Filled with which hope, they in great haſte came with all their Power the laſt of April towards Hatwan; but foraſmuch as they could not paſs over the River Zagijwa by reaſon of the height of the Water, they were the next day, being the firſt of May, conducted by the Captain of Jaſparin, to a more commodious Paſſage, ſo to come the nearer unto us, and the next day in the Morning to have ſurpriſed us in our Tents. But our moſt merciful God hath averted this ſo great a Miſchief from us, and turned it upon their own Heads. For as it is moſt conſtantly reported from Zolnocke, Peſth, and Buda, and confirmed by the Inhabitants of the ſame Places, there are two thouſand five hundred of the Turks ſlain, and as many wounded, of whom many periſhed, and are found dead upon the High-ways leading to Peſth, and Zolnocke; of theſe we have ſent a thouſand Heads to Caſſovia, and cauſed many of the Turks to be buried for fear of Infection in this ſo great heat. Verily it was a bloody Battel, ſo that the old Souldiers ſay, they have not remembred or ſeen the Turks (no more in number) to have ſtood ſo long in Battel, and to have ſo fought it out without flying. Many Men of great Name and Place there periſhed and fell, amongſt whom are redeemed the Sanzacks of Peſth, Novigrade, and Temeske, Genne, Alavus, Bogſte, Aluſtafa, Marielaus, and certain Chiaus lately ſent from the Court, with the Baſſa's Guard, wherein were eight hundred right valiant Souldiers, of whom few eſcaped with Life. Many fell that would have yielded great Ranſome; but it was agreed upon between the Germans and the Hungarians, not to ſpare any of the Enemies, but to put them all to Sword; and that whoſoever did otherwiſe, it ſhould be imputed unto him for Diſhonour. So that more than ſixteen common Souldiers, none were taken Priſoners, of whom we might learn how things went amongſt the Turks, with other Circumſtances of the Battel. We took thirteen Field-pieces, whereof four were greater than the reſt; which they called Organes, and four and twenty of the Enemies Enſigns. The Baſſa of Buda (beſide other three Wounds by him received) was grievouſly wounded in the ſide. Of our men were loſt about an hundred, and many of them moſt expert Souldiers; and about ſix hundred others grievouſly wounded, of whom there is ſmall hope, many of them being already dead. Neither is the loſs ſmall we have received in our Horſes and Armour, for there be few amongſt the German Horſemen, which have not loſt one, two, or three, of their Horſes or Servants, whereby our Horſemen are wonderfully weakned; yet was the Victory great, to God be the Praiſe, to him be the Glory and Thanks therefore. Let us in the mean time proſecute the ſiege begun. The laſt Night I commanded the Water to be drawn another way, ſo that now our Trenches may be advanced many Paces, and Bulwarks raiſed within two hundred paces of the Wall. We have already planted five great pieces of Artillery in one Bulwark, and hope the next Night to place five more upon a Mount faſt by, and will do what ſhall be needful for a ſtraight ſiege; and when time ſhall ſerve, undertake the Town with all our Power; God grant us therein good Succeſs and Victory.

The Turks in Garriſon at Zabola, a Fort there by, diſcouraged with the overthrow of their Friends, forſook the Fort; which for Strength and Greatneſs was comparable with Tocay or Erla; which ſtrong Place the Chriſtians without any loſs now recovered.

Strigonium beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Whilſt this valiant Captain, the Lord Teuffenbach, thus lay at the ſiege of Hatwan, Matthias, the Arch-duke, General of the Chriſtian Army in Hungary, incouraged with the good Succeſs he had at Novigrad, came with his Army (being 44000 ſtrong) before Strigonium (ſometime the Metropolitical City of Hungary, but now of long a ſure receptacle of the Turks) and the ſixth of May incamped his Army about a quarter of a mile from the Caſtle in a moſt pleaſant Medow, from whence both the City and the Caſtle were plainly to be ſeen. Upon whom the Turks, out of the Caſtle, and three Gallies that lay upon the River, diſcharged certain great pieces without any great harm doing; but after the Chriſtian Fleet was a little before Night come down the River, and with their great Ordnance began to anſwer them again, the Enemy ceaſed ſhooting, and lay ſtill that Night. In the mean time it fortuned, that a Turkiſh Youth, taken in a Garden thereby, and brought into the Camp and examined, confeſſed that there was no Garriſon in the City, more than four hundred Janizaries, and that a new ſupply was daily expected from Buda. The Chriſtians labouring that Night, were by the breaking of the Day come with their Trenches to a Hill over againſt the Caſtle, where they placed their Battery, and forthwith began to batter the City. The ſame day (being the ſeventh of May) two and twenty Turks Heads were preſented to the Arch-duke, and four men taken alive, newly ſent out of the City to have viewed the Chriſtian Camp. About Night certain Balls of Wild-fire were ſhot into the City, whereof one fell upon the Tower called St. Adelbert, and ſet it on fire; wherewith, firſt the Church, and afterward a great part of the Town fell on fire. The Sanzacks Houſe, with all his Horſes and Armour, and a great quantity of Powder was then burnt, and ineſtimable hurt done in the City. The next day the Chriſtians had with continual battery made a breach in the Caſtle Wall; but adjoyning unto the Wall was an high and broad ſandy Rampier, which could hardly be battered; for all that the Germans gave a fierce aſſault to the breach, hoping to have entred by the Ruins of the Wall, but not being able to get over the ſandy Rampier, were inforced with loſs to retire. The day following, they began again the Battery with eighteen great pieces, when, about eight a Clock in the Morning, the Raſcians that were in the old City gave the General to underſtand, That if he would, at a place by them appointed, aſſault the greater City, to draw the Turks thither, they would in the mean time deliver unto the Chriſtians certain little Poſterns, and receive them into the old City; upon Condition, that no Violence ſhould be done unto them or theirs. Which being ſo agreed upon, the Chriſtians accordingly gave the aſſault the eleventh of May in the Evening, and by the help of the Raſcians took the City; who, according to promiſe, were all taken to Mercy, and the Turks ſlain, except ſuch as by their good hap recovered the new Town. The keeping of this City was committed to the charge of two Companies of German Footmen, and ſix hundred Hungarians, with three hundred Raſcians, and other Townſmen. Thus was the old City of Strigonium gained by the Chriſtians, the Suburbs whereof they preſently burnt, nevertheleſs the new Town, with the Caſtle, was ſtill holden by the Turks. Wherefore the Chriſtians having caſt up certain Trenches and Mounts, and placed their Artillery as they thought moſt convenient, began again to batter the Caſtle, and after they had by the Fury of the Cannon made it aſſaultable, with great Courage aſſailed the breach, which the Turks valiantly defended; ſo that the Chriſtians were glad to retire, leaving behind them about an hundred and thirty of their Fellows ſlain in the breach. The Turks, a little before the coming of the Chriſtians, had fortified an Hill, whereunto the Caſtle was ſomething ſubject, called of the Chriſtians St. Nicholas his Hill; this Hill ſo fortified, the Chriſtians, with continual battery and aſſault, gained the 17th of May, and put all the Turks left alive therein to the Sword; and turning the Ordnance, from thence alſo battered the Caſtle. The two and twentieth of May, a little before the going down of the Sun, certain Enſigns of Footmen were drawn out of the Camp, to have the next day aſſaulted the lower Town; who, taking the benefit of the Night, attempting to have entred the Town in the dead time of the Night, were notably encountered by the Turks, ſallying out of the Town upon them. The Chriſtians for all that, having enforced them to retire, proſecuted their former Reſolution, and with much ado got over the uttermoſt Wall; but finding there, contrary to their Expectation, ſuch a deep and broad countermure as was not poſſible to be paſſed, they ſtood as Men diſmaied, neither could they in the Darkneſs of the Night well ſee how to get back again over the Town-ditch, but diſorderly retiring, ſtuck faſt, many of them in the deep mud, and there periſhed. In this aſſault there were about a thouſand of the Chriſtians wounded and ſlain, and albeit that they twice or thrice renewed the aſſault, yet prevailed they nothing, but were ſtill repulſed with loſs. Many alſo of the Turkiſh Garriſon were likewiſe ſlain, yea, the Sanzack himſelf hurt with a great ſhot, with many other wounded men ſent down the River to Buda, brought thither true News of the aforeſaid Aſſaults, and of the ſtate of the beſieged.

The Caſtle aſſaulted.

The Raſcians riſe up againſt the Turks.

In the mean time, News was brought to the Camp, That Sinan Baſſa, the old Enemy of the Chriſtians, and the Turks great Lieutenant, coming towards Hungary with a great Army, and having by Boats conveyed over part thereof, was ſet upon by the Raſcians, (theſe are poor oppreſſed Chriſtians, dwelling on both ſides of Danubius, who, weary of the Turkiſh Thraldom, and deſirous of their antient Liberty, have oftentimes taken up Arms againſt the Turks, as they now did, encouraged by the good Succeſs of the Chriſtians on the other ſide of Hungary) and that after divers Skirmiſhes, they had taken thirteen of the Turks Veſſels, wherein, beſides Victuals, and certain great pieces of Artillery, they found about 2400 weight of Powder, 447 hundred of Lead, 46454 bundles of Match, 1200 great ſhot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound weight, and of ſmall ſhot for Harquebuſiers, 48500, with much other warlike Proviſion; a great part whereof was brought into the Camp at Strigonium, and the reſt reſerved to future Uſes. This loſs ſo troubled the great Baſſa, that he altered his purpoſe before intended for Caſſovia.

Five thouſand Chriſtians loſt at the ſiege of Strigonium.

The fourth of June, about five hundred Turks, ſent up the River from Buda, conducted by two Sanzacks under two red and white Enſigns, landed near to Gokara, on the further ſide of Danubius, over againſt Strigonium; where, after they had a while refreſhed themſelves, and left ſome few for the more aſſurance of the Place, all the reſt were conveyed over the River into Strigonium; where they had been long looked for, the old Garriſon being now ſore weakned by the former Aſſaults. Four days after, the Turks, encouraged with this ſupply, ſallied out upon a ſudden, and had entred one of the Forts of the Chriſtians; but were forthwith again repulſed, having loſt ſix and twenty of their men, and two of their Enſigns; not far off lay a troop of Horſemen, who, if they had in time come in, not one of the Turks had eſcaped. Long it were to tell, how often, and in what manner the Chriſtians aſſaulted this City, but were by the Turks ſo received, that in five Aſſaults they loſt five thouſand of their Men, amongſt whom were divers Captains, Lieutenants, Antients, and others of good account; three and twenty Canoneers were alſo ſlain, and ten great pieces of Artillery ſo ſpoiled, as that they were no more ſerviceable. The Garriſon of this City conſiſted for moſt part of the Janizaries (the Turks beſt Souldiers) whoſe notable Valour in holding out of this ſiege, was both of their own People, and their Enemies, much commended; whatſoever was beaten down by Day, that they again repaired by Night, and ſtill relieved with Victual, and things neceſſary from Buda, did what was poſſible to be done for defence of the City. About the ſame time certain Turks chancing upon a Troop of German Horſemen, in fight ſlew about fifty of them, and put the reſt to flight; whereupon, an alarm being raiſed in the Camp, many ran out to the reſcue of their Fellows, taking with them certain ſmall Field-pieces. Which the Turks perceiving, began to flie; whom the Chriſtians eagerly purſuing, were ſuddenly aſſailed by other Turks, ſallying out of a Fort faſt by, and inforced ſhamefully to retire, and to leave their Field-pieces behind them. Which the Turks ſeizing upon, cloyed them, brake their Carriages, and made them altogether unſerviceable.

The Archduke ſendeth Aid to the ſiege of Hatwan.

All this while the Lord Teuffenbach, lying at the ſiege of Hatwan, about this time requeſted Aid of the Archduke, for that his Power was with often Conflicts, Hunger, and other Difficulties always attending long ſieges, ſo much weakned, as that he had ſcarcely ſix thouſand ſound Men in his Camp; to whom the Arch-duke forthwith ſent twelve hundred Footmen, being loth to ſpare any more, for too much weakning of his own Army.

Amurath, diſdaining to ſee the Frontiers of his Empire in ſo many places impugned by the Chriſtians, and daily to receive from them ſo great Harms, ſought by all means to be reverenced; wherefore, beſide the great Power of his own, which he was now about to ſend with Sinan Baſſa into Hungary, he had alſo procured from the great Tartar, a wonderful number of thoſe rough and ſavage People to be ſent into Hungary, there to joyn with his Army. Theſe wild People, to the number of ſeventy thouſand, according to direction given, breaking into Padolia, Walachia, and Moldavia, gathered together an incredible number of Oxen and Kine; to this end and purpoſe, that driving them before them, they might both be aſſured of Victuals, and the ſafer travel through a part of Polonia. But when they were come unto the Borders of that Country, and there found the Power of Samoſchie the great Chancellor, and the Polonian Coſſacks in Arms, they eaſily perceived that they could not paſs that way without great loſs. Wherefore they placed the aforeſaid Heards of Cattel, ſome before, ſome behind, and ſome on each ſide of the Army, and ſo incloſed round about with thoſe Cattel, as with a Trench, marched on. But when they were come near unto the Polonians, this rude Device ſerved them to no other purpoſe than the overthrow of themſelves; for the Polonians diſcharging their great Ordnance, ſo terrified the Cattel, that they turned upon the Tartars; and overthrowing whomſoever came in their way, did exceeding much harm; whom the Polonians immediately following, and hardly charging the confuſed Army, armed only with Bow and Arrows, after ſome ſmall fight, put them at laſt to flight, and obtained of them a notable Victory, with an exceeding rich Prey. Of the Polonians were loſt about eighteen hundred, but of the Tartars were ſlain thirty thouſand. The reſt retiring into Podolia, and paſſing the River Neſter by the way of Tranſilvania, where they did exceeding much harm, came to Temeſware, and ſo afterwards further into Hungary; unto whom the Turks ſent ſeven hundred Horſemen, to conduct them to the Army.

Strigonium aſſaulted.

But to return again to the ſiege of Strigonium, The fourteenth day of June, the Chriſtians, between eight and nine of the Clock in the Morning, with great Fury aſſaulted the Town in three places; which aſſault they moſt notably maintained, until it was almoſt three a Clock in the Afternoon. Nevertheleſs, the Turks ſo valiantly defended themſelves, that at laſt the Chriſtians were glad to give over the aſſault, and with loſs to retire. The Archduke from an high place beholding the aſſault, had one of his Foot-men ſlain faſt by him with a ſmall ſhot. Many of the Turks were alſo ſlain in this aſſault, and amongſt them, one of the three Sanzacks that defended the City. The Night following there aroſe a moſt horrible Tempeſt, with ſuch raging Wind, and abundance of Rain, that many thought they ſhould never have ſeen day; with the Violence whereof the Archdukes Tent was overthrown, and divers others blown down, or rent in ſunder, were in the Air carried from Place to Place. About the ſame time, the Lord Palſi, within the ſight of the Caſtle, caſt up a notable Fort, with high Mounts and ſtrong Trenches (even in the ſelf ſame place where Solyman lay about fifty years before, when he beſieged and won Strigonium) by which Fort ſo built, the Enemy was embarred to convey any thing up the River for the relief of the City, to the great diſcomfiture of the beſieged; for to have hindred the which work, the Enemy oftentimes ſallied out, but to no purpoſe. This Fort being brought to Perfection, the Chriſtians took alſo another Fort in an Iſland on the further ſide of the River, which the Turks had but few days before taken from the Chriſtians, and cloyed the great Pieces therein; which Fort the Chriſtians now again repaired, furniſhed it with a ſufficient Garriſon, and other great Ordnance.

Strigonium ſore battered.

Theſe things thus done, the Caſtle and the lower Town were in five divers places out of the new built Fort, the old Town, and the Iſland, ſo battered with continual ſhot, that a man ſhould have ſaid, that one Stone would not have been left upon another, but that all ſhould have been beaten down, and laid even with the Ground. The ſeventeenth of June, one of the Chriſtian Canoneers ſo diſmounted one of the great pieces in the Caſtle, that the piece, together with the Turkiſh Canoneer that had charge thereof, fell down out of the Caſtle into the Ditch. And the ſame day, a Maſon that fled out of the Caſtle into the Camp, among other things reported, That many of the Turks were ſlain with this continual battery and often aſſaults, and that not paſt an hour before, forty of them were ſlain in one Chamber, and now acknowledged themſelves to be indeed beſieged; and to have reſolved, that when they were brought to the laſt caſt, then deſperately to ſallie out upon the Chriſtians, and ſo either to return with Victory, or to make ſhift every man for himſelf as he might. Which his report ſeemed not altogether feigned; for about Midnight, a thouſand of the Turks ſallying out of the Caſtle upon the Fort newly built upon the River, in hope to have ſurpriſed it, were by the Chriſtians therein notably repulſed and inforced to retire; in which conflict fifty of the Turks were ſlain, and many more wounded and taken Priſoners. And the ſame day toward Evening, eight Turks of good ſort being taken and brought into the Camp, confeſſed, That but ſix days before, they had ſeen ſeven Boats full of wounded and dead men ſent down the River from Strigonium to Buda. Whereby it was eaſily to be gathered how bloody a ſiege this was unto the Turks, foraſmuch as all thoſe Bodies were the Bodies of men of good account and place; for the Bodies of ſuch common Souldiers as were ſlain, they ſtill threw into the River running by.

The new built Fort hardly aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Fort newly built upon the Bank of Danubius, much troubled the beſieged Turks in Strigonium, becauſe nothing could without danger of it be ſent up the River for their Relief; Wherefore they by fit Meſſengers ſent word out of the Caſtle to the Admiral of the Turks Gallies lying below in the River, That he ſhould at an appointed time come up the River with his Gallies as high as the Fort, and on that ſide at leaſtwiſe to make ſhew as if he would aſſault it; at which time they of the Town would be likewiſe ready to ſally out, and to aſſail it indeed on the other ſide by Land. The Admiral accordingly came up the River with his Gallies, and by diſcharging of certain great pieces, made ſhew as if he would on that ſide have battered the Fort; but was ſo welcomed thereout, that he was glad with his rent Gallies, quickly to fall down the River again further off out of danger. But whilſt the thundering ſhot was thus flying too and fro towards the River, they of the Town ſallying out, aſſaulted the Fort on the other ſide toward the Land, and that with ſuch deſperate Reſolution, that ſome of them were got up to the top of the Rampiers, and there, for the ſpace of two hours, maintained a moſt cruel fight; wherein many of them were ſlain and wounded, and the reſt enforced with ſhame to retire.

The Chriſtians thus ſtill lying at the ſiege, and intentive to all Occaſions, partly by their Eſpials, and partly by ſuch as they had taken Priſoners, underſtood, that a new ſupply, both of Men and Victuals, was ſhortly to be put into Strigonium; and therefore ſent out certain Companies of Souldiers, who lying in two convenient Places, the one upon the River, the other by Land, might intercept the ſaid ſupply. Both which Places were before by the provident Enemy poſſeſſed; who ſuddenly aſſailing the Chriſtians coming thither, and fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew ſome of them, and put the reſt to flight; who nevertheleſs in their retreat, brake the Bridge which the Turks had made of Boats under the Caſtle of Strigonium over Danubius. Of which Boats, ſome were carried away with the Violence of the Stream, and of the reſt thirty fell into the hands of the Chriſtians, without loſs of any man more than five, who making too much haſte out of a little Boat, fell into the River, and ſo periſhed. In this time, Fame, the fore-runner of all great Attempts, had brought News into the Chriſtian Camp, That Sinan Baſſa, the Turks great General, was coming to the relief of Strigonium; of whoſe Power divers diverſly reported. But the greater part doubting the worſt, and weary of the long Siege, and of the Calamities incident thereunto, added ſtill ſomething to the laſt report, to make the danger of longer ſtay to ſeem the greater; certain it is, that the News of the coming of ſo great and puiſſant an Enemy, raiſed many a troubled thought in the Minds of ſo great a Multitude. Now were the beſieged Turks in great wants in Strigonium, as appeared by Letters intercepted from the Sanzack 1594 zack to the Baſſa of Buda, declaring unto him the hard eſtate of the beſieged, and humbly craving his promiſed help, without which the City could not, for want of Victuals, poſſibly be defended by the fainting Souldiers above three days. Which Letters being read in the Camp, cauſed great Preparation to be made for the continuing of the ſiege, and the withſtanding of the Enemy, whoſe coming was every hour expected. All this while the great Ordnance never ceaſed on either ſide; whereby many were ſlain, as well of the Chriſtians, as of the Turks, and amongſt others many of the Canoneers.

But foraſmuch as the riſe Fame of Sinan Baſſa's coming increaſed daily, and the Chriſtian Camp poſſeſſed with a general fear, gave unto the wiſe, juſt Suſpition of ſome great Miſchief likely to enſue; Matthias the General entered into Counſel with County Ferdinand Hardeck, the Lord Palſi, the Lord Ungenade, Preſident of the Counſel for the Wars, and Eraſmus Eraun, Governour of Comara, What was the beſt to be done in ſo dangerous a time. Who with general conſent agreed betimes, before the coming of Sinan, to raiſe the ſiege, and to remove with the Army into ſome place of more ſafety. Which their determinate Reſolution, the day following, being the ſix and twentieth of June, they made known to the other Princes and great Commanders in the Army; who wonderfully diſcontented therewith, eſpecially the Germans; both openly by word, and ſolemnly by writing, proteſted againſt the ſame, as moſt diſhonourable, and altogether made without their Knowledge or good likeing. To whom the Preſident of the Counſel for their further Satisfaction, declared, That the Enemy was coming with a very great Army, and even now at hand, whoſe ſtrength encreaſed daily, and with what Power he had purpoſed to aſſail them in their Tents, was uncertain; beſides that, it was manifeſtly know unto the World, how that in the former aſſaults they had loſt many of their beſt Souldiers, beſide others that died in the Camp; and that the Place wherein they lay encamped, was ſubject to many dangers; for which ſo urgent Cauſes the General had reſolved to raiſe his ſiege, and before the coming of ſo ſtrong an Enemy, to remove his Army into a place of more ſafety. Which Reaſons for all that, did not ſo well ſatiſfie the German Princes and Commanders, but that they ſtill urged their former Proteſtation, requeſting his Excellency to have them excuſed beforeGod and the World, if they yielding to his Command, as to their General, did that which they thought not altogether beſt, and which they would not otherwiſe have done. For the more Evidence whereof, the ſaid German Princes and great Commanders, cauſed their ſaid Proteſtation to be ſolemnly conceived in Writing, which they affirmed with their Seals, and ſubſcribed with their own hands in order as followeth: Francis, Duke of Saxony, Auguſtus, Duke of Brunſwick, Sebaſtian Schlick, County Wigand Maltzan, Erneſtus of Aſtan, Henry Phlugk, John Nicholas Ruſwormb, Henry Curwigger Heerrath, John Oberhauſan, Henry Rottcrch, Melchior of Nothwith.

The Arch-duke raiſeth his ſiege, and with his Army paſſeth the River.

But the Arch-duke, with the reſt, conſtant in their former Reſolution, firſt ſent away the great Ordnance, and raiſing the ſiege the 28*th* of June, followed after with the whole Army, paſſing over Danubius, not far from Kokara, doubtfully expecting what courſe Sinan the great Baſſa (who was then reported to be even at hand) would take. Yet before their departure, they ſet the old Town on fire, and raiſed the Fort St. Nicholas, before taken from the Enemy, which they had once purpoſed to have kept. This unexpected departure of the Chriſtians much gladded the beſieged Turks; who for want of Victuals, had not been able long to have holden out. 1594 Yet lay the Lord Teuffenbach ſtill at the ſiege of Hatwan, labouring by all means to take from the beſieged Turks their Water, and with Earth and Faggots to fill up their Ditches; which work he had now happily brought to ſome good Perfection. Whereof they in the Town by Letters advertiſed the Baſſa of Buda, and that except they were within the ſpace of three days relieved, they ſhould be enforced to yield the Town. Which their diſtreſs the Baſſa conſidering, with ſpeed aſſembled all his Forces, and ſo ſet forward to relieve them, hoping to have come upon the Chriſtians before they were aware of his coming. But Teuffenbach underſtanding thereof, with five thouſand choſen Horſemen went out of the Camp to meet him, and ſuddenly coming upon him, fearing no ſuch thing, ſlew five thouſand of the Turks, put the Baſſa to flight, and together with the Victory, obtained an exceeding rich Prey.

Hatwan in vain aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

Now was there no leſs expectation and hope of the winning or yielding up of Hatwan, than was before of Strigonium; but according to the chance of War, it fell out otherwiſe. For Teuffenbach having with continual battery laied the breaches fair open, and made choice of ſuch Souldiers as he thought meeteſt for the aſſault, was in the performing thereof ſo notably repulſed by the Turks, that he was glad to retire with the loſs of his beſt and moſt reſolute Souldiers; which put him out of all hope of taking the Town by force. For beſide the loſs of theſe good men, he had ſcarce ſo many ſound men left, as might ſuffice to furniſh his Gariſons for defence of thoſe Frontiers; by reaſon that the Hungarians were almoſt all ſhrunk home, and of the Germans were left ſcarce two thouſand. Beſides that, he had oftentimes craved new Supplies of the Arch-duke, but all in vain; for which Cauſes he was glad to abandon two ſtrong Forts he had built before Hatwan, and to leave the Town, now brought to great Extremity. Thus two notable Cities, which were now as it were in the hands of the Chriſtians, and by the recovery whereof, the broken ſtate of the afflicted Chriſtians in Hungary had been much ſtrengthned, were as it were again reſtored unto the barbarous and cruel Enemy.

Teuffenbach giveth over the ſiege of Hatwan.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Strigonium and Hatwan, the Raſcians (of whom we have before ſpoken) ſtriving ſtill more and more to rid themſelves from the Turkiſh Thraldom, gathered themſelves together to the number of fifteen thouſand, between Buda and Belgrade, under a General of their own chuſing. For fear of whom, the Baſſa of Temeſwar, with an Army of fourteen thouſand, went to fortifie and victual Lippa, doubting leſt it ſhould by them be ſurpriſed; but having done that he went for, in his return he was met with by the ſame Raſcians, and twice fought withall in one day, and both times put to the worſe, with the loſs of the greateſt part of his Army. After which Victory the Raſcians took Beczkerek, a ſtrong Town ſtanding in a Mariſh four miles from Belgrade, and ſlew all the Turks they found therein. After that, they took a Caſtle called Ottadt, and dealt with the Turks in like manner. From thence they went and beſieged Beche, a Caſtle ſtanding upon the River Tibiſcus or Teiſe, where the Town adjoyning unto it yielded preſently; but they in the Caſtle ſtanding a while upon their Guard, offered at laſt to yield alſo upon certain Conditions. But the Raſcians knowing that the Turks thereabouts had conveyed into the Caſtle the beſt part of their Wealth, and withal, that it was but weakly manned, would accept of no Conditions, but needs have it abſolutely delivered up to their Pleaſure. In the mean time the old Baſſa of Temeſwar, and his Son, knowing it to tend to their

their diſhonour to ſuffer this baſe People ſo to rage at their pleaſure about them, gathered together 11000 Turks, and ſo in great haſte came to relieve the beſieged Caſtle. Upon whom the Raſcians turned themſelves, and in plain Battel, overthrew the Baſſa, and ſo purſued the Victory, that of thoſe 11000 Turks ſcarcely eſcaped 1000; the Baſſa himſelf being there ſlain, and with him three Sanzacks, his Son eſcaped by flight. In this Battel the Raſcians took 18 great pieces of Artillery, and not long after took alſo Werſetza, and Lutz, two ſtrong places. After which ſo happy Succeſs, they ſent unto the Arch-duke Matthias for Aid, but eſpecially for Canoneers, profeſſing themſelves now utter Enemies unto the Turks. The Raſcians alſo about Temeſwar ſent word unto the other in the Camp that they would come and joyn with them; and they which inhabit the Country between the River Danubius and Tibiſcus, by Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe unto the Lord Teuffenbach (the Arch-dukes Lieutenant in the upper part of Hungary) offered in ſhort time to ſend him ten or twelve thouſand men, ſo that he would receive them and their Country into the Emperours Protection; which he eaſily granted them, and thereof aſſured them by writing. And to the Arch-duke himſelf they ſent alſo their truſty Meſſengers, requeſting him to ſend them a General to lead them, promiſing unto him all Obedience; which Meſſengers departing from them the fourteenth of June, ſhortly after returned with ſuch anſwer as was thought moſt convenient for their preſent State. Thus againſt the coming of Sinan, was Hungary almoſt all on a broil.

A Diet of the Empire holden at Ratisbone for the withſtanding of the Turks.

The Emperour grievouſly complaineth unto the Princes Electors and States of the Empire, of the Infidelity of the Turk, and craveth their Aid.

The Emperour, long before diſtruſting the Turks purpoſe for War, and well conſidering what a difficulty it would be for him with his own Forces only to withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy as Amurath, had by his Ambaſſadors prayed Aid of divers Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of them of the Empire, as thoſe whom this War concerned moſt. Wherefore he, after the antient and wonted manner of his State, in ſo common and imminent a danger, appointed a general Aſſembly of the Princes and States of the Empire, to be holden at Ratisbone, in the latter end of February; which, for ſundry urgent Cauſes was put off until March, and again until April, and ſo afterward until May. At which time the Emperour in Perſon himſelf, with the Princes Electors, and other the great States of the Empire, being met together with great Pomp at Ratisbone, and ſolemnly aſſembled in the Biſhops Palace, began there to ſit in Council the ſecond of June. Unto which Princes and States ſo aſſembled, after that the Emperour had firſt by the Mouth of Philip County Palatine of the Rhine, given great thanks for their ſo ready appearance, and briefly declared the Cauſe of their Aſſembly; he himſelf, after ſome complaint made of the Turkiſh Infidelity, in expreſs words declared unto them, how that he by his Ambaſſador then lying at Conſtantinople, had in the year 1591, made a League for eight years, with the preſent Turkiſh Sultan Amurath; which League Amurath himſelf had approved and confirmed, and thereof ſent him publick and ſolemn Inſtruments; wherein it was provided, That no hoſtility ſhould be on either ſide during that time attempted. And yet notwithſtanding that, he, contrary to his Faith given, as an hereditary Enemy of the Chriſtians, had violated this League, and by ſundry Incurſions barbarouſly ſpoiled and waſted, not Hungary only, but other of his Imperial Provinces alſo; but eſpecially by Haſſan, Baſſa of Boſna, who, firſt with a ſtrong Army beſieged, battered and took Repitz, an antient frontier Caſtle, and after that, Wihitz, Drenik, Craſſowitz, with other Places of Name; and had in his Dominion and Territory built Petrinia, a moſt ſtrong Fort, hurtful to all that Country, out of which he had done incredible miſchief in Croatia, Windiſmarch, and the moſt fruitful Iſland Turopolis; and had out of thoſe Places carried away above 35000 Chriſtians into moſt miſerable Captivity. Of which ſhameful Injuries and breaches of Faith he had many times by his Ambaſſadors complained unto the Turkiſh Sultan at Conſtantinople; and requeſted that all hoſtility ſet apart, due Reſtitution might have been made; but to have therein prevailed nothing, and that the ſame Baſſa, inſtead of condign Puniſhment, had been for the doing thereof, honoured by the great Sultan his Lord with honourable Gifts, the ſure Tokens of his Favour. Whereby he was ſo confirmed in his barbarous Proceedings, that he began to make open War, and having raiſed a full Army, and ſtrengthned alſo with certain Companies of Janizaries ſent from the Court, had paſſed over the River of Kulp, and beſieged the Caſtle of Siſeg; but by the juſt Judgment of God, the Revenger of Wrongs, had there received the Reward of his faithleſs and cruel dealing, being there ſlain, and almoſt all his Army utterly deſtroyed by his ſmall Forces, raiſed in haſte for his own lawful defence. Nevertheleſs the faithleſs Turk (as if he had been highly wronged himſelf) to have made this his breach both of League and Faith forthwith known to all the World, by commanding open War to be ſolemnly proclaimed againſt the Kingdom of Hungary, both in Conſtantinople and Buda; and by the Beglerbeg of Greece, to have again beſieged and taken the ſtrong Fortreſs of Siſeg. Whereas, on the other ſide, becauſe nothing ſhould on his part be wanting, which might make his deſire of Peace more known, he had again, and oftentimes by his Ambaſſador put the Turk in remembrance of his League, made and confirmed by his Faith. Who for all that, had changed nothing of his Purpoſe, but ſent his great Viſier, Sinan Baſſa, with the Beglerbeg of Gracia, and many inferiour Baſſaes and Sanzacks into Hungary, who with Fire and Sword inforced the Inhabitants and Country-People (ſuch as they left alive) to ſwear to the Turk Obedience, and to become his Subjects; and at the ſame time took Veſprinium and Palotta, two famous Fortreſſes of that Kingdom. And that the ſame Baſſa, by Commandment from his Lord and Maſter, had, contrary to the Law of Nations, impriſoned Frederick Kreckowitz his Ambaſſador, firſt at Conſtantinople, and cauſed the greater part of his Followers to be thruſt into the Gallies; and afterwards to have ſent him with a few of his Servants to Belgrade, and there to have kept him ſo long in Priſon, that he there miſerably died. In Revenge of which ſo great and open wrong, and for the defence and comfort of his afflicted Subjects ſo near the Enemy, he had raiſed a good ſtrength both of Horſe and Foot; by whoſe help and the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, the Baſſa of Boſna had reaped the Fruit of his perfidious dealing; as had alſo the Baſſa of Buda, with many thouſands of their great Souldiers, overthrown near unto Alba-Regalis, beſides many of their Caſtles and Towns taken or razed. Yet for all that, was it eaſie to be ſeen, theſe ſo great Victories, by the goodneſs of God, had and obtained againſt ſo mighty and cruel an Enemy, not to ſuffice; but that there was ſtill need of a perſeverant and continual ſupply for the maintenance of a perpetual War; and that it was daily to be expected, or rather, even now, preſently to be deſcried, That the Turk in his quarrel (which he deemed always juſt againſt the Chriſtians) and in revenge of theſe overthrows, would draw forth all his Forces, and adventure his whole Strength. For which Cauſes he had by the Knowledge and Conſent of the Princes Electors of the Sacred Empire, appointed that that preſent Diet of the Empire; and not for the aforeſaid Cauſes only, but for divers others, both neceſſary and weighty alſo; as the general Peace of the Empire, the Pacification of the Low-countries, the Reformation of Juſtice, and amendment of the Coin; but eſpecially, and above all other things, to make it known unto the World, how much it concerned to have the Turks Pride betime abated, and ſome effectual defence for Hungary (now in danger) at length provided; being the moſt ſure defence and ſtrongeſt bulwark of that part of Chriſtendom. And that whereas his own hereditary Provinces were not of themſelves alone ſufficient to maintain ſo chargeable a War, he therefore requeſted the Electors, Princes and States, both preſent and abſent, not to grudge to be preſent with their Help, their Counſel, and whatſoever elſe ſhould be needful againſt ſo puiſſant and dangerous an Enemy. So ending his Speech, he cauſed all his demands, before conceived into Writing, to be read, and ſo delivered unto them. For anſwer whereunto, the Princes Electors, and others there preſent, required time. Which granted, after many ſittings and long Conſultations, they at laſt with one conſent anſwered, That it was a hard matter, by reaſon of the late dearth, and other like Occaſions, for them to grant ſuch Help and Aid as the Emperour had in Writing required; yet having before their Eyes the great and imminent danger wherein the Chriſtian Common-weal then ſtood, they, not regarding their own proper and near Difficulties, had, in regard of his Sacred and Imperial Majeſty, for the comfort and defence of the endangered Chriſtians, and for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh Fury, of their own free Will and meer Compaſſion, granted, beſide their accuſtomed Contribution, ſuch farther relief for the ſpace of ſix years, as they thought ſufficient for the maintenance of a defenſive War, both for the preſent, and for the time to come. What was by them farther decreed concerning the Emperours other demands, as not pertinent to our purpoſe, we willingly paſs over.

Of all theſe things, as alſo whatſoever elſe had hapned at Strigonium, Hatwan, or other Places of Hungary, was not Sinan Baſſa ignorant; who now, even upon the departure of the Chriſtians from Strigonium, was come with an huge Army between Buda and Alba-Regalis; unto whom forty thouſand Tartars, that by force had made themſelves way through Podolia, and the upper part of Hungary, had joyned themſelves; ſo that in his Army were reckoned above 150000 fighting-men, to the great Terrour, not only of Hungary, Auſtria, Stiria, Croatia, Bohemia, and the Provinces thereabout, but alſo of the whole State of Germany. With this great Army the old Baſſa had purpoſed to have over-whelmed the Chriſtians in their Camp at Strigonium; but now that they were before his coming departed over the River towards Comara, he reſolved to keep on his way, and to beſiege the ſtrong City Jaurinum, now called Rab: and to make all ſure before him, he thought it beſt to take Dotis in his way, a ſtrong Town of the Chriſtians in the mid-way between Strigonium and Rab, about five Hungarian miles ſhort of Rab. The Chriſtian Army, but newly paſſed over Danubius, in marching toward Comara, might ſee the Mountains and Fields on the other ſide of the River all covered with the Multitude of the Turks Army; who, though they were indeed many, yet marching diſperſedly, made ſhew of more than in truth they were. So both Armies marching in ſight the one of the other, and ſeparated only with the River, held on their way, the Chriſtians to Comara, where they encamped under the very Walls of the City, yet in ſuch ſort, as that they might afar off well deſcry one another; and the Turks towards Dotis, where the Baſſa with all his Army encamped the one and twentieth day of July. The Night following, having planted his battery, he began in furious manner to batter the Caſtle, the chief ſtrength of the Town, the Chriſtian Army looking on, but not daring at ſo great odds to relieve their diſtreſſed Friends. So whilſt the Baſſa granteth no breathing while unto the beſieged, but tyring them out with continual Battery and Alarms, they of the Town, deſpairing of their own ſtrength, and to be able for any long time to hold out againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, within three days after yielded up the Town, being in that ſhort time ſore battered, and in divers places undermined; yet with this Condition, That it ſhould be lawful for the Garriſon Souldiers and Townſmen, with their Wives and Children, in ſafety to depart. Which was by the Baſſa frankly granted unto them, but not ſo faithfully performed; for at their departure, many of their Wives and Children were ſtayed by the Turks, and the Lord Baxi, Governour of the Town, fouly intreated. Immediately after, the Baſſa without much ado took the Caſtle of St. Martins alſo, not far from Dotis, being by the Captain yielded unto him.

Dotis and St. Martins yielded unto the Turks.

In the mean time, the Country Villages round about, forſaken of the poor Chriſtians, were by the Turks moſt miſerably burnt, and all the Country lay'd waſte. Yea, ſome of the fore-runners of the Turks Army paſſing over the River Rabnitz, ran into the Country as far as Altenburg, within five miles of Vienna, burning the Country Villages as they went, and killing the poor People; or that worſe was, carrying them away into perpetual Captivity: yet not without ſome loſs, four hundred of theſe roaming Forreigners being cut off by the Lord Nadaſti. Palſi alſo, and Brun, Governour of Comara, following in the tail of the Turks Army, ſet upon them that had the charge of the Victuals, of whom they ſlew a great number, took an 120 of them Priſoners, and an 150 Camels, and 30 Mules laded with Meal and Rice, which they carried away with them to Comara.

Dotis and St. Martins thus taken, Sinan Baſſa, conſtant in his former Determination, ſet forward again towards Rab, and being come within a mile of the City, there encamped; the Chriſtian Army then lying not far off on the other ſide of the River. The City of Rab is a ſtrong and populous City, honoured with a Biſhops See, and was worthily accounted the ſtrongeſt Bulwark of Vienna, from whence it is diſtant about twelve German miles, ſtanding upon the South ſide of Danubius, whence the River dividing it ſelf, maketh a moſt fertile Iſland called Schut; in the Eaſt point whereof ſtandeth the ſtrong City of Comara. The defence of this City of Rab was committed to County Hardeck, a man of greater Courage than Fidelity, with a Garriſon of twelve hundred choice Souldiers; unto whom, a little before the coming of the Baſſa, were certain Companies of Italians joyned, who, together with the Citizens, made up the number of five thouſand able men; a ſtrength in all mens judgment, ſufficient for the long defence of that Place. The laſt of July, Matthias, the Archduke, about the going down of the Sun, departing out of the City of Rab, over the River into the Iſland over againſt it, came Sinan Baſſa with his huge Army and beſet it round, caſting up Trenches and Mounts, whereon he skillfully placed his Gabions and great Artillery, and whatſoever elſe was neceſſary for ſo great a ſiege; and that with ſuch Celerity as was to the Beholders thought moſt ſtrange. The ſecond of Auguſt, he with great Fury battered the City, and brought his Trenches within Muſquet ſhot of the Walls. At which time four thouſand Tartarian Horſemen ſwam over the Danubius, between Rab and Comara, after whom followed ſix thouſand Turks, who being with much ado got over to the farther ſide, ſuddenly ſurpriſed a Fort of the Chriſtians next unto the River, and forthwith turning five great pieces of Ordnance which they found therein, diſcharged them upon the Camp of the Chriſtians; who, terrified with the ſudden accident, riſe up all in Arms, and hardly charging thoſe deſperate adventurers, ſlew many of them, eſpecially ſuch as ſeeking after booty, had diſperſed themſelves from their Fellows, and forced the reſt again to take the Water, wherein moſt of them periſhed. About five days after, the Tartarians (living for the moſt part upon prey) ſwam again over the River, and upon the ſudden burnt a Village in the Iſland, and ſlew certain Chriſtians in their Tents; but being quickly encountred by the Chriſtian Horſemen, they were eaſily overthrown and many of them ſlain; the reſt, caſting away their Weapons, and forſaking their Horſes, ran head-long into the River, truſting more to their ſwimming than to their fighting; whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, in the very River ſlew about two thouſand of them; and by this Victory obtained many of the Tartarians ſwift Horſes, with their Scimitars, their Bows and Arrows, and ſuch Enſigns as they had. All this while, Sinan Baſſa, without intermiſſion, lay thundring with ſixty great pieces of battery againſt the City, but to little or ſmall purpoſe, for as yet he had made no breach whereby to enter, but the harm that was done was upon the Towers, or high built Houſes, or in the Camp, by ſuch random ſhot, as flying over the Town, fell by chance among the Tents of the Chriſtians. And the Janizaries, intentive to all opportunities, in a great Rain, furiouſly, and with a moſt horrible cry, (as their manner is) aſſaulted an utter Bulwark of the Chriſtians; which they for fear forſook, and retired themſelves into the City. Upon which Bulwark ſo taken, the Janizaries had ſet up three of their Enſigns: when the Chriſtians, aſhamed of that they had done, and better adviſed, taking courage unto them, forthwith ſallied out again, and courageouſly charging the Janizaries, but now entred, ſlew many of them, and recovered again the Bulwark.

A Baſſa ſlain.

Sinan Baſſa, leaving nothing unattempted that might further his deſire for the winning of the City, was now caſting up a great Mount againſt the City; which whilſt he daily ſurveyed, he chanced to fall ſick, and therefore appointed one of the Baſſaes in his own ſtead, to overſee the work; who, whilſt he was walking too and fro, haſtening the work, and commanding this and that thing to be done, was taken with a ſhot out of the Town and ſlain.

A fight in the River betwixt the Turks and the Tartars.

The fifteenth of Auguſt, certain Turks before the riſing of the Sun, getting over Danubius in Boats, aſſailed a Fort of the Chriſtians; which the Souldiers that had the keeping of it, preſently forſook and left it to the Enemy. Which John de Medices, lately come into the Camp with two thouſand Italians, perceiving, forthwith came to the reſcue of the Fort, drove out the Turks, and having ſlain divers of them, forced the reſt into the River, where they were all drowned. At which time five thouſand Tartars in another Place paſſing over the River into the Iſland, were encountred by the Lord Palſi, and the Huſſars his Followers, and without any great reſiſtance put to flight, wherein many of them were ſlain; the reſt taking the River, were in good hope to have got over, and ſo to have ſaved themſelves; but other Turks meeting them in the River, would with their Weapons have beaten them back, and ſtayed their flight; againſt whom the Tartars oppoſing themſelves, made with them in the very River a moſt cruel fight, but with ſuch loſs unto the Tartars, that of the five thouſand which adventured over, few returned to carry News unto their Fellows, how they had ſped. Now began great ſcarcity of Victuals in the Turks Camp, ſo that the Souldiers were fain to feed upon unripe Fruit, and ſuch other unwholſome things, whereof enſued the bloody Flux, and many other dangerous Diſeaſes; which raging amongſt them, did wonderfully conſume the Baſſa's Army. Beſide that, they of the City with continual ſhot had ſlain many, and amongſt them a Son-in-law of the great Baſſaes, whoſe death he is reported to have taken ſo unpatiently, that he fell ſick for Grief, but in ſhort time after paſſed it over, and recovered again.

The Tartars, not yet warned by their often loſſes, but paſſing again over the River into the Iſland the nineteenth of this Month, were there 3000 of them ſlain. In the mean time, certain Companies alſo of the Turks, having ſecretly paſſed the River, in another quarter aſſailed the Chriſtians in their Camp; in which hurly-burly, other of the Tartars got over the River not far from Comara, hoping now at length to perform ſome great matter, which they had before to their coſt vainly attempted; but finding the Turks overthrown before their coming, and the Chriſtians (contrary to their expectation) in Arms ready to receive them, they were eaſily diſcomfited, and two thouſand of them ſlain. In this conflict the Sanzack of Strigonium, with two others, and many more of great account among the Turks, periſhed. Shortly after, the Chriſtians ſallying out of the City, ſlew a great number of the Turks, and ſo retired with ſmall loſs. Thus was the Turks Army daily diminiſhed, beſides that, the want of Victuals, with the Bloody-flux, ſo increaſed, that many perſwaded the Baſſa to have raiſed his ſiege, and to have removed with his Army to ſome other more wholſom place, and of greater plenty; but he, reſolutely ſet down not to depart before he had either won the Town, or enforced them therein to yield, would not hearken to any perſwaſions to the contrary.

Whilſt Sinan thus lay at the ſiege at Rab, Maximilian, the Emperour's Brother, took Craſtowitz, a Fortreſs of the Turks, upon the borders of Croatia, and put to the Sword all the Turks there in Garriſon. After that, he laid ſiege to Petrinia, a ſtrong Fortreſs of the Turks, which they but a few years before had contrary to the League built in the Emperour's Territory, for the annoying of Croatia, and for the exceeding ſtrength thereof, was thought almoſt impregnable. Yet ſuch was the Induſtry of Maximilian and his Souldiers, that what with continual battery and mines, they ſo terrified the Turks there in Garriſon, that they for fear ſet fire on the Fort, and flying away by Night, made ſhift every man for himſelf as he might: Which they in the Caſtle of Siſeg hearing, ſet fire alſo upon it, and ſo left it to the Chriſtians: Whoſe Example they alſo of Gara followed; by which ſo proſperous and happy Succeſs of Maximilian's, not the Frontiers only, but even the whole Country of Croatia was for that time delivered of a wonderful trouble and no leſs danger.

A great skirmiſh betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

The eight and twentieth day of Auguſt, twenty thouſand of the Chriſtians paſſing over the River by a Bridge out of the Iſland, and joyning with them of the Town, ſallied out upon the Turks Camp; the Hungarian Heidons in the foreward at the firſt Onſet took two of the Turks Bulwarks, and having beaten out the Enemies, cloyed certain of their great pieces; but the Turks returning with greater power, enforced the Chriſtians to retire, and recovered again their loſt Bulwarks. In this conflict many were ſlain, as well Chriſtians as Turks. In the mean while Thonhauſe, a great Captain of the Chriſtians, ſtians, and Geitzhofler, County Hardeck's Lieutenant, with fifteen hundred Hungarians and German Foot came in great Boats to have holpen their Fellows, but landing ſomewhat too late, they were by the Enemy beaten back, and inforced with ſuch ſpeed to retire, that many of them being not able to recover the Boats, were drowned in the River; amongſt whom, Geitzhofler himſelf periſhed, and Thonhauſe was deadly wounded in his Breaſt. Yet the Chriſtians, not diſcouraged with this loſs, but gathering themſelves together under the very Walls of the City, gave a ſecond aſſault unto the Enemy; in the foreward were the Footmen, who were by the Enemies Horſemen eaſily repulſed; but by the coming in of the Lord Rhinsberg, (who was at the firſt onſet ſlain) the Turks were inforced into their Trenches, except ſome few, which, divided from the reſt, hid themſelves in the Vineyards, but being found out by the Chriſtians, were there all ſlain. In this Skirmiſh the Lord Palſi was grievouſly wounded in his Thigh. Of the Chriſtians were ſlain four hundred, and of the Turks about two thouſand. Theſe conflicts endured from ſeven a Clock in the Morning until twelve, at which time the Chriſtians returning into the City, and ſo into the Camp, amongſt other ſpoiles, carried away with them ſeventeen of the Enemies Enſigns.

Two thouſand Turks ſlain, and ſeventeen of their Enſigns taken.

No day now paſſing without ſome skirmiſh, at length, the ninth of September, ten thouſand Turks, ſome in Boats, ſome by other means, having got over the River of Danubius into the Iſland of Schut, ſuddenly ſet upon the Chriſtians, all ſleeping in ſecurity, and little fearing any ſuch danger; of whom they ſlew about two thouſand, and after ſome ſmall fight put the reſt to moſt ſhameful flight, in ſuch ſort, that Matthias, the Arch-duke himſelf, with the other Noblemen and Captains, had much ado by flight to eſcape. Thus, whilſt every man ſurpriſed with fear, made what ſhift he could for himſelf, the Enemy in the mean time entred the Trenches, took their Tents, their great Ordnance, the Shot and Powder, and all the Money, which but a little before was brought for the Souldiers Pay; beſides, about a thouſand Waggons, and two hundred Boats well loaded with Proviſion for the Camp, and ten Gallies, wherein were an hundred and twenty pieces of great Ordnance. The loſs received this day was valued at 500000 Duckats. And albeit that this Victory coſt the Turks two thouſand and five hundred of their lives, yet thereby they gained the maſtery, both upon the River and the Land; ſo that now, roming far and near, without reſiſtance, they ſpoiled the Country all about, and burnt certain Country Villages not far from Vienna; ſo that for many miles ſpace the Country Towns were for fear of the Enemy forſaken by the Inhabitants, of whom ſome were taken and ſlain, ſome carried into Captivity, and ſome others, (reſerved to a better Fortune) with ſuch things as they had, got themſelves farther off into Places of more ſecurity. And the more to increaſe theſe calamities, the Tartars ſhortly after paſſing over Danubius, near unto Altenburg, firſt ſacked Weiſenburg, and after burnt it, with certain Towns thereabout; but adventuring to have gone farther into the Country, they were with loſs inforced to return.

A great ſpoil taken by the Turks.

Whilſt the Turks thus prevailed in Hungary, Cicala Baſſa, the Turks Admiral then at Sea, with a Fleet of Gallies, landing his Men in divers places of Italy, did exceeding much harm, but eſpecially in Calabria, where he upon a ſudden ſurpriſed Rhegium, rifled the Town, and afterwards burnt it: From thence taking his courſe towards Sicilia, he, in the ſight of Meſſana, landed certain of his Men; who, adventuring too far a ſhore, were by the Country People overthrown and put to flight. So the Turks returning again to Regium, utterly razed what they had before left of that Town. In the mean time, not far from Meſſana, even in the ſight of the Garriſon of the Town, they took a certain Ship coming out of the Eaſt Countries, and three other coming from Apulia. Afterward, chancing upon certain Gallies of the Eaſt, they changed ſome few ſhot with them, but to no great purpoſe; and ſo turning their courſe, and ſailing along the Coaſt of Calabria, they oftentimes landed certain Companies, which, skirmiſhing with the Calabrians, had ſometime the better, and ſometime the worſe, and ſo with ſuch Fortune as befell them, were again received into their Gallies. They of Meſſana, unto whoſe eyes thoſe dangers were daily preſented, both by Letters and ſpeedy Meſſengers, gave the Viceroy knowledge thereof, (who then for his pleaſure lay at Palermo) requeſting his preſent Aid; but he dallying off the time, they, for the more ſafegard of the City and of the Sea Coaſt, of themſelves raiſed five hundred Horſemen, whom they committed to the Leading of Philip Cicala, the Renegade Turkiſh Admiral's Brother; and beſide, ſtored the City with all ſuch things as they thought neceſſary for the enduring of a Siege, if it ſhould chance the Turk to have any ſuch purpoſe; of all which they certified the King of Spain, as alſo of the negligence of the Viceroy, requeſting his ſpeedy Aid againſt theſe Terrours of the Turks. In the mean while, the Neapolitans, for ſafegard of their Coaſt put to Sea thirty Gallies; unto whom the Pope, the Duke of Florence, the Genowaies, and the Knights of Malta joyned alſo theirs; in all, to the number of about eighty Gallies, under the conduct of Auria. The provident Venetians alſo, although they were as then in League with the Turk; yet for the ſafety of their State, put to Sea a Fleet of about an hundred Sail, ſome Ships, ſome Gallies, under the leading of Foſcarin, their Admiral. Which two Fleets ſailing up and down thoſe Seas, delivered Italy, Sicily, Dalmatia, with many Provinces and Iſlands of the Chriſtians, of a great fear.

Regium razed by the Turks.

Sinan Baſſa, having before encouraged his Souldiers with great hope and large Promiſes, commanded an Aſſault to be given to the City of Rab; which was accordingly by them begun the twenty third of September, the Sun being as yet ſcarce up, and furiouſly maintained all that day from Morning until Night: But they of the Town ſo valiantly defended themſelves, that at laſt the Turks were glad to give over the Aſſault, and with loſs to retire. Nevertheleſs, the next day the Aſſault was again renewed, and moſt deſperately continued by the ſpace of two days; wherein twelve thouſand of the Turks there loſt their lives, the other with ſhame retiring themſelves into their Trenches. In few days after, the Turks by a Mine blew up one of the Bulwarks of the Town, with the fall whereof the Town-Ditch was in that place ſomewhat filled; whereby the Turks with all their Power attempted thrice the next day to have entred, but were by the Valour of the Defendants ſtill notably with loſs repulſed. Yet notwithſtanding all this cheerfulneſs and courageouſneſs of them in the Town, the Puiſſant Enemy ceaſed not with continual battery and furious aſſaults to attempt the City, until that at length he had gained two of the Bulwarks, from whence he might, to his great advantage, by the rubbiſh and earth fallen out of the battered Bulwarks and Rampiers, have acceſs unto the Town, to the great terrour of the Defendants. Whereupon County Hardeck, the Governour (who, corrupted by the Turk, had of purpoſe many times before ſaid that the Town could not poſſibly be long defended) now took occaſion to enter into Counſel with the other Captains of the Town, (divers of whom he had already framed to his purpoſe) what courſe were beſt to take for the yielding of it up. And ſo after a little Conſultation, holden more for faſhion-ſake, than for that he doubted what to do; reſolved to ſend a Meſſenger unto the Baſſa, for a Truce to be granted for a while, to ſee if haply in the mean time ſome reaſonable Compoſition might be agreed upon. Yet the Governour, conſidering into what ſcorn and danger he ſhould expoſe himſelf, by yielding up of ſo ſtrong a Town, to colour the matter, and to excuſe his doings unto the reſt of the Nobility and Garriſons of Hungary, cauſed a publick Inſtrument to be made in his and all the reſt of the Captains Names conceived in Writing; wherein they ſolemnly proteſted unto the World, That foraſmuch as it was impoſſible (by reaſon of the weakneſs of the Garriſon) for them longer to defend the Town againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, without new Supplies inſtead of them that were ſlain, (which they had oftentimes in vain requeſted) they were therefore of neceſſity inforced to come to Compoſition with the Enemy. Which Proteſtation ſo made, the Governour with the chief Captains confirmed with their Hands and Seals. So after a Truce granted, and Pledges given on both ſides, at length it was agreed upon, That all the Garriſon Souldiers, together with the County and other Captains, ſhould in Arms with Enſigns diſplaied, with Bag and Baggage depart in ſafety, and with a ſafe Convoy be brought to Altenburg. Which Agreement, though by Oath confirmed, was not on the Turks part altogether performed; for when the County had the 29th day of September, at ten a Clock in the Forenoon, delivered up the City to the Baſſa, and the Chriſtian Garriſon was all come out, the County himſelf, with a few of his Friends, was with a Convoy of Turks brought in ſafety to the appointed place; but the Italians, and other Garriſon Souldiers that came behind, and ought to have been by the Governour protected, were, contrary to the Turks promiſe, ſpoiled of all that they had, and hardly eſcaping with Life, came that Night to Hochſtrate, and the next day to Altenburg. Thus was Rab, one of the ſtrongeſt Bulwarks of Chriſtendom, traiterouſly delivered unto the moſt mortal Enemy of the Chriſtian Religion; being even then when it was given up, victualled for a year, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſary for defence; all which Proviſion, together with the City, fell into the hands of the faithleſs Enemy. A loſs never to have been ſufficiently lamented, had it not been about four years after, even as it were miraculouſly again recovered, to the great rejoycing of all that ſide of Chriſtendom, as in the Proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall appear.

County Hardec corrupted by the Turks, yieldeth the ſtrong Town of Rab unto Sinan Baſſa.

Sinan, glad of this victory, as the greateſt Trophy of his Maſters glory over the Chriſtians, gave him ſpeedy knowledge therof, both by Letters and Meſſengers. Of whom he was for that good ſervice highly commended, and afterward bountifully rewarded: for now had Amurath already in hope devoured all Auſtria, with the Provinces thereabout. The great Baſſa, becauſe he would not with too long ſtay hinder the courſe of this victory, without delay repaired the rent City, new fortified the battered Bulwarks, enlarged the Ditches, and filled the Cathedral Church with earth, in manner of a ſtrong Bulwark, whereupon he planted great ſtore of great Ordnance: and with exceeding ſpeed diſpatched all things neceſſary for the holding of the place. In the mean time he ſent certain Tartars to ſummon the Town and Caſtle of Pappa: which Caſtle and little Town ſubject thereunto, the Chriſtians the night following ſet on fire, becauſe it ſhould not ſtand the Enemy in any ſtead for the farther troubling of the countrey; and ſo fled.

Rab repaired by the Turks.

The Baſſa, having at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things in Rab, and leaving there four thouſand Janizaries, and two thouſand Horſemen in Garriſon, departed thence with his Army and laid ſiege to Komara, a ſtrong Town of that moſt fertile Iſland, which the Hungarians call Schut; which, ſcituated in the very point thereof, about four miles from Rab, is on the Eaſt, South, and North, incloſed with the two Arms of Danubius. All theſe ways Sinan with his Fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laid hard ſiege unto the Town, and gave thereunto divers aſſaults; and by Land, the Beglerbeg of Greece, ceaſed not both by continual battery and Mines, to ſhake the Walls and Bulwarks thereof. Thus was the City on all ſides, both by Water and by Land, hardly laid unto. But the Chriſtians within, with no leſs Courage defended themſelves and the City, than did the Turks aſſail them; ſhewing indeed, that the Liberty of their Religion and Country, was unto them dearer than their Lives. Matthias, the Arch-duke, in the mean time, not ignorant how much it concerned the Emperour his Brother to have this City defended; having, after his late overthrow, gathered together a good Army of Germans, Bohemians, and Hungarians, reſolved to go and raiſe the ſiege; and ſo marching forward with his Army, came and encamped the 28th day of October at Nitria, about five miles from Komara. Now were the Tartars a little before departed from the Camp, with purpoſe to return home; yea, the Turks themſelves, weary of the Siege, and wanting Victual both for themſelves and their Horſes, began alſo, as men diſcouraged, to ſhrink away. Which the Baſſa well conſidering, thought it not beſt with his heartleſs Souldiers and Army, now ſore weakned, to abide the coming of the Chriſtians; and therefore upon their approach he forthwith forſook the City, which he had by the ſpace of three weeks hardly beſieged, and by a Bridg made of Boats, tranſported his Army and Artillery over Danubius to Dotis, where he the next day after brake up his Army. Immediately after the Turks were thus departed, the Arch-duke arrived at Komara, where he with great Diligence cauſed the Breaches to be repaired, the Mines to be filled up, and new Bulwarks and Rampiers to be made in divers Places for the more ſtrength of the City, leaving the charge thereof ſtill unto the Lord Braun the old Governour, who in the defence thereof, had received a grievous Wound in his right Knee; of whom alſo this notable Fact is reported. The Baſſa, in time of the late ſiege of Komara, under the Colour of a Parley, had ſent five Turks into the City to the Governour, but indeed to prove if he were by any means to be won to yield up the City, and not to hold it out to the laſt. The faithful Governour, having given them the hearing until they had diſcharged their whole Treachery, preſently cauſed four of their Heads to be ſtrucken off, and to be ſet upon long Pikes upon one of the Bulwarks for the Baſſa to look upon; but the fifth (the beholder of this Tragedy) he ſent back unto the Baſſa, to tell him, That although he had found one in Rab to ſerve his turn, he was much deceived, if in him he thought to find County Hardeck, and that he wiſhed rather to die the Emperours faithful Servant in the blood of the Turks, than to betray the City committed to his Charge.

Komara beſieged by Sinan Baſſa.

Sinan Baſſa raiſeth his ſiege.

County Hardeck, late Governour of Rab, generally before ſuſpected to have treacherouſly betrayed that ſtrong Town unto the Baſſa, was therefore ſent for to Vienna, and there by the Emperours Commandment committed to Priſon. Where, among many things laid to his Charge, as that he ſhould in the beginning of the ſiege, negligently have ſuffered many things to be done by the Enemy, which afterwards turned to the great danger of the Town; and that in the time of the ſiege, he had cauſed ſome of the Canoneers to diſcharge certain great Pieces againſt the Enemy, with Powder only, without Shot; and that ſeeing one Piece among the reſt to do the Enemy much harm, he had cauſed the ſame to be removed, and ſo placed, as that it ſerved to little or no uſe; beſide that, he (as it ſhould ſeem) making ſmall rekoning of the Town, ſhould oftentimes ſay, That if the Turks ſhould win it, he ſhould be but one Town the richer; with divers other ſuch things, giving juſt cauſe of ſuſpition. The thing that lay moſt heavy upon him, was the Teſtimony of one of Sinan Baſſa's Chamber, who being taken young by the Turks, and ſerving in the Baſſaes Chamber, was now fled from the Turks; and coming to the Arch-duke in the time of his ſiege, declared unto him, that there was Treaſon in his Camp; and that he, but three days before, by the Commandment of his Maſter, had delivered two bags full of Duckats unto two Chriſtians, of whom the one had a notable ſcar in his Face, and was afterwards known to have been one of the Counties Servants. Upon this and ſuch like Proofs, the County was, after many days hearing, in open Court, by the Judgment of ſeven and forty Noblemen and Captains of Name, condemned of Treaſon, and adjudged to be hanged, his dead Body to remain upon the Gallows by the ſpace of three days, and all his Lands and Goods to be confiſcate; the rigour of which Sentence was afterward by the Emperour mitigated, and the Traitor by him adjudged to have his right Hand (by him before given unto the Emperour in pawn of his Faith) and his Head ſtruck off upon a Scaffold at Vienna, and ſo buried. Which ſevere Sentence was afterwards accordingly put in Execution; for the tenth of June following, the Traitor being brought to the Scaffold, built of purpoſe in the high Street of Vienna, after the Sentence of his Condemnation there ſolemnly read, commending himſelf upon his knees to the Mercy of God, with his Eyes covered, and his right Hand laid upon a Block covered with black, had both his Hand and Head ſo ſuddenly ſtruck off by the Executioners, as that the Beholders could hardly judge which of them was firſt off. His dead Body with his Head and Hand, was preſently by his Servant wrapped in a black Cloth, and layed in his Coach, which ſtood there by of purpoſe covered with black, and was afterwards buried amongſt his Anceſtors.

County Hardeck condemned and executed for betraying of Rab.

The Tartars, but lately before departed from Sinans Camp, paſſing over Danubius at Strigonium, had purpoſed through the upper part of Hungary, and by the Borders of Tranſilvania and Moldavia, to have again returned into their Country; of whom two Companies falling into the hands of the Lord Palfi, were by him cut off, and utterly defeated; the reſt coming unto the Borders of Tranſilvania, and finding the Paſſages ſo beſet by the Prince and the Vayvod of Valachia, as that they could not without moſt manifeſt danger paſs that way, returned again the ſame way they came; and having rifled and burnt certain Towns and Villages in the upper Hungary about Tockay, paſſed the River again at Strigonium, and wintering at Veſprinium, Palotta, and other Places in the Country which is about Rab, lived upon the ſpoil of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians, upon the Frontiers of Auſtria, even as far as Meinerſdorf.

Theſe Tartars (of whom we have ſo often ſpoken) at their firſt coming to the Aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkiſh Sultan, ſtayed upon the Frontiers of Tranſylvania, of purpoſe to have ſurpriſed that Country, and either to have thruſt Sigiſmund Bator, the young Prince, out of the Government thereof, or elſe to have ſent him in bonds to Conſtantinople; for it was commonly reported, That he, weary of the heavy Tribute which he yearly payed unto the Turk, and had now after their greedy manner been divers times enhaunſed, had purpoſed to revolt from the Turkiſh Sultan, and to enter into Confederation with the Chriſtian Emperour. Which Innovation and Change, certain of the Nobility and chief States of Tranſylvania, ſought by all means to hinder; and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entring into Conſpiracy with the Tartars, undertook to deliver the whole Country into their Hands, and to ſend the Prince Priſoner to Huſt, where the Tartars then lay upon the Borders encamped. Wherefore, diſſembling their purpoſe, they cunningly perſwaded the Prince, that Samoſche, the great Chancellor of Polonia, in the Confines of his Country, lay with a great Power expecting his coming, to conſult with him of matters of great Importance: and the better to colour this their Treachery, they had counterfeited Letters to that effect from the Chancellor to the Prince, and had wrought ſo effectually, that the Prince, not ſuſpecting any ſuch Treaſon, gave credit to their Perſwaſions, and ſo put himſelf upon his way towards the Chancellor, (as he ſuppoſed;) but by the way, he was adviſed by ſome of his Friends, which had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter, not to go any farther, for that his coming was not intended by the Polonians his Friends, (as he was perſwaded) but by the Tartars his Enemies, who lay in wait for him at Huſt, to bereave him of his Life and Government. The Prince, aſtonied with the novelty of the matter, liſtned unto their Perſwaſion, and retired with his Train to the ſtrong Fort of Kebwere; where he ſtayed fourteen days, as if it had been only for fear of the Tartars. In the mean time, he gave notice to the Nobility and Governours of the Country, his Friends, of the imminent and common danger; who forthwith repaired unto him in Arms. But the Traytors proceeding in their purpoſe, ceaſed not to perſwade Bornemiſſa, who had the Leading of the Princes Army, That to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no ſmall danger; and that therefore, if he wiſhed well to his Country, he ſhould not have to do with them, but only ſhew himſelf near unto them, and that he was not unprovided for them; which was accordingly done, and the Tranſilvanian Army brought ſo nigh unto the Tartars, as that they might hear the noiſe of their Drums and Trumpets. Whereby the Tartars, as by the Watch-word, perceiving themſelves diſcovered, and nothing to fall out according to their Expectation, as had been unto them promiſed for the betraying of the Prince; they removed thence, and by another way breaking through the midſt of Tranſilvania, and ſo into Hungary, rifled and burnt five hundred Villages, ſlew all the Males that were above twelve years of Age, and carried away the reſt unto the Turkiſh Army, then lying at the ſiege of Rab. In the mean time the Traytors (when as this firſt Plot ſerved them not) conſpired to ſet up one Balthazor Bator, the young Princes nigh Kinſman, and with the good favour of Amurath, to prefer him to the Soveraign Government of their Countrey. Which their purpoſe the Prince perceiving, and doubting altogether to truſt unto the fidelity of his own Subjects; writ to his Neighbours, the Raſcians, and other his Confederates, praying their Aid in this his ſo dangerous and doubtful Eſtate. Which after he had received, he appointed a general Aſſembly of all his States to be holden at Clauſenburg, and that upon a great pain to be inflicted upon all ſuch as ſhould not there perſonally appear; ſo at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinal Bator, and Stephen his Brother, ther, who, guilty of ſo foul a Treaſon againſt their own Blood, were now before fled into Polonia. Being all thus met together, the Prince Commanded the Gates of the City to be ſhut, and diligent Watch and Ward to be kept, forbidding by open Proclamation, That any man upon pain of death ſhould ſo much as ſpeak of any imagined Treaſon. And at the ſame time, politickly cauſed to be publiſhed in Writing, how that the Germans had in the farther ſide of Hungary got a notable Victory over the Turks; for joy whereof he commanded Bonefires to be made, and the great Ordnance to be in Triumph ſhot off, with many other ſigns of joy and gladneſs; and withall, cauſed a notable Banquet to be prepared, whereunto, together with others, were invited alſo all the chief of the Conſpirators; of whom, even as they were at Dinner, and leaſt feared any ſuch matter, he commanded fourteen to be apprehended and committed to Priſon; and the next Morning cauſed five of them to be Executed in the open Market-place. The Principal of whom, who had undertaken to have himſelf ſlain the Prince, after three or four light cuts in the Neck, he cauſed to be drawn in pieces with four Horſes; the other four, namely, Alexander and Gabriel Gengi, Gregory Diaco, and Ladiſlaus Sallentz, were beheaded, and their dead Bodies all that day left in the Market Place for the People to behold; the reſt were alſo afterwards worthily executed: and Balthazor Bator, whom the Conſpirators had intended to have exalted, ſtrangled. Having thus revenged himſelf upon his Enemies, he by a publick Edict divulged through all his Dominion, gave leave to all his Subjects in general, of their own charge to take up Arms againſt the Turks, and whatſoever they could take from them, to have it to themſelves, as good priſe gotten from their lawful Enemies. By which unwonted Liberty, the Tranſilvanians, encouraged as with a great Bounty, armed themſelves on all hands, to the number of forty thouſand; who being muſtered and ſworn to hold together againſt the Turks, made their firſt Expedition towards Danubius; where, at their firſt arrival, by good hap they light upon certain of the Turks ſhips laded with Proviſion for the Camp, and Merchandiſe of all ſorts, and much Treaſure; of which rich Ships, they at the firſt Onſet took ſeven, but the eighth (being indeed the Admiral) eſcaped their hands. In theſe Ships they took an exceeding rich booty, ſlew many of the Turks, and in token of the Victory, carried back unto the Prince, ſeven of the Turkiſh Enſigns. This Victory cauſed great Joy in Tranſilvania, every man of ſo proſperous a beginning, conceiving good hope of moſt happy Succeſs. It is reported, that Sinan Baſſa hearing of this loſs, ſhould ſay, That if this Proviſion had come to him in ſafety, he could with that Treaſure more eaſily have bought Vienna in Auſtria, than he had Rab in Hungary. After this Victory the Prince laid ſiege to Temeſwar, but hearing of the return of the Tartars from the Turks Camp, and that they were coming toward Tranſilvania (as is before ſaid) he left Temeſwar, to look to the defence of his own Country.

The Conſpirators againſt the Prince, apprehended and executed.

Not long after, about the two and twentieth of December, a Tumult riſe among the Janizaries of the Court at Conſtantinople, which grew to ſuch an height, that in the heat thereof, one of the Baſſaes was by them ſlain, with ſome others of good account, and one of Amuraths Sons ſore wounded, and with much ado ſaved. Upon conceit whereof, Amurath for Anger and Grief fell into a fit of the falling ſickneſs (whereunto he was much ſubject) and was therewith for the ſpace of three Days and three Nights ſo grievouſly vexed, as if he ſhould have preſently given up the Ghoſt; ſo that the City was filled with heavineſs and fear, and the great men of the Court were even ready to think upon a new Lord. This Tumult of the inſolent Janizaries many ſuppoſed to have been the cauſe of Amurath's death, which ſhortly after enſued; his Grief and Malady increaſing daily by the evil News ſtill brought unto him both by Meſſengers and Letters, eſpecially out of Tranſilvania, where the Prince, waiting upon every occaſion, was ſtill at hand with the Turks, cutting them ſhort in every place; and in ſundry Roads which he made upon them this Month, took many of their Caſtles and Forts from them. He had at that time in the Field, in divers places, three Armies; one under the conduct of Geſty Ferens, in the Country of Lugaz, near unto Temeſwar; another under the leading of Michael Horwat, on the ſide of Danubius, to intercept the Turks coming to Buda; and the third commanded by Caſpar Cornoyſe, in the Country near to Giula, unto whom came ſhortly after fifteen hundred Horſemen out of the upper Hungary.

The Tranſilvanian Prince Sigiſmund Bator, thus lately revolted from the Turk, for the ſtrengthning of his State, thought it beſt betimes to enter into Confederation with his Neighbours of Valachia and Moldavia (who, moved by his Example, ſhortly after in like manner alſo caſt off the ſervile Yoke of the Turk) but eſpecially with the Chriſtian Emperour Rodolph. For which purpoſe he ſent Ambaſſadors honourably accompanied; who coming to Coſſovia in Hungary, the fourteenth of December, arrived at Prague the twelfth of January, with twenty Waggons, and an hundred and fifty Horſe, where they were by the Emperours appointment moſt honourably received, and royally entertained; and after a few days, having delivered unto the Emperour the ſum of their Embaſſage, which was for a Confederation to be made between the Emperour and the Prince; after much grave Conſultation and ſerious Diſcourſe, it was fully concluded and agreed upon; the chief Points whereof I thought it not amiſs here in brief to ſet down, for the ſatisfying of ſuch as deſire to know in what terms that worthy Prince, next Neighbour unto the Turk, then ſtood with the Chriſtian Emperour.

Firſt it was agreed upon, That the Emperour for himſelf, and for the States of Hungary, ſhould promiſe to proceed in his Wars begun againſt the common Enemy; and not to conclude any Peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the Prince. And that in all Concluſions of Peace to be made betwixt him and the Turk, the Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, ſhould be always compriſed; in regard whereof, the Prince likewiſe promiſed for himſelf, and the States of Tranſilvania, to proſecute the commenced War, and not to enter into any League with the Turk, without the knowledge and conſent of the Emperour and the Nobility of Hungary, and this to be confirmed by ſolemn Oath on both ſides.

The Capitulations of the League betwixt the Emperour and the Tranſilvanian Prince.

Secondly, That the Province of Tranſilvania, with all the Parts and Confines thereof, hitherto poſſeſſed by the Prince of Hungary, ſhould remain unto the ſaid Prince Sigiſmond, and to his Heirs Male, with all the Profits ariſing thereof, in ſuch ſort as they had done in the time of John, Stephen, and Chriſtopher, his Predeceſſors, to have therein a moſt free and abſolute Authority; yet ſo, as that they ſhould acknowledge his Imperial Majeſty, and his lawful Succeſſors for their lawful Sovereigns; unto whom they ſhould always ſwear their Fealty, but without any Homage doing: and that to be performed by his Succeſſors at the time of the change; but by the Prince himſelf, preſently after the confirming of this League. But that for lack of Heirs Male, the Country of Tranſilvania, with all

1595 all the Territories thereunto annexed, ſhould deſcend unto his Sacred Majeſty and his Succeſſours, the King of Hungary, as a true and inſeparable member thereof; whereunto the Prince, and all the States of Tranſilvania ſhould bind themſelves by ſolemn Oath. But yet, that at ſuch time as the Heirs Male ſhould fail in the line of the preſent Prince, and that the Country of Tranſilvania ſhould according to theſe preſent Conditions be devolved to the Crown of Hungary; as well his preſent Imperial and Royal Majeſty, as his Succeſſours, ſhould keep inviolate the antient Laws, Priviledges, and Cuſtoms of that Country, and always appoint one of the Nobility of Tranſilvania, to be Governour or Vayvod of the ſame, and no other Stranger.

Thirdly, That his Majeſty ſhould acknowledge the Prince of Tranſilvania for an abſolute Prince, and by ſpecial Charter confirm unto him the Title of Moſt Excellent.

Fourthly, That his Imperial Majeſty ſhould procure one of the Daughters of the late Archduke, Charles, his Uncle, for a Wife for the Prince, that as they were now to be joyned in League, ſo they might be joyned in Affinity alſo.

Fifthly, That the Emperour ſhould procure him to be made one of the Order of the Golden Fleece.

Sixthly, That the Prince might with more chearfulneſs and ſecurity make War againſt the common Enemy, his Imperial and Royal Majeſty ſhould not at any time, howſoever things fell out, forſake the ſaid Prince, or any of the Countries ſubject unto him; and even now preſently to aid him according as the preſent occaſion required, and afterward (if great need ſhould be) with greater help, whether it was by his General of Caſſovia, or others; and this giving of Aid to be on both ſides mutual and reciprocal, according as the neceſſity of the one or the other part ſhould require; and that where moſt need was, thither ſhould moſt help be converted.

Seventhly, That the ſacred Roman Empire ſhould take upon it the Protection and Defence of the Prince and his Territories; and that his Imperial Majeſty ſhould create the ſaid Prince, and the Prince's Succeſſors, Princes of the Empire; yet ſo, as that they ſhould have neither Voice nor Place among the ſaid Princes.

Eighthly, That whatſoever Caſtles, Towns, Cities, or other Places of Strength, ſhould by their common Forces be taken or recovered from the common Enemy, at ſuch time as his Imperial Majeſty ſhould ſend into the Field a full Army, ſhould be all his Majeſties; but ſuch Places as the Prince ſhould by his own Forces or Policy gain from the Enemy, ſhould remain unto the Prince himſelf. Yet that what Places ſoever the Prince ſhould recover, which at any time before belonged to the Kingdom of Hungary before it was taken by the Turk, thoſe he ſhould forthwith deliver to his Majeſty, as ſoon as reaſonable recompence were by him therefore made unto the Prince.

Ninthly, His Sacred Majeſty ſhould promiſe of his own Bounty to give unto his Excellency ſufficient Aid for the fortifying and defence of ſuch Places as ſhould be thought neceſſary for the behoof of the Chriſtians; as again the ſaid Prince ſhould likewiſe promiſe not to ſpare his own Coffers or Forces, that the ſame Places ſhould be throughly fortified and defended for the behoof of his Majeſty, and the common good of the Chriſtian Common-weal.

Laſtly, That foraſmuch as the Events of War are uncertain, and many things ſuddenly happen contrary to mens Expectation, if ſuch neceſſity ſhould chance unto his Excellency or his Succeſſors (which miſhap God forbid) that having ſpent themſelves, they ſhould not be able longer to defend their State and Country, but that the mighty Enemy prevailing, they ſhould at laſt be inforced to forſake the ſame; in this their Extremity, his Imperial and Royal Majeſty ſhould promiſe both for himſelf and his Succeſſors, within the ſpace of one Month to aſſign ſome certain Place in ſome other of his Dominions, where the ſaid Prince and his Succeſſors might honourably live; and the like regard to be had alſo of other ſuch principal men, as ſhould, together with the Prince, adventure their Lives and Livings in defence of the Chriſtian Common-weal.

Which Articles of Confederation agreed upon, and ſolemnly confirmed, the ſame Ambaſſadors were with all Kindneſs, Bounty, and Magnificence, diſmiſſed and ſent back again unto the Prince; who was not himſelf in the mean time idle, but labouring by all means he could to draw unto him Michael the Vayvod of Valachia (a man of no leſs worth than himſelf) and Aaron the Palatine of Moldavia, both of them then the Turks Tributaries; and by them to alienate from the Turk both thoſe Countries, that ſo with their combined Forces they might the better defend their Liberty, and withſtand their common Enemy; wherein he did ſo much, and prevailed ſo far with them both, that caſting off the Turks Obeiſance, they ſhortly after, to the great Benefit of the Chriſtian Common-weal, and no leſs hindrance of the Turks proceedings in Hungary, joyned hands both together with him for the recovery of their loſt Liberty. Which revolt of theſe bordering Princes, for that it ſo much concerned the common good, as that the ſafegard of Auſtria, and of the remnants of Hungary, with ſome good part of Germany alſo, is even by them that in thoſe matters ſaw much, not without cauſe ſuppoſed to have reſted therein; and that this noble Vayvod (of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter) was the ſecond Actor herein, it ſhall not be from our purpoſe to ſee the manner of his revolt alſo from the Turk, as we have already the Tranſilvanians. For the more Evidence whereof, as for the Honour of the man (whilſt he lived, a moſt worthy member of the Chriſtian Common-weal) we will a little ſtep back to ſee how he obtained of the great Turk this ſo honourable a Preferment, as was the Vayvodſhip of Valachia, not without his revolt long now to be holden.

Valachia oppreſſed by the Turks.

Alexander, the late Vayvod of Valachia, a Moldavian-born, and by Amurath himſelf promoted to that Dignity; proud above meaſure of this his ſo great a Preferment, as alſo of his own Nobility, and the deceitful Favour of Fortune ſtill fawning upon him; not only oppreſſed his People himſelf with intolerable Impoſitions, but to be in farther favour with the Turks, brought into that Country (too much before exhauſted) ſuch a company of them, as that they ſeemed now almoſt wholly to have poſſeſſed the ſame, oppreſſing the poor Chriſtians (the natural Inhabitants) with new Exactions, and more than Tyrannical Injuries, even ſuch as were not elſewhere by the Turks themſelves uſed; not only breaking at their Pleaſure into their Houſes, and deſpoiling them of their Goods, but taking Tithe alſo of their Children, as if it had been of their Cattel, a thing never before there ſeen; and for the ſatisfying of their beaſtly Luſt, raviſhing their Wives and Daughters, even in the ſight of their Husbands and Parents, with divers other ſuch outragious Villanies, not with Modeſty to be rehearſed. So that by this means he had violently taken from his Chriſtian Subjects all hope of recovery of their antient Liberty, had it not, as ſometime it falleth out in theſe worldly things, both unto Men and Common-weals, which brought unto the laſt caſt, and even as it were to the bottom of deſpair, by the Goodneſs of God, contrary to all hope, find ſometime ſuch unexpected Help and Relief, as that thereby they, beyond their hope, even to the aſtoniſhment of the World, mount up again unto a greater luſtre of their State, than was that from which they before fell; it had even ſo by the ſingular Mercy of God, now hapned unto the Valachians, not knowing which way to turn themſelves. There was at Crailowa (a City in the Confines of Valachia, towards the Confines of the Hungarians and Turks, where the Governour of thoſe Borders is for the defence thereof with a ſtrong Garriſon always reſiant) a noble Gentleman called * Ion Michael, Son to Peter, the Palatine of that Country, the aforeſaid Alexander's Predeceſſor; who, as he was unto the People for the Honour of his Father, the Prerogative of his Birth, the Comelineſs of his Perſon, and Tallneſs of his Stature, well known, ſo was he for his Zeal towards the Chriſtian Religion, his Love towards his Country, his Kindneſs towards his Equals, his Courteſie towards his Inferiours, his upright Dealing, his Conſtancy and Bounty unto them, no leſs Gracious; and for other the noble Virtues of his Heroical Mind, and natural Diſpoſition for the Performance of great Matters, his deep Wiſdom and quick Foreſight, his ſweet and pleaſing Speech, void of all Affectation, unto all good men moſt dear; whoſe Fame, both for the Honour of his Houſe, and of his own Virtues, ſtill more and more increaſing, and riſe in the Ears of Alexander the Vayvod, was the cauſe that he commanded him, as the ready, or rather natural Competitor of his State and Honour, to be ſecretly apprehended, and ſo taken out of the way; whereof he by good Fortune having Intelligence, and careful of his own Health, for ſafeguard of himſelf fled firſt into Hungary, and there not ſtaying long (God ſo directing him) went to Conſtantinople in the year 1591, to ſue for the Vayvod's Place, all the Nobility of his Country, and the Provinces thereunto adjoyning, ſecretly rejoycing thereat. About which time, the chief and moſt grave of the Valachian Nobility and Councellors proſtrating themſelves at the Feet of Amurath, moſt grievouſly complained unto him of the manifold and intolerable Injuries they had already ſuſtained, and were ſtill like to endure, without hope of redreſs, from Alexander their Vayvod, and the Followers of his Court; the Turks Garriſons and Merchants with plentiful Tears orderly declaring his many moſt foul and deteſtable Facts, and afterward highly commending Ion Michael for his rare Virtues, as the true Heir of their Province; moſt humbly requeſted Amurath, either to have him appointed the lawful Governour of their Country, or elſe ſome other Place by him aſſigned for them to dwell in, wiſhing any where to live, rather than under the heavy command of ſo mercileſs a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their Suit, Michael, his Uncle by the Mothers ſide, a Greek born, and a Man for his exceeding Wealth in great Favour in the Turks Court, ſpared for no coſt. So Michael, by the Goodneſs of God, was by Amurath with great Solemnity created Vayvod of Valachia, and the oppreſſed and almoſt forlorn State of that ſometime moſt flouriſhing Country by little and little well relieved (although not altogether without moſt ſharp and violent Remedies, ſuch as Extremities oft require) began now again to lift up the head, and to aſpire unto the ancient Liberty and Honour thereof. At the beginning of whoſe happy Sovereignty, Alexander, his Predeceſſour, in his own Conſcience guilty of his evil and ſhameful Government of that ſo notable and great a Province, and now in fear to be called to account, ſecretly fled. But certain years after, removing to Conſtantinople with his Wife, and there attempting divers evil means for the obtaining of the Palatinate of Moldavia, and for thoſe his unlawful Practiſes accuſed by the Palatine's Agent; he was by the Commandment of Amurath taken in his own Houſe, and there in his princely Apparel, moſt miſerably ſtrangled upon Palm Sunday, in the year 1597, about ſix years after his departure out of Valachia.

* Ion ſignifieth with the Valachians as much as Chriſtian, which ſome miſtaking, call this Michael alſo by the Name of John.

Michael by Amurath created Vayvod of Valachia.

Alexander ſtrangled at Conſtantinople.

Michael thus made Vayvod of Valachia, long it was not but that it fortuned, the Reverend Father Cornelius de Nona, ſent from Pope Clement the Eighth, unto the great Duke of Muſcovie, in his return conferring with Sigiſmund, the Tranſilvanian Prince, and Aaron, the Palatine of Moldavia, informed them of the great conſent of divers zealous Chriſtian Princes, for the maintenance of the War againſt the dangerous and common Enemy; with many grave and effectual Reaſons perſwading them (but eſpecially for that they were themſelves Chriſtians) in that Chriſtian quarrel to joyn unto them their Forces alſo, raiſed in thoſe their Countries near unto the great Rivers of Danubius and Neſter; but unto Michael, the Vayvod of Valachia, he could not for divers his other important Buſineſſes then come; whom for all that, the aforeſaid Tranſilvanian Prince, Sigiſmund, his Neighbour, deſirouſly ſought to draw into the Fellowſhip of this War, even for the ſame Reaſons almoſt, wherewith he had been himſelf moved. Firſt, by divers great Reaſons removing ſuch doubts as might juſtly ſeem to hinder him from giving his conſent thereunto; and then by declaring the Turkiſh Inſolency daily increaſing, with the infinite Grievances by them deviſed againſt the miſerable Valachians; when as the Incurſions of the Turks or Tartars, or their Paſſages that way, (no leſs troubleſome than their Inroads) was almoſt every Month to be feared, their Armies, as Friends, to be in Winter and Summer received, their Souldiers to their great charges relieved, and their Commanders and Captains rewarded. Valachia thus impoveriſhed, was not able (as he ſaid) to pay the great Sums it did already owe, neither was to expect any releaſment of the evils it was wrapped in, much leſs was it able to ſuffice unto the grievous Exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards impoſed. None of his Predeceſſors (as he ſaid, and as truth was) had for many years now paſt, for any long time, or with any Security held their State or Government; but that either by the Calumniation of the Envious, or Bribes of their ambitious Competitors, brought into Suſpition with the Sultan, they were violently thruſt out, or moſt cruelly put to death. In brief, he ſaid it was a wiſe mans part, not without moſt manifeſt and weighty Reaſons, to promiſe unto himſelf better Fortune, or more aſſurance of his State, than had his unfortunate Predeceſſors before him; but warned by their Harms, betimes to provide for his own Safety. By which Perſwaſion he ſo prevailed, that the Vayvod (whoſe Name, whoſe Fame, whoſe Wealth and Life, together with his Subjects, was all thereby indangered) although he would not (for the weightineſs of the matter) at the firſt yield thereunto; yet aſſuredly promiſed, with his Friends, and the reſt of the Nobility of his Country, to conſider thereupon. Having it by the Prince plainly laid down before him, how a ſufficient number of Souldiers might at all times be raiſed, their Pay provided, and Aid ſtill ſent him as need ſhould be, from the German Emperour, or himſelf out of Tranſilvania; as alſo that Aaron the Palatine of Moldavia, would at all times be ready to combine himſelf unto them; that ſo with their united Forces they might upon the Banks of Danubius and Neſter, eaſily repulſe the Incurſions both of the Turks and Tartars their Enemies; the Chriſtian Emperour in the mean time, with leſs trouble proceeding in his Wars againſt the Turk in the other ſide of Hungary.

Now whilſt this Plot was thus in laying, and Matters debating too and fro, not altogether without the Turks Suſpicion; Sinan Baſſa, coming with a great Army into Hungary, had taken the ſtrong Town of Rab, as is before declared; with which Miſchance ſo much concerning the poor remainders of Hungary, the Vayvod, not a little moved, began more deeply to conſider of his own Eſtate. And as he was a man of great Spirit, and no leſs Zeal toward his Country, grieving to ſee his Subjects committed to his Charge, to be ſo daily by the inſolent Turks, ſtill more and more oppreſſed; he (as he had before promiſed to the Tranſilvanian) called an aſſembly of all the States of Valachia, to conſult with them what were beſt to be done for the Remedy of ſo great Evils, as alſo for the preventing of greater, not without cauſe then to be feared. Where, by the general Conſent of them all, it was agreed, rather to joyn with the Emperour and the other Chriſtian Princes in Confederation, as they had been oftentimes by them requeſted, than longer to indure that heavy Yoke of the Turkiſh Thraldom and Slavery. Whereupon the Vayvod taking unto him two thouſand of the Hungarian Garriſon Souldiers, now before, for that purpoſe, ſecretly laid upon the Frontiers of his Country; and calling upon the Name of Chriſt Jeſus, in one day to begin withal, ſlew about to thouſand of the Janizaries, (who without his leave had in that Country proudly ſeated themſelves) with all the reſt of the Turks, (in the midſt of their Inſolency) together with the traiterous Jews, not leaving one of them that he could come by alive, in all the open Country. And purpoſing to drive them out of their ſtrong holds alſo, and ſo to make a clean riddance of them, he within fourteen days after, ſet upon Dziurdzowa, a great Town of the Turks upon the Bank of Danubius; all which he burnt, ſaving the Caſtle: and having there made a great ſlaughter, and loaded with the ſpoil of the Turks, returned to Buchareſta, the chief Seat of his Palatinate.

Michael, the Vayvod of Valachia, revolteth from the Turks.

But long it was not after this his ſo great Preſumption, but that he perceived the Turks in Revenge thereof, to ſeek after his Life; although he yet ſeemed to yield his Obedience unto Amurath, and to have done that he did, as inforced thereunto by the Inſolency of the Turks, and for the neceſſary relief both of himſelf and his Subjects. For the ſame Month (Rab being, as is aforeſaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks * Emirs, deſcended of the great Family and Stock of Mahomet their falſe Prophet, and then Cadileſcher (a man of great Account and Place amongſt the Turks) accompanied with 2000 choſen Souldiers, fifty of the great Sultans Chamber, and many of the Zauſii and Spahi, upon the ſudden came to Buchareſta, under the colour of refreſhing themſelves after their long travel, but indeed with purpoſe to have taken the Vayvod; where they without Controulment, committed all kind of outragious Villany; and taking up all the chief Houſes in the City, imperiouſly demanded of the Vayvod (who then lay at his Palace near unto the new Monaſtery without the City, built without any Caſtle or Defence, upon the River Dembowiza) 10000 Florens for a Preſent, with Victuals and other neceſſary Proviſion for his Followers. And preſently after, being certainly informed that he lay there but ſlenderly accompanied, and almoſt himſelf alone, the Emir himſelf on foot, with a thouſand of his Souldiers, went out of the City, as if it had been but for his Pleaſure, and in Courteſie to have ſeen him. Of which ſo ſuſpicious a Gueſts coming, the Vayvod underſtanding, got him betimes away into the Camp of his Hungarian Mercinaries, which then lay but faſt by; when the Turk thus deceived of the hope he had before conceived for the taking of him, craftily ſent certain of his Followers, to know of him, to what end he, in time of Peace, did entertain ſuch a number of Hungarian Souldiers? Whereunto the Vayvod cunningly anſwered, That they were at the firſt entertained for the taking of Peter, the Son of Alexander, ſometime Palatine of Moldavia; who, although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged upon an Hook at Conſtantinople, yet that thoſe Souldiers were, for their ready Service, of neceſſity ſtill to be bileted in the Country, until ſuch time as their pay might be provided. Which the Turk hearing, commanded the Vayvod forthwith to diſcharge them, as men unneceſſary, and to his Subjects troubleſome, promiſing the next day to lend him a Tun of Gold to pay them their Wages. Which feigned promiſe the Vayvod ſeemed thankfully to take; yet nevertheleſs commanded the Hungarians forthwith in Arms to ſtand in readineſs in the Camp, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him diſtreſſed, they ſhould betake themſelves to flight; whilſt he in the mean time, with his Courtiers and other Souldiers, ſecretly aſſembled into a Valley thereby, came ſuddenly upon the Turks (not as then, dreaming of any ſuch thing) compaſſed about the Inns wherein they lay, and ſetting fire upon them in five Places, notably forced them both with Fire and Sword, the two greateſt Extremities of War; ſeeking now for nothing more than the juſt Revenge of his ſpoiled City, his forced Virgins, and wronged Subjects. Howbeit, the Turks, for a ſpace right valiantly defended themſelves, and by plain force (although in vain) ſought to have broken through the midſt of their Enemies, and ſo to have fled. Yea, many of them by force of the Fire driven out of their Lodgings, and tearing off their burning Cloaths, fought ſtark naked; but moſt of them which could, fled unto the Palace where the great Emir lay, there with him ready to die or live. All which their laſt endeavours of Deſperation the Vayvod eaſily fruſtrated, with two great Pieces of Artillery opening a way for his Souldiers unto them. So that the proud Emir now in diſpair (like the hunted Caſtor) threw down out of a Window, a great Cheſt full of Gold and precious Stones, and other Jewels of great value, if happily he might have ſo appeaſed the Vayvods Wrath; humbly now requeſting no more, but to have his Life ſpared; fearfully promiſing a large ranſom for himſelf and thoſe few which were yet alive with him. Howbeit, the Vayvod mindful of the manifold Injuries by them done unto him and his Subjects, and nothing mitigated or moved with the rich Spoils thruſt upon him, or the large Promiſes the Turks had made him; commanded all thoſe his Enemies now in Power, to be ſlain every Mothers Son; of whom his Souldiers had a wonderful rich ſpoil, although much more was loſt in the fire: and ſo giving thanks unto God for the Victory, reſted with his People a while at quiet. Yet within leſs than a Month after, he ſent Albertus Kiral, his Lieutenant, with an Army to Phloch, (a great open unwalled Town on the farther ſide of Danubius, equally diſtant from Vroſczok and Nicopolis) from whence the Turks, oftentimes paſſing over that frozen River into Valachia, had there done great harm: which Town, not inferiour unto a good City, he ſuddenly ſurprized, and ſacked it, and put to the Sword all the Inhabitants thereof, except ſuch as were before his coming fled. And ſhortly after (the more to annoy the Turks) marching again over the frozen River, to have ſurprized Herſowa, a walled City, but one days Journey from Brailoua, he was by the way encountred upon the Ice by the Turks, whom he there in a great conflict overoverthrew; and having ſlain many of them, and put the reſt to flight, holding on his intended Journey, took that rich City, which he rifled and burnt down to the Ground, all except the Caſtle, which was yet by the Turks valiantly defended; and ſo with the ſpoil of the City, returned again over the River, there to refreſh his Souldiers, wearied with Labour and the Extremity of the Winter weather. And yet not ſo contented, within ſix days after paſſing again over the River, and having upon the ſide thereof in a great Battel overthrown the Turks Garriſons, took Siliſtra, a great City of Macedonia, built by Conſtantine the Great, (being the Seat of one of the Turks Sanzacks, and well inhabited with rich Merchants) which fair City he ranſacked, and having ſlain moſt part of the Inhabitants, burnt it down to the Ground, as he had the other: no leſs Terror than Grief unto the Turks.

Siliſtra burnt.

Amurath dieth.

But whilſt the aforeſaid Confederation betwixt the Emperour and the Tranſilvanian Prince was yet in hand, and the Troubles in Valachia thus ariſing, Amurath, the great Sultan, grievouſly troubled with the Stone, and attainted with the falling Sickneſs, his wonted Diſeaſe, and inwardly alſo tormented with the late Inſolency of the Janizaries, and Revolt of the Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, (no ſmall hinderance to the proceeding of his Wars in Hungary) as a man both in Soul and Body tormented, with great Impatiency and Agony of Mind, departed this Life the eighteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord 1595; when he had lived one and fifty, or as ſome ſay, two and fifty years, and thereof reigned nineteen. At the time of his Death aroſe ſuch a ſudden and terrible Tempeſt at Conſtantinople, that many thought the World ſhould even preſently have been diſſolved. His dead Body was, not long after, with great Pomp and Solemnity, buried by Mahomet, his eldeſt Son, in a Moſchy which he himſelf had before built at Conſtantinople.

1603 MAHOMETHES III TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEPTIMVS

Si quid in humanis, magnum te reddere poſsit:
Quid prohibet magnis nomen ineſse tuum?
Qui subjecta vides, tot diſsona regna, tot urbes:
Et nulli cedens, sceptra superba geris.
Cum tamen ignores, quid sit Sapientia Christi,
Omnia quæ jactas sunt, Mahomete, nihil

If any thing on earth can make man great,
Great as the greatest art thou Mahomet,
Who overlookst the World from thy bright Throne,
And seest the largest part of it thine owne.
But since the Christian Law thou dost disdeigne,
Thy labours to be truely Great, are all but vaine.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET,

The Third of that Name, Seventh Emperour of the Turks.

1595

THE Death of the late great Sultan Amurath was not forthwith made known in the Court, but with wonderful ſecreſie concealed, not onely for fear of the Janizaries, (who in the time of the vacancy of the Empire always do whatſoever pleaſes themſelves) but alſo for that the People, having in diſtruſt the fierce Nature of Mahomet, Amurath's eldeſt Son, were generally better affected to Amurath, the younger Brother, a Prince of a more mild ſpirit and courteous diſpoſition, unto whom they in heart wiſhed thoſe ſtately honours, which could by no means, without the great wrong and prejudice of his elder Brother, and danger of the whole State, be given unto him. Ten days after came Mahomet in poſt from Amaſia to Conſtantinople, and was there by the great Baſſa's, and other his mighty Favorites, ſaluted Emperour: which done, he preſently after cauſed all his Brethren to be invited to a ſolemn Feaſt in the Court; whereunto they (yet ignorant of the death of their Father) came cheerfully, as men fearing no harm; but being come, were there all by his commandment moſt miſerably ſtrangled: and at once to rid himſelf of the fear of all Competitors, (the greateſt torment of the Mighty) he the ſame day (as is reported) cauſed ten of his Fathers Wives and Concubines, ſuch as by whom any Iſſue was to be feared, to be all drowned in the Sea.

Mahomet ſaluted Emperour of the Turks.

He murthereth his Brethren.

The Janizaries in a Tumult.

The Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court, not before acquainted with the Death of Amurath, neither with the choice that the great Baſſa's had without their privity made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to ſee themſelves ſo diſappointed of ſuch Spoils as they reckon due unto them in the time of their Vacancy, as men diſcontented, riſe up in a rage, and made ſuch havock and ſpoil in the Imperial City, as greater they could not well have made had there been as yet no Emperour choſen at all; and not ſo contented, were now even upon the point to have rifled their new Emperour's Court, and to have laid violent hands upon the Perſon of himſelf, in revenge of the tyranny by him executed upon his Brethren and Fathers Wives (which inhumane cruelty the Turkiſh Emperours eaſily excuſe by the name of the Policy of their State.) For the appeaſing of which ſo dangerous a Tumult, Mahomet called unto him certain of the chief men among the Seditious, ſuch as were thought to be able to do moſt with them, whom he ſought by fair perſuaſions and large promiſes to win unto him, and by them to pacifie the reſt. Which ſerved him to little or no purpoſe, until ſuch time as the great Baſſa's themſelves came out with their followers; who, with many fair perſwaſions, mixt with moſt grievous threats, and firm promiſe of a general pardon, with much ado appeaſed the Tumult; yet for the more ſafety, kept all the chief Streets of the City with ſtrong Watch and Ward. This Broil thus overblown, a new Tent was by the Commandment of the new Emperour ſet up before the Temple of Sophia; wherein, on the right hand was placed the dead Body of the late Sultan Amurath, his Father, and on the left-hand the Bodies of his nineteen ſtrangled Brethren, layd forth of purpoſe, as an heavy Spectacle for the People to behold; who all, not long after were, together with their Father, with great Solemnity, after the Turkiſh manner buried; and Mahomet himſelf (being about nine and twenty years old) now openly proclaimed great Emperour of the Turks, and Lord of all, from the riſing of the Sun, to the going down of the ſame. After that, returning to his Palace, he made unto his Baſſaes, and other great men, a ſumptuous and Royal Feaſt, as the manner was; but whilſt they were in the midſt of their Mirth, upon the ſudden all the City was again in an uprore, and the People in Arms, in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought ſcarce one man would have eſcaped alive from that Banquet, had not the chief Baſſa with his Gravity and Wiſdom, and wonderful Labour, in good time appeaſed their Fury; and withal, to their greater Terrour, cauſed all the great Ordnance in the City to be brought forth into the Streets ready charged, to be ſhot off amongſt them.

1595

The Tumult appeaſed.

The Janizaries again in an uproar.

Divers fortunate Roads made by the Chriſtians upon the Turks.

Whilſt theſe Troubles thus paſſed at Conſtantinople, upon the late Confederation made between the Emperour, the Tranſilvanian Prince, the Valachians, and Moldavians, divers fortunate Inroads and Skirmiſhes were by them made in the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, many ſtrong Places were ſurpriſed, many rich Booties taken, and notable Exploits done, which we will briefly paſs over, as the Precedents of a greater War. The City of Weitze, before taken by the Turks, was now again in the beginning of this year recovered; and the Chriſtians about Scuthia, in number about four thouſand, breaking into the Turks Frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich Prey, with divers notable Captives. The like did alſo the Chriſtians of Vivaria; at which time alſo the Garriſon Souldiers of Altenburg, making a Road into the Country about Rab, encountered with four thouſand Turks, of whom they ſlew two hundred, took certain Priſoners, whom they ſent, ſome to Presburg, ſome to Altenburg; and Sinan Baſſa, the late General, returning towards Conſtantinople with much Treaſure, which he had greedily ſcraped together in the late Wars in Hungary, was by the Valachians ſet upon by the way not far from Belgrade, and ſtript of all that he had, having much ado to eſcape himſelf 1595 with ſome few of his Followers. The ſame Valachians, together with the Tranſilvanians, under the conduct of their valiant Captain, Geſtius Ferens, entring further upon the Turks, took from them divers of their Towns and Caſtles, as Pondeſie, Nicopliſe, Rilla, and Rebnichi; and meeting with twelve thouſand Tartars, ſlew a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight. With this Inſolency of the Valachians, his late Tributaries, but now his Enemies, the Turkiſh Emperour was highly offended; and therefore ſent one Bogdanus, a Valachian born, deſcended of the Palatines Houſe, with a great Power, to expulſe the old Vayvod, and to poſſeſs himſelf of that Honour, as his Tributary; promiſing unto him all favour and kindneſs. Bogdanus, thus ſupported and furniſhed, came with his power into Valachia, yet thought it beſt before he attempted any great matter, to expect the coming of the Tartars, left the laſt year in Hungary by Sinan; of whoſe coming the Valachians and Tranſilvanians having underſtanding, met them by the way; and joyning Battel with them, ſlew eight thouſand of them, put the reſt to flight, and ſo returned: unto whom, preſently after this Victory, the Tranſilvanian Prince ſent fourteen thouſand Souldiers more to aid them againſt the Turks. But Bogdanus underſtanding both of the Overthrow of the Tartars, and the coming of this new Supply, durſt not proceed any farther in his Enterpriſe, but kept himſelf ſtill in his Trenches. Not long after, by the Commandment of the Turkiſh Emperour, Han the Crim Tartar, with a great power of his Tartarian Horſemen, entred into Moldavia, with purpoſe to have by Fire and Sword reduced that Country again unto the Turks Obeiſance: of whoſe coming, Aaron Vayvod of Moldavia having knowledge, and aided by his Neighbour Michael Vayvod of Valachia, ſo belayed the Tartars, that he in three divers Battels overthrew them; and having ſlain twelve thouſand of them, enforced the reſt to retire again out of his Country: and following the courſe of this Victory, preſently after took Bendar, Schinitz, Tigna, Mechnis, with ſome other Caſtles and Fortreſſes of the Turks, near unto the River of Danubius; all which he furniſhed with his own Garriſons; and withal, took in the rich Country of Bobraga, the Inhabitants thereof willingly ſubmitting themſelves unto him, as men weary of the Turkiſh Thraldom. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Coſſacks, he overthrew Janicula, the Son of Bogdanus, ſometime Vayvod of Moldavia, now ſent by Mahomet with a great Power, as a moſt fit Inſtrument to trouble the Vayvod, and to recover again that Country: with whom Aaron couragiouſly encountring at Scarpetra, a mile from Danubius, overthrew him in plain Battel; and having ſlain eight thouſand of his Turks, put him to flight, and took the ſpoil of his whole Camp. Neither yet ſo contented, marched preſently to Neſter Alba, where he put the Turks in a great fear, and afterwards burnt the Suburbs of the City, and ſo retired.

The Emperor's Ambaſſador dieth in Priſon at Belgrade.

How Amurath, the late Sultan, in the beginning of theſe Troubles, had at Conſtantinople ſhut up in Priſon Frederick Krecowitz, the Emperour's Ambaſſador, is before declared. This Ambaſſador Sinan Baſſa brought with him the laſt year, when he came into Hungary; who, after many Indignities by him ſuffered, both upon the way and at Belgrade, there died; five of whoſe Servants the falſe Baſſa cauſed to be kept in ſtraight Priſon, as guilty of their Maſter's Death; ſo to avert the Infamy thereof from himſelf. But now lying himſelf at Belgrade for the better managing of this years Wars, upon the coming of a new Treaſurer from the Court, he cauſed the five poor Priſoners to be brought before him, and moſt impudently charged them with the Death of their Maſter; ſaying, that they ſhould anſwer for the ſame unto God and their Emperour; and that his purpoſe in bringing of him from Conſtantinople, was to no other end, but to have uſed his help in concluding a Peace between the Great Sultan and the Emperour, and ſo to have ſet him, with all his, at liberty: but now that he was dead, he would ſend them his treacherous Servants to the Emperour, to be by him examined; and withal to tell him, That he was ſent from the Great Sultan (whoſe Power was not by any but God only to be withſtood) to beſiege Vienna, which he could (as he ſaid) the laſt year have taken with leſs labour than he had done Rab; and that therefore it were beſt for him betime to ſeek for Peace, before ſo great a Power had taken the Field: and that for farther Inſtructions, he would refer them to his Son, the Baſſa of Buda, to whom he ſent them from Belgrade, together with the new-come Treaſurer. Being come to Buda, they were forthwith brought before the Baſſa, and amongſt them the late Ambaſſador's Secretary, unto whom, after he had ſaid ſomewhat of the hard dealing with the Ambaſſador and his Followers, he declared, That he had always diſliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimes intreated his Father for their Liberty, and now at laſt to have obtained, That the Ambaſſador being dead, his Servants might be ſet free; and ſo put them in good hope, that they ſhould in ſhort time be reſtored to their wonted Liberty: in the mean time, that one of them ſhould go unto the Emperour's Court, and there ſpeak with one of his Secretaries, whom he had before adviſed to bethink himſelf of Peace; unto whom alſo he afterwards writ, upon what Conditions he thought Peace might be at the Sultan's hand obtained. Which were, If all the Caſtles and Strong-holds, taken by the Emperour's Forces in theſe Wars, as Filek, Setchine, and Novigrade, with their Territories, ſhould be reſtored, Siſeg in Croatia ſurrendred; if the Emperour ſhould from thenceforth refuſe to aid or protect the Tranſilvanians, Moldavians, and Valachians, and leave them to the Great Sultan to be chaſtiſed as Rebels; if finally, the Emperour would at once ſend unto the Turks Court his wonted Tribute for the years paſt, and ſo yearly afterwards: ſo he could be content, by the mediation of his Father, to attempt to appeaſe the fierce and inveterate Diſpleaſure of the Sultan, and to further the Treaty of Peace. This he commanded the Secretary to write, and to ſend it by the young Lord Perling, and to require Anſwer thereof: yet that he ſhould go with this Condition, That if the ſaid Perling within the ſpace of five and twenty days returned not with Anſwer, all the reſt ſhould, for his default, loſe their Heads. A ſubtil Device, and full of deceit, wherein the crafty Baſſaes, both the Father and the Son, ſought for nothing elſe but to ſee what confidence the Chriſtians had in themſelves, and to break the Confederation made between the Emperour, the Tranſilvanians, Moldavians, and Valachians; and that other Princes, whom God had ſtirred up in defence of ſo juſt a cauſe, hearing of a rumour of Peace, might grow cold, and defer to ſend their promiſed Aid. For now the Turks had found by experience, how hurtful and dangerous the Revolt of the three Countries of Tranſilvania, Moldavia, and Valachia was unto them, as they which brought ten hundred thouſand Duckats yearly into the Great Sultan's Treaſury: beſides that, thoſe People, now become their Enemies, were of all other fitteſt to intercept all manner of Proviſion to be brought by Land either to or from Conſtantinople, were it Victual, or other warlike Proviſion. Notwithſtanding this motion of Peace made by the two Baſſaes, Sinan, the old Baſſa in the mean time, 1595

with

1595 with great Diligence at Belgrade, prepared all things neceſſary for War, and cauſed three Bridges to be made, whereby he might in divers Places, as he thought beſt, tranſport his Army over Danubius; and at the ſame time ſent for the Garriſons round about, and other Souldiers before billeted in the Country, and put in readineſs all things neceſſary for a moſt mortal War.

The Baſſaes ſubtil demands anſwered with like.

Within the appointed time came Perling from the Emperours Court, with anſwer to the Letters written by the Ambaſſadors Secretary, at the Commandment of the Baſſa; the effect whereof was, that he had received his Letters by Perling, and did thereby underſtand what had paſſed between the captive Servants of the late Ambaſſadour, and Sinan Baſſa at Belgrade, and alſo between them and Sinan Baſſa's Son at Buda; and that the Emperours Mind was never other, but that a firm Peace might have been made between him and the Sultan; and that the Emperour had done nothing elſe by his Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, or by others in other Places, but that ſuch reaſonable Conditions might have been found out, as might have ended thoſe Wars, and have on both ſides delivered their innocent Subjects from their great and daily Calamities; which might eaſily have been done, if Sinan, the Author and Fautor of this War, had with like deſire furthered the Peace. But that it was manifeſt unto the whole World, that all Complaints of infinite Grievances, being by the Ambaſſador, yea, and by the Emperour himſelf, by his Letters laid open unto the Sultan and his chief Baſſaes, had not only nothing prevailed, but alſo to have been with great Contempt rejected, and the Treaty of Peace once begun, to have by the Inſolency of the Baſſa of Boſna, been interrupted; That the Emperour, becauſe the matter ſhould not break out into open War, had ſent his double Tribute into the Confines of Hungary, which was a great while laid up at Comara, until the Sultans Mind was known. But when all his Deſigns tended to War, and the Chriſtian Provinces were by his Robbers on every ſide ſpoiled, the Inhabitants led away into moſt miſerable Captivity, the Towns and Villages burnt, yea, whole Countries laid deſolate, and all manner of Outrages were upon a mere Pride and Contempt, as it were of the whole World, exerciſed; then the Emperour to have taken his Refuge unto the defence of his juſt cauſe, and to have uſed ſuch Remedies as are both before God and the World to be allowed, and ſo by lawful War to have repulſed War. And that altho' all had not the laſt year proſpered in his hand, but that he had received ſome loſs; yet that Sinan Baſſa himſelf, and the Baſſa of Buda, his Son, with other of the wiſer ſort of the Turks, muſt needs confeſs that to have chanced, not by their Wiſdom, Policy, or Power, but by the Sufferance of God, by a rare Misfortune, through the inexcuſable Negligence and Treaſon of ſuch as he had put in truſt with the Confines of his Empire, worthy moſt ſevere Chaſtiſement. And that no man could deny, but that great Powers of the Turks, had not once, but oftentimes been overthrown and diſcomfited, by ſmall handfuls of the Chriſtians; therefore their Power not to be ſo invincible, as they vainly vaunted of. But whereas it is written, that the great Viſier Sinan, and the Baſſa his Son, are of Opinion, that the Emperour is brought to ſo low an ebb, that he muſt be glad to accept of moſt hard and diſhonourable Conditions of Peace propounded by them; therein they err much, and deceive themſelves far; for by the Power of God they ſhould ſhortly by Experience know, that his Imperial Majeſty wanteth neither Power nor Wealth, to repair the loſs received through the Treaſon of them he truſted, yea, and to recover whatſoever elſe he had loſt; and that it ſhould in ſhort time be witneſſed unto the whole World, by the help of God, and the defence of a moſt juſt Cauſe, that the Emperour was not ſo poor and weak as they ſuppoſed him to be. Yet, as he of his own natural Goodneſs and Clemency, with his own incomparable loſs and harm, had always ſought for the Quiet and Profit of his Subjects, and to the uttermoſt of his Power, ſtaied the effuſion of innocent Blood; ſo now alſo forgetting all Injuries, he could happily be content to think of an honourable Peace; whereunto he was more inclined than to protract the War with the unſpeakable harms of the Subjects on both ſides. Yet above all things, it behoved Sinan to know, that he was to reſtore all ſuch Caſtles and Towns as have in this War been taken by the Turks, beginning at Wibitz in Croatia, even to the laſt innocent Subject by them carried away into Captivity. And that the Tranſilvanians, Moldavians, and Valachians, (People many Ages joyned and united as inſeparable Members to the Kingdom of Hungary, as unto the true Body, and now of late by the Practiſe and Treachery of certain rebellious Perſons ſeparated from the ſame) were from henceforth to be left under the Protection and Government of his Imperial Majeſty, and never more to be impugned by the Turks. If theſe things were done, and order taken that the Injury and Diſgrace done unto the Emperours late Ambaſſador (a Fact that all the Princes of the World cried ſhame of) might not remain unpuniſhed; and that his Servants in durance at Buda and Conſtantinople, might be reſtored unto their wonted Liberty, then ſome good form of Peace, and bounding of their Territories, might happily be agreed upon; without which Conditions, all talk of Peace was but vain; for that God, the juſt and mighty Protector of ſuch as put their Truſt in him, would not fail to help his Imperial Majeſty, with the reſt of the Confederate Princes, in their ſo juſt a quarrel, and abate the Pride of ſuch as truſt in their own Strength and Power. 1595

This anſwer the Captives at Buda were commanded to give unto the Baſſa, either by Writing or by word of Mouth; and withal, earneſtly to requeſt him, both for their own Liberty and their Fellows, wrongfully detained at Conſtantinople. Which if it could not be obtained, yet to comfort themſelves with that, that they ſhould in bounteous manner receive from the Emperour ſuch allowance, as ſhould ſuffice to provide them things neceſſary; as he had granted to Perling, whom he might have juſtly detained, and not ſent him back again, but for his Oaths ſake, being no lawful Priſoner. Thus were the unreaſonable Conditions of Peace, craftily by the Baſſa propounded, by others anſwered; but by whom he knew not, no Mans Name being ſet thereunto.

The Emperour, not ignorant with what an Enemy he had to do, and of nothing more careful than of the Kingdom (or more truly to ſay, of the Reliques of the Kingdom) of Hungary, lying now as it were in the Lions Mouth, ceaſed not to pray Aid, not of the Princes Electors only, but of others alſo farther off; yea, even as far as Italy and Spain, but eſpecially of the King of Polonia, as his near Alliance and Neighbour. Unto whom both he and the States of Hungary ſent their Ambaſſadors, at ſuch time as he, moved with the daily Incurſions of the Turks and Tartars into the Countries adjoyning upon his, had for the ſafety of his own Kingdom, called a Parliament of all his States in February laſt at Cracovia. Whereof Mahomet, the great Turk, hearing, ſent alſo two of his chief Chiaus, his uſual Ambaſſadors, unto the King and his States ſo aſſembled, to crave his Aid in his Wars in Hungary; which if the King ſhould not refuſe, then to

with ſome few of his Followers. The ſame Valachians, together with the Tranſilvanians, under the conduct of their valiant Captain, Geſtius Ferens, entring further upon the Turks, took from them divers of their Towns and Caſtles, as Pondeſie, Nicopliſe, Killa, and Rebnichi; and meeting with twelve thouſand Tartars, ſlew a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight. With this Inſolency of the Valachians, his late Tributaries, but now his Enemies, the Turkiſh Emperour was highly offended; and therefore ſent one Bogdanus, a Valachian born, deſcended of the Palatines Houſe, with a great Power, to expulſe the old Vayvod, and to poſſeſs himſelf of that Honour, as his Tributary; promiſing unto him all favour and kindneſs. Bogdanus, thus ſupported and furniſhed, came with his power into Valachia, yet thought it beſt before he attempted any great matter, to expect the coming of the Tartars, left the laſt year in Hungary by Sinan; of whoſe coming the Valachians and Tranſilvanians having underſtanding, met them by the way; and joyning Battel with them, ſlew eight thouſand of them, put the reſt to flight, and ſo returned: unto whom, preſently after this Victory, the Tranſilvanian Prince ſent fourteen thouſand Souldiers more to aid them againſt the Turks. But Bogdanus underſtanding both of the Overthrow of the Tartars, and the coming of this new Supply, durſt not proceed any farther in his Enterpriſe, but kept himſelf ſtill in his Trenches. Not long after, by the Commandment of the Turkiſh Emperour, Han the Crim Tartar, with a great power of his Tartarian Horſemen, entred into Moldavia, with purpoſe to have by Fire and Sword reduced that Country again unto the Turks Obeiſance: of whoſe coming, Aaron Vayvod of Moldavia having knowledge, and aided by his Neighbour Michael Vayvod of Valachia, ſo belayed the Tartars, that he in three divers Battels overthrew them; and having ſlain twelve thouſand of them, enforced the reſt to retire again out of his Country: and following the courſe of this Victory, preſently after took Bendar, Schinitz, Tigna, Mechnis, with ſome other Caſtles and Fortreſſes of the Turks, near unto the River of Danubius; all which he furniſhed with his own Garriſons; and withal, took in the rich Country of Bobraga, the Inhabitants thereof willingly ſubmitting themſelves unto him, as men weary of the Turkiſh Thraldom. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Coſſacks, he overthrew Janicula, the Son of Bogdanus, ſometime Vayvod of Moldavia, now ſent by Mahomet with a great Power, as a moſt fit Inſtrument to trouble the Vayvod, and to recover again that Country: with whom Aaron couragiouſly encountring at Scarpetra, a mile from Danubius, overthrew him in plain Battel; and having ſlain eight thouſand of his Turks, put him to flight, and took the ſpoil of his whole Camp. Neither yet ſo contented, marched preſently to Neſter Alba, where he put the Turks in a great fear, and afterwards burnt the Suburbs of the City, and ſo retired.

The Emperor's Ambaſſador dieth in Priſon at Belgrade.

promiſe him to want no Coin to pay his Souldiers; and that Mahomet, mindful of ſo great a courteſie, would at all times be ready to requite him with like, when his Occaſions ſhould require. Theſe Ambaſſadors, having obtained ſafe conduct from Michael the Vayvod of Valachia, for their Paſſage through his Country, coming thither, were by the Vayvod himſelf honourably entertained and welcomed, and ſo brought into a fair Lodging, where they diſcourſed with him of many matters. But the Vayvod's Followers, grieved to ſee ſo great Honour done to theſe their ſworn and mortal Enemies, with Weapons in their hands brake into the Room where the Ambaſſadors were, and without more ado ſlew them both; and in the ſame Fury ſetting upon the reſt of the Turks their Followers, cut them all in pieces, ſo that of them none came into Polonia to do their great Maſter's Meſſage, neither yet returned to Conſtantinople to carry news of the reſt, but there altogether periſhed. Of which Outrage Mahomet yet underſtanding, was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatning all Evils both to the Moldavians and Valachians, and forthwith ſent out other Ambaſſadors to the ſame purpoſe, who with better Fortune afterwards in ſafety arrived in Polonia.

The Tartars in many places (as is before declared) overthrown, and many ſtrong Caſtles and Forts taken from the Turks by the Tranſilvanians, Valachians, and Moldavians, the Turkiſh Affairs going to wrack in thoſe Quarters, and ſore ſhaken on that ſide of Hungary; Mahomet, the Turkiſh Emperour, called home to the Court Sinan Baſſa, his General in Hungary, to confer with him (as it was thought) of ſome great matters. In whoſe place he ſent Ferat Baſſa, he who ſometime had the leading of Amurath's great Armies againſt the Perſians; who now departing from Conſtantinople, came to Belgrade in April, and there took the charge upon him. Where, at his firſt coming, in the night time all the Ropes and Cords of the Tents were ſuddenly cut in ſunder, and ſo the Tent let fall about his Ears: which ſome ſuppoſed to have been done to his Diſgrace, by the procurement of Cicala Baſſa, before by him wronged; or, as others thought, by the inſolent Janizaries, who diſliking of him, did it in deſpight, wiſhing rather to have been led by Mahomet himſelf. Now at his coming, the Famine which the laſt year began amongſt the Turks was grown exceeding great, not at Buda and Belgrade only; but even generally in moſt places of Hungary poſſeſſed by the Turks; inſomuch, that the Tartar Women that followed the Camp were fain to roaſt their own Children, and eat them. This Famine was alſo accompanied with a moſt terrible Plague, whereof great numbers of the Turks and Tartars died daily: ſo that of fourſcore five thouſand Tartars, which came the laſt year into Hungary, now remained ſcarce eight thouſand, the reſt being all devoured with the Sword, Famine, and Peſtilence.

The Plague and Famine among the Turks.

Great were the harms the Turks ſtill daily received from the late revolted Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, the Chriſtians of thoſe Places ſeeking by all means to annoy them. Michael Vayvod of Valachia, not contented with that he had already done, but entring into the Turks Frontiers, ſurpriſed Scihmele, together with the Caſtle; wherein he found fourteen field pieces, amongſt which were two which had upon them the Arms of the Emperour Ferdinand, and other two having upon them the Arms of Huniades; which Pieces he afterwards ſent as a Preſent to the Tranſilvanian Prince. After that, he took Oroſige, a famous Port-Town, the dwelling place of the Turks great Purveyor for Butter, Cheeſe, and Honey, and ſuch other Proviſion for the Court, wherein he found ſuch ſtore of the aforeſaid Proviſion, as might well have ſufficed eight thouſand men for a whole year; and ſtill proſecuting his good Fortune, took from the Turks Kilec and Galempe, with the ſtrong Caſtle of S. George, commonly called Grigio, and at length beſieged Laganoc.

Michael Vayvod* of Valachia doth the Turks great harm.

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias, the Arch-duke, and General of the Chriſtian Army, from the Aſſembly of the Nobility of Hungary at Presburg, to Vienna, and ſo from thence to the Emperour his Brother at Prague, who appointed him General of the lower Hungary, and Maximilian his Brother General of the upper Country; giving them for their Lieutenants, unto Maximilian the Lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the County Charles Mansfelt, by him ſent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the Princes of the Empire. John de Medices, who was yet in Hungary, he made Maſter of the great Ordnance, with charge to fortifie Komara; which he ſo well performed, as that it was thought nothing in ſtrength inferiour to Rab. All this while the Emperour ceaſed not, by his Ambaſſadors and Letters, to ſollicite the Chriſtian Princes, for the repreſſing of the common Enemy to put to their helping hands; and ſo much prevailed with them, that out of his own hereditary Provinces, and from other Princes his Friends, he had this Spring raiſed a right puiſſant and ſtrong Army for the defence of Hungary; which how it was raiſed, and from whom, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefly to remember, as the chief ſtrength, under God, whereby the Chriſtian Commonweal was this year moſt notably defended. Out of the higher Saxony came a thouſand two hundred Horſe-men, and out of the lower Saxony ſix hundred; from Franconia a thouſand Horſe-men; from Suevia four thouſand Foot-men; out of the County of Tirol, as many; from Bavaria three thouſand; out of Bohemia two thouſand men at Arms, ſix hundred light Horſe-men, and ſix thouſand Foot-men; from Sileſia a thouſand five hundred Horſe-men; from Luſatia five hundred Horſe and a thouſand Foot; from Moravia a thouſand Horſe, and two thouſand Foot, out of Auſtria two thouſand Horſe and ſix thouſand Foot; from Hungary five hundred Horſe-men and a thouſand Foot: from the Nobility of Suevia and Franconia four thouſand Foot; from the King of Spain out of the Low-Countries, under the Conduct of Charles County Mansfelt, two thouſand Horſe-men and ſix thouſand Foot; unto theſe the Biſhop of Rome added two thouſand Horſe-men and eight thouſand Foot; the great Duke of Florence ſent five hundred Horſe and three thouſand Foot; the Duke of Ferrara a thouſand five hundred Foot-men; the Duke of Mantua a thouſand Foot; and the Duke Venturee five hundred Horſe. All which being put together, fill up the number of fifteen thouſand nine hundred Horſe-men, and fifty thouſand five hundred Foot. Which notable Army, raiſed from the power of divers Chriſtian Princes, and conducted by worthy Chieftains, had, by the goodneſs of God, much better Succeſs this Summer againſt the ancient Enemies of Chriſtendome, than had the like Army the Year before, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall appear.

The notable Army of the Chriſtians, and from whence it was raiſed.

Among the worthy Commanders that were in this puiſſant Army, Charles County Mansfelt, the Son of Peter Erneſtus the old County, from his Youth brought up in Arms, was by the King of Spain, at the requeſt of the Emperour, ſent with the aforeſaid Forces of two thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot out of the Low-Countries, as a Man for his approved Valour and Direction, fit to manage theſe dangerous Wars againſt the Turk under Matthias the Arch-duke, as his Lieutenant-General; who having raiſed the appointed Forces, for moſt part Walloons, departed from Bruxels, about the midſt of February; and by the way taking his leave of his aged Father at Luxenburg, and travelling through Germany, came in March to Prague, where he was by the Emperour, and the Arch-duke his Brother, moſt honourably entertained, and ſhortly after, with great Solemnity, created one of the Princes of the Empire. His Forces following after him, were by the way ſtayed, partly by the Inundation of Waters (the Rivers they were to paſs over at that time riſing to an unwonted height) partly by the Jealouſie of ſome of the German Princes, who denied them Paſſage through their Territories, untill ſuch time as that the Emperour, by his Letters, had opened unto him the way; which Princes, for all that, ſtood upon their guard, and ſo gave him Paſſage.

Now ran great Rumours of the wonderful Preparations of the Turks, as alſo of the Chriſtians; Fame, after her wonted manner, increaſing the report of all things above meaſure: which cauſed the Turks, with exceeding care, to look to the Fortification of their frontier Towns, eſpecially of Rab and Strigonium; as did the Chriſtians to the Fortification of Komara and Altenburg. In the mean time, many hot Skirmiſhes paſſed between the Chriſtians and the Turks, eſpecially in the late revolted Countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia, wherein the Turks were ſtill put to the worſe, to the great diſcontentment of their Emperour. Near unto Temeſwar the Baſſa of Buda was overthrown by the valiant Captain Geſtius Ferentz, and the Tranſilvanians. And in Valachia, the Turks General entring with a great Army, was there alſo, by the Lord Nadaſti and the Valachians, aided with the Tranſilvanians, in a great Battel diſcomfited and overthrown. Eight thouſand of the Turks heads, in token of this Victory, the Lord Nadaſti ſent to Alba-Julia to the Tranſilvanian Prince, and certain Enſigns, amongſt which, one was moſt richly garniſhed with precious Stones and Pearl, thought to be worth thirty thouſand Dollars; which the Prince afterward reſtored again to Nadaſti, offering him great Poſſeſſions in Tranſilvania, if he could have been content there to have ſeated himſelf.

Ferat Baſſa over-thrown in Valachia.

All this Spring the Turks countenanced their Wars with greater Boaſts and Threats than true force, giving it out, That they would in ſhort time work Wonders both by Sea and Land. For the more credit whereof, Murat Rays, a notable Pirate, was ſent out with twelve Gallies, who landing here and there upon the Coaſts of Italy, did much harm; cauſing it to be reported in every place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater War, and that a wonderful Fleet was to follow him: which raiſed a great fear, as well in other places as in Italy. Howbeit, no ſuch Fleet afterwards appeared; for why, the Turkiſh Emperour, much troubled with the Revolt of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, and the great Mortality then raging both among his Souldiers and their Horſes, was not at leiſure to look into the Sea, having his hands full enough with the Troubles of Hungary, where his men of War enjoyed little reſt in the Frontiers of his Territories.

Sigiſmund, the Tranſilvanian Prince, had, upon ſome juſt cauſes, of late ſuſpected Aaron the Vayvod of Moldavia, to have Intelligence not only with the Polonians, but alſo with the Cardinal Bator, and other his mortal Enemies, and ſecretly to have been about to make his Peace with Mahomet, and ſo again to fall off from him unto the Turk: which vehement Suſpicion growing daily more and more, was about this time manifeſtly confirmed by certain Letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preventing whereof, the Prince cauſed Aaron to be apprehended, and with his Wife and Son to be ſent as Priſoners to Prague; in whoſe Room, he, by the conſent of the Nobility of the Country, placed one Stephen Rozwan, a wiſe and diſcreet man amongſt them, and ſuch an one as had been always faithful unto him: ſo, as much as in him was, providing that that Country ſhould not be rent from him, and the Union of the other. But againſt the ſecret Practices of the Polonians, he proteſted openly, by Letters unto the Emperour, by the Power of God, and Aid of his faithful Subjects, to redreſs thoſe ſo great Injuries himſelf by the Sword.

Mahomet ſendeth Ambaſſadours to the Prince of Tranſilvania.

In the midſt of theſe Troubles came three Chiaus, Ambaſſadors from the Turkiſh Sultan, unto the Prince, to perſuade him again to put himſelf into his Protection, and to give him Paſſage through his Country, as in former time, into Hungary; promiſing him, that all the Injuries done by him or his People, ſhould be for ever forgotten and forgiven; and that he ſhould have thoſe three Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, as his own free Inheritance, without paying any Tribute; and ſo to be accounted as the Turk's moſt loving Friend and Vaſſal. What the Prince anſwered thereunto was not known; but by his doings afterwards it was eaſily to be gathered, that he hearkened not unto the deceitful Charms of the faithleſs Tyrant, truſting more unto the League he had with the Chriſtian Emperour. Theſe Ambaſſadors were ſcarce gone, but that a ſecret Meſſenger came with Letters from the chief of the Chriſtians in Bulgaria to the Prince, declaring unto him, That if he did with any good Succeſs proſecute his Wars, they would be ready to follow his Fortune, and to joyn hands with him againſt the cruel Tyrant, and to ſhut up all the Paſſages that way into Valachia, Moldavia, and Hungary.

Whilſt theſe troubleſome times thus paſſed in Tranſilvania and Hungary, one of the old Janizaries, called Waſvode Giezi, an old Souldier, but a confident bold ſpoken Fellow, moved, as ſhould ſeem with the Diſcontentments of the time, came unto Mahomet the Great Sultan, at Conſtantinople, and there openly ſet upon him with this rough and abrupt Speech:

The preſumptuous Speech of one Waſvode, an old Janizary, to Mahomet the Great Sultan.

H*OW long at laſt, moſt mighty Emperour, wilt thou endure thy ſelf to be ſeduced and blinded by the great Baſſaes of thy Court, and Commanders of thine Armies? How long wilt thou ſuffer thy ſelf to be deceived, to the great danger of thy ſelf, and hurt of thy Subjects? See'ſt thou not how overthwartly, fraudulently, and cunningly, they, moved only with their own covetous and ambitious Humour, have hitherto dealt with thee and thy Father? eſpecially in that, that perſuaded by them, thou haſt diſhonourably broken thy League, and taken up Arms againſt the Chriſtian Emperour. At length open thine eyes and ſee their deceit, and how much they abuſe thy Power.* Sinan Baſſa, who muſt have himſelf honoured and exalted above all others, hath not by ſtrong hand honourably won Rab, as hath been the manner of thine Anceſtors, but hath craftily bought it with thy money, and thereby caſt thee into a moſt dangerous War and infinite Troubles. O Rab, Rab*! now the cauſe of great triumph and rejoycing, as if thereby all Chriſtendome ſhould in ſhort time be ſubdued to thy Scepter. But thou art therein much deceived; thy Barns, thy Store-houſes, as are* Tranſilvania, Valachia, Moldavia, Bulgaria, and other Provinces adjoyning, from whence, this thy Imperial City of Conſtantinople, with the Country about it, thy Court, yea thy Self are to be relieved, are by this War ſhut up; ſo that down the River of Danubius out of the Weſt, or by the Euxine out of the Eaſt, thou art not able to look for any Proviſion. From whence then, O moſt mighty Emperour, wilt thou maintain thy ſelf, thy Court, this populous City, and the Country hereabout? Not to ſpeak in the mean time of thy mighty Army now in Hungary, Fleſh, Fiſh, Corn, all manner of Victual, are now at ſuch a price, that the common Souldier cannot buy them. In this extream dearth of all things, not men only, but even the very Beaſts and Cattel, ſtarve for Hunger. Thy Horſes go fat perhaps into Hungary, but neither thou, nor thy ſelect Souldiers, can live by Graſs and Weeds, all that is left in that Country. This Miſery and Calamity of thy People thou ſeeſt daily, and yet thou wilt not with ſound Judgment lift up thine eyes, to ſee from whence theſe harms come, and how that they by thee put in greateſt truſt, ſtudy not for thy Profit, or the profit of the Commonweal, but only how by all means to enrich themſelves.

Mahomet, much moved with the confident Speech of the old Janizary, commanded him to be forthwith committed to Ward, and by fair means to be examined, by whoſe ſetting on, and for what Cauſe, he had ſo boldly uttered this rude Speech unto his Sovereign, and what further thing he had intended: but the reſt of the Janizaries hearing thereof, riſe preſently in a Tumult, and by ſtrong hand took him out of Priſon, and by ſolemn Oath combined themſelves to defend him, even to the ſpending of their own Blood: whereat Mahomet was glad to wink.

The greateſt part of the Aid promiſed by the Chriſtian Princes for the maintenance of this years Wars againſt the Turks being now come to Vienna in Auſtria, County Mansfelt, Lieutenant-General under the Arch-duke, forthwith called a Council of the Colonels, Captains, and other great Commanders of the Army, to conſult with them what courſe to take for the beginning of this great War, as, whether they ſhould preſently lay Siege to ſome Town of the Enemies, or elſe to expect him in the plain Field, and to give him Battel. All things well conſidered, and that reſolved upon which was thought moſt expedient, he removed from Vienna to Altenburg, where he muſtered his whole Army; and departing thence, with ſome few of his Followers came to Walkenburg, a Village upon the ſide of Danubius, where he made choice of a place to incamp his Army in; which after he had marked out, he returned again with ſpeed to Altenburg, and by open Proclamation thorow the Camp, gave ſtraight Commandment, That againſt a certain hour every man ſhould be in readineſs to remove and ſet forward toward the Enemy: but divers of the Souldiers, and eſpecially the Germans, began forthwith, after their wonted manner, to cry out for their Pay, before they would ſtir any farther: ſo that the County was glad, by a ſecond Proclamation to command them to riſe, promiſing them their Pay within eight days. But they ſtill ſtanding upon their former Reſolution for their Pay, refuſed any farther to follow their Captains, and ſent ſix of the beſt ſort among thoſe mutinous Souldiers to the County, in the Name of all the reſt, to demand their Pay; whom he forthwith commanded to be all hanged: but three of them having reaſonably excuſed themſelves, he let them go, and cauſing the other three to caſt lots for their Lives, hanged up two of them. Which ſevere Execution ſo terrified the reſt, that upon the Sign given they all riſe, and with the reſt of the Army followed the County. The whole Army being come to Walkenburg, unto the place where they were to encamp, the County himſelf, with others of the Nobility, began with Spades and Shovels to dig and caſt up the Trenches, and ſo wrought until they ſweat again; with whoſe Example, all the reſt of the Army, of what degree ſoever, being moved to labour, had in a ſhort time caſt up a very great Trench from Danubius unto the Mariſhes, large enough for eighty thouſand men to encamp in, the great Work, with reſtleſs labour, going forward both night and day until it was fully finiſhed. The County lying thus intrenched with his Army, was ſtill careful, by his Eſpials, to underſtand where the Enemy lay, and what he did. He was ready ſtill to hear all, but to believe that which ſeemed moſt like to be true: what he purpoſed, he kept moſt ſecret, ſo that the Enemy could never diſcover any of his Deſigns, (wherein the Generals of late years before him had much erred;) and commonly his moſt certain Reſolutions were ſhadowed under the open ſhew of ſome other matter nothing meant: Security he much abhorred, as never free from danger: and although it was by divers Meſſengers brought unto him, That the Enemy was but of ſmall Strength, unable to meet him, diſorderly encamped, and in great diſtreſs for want of Victuals; yet would he give little credit thereunto, as knowing ſuch Reports to have oftentimes been given out by the Turks, of purpoſe to lull the Chriſtians in Security, the more eaſily to oppreſs them. The Chriſtian Army thus ſtrongly entrenched, and the Trenches planted with great Ordnance, the County himſelf, with certain Troops of Horſe-men, would oftentimes ſhew himſelf before Rab, and ſometime before Dotis, viewing ſometime the one place, and ſometime the other, as if he had verily purpoſed to have beſieged one of them: and to give the greater ſhew that he had ſo determined, he cauſed the Ground to be marked out for his Army moſt conveniently to encamp in, and for the caſting up of his Mounts. Which cauſed the Turks of Strigonium, Veſprinium, Palotta, and other Places farther off, to ſend part as well of their warlike Proviſion, as of their Gariſon Souldiers, ſome to Rab, ſome to Dotis, for the defence of thoſe Places, neareſt as they thought unto danger. The County in the mean time having now put all things in readineſs, came with his Army, and ſat down before Dotis, demanding to have it yielded unto him. And the more to confirm the Turks that he would aſſuredly beſiege that place, he began to caſt up his Trenches, and to raiſe his Mounts as ſeemed moſt convenient; ſtraitly commanding every man, of what condition ſoever, to put his hand in ſome meaſure to the furtherance of thoſe Works; and the more by his own Example to encourage others, would oftentimes himſelf carry a Faggot, or ſome other thing, before him upon his Horſe, for the raiſing of the Mount. For all that, certain Hungarian Gentlemen diſdaining ſuch baſe labour (as they deemed it) refuſed to do any thing therein; which the County perceiving, ſtraitly charged one of them, by his Example, to carry a Faggot to the Mount: which the Hungarian Gentleman refuſing, the County therewith much moved, laid the Faggot he was carrying himſelf, before the Hungarian upon his Horſe, charging him to ſee that he carried it to the appointed place: the Hungarian diſdainfully taking it, carried it until he thought he was out of the County's ſight, and then in ſcorn threw it down; which the County (having ſtill an eye after him, perceiving, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid, to be preſently hanged upon the next Tree for his Obſtinacy. Which wholſome ſeverity, both then and afterwards, cauſed others more diligently to do what they were commanded by their Superiours.

The Army of the Chriſtians muſtered at Altenburg.

The vigilant carefulneſs of County Mansfield.

Dotis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

An obſtinate Turk.

It happened about this time, that three Turks being taken Priſoners, were brought into the Camp; whom the County ſtraitly examined of many matters. But the firſt of the three could neither by fair or foul means be induced to anſwer to any thing that he was asked; and was therefore, by the Commandment of the County, in the ſight of the other two, cut into ſmall pieces. Who terrified with his diſmembring, confeſſed many things whereof they were asked; and among others, That the Turkiſh Sultan had determined to turn his greateſt Forces into Tranſilvania, Moldavia, and the upper part of Hungary; and therefore would this Summer ſend ſmall Forces, or elſe none at all into thoſe quarters.

Now was Dotis ſo belay'd by the County, as that no man doubted but that he had thereon purpoſed to have engaged his whole Forces, when ſuddenly, the laſt of June, commandment was given thro' the Camp, That every man upon ſign given, ſhould be in readineſs to follow his Leaders, for that the County had determined forthwith to remove; yet whither the Army was to be removed, few or none knew, more than certain of the chief Commanders. As for to go to Strigonium, few there were that ſo much as dreamed thereof, all was kept ſo ſecret; yet was it the Counties purpoſe, even from the beginning, to attempt the winning of that City, which the Arch-duke had in vain the laſt year beſieged. The next Night, being both dark and foul, the County riſe with all his Army, and the next day, being the firſt of July, came to Strigonium, they of the City not hearing of his comming, before they ſaw him under their Walls. Wherefore the Turks in the Suburbs, called the Raſcian City, and they in the Fort under St. Thomas Hill, deſpairing of the keeping of thoſe Places, ſetting fire on the Houſes, and defacing the Fort, ſo much as in that ſudden fear they poſſibly could, fled into the lower Town. The next day the County without reſiſtance took the foreſaid Places forſaken by the Turks, which he manned with certain Companies of Wallons, and made a Bridg of Boats over Danubius, caſt up certain Mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the Siege. In three days he had again repaired the Fort under St. Thomas Hill, abandoned by the Turks, and therein placed four great pieces of Artillery, wherewith he began to batter the lower Town, and in other Places to ſtraiten the beſieged more than they had been the year before. The Baſſa of Buda, not ignorant of the want both of Men and Munition in the beſieged City, (and the rather, for that they had but a little before ſent part of their Garriſon with Shot and Powder to Rab and Dotis) attempted thrice (as he did many times after during the time of the ſiege) to have by the River put new Supplies both of Men and Munition into the City; but was ſtill, by the Diligence of the Chriſtians excluded, and inforced with loſs to return. In ſhort time, the lower Town, which they call Waſſerſtat, or the Water-town, was with continual battery ſore beaten, ſo that ſcarcely any Houſe or Building was left whole; and a Counterſcarf, made the laſt year, beaten down. Whereunto certain Wallons were ſent, only to have viewed the bredth and manner of the Ditches; after whom certain Companies of the Hungarian Heidons preſently followed, without any Command of their Captains; who with great Courage got to the top of another high Counterſcarf, and there ſet up ſome of their Enſigns. Which the Turks beholding, and coming on cloſe together, by plain force inforced them with loſs to retire. Among theſe Hungarians were divers alſo of the Wallons ſlain, with ſome others of good Name and Place, to the great Grief of the County, being not a little offended with that diſordered Service; yet Day and Night the Battery ceaſed not, and the Chriſtians out of their Trenches with their Muſquet-ſhot ſlew many of the Turks upon the Walls, receiving little or no hurt again, the Turks ſtill ſhooting ſparingly, for fear of wanting Shot and Powder at their greater need; yet that they ſpent they beſtowed ſo well, that amongſt others they had ſlain four of the Chriſtian Canoneers, and one Wallon Captain. About the midſt of July, the County with continual battery had made the Water-town (as he thought) aſſaultable; and therefore ſent certain Companies to begin the aſſault; who having paſſed the Counterſcarf, found the Ditch full of deep Mud, and but newly cut broader certain paces by the Turks, ſo that it was thought ſcarce poſſible to be paſſed without a Bridg; behind which Ditch was an high Wall with ſtrong Bulwarks, and within all this was another new caſt Ditch, and upon the very brink thereof a thick and high Parapet; all which, for all that, certain Companies of Wallons, with great Labour and Danger adventured to paſs; but ſuch was the Valour of the Defendants, and the ſmall number of them that came on to the aſſault, with the Diſadvantage of the Place wherein they ſtood, that at length they were glad to retire with the loſs of many of their Fellows. The Chriſtians in the beginning of this Siege had taken a little Iſland in the River before the City, which was kept with ſome few Companies of the Lord Palfi's Heidons; whereof the Turks having Intelligence at Buda, with three Gallies and certain other Veſſels, landed in the Iſland 3000 Souldiers, which ſlew the Heidons, unto whom no Succour could be ſuddenly ſent, and ſo recovered again the Iſland; wherein they left a ſufficient Garriſon for the keeping thereof, furniſhed with all things neceſſary, and ſo departed.

County Manſfield removed with the Army from Dotis to Strigonium.

The Chriſtians repulſed.

About three days after the former aſſault, the Chriſtians, in hope of better Succeſs, the ſecond time aſſaulted the Water-town, in which aſſault the chief Leaders were the Lord Greis and Anthony Zinne, a famous Captain, had he not ſtained his Honour with County Hardeck at Rab; but being pardoned by the Emperour, did now, together with the reſt appointed to that Service, moſt couragiouſly aſſault the Breach, but were again by the Turks notably repulſed, and inforced at laſt to give over the aſſault, and ſo to retire with the loſs of 150 men; among whom Zinne himſelf was ſlain, with one Captain Ruger, and ſome of the Counties own Guard; the Lord Greis was wounded in the Head, and the younger Lord Schuendi, with divers other Captains, grievouſly hurt. The next day after, 600 of the Mountain People came into the Camp unto the County, with Supplications, to requeſt him, Not to give over the ſiege until he had won the City; promiſing him in the Name of thoſe Towns and Villages from whence they were ſent, of their own Charges to repair for him what harm ſoever he ſhould do in the City for the taking thereof, yea, though he ſhould lay it even with the Ground: for why, the Harms they daily received from the Garriſon of that City were wonderful.

Mahomet careful of Strigonium.

At the ſame time alſo he was advertiſed by his Eſpials (of whom he maintained many for the Diſcovery of the Enemies doings) that Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had writ unto the Baſſa of Buda, carefully to provide that his beloved City of Strigonium took no harm, and not to ſpare either for Men or Money in time to relieve it; and therein to do nothing without the Advice and good liking of his old and faithful Servant Alis Beg, who of long time had governed, and alſo defended that City; and to the intent that nothing ſhould be wanting for the performance hereof, that he had ſent Alexander Aga of the Janizaries from the Court, (whoſe Service he might ill have ſpared) whoſe approved Counſel and Help he might alſo uſe in all things; for that he had rather loſe ſome other whole Kingdom, than that one City; And that therefore he ſhould beware that it were not won by the Enemy, or by any Compoſition yielded; wherein if he failed, he threatned unto him his heavy diſpleaſure, not to be appeaſed without the price of his Head. Which ſo ſevere a Commandment of the great Sultan's, the Baſſa ſent to them of Strigonium; with moſt grievous threats from himſelf, if they, terrified with any Battery, undermining, or aſſault, ſhould yield the City, and not hold it out as became valiant Souldiers, unto the laſt man; ſwearing to impale them all upon Stakes that ſhould conſent to the yielding up thereof. The old Governour Alis Beg having received this ſo ſtrait a Command from him that was both able and like enough to perform what he had threatned; utterly to deterr the Souldiers from once thinking of yielding, cauſed diligent Enquiry to be made throughout the Garriſon, if any of them had at any time made any motion of yielding up the City, or otherwiſe murmured againſt their Captains or Commanders appointing them to any Service; and ſuch as he found to have ſo done, he, to the terror of others, cauſed to be preſently executed; and after that, went down himſelf into the lower Town, to ſee that nothing were there wanting or amiſs, where moſt danger was. But when he would have again returned into the upper Town, he was ſtayed by the Janizaries, who told him, That ſeeing he was of ſo valiant and couragious a mind, and their Governour, he ſhould there ſtay with them, and take ſuch part as they did, were it better or worſe; and ſo would he, or would he not, there needs ſtay he muſt.

Now the Baſſaes of Buda and Temeſware, with divers Sanzackes, as well of thoſe parts of Hungary which the Turks poſſeſſed, as other places, were aſſembling their forces for the relief of the beſieged in Strigonium: whereof the Tranſilvanian Prince hearing, made ſhew as if he would forthwith have beſieged Temeſware; ſo that the Baſſa thereof leaving the intended Expedition for Strigonium, was glad to return for the defence of his own Charge. They alſo of Stiria, Carinthia, and Croatia, with the Troops of County Serinus, had ſo ſtopped all the Paſſages, that twelve thouſand Turks, which were coming from Zigeth, and the places thereabout, could by no means come to joyn themſelves with their Fellows for the relief of the diſtreſſed City.

The higher City of Strigonium battered by the Chriſtians.

Gokara taken by the Chriſtians.

The County leaving nothing unattempted or undone that might help for the gaining of Strigonium, had made a notable Fort upon S. Thomas Hill, and therein placed five great Culverins; wherewith he furiouſly battered the higher City, and did therein great harm; and thereby alſo brought to paſs, that no man could go up or down the Hill betwixt the upper Town and the lower, but he was in danger to be fetch'd off with thoſe Pieces, or the Muſquetiers; who, defended by thoſe great Pieces, lay upon the ſide of the Hill in Caves and Buſhes, awaiting for ſuch as ſhould go up or down betwixt the two Towns. Thus the Chriſtians at one time battered the upper Town, the lower Town, and the ſtrong Town and Fort of Gokara, ſtanding on the farther ſide of Danubius over againſt Strigonium, beſieged by the Lord Palſi. But of all theſe Places, Gokara was with the fury of the great Ordnance moſt ſhaken; which the County perceiving, cauſed the Battery to be increaſed, and ſo continued until he had beaten down the Counterſcarf, and made certain fair breaches in the Wall. Whereunto the Moravians (unto whoſe Lot it fell) the one and twentieth of July gave an Aſſault in five divers places, whom the Lord Palſi ſeconded with his Hungarians, of whom certain were of purpoſe appointed, beſides their Arms, to bring things with them for the firing of the Town; which they in the time of the Aſſault found means ſo well to beſtow, that in a while the Town was all on a light Fire. The Turks at firſt made notable Reſiſtance, but finding themſelves over-preſſed, and ſeeing the Town now on a fire about their ears, which with the Wind ſo increaſed, that it caught hold of the lower Town on the other ſide of the River; they retired to the River-ſide, where ſome of them by Boats got over to Strigonium, other ſome periſhed in the River, the reſt, falling into the hands of the Chriſtians, were by them all put to the Sword. Gokara thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Chriſtians repairing the Breaches, and ſtoring it with all warlike Proviſion, left in it a ſtrong Garriſon. Within a night or two after, were two hundred of the Turks Horſe-men deſcried in a Field faſt by, which cauſed an Alarm to be raiſed in the Camp, as if the whole Army of the Turks had been at hand; howbeit, thoſe Horſe-men retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards known, that they were only Scouts ſent out by the Turks to take view of the Army of the Chriſtians, in what ſort they lay encamped.

The latter end of this Month it fortuned, that a young country fellow, ſecretly ſent out of the City by the Governour, and falling into the hands of Palſi, was by him ſent to the County; by whom he was in friendly manner demanded, from whence he came, whither he was going, and whereabouts? Whereunto the Youth frankly anſwered, That he was ſent from the Governour with Letters to the Baſſa of Buda; which he preſently drew out of his Boſom, and delivered them unto the County; who after he had read them, cauſed them to be cloſed up again, and ſo delivered to the Young-man, with ſome few Crowns, commanding him to carry them to the Baſſa, as he was about, and in his Return to bring him the Baſſa's Anſwer, promiſing for his ſo doing to reward him bountifully: which the Young-man undertook to do, and ſo departed. Now the purport of the Governours Letters was, That if the Baſſa did not within ſix or ſeven days ſend him aid, and relieve him, he ſhould for want of Victuals, and other things neceſſary for the holding out of the Siege, be inforced either to abandon the City, or to yield it up into the Enemies hands. Whereunto the Baſſa returned Anſwer by the aforeſaid Meſſenger, That he would within the appointed time be with him, willing him in the mean time to be mindful of his wonted Valour, and not to be with any thing diſcouraged; appointing him the day, the hour, the way, the means, with all the other Circumſtances how he would relieve him. Which Letters, the Young-man, according to his Promiſe, delivered unto the County; who thereupon provided accordingly for the welcoming of the Baſſa. Within a day after alſo, one of the Turks Canoneers, conſidering the danger the City lay in, and fearing that it would be loſt, fled out of it into the Camp; who, beſides that he aptly declared the ſtate of the City, and the wants the Beſieged were in, did alſo afterwards good Service during the time of the Siege. The Turks had in this while many times ſallied out to their great loſs; yet now, upon hope of better Succeſs, they adventured, the twenty ninth of this Month, to ſally out again, but with like fortune as before, leaving fourſcore of their men behind them, having ſlain but five of the Chriſtians.

Now had the Turks, in great wants, by the ſpace of a Month, right worthily defended Strigonium, expecting ſtill for relief. At length News was brought into the Camp, That the Baſſa of Buda, with 20000 men, was coming to raiſe the Siege; who the ſecond of Auguſt came accordingly, and with his Army encamped within four miles of the Chriſtians; lying ſo nigh, that certain of the Turks Horſe-men ſeeking after Booty, came very near unto the Camp of the Chriſtians, and out of the Paſtures, even under their Noſes, carried away ſome few Horſes: Againſt theſe deſperate Adventurers, certain Troops of the Hungarian and German Horſe-men iſſued ſuing out, had with them an hot Skirmiſh: but the Turks of purpoſe retiring, as men over-charged, and the Chriſtians ſtill following on, had at length drawn them unto the place where divers other Troops of the Turks lay in Ambuſh for them; who now ſtarting forth, on every ſide hardly charged them. The Hungarian light Horſe-men well acquainted with ſuch Skirmiſhes, ſeeing the danger, preſently fled, and left the Germans to themſelves; who for a while valiantly encountred their Enemies; but oppreſſed with multitude, were glad at laſt to fly alſo. In this Skirmiſh of the Chriſtians were loſt and grievouſly wounded about an hundred. The Turks, encouraged with this ſo proſperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their Army, being before reſolved, by plain force to open themſelves a way into the City, and ſo to relieve the beſieged. Of all theſe things the County was not ignorant, as thereof forewarned by the Baſſa's Letters before delivered unto him; and had therefore with his Army ſtrongly belayed all the ways unto the City. Nevertheleſs, the Enemy came ſtill on between the Hills S. Thomas and S. George, and near unto the Suburbs called the Raſcian City, put themſelves in order of Battel, as did alſo the Chriſtians, giving the Enemy leave to come even to their Trenches. In the mean time, the Lord Palſi, with his Hungarian Horſe-men, fetching a compaſs about the Hill on the one ſide, and the Lord Swartzenburg with his Horſe-men on the other, had ſo incloſed the Turks behind, as that they could not without great danger retire. Both Armies orderly ranged, and the ſignal of Battel given, the Turks having before, without any great harm done, diſcharged ſeventeen Field-pieces, came on after their wonted manner with a moſt hideous cry, and at the firſt Onſet, with their Turkiſh Arrows, as with a thick-ſhower, darkned the Sky; when on the other ſide, the German and Wallon Horſe-men, with their Petronels, ſent their deadly ſhot as thick as Hail amongſt them again; and the Men at Arms after them, taught the Turks, to their coſt, how unfit their light and half-naked Horſe-men were in a ſet Battel to meet with them ſo well appointed: in a trice, but not without great ſlaughter, the Battel was brought to the Sword, and to be tried by true Valour: There was to be heard a cry Heavens high, the thundering of Artillery both great and ſmall, the clattering Armor, the gliſtering Weapons, the neighing of the Horſes, the crying of the Wounded, the heavy groanings of the Dying, with the noiſe of the Trumpets, Drums, and other warlike Inſtruments, made deaf the ears of the Hearers, preſenting unto them nothing but horror and even preſent death. It was a moſt miſerable ſight to ſee ſo many men in ſo ſhort time ſlain; for the Battel had ſcarce endured half an hour, when many thouſands of the Turks lay dead upon the ground, and the reſt ſeeing the Victory incline to the Chriſtians, betook themſelves to flight, leaving behind them their great Ordnance, and whatſoever elſe they brought for the relief of the beſieged: whom ſo flying, the Lords Palſi and Swartzenburg (who had before taken the ſtraights whereby they were to paſs between the Mountains) ſo received with their freſh Horſe-men, that of them that came that way few eſcaped. The Baſſa himſelf, who ſtood upon the Hill, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his Men, fled alſo himſelf. The Baſſa of Natolia, with about 100 of the Turks more, by good fortune got into Strigonium. The number of the Turks ſlain in this Battel was great, and is of divers diverſly reported, ſome ſaying that there were ſlain 14000, and ſome fewer. Beſides them that were ſlain, many were alſo taken, and ſome of them men of great Name and Place. There was alſo taken 27 Enſigns, with a multitude of Camels, Aſſes, and Mules, laden with Mony, Shot, Powder, and other neceſſary Proviſion; all which, brought thither for the relief of the beſieged, became a prey unto the Chriſtians. In the heat of this Battel they of the City ſallying out, had entred a Fort of the Chriſtians upon the River-ſide, but were again preſently driven out, and with loſs enforced to retire. After this Victory, the County ſent certain Companies of the Hungarian and German Horſe-men, with 500 Waggons, to the Enemies Camp, not far off in the Mountains; who coming thither, found it utterly forſaken by the Enemy, but well ſtored with all manner of neceſſary Proviſion, which they carried all away, together with 600 Tents, many whereof were lined with Damask, Satin, and other Silk, richly embroidered, or layed with gold-lace, or gold-twiſt. The Baſſa's rich Tent, taken by the Collonel of the Horſe-men, was afterwards by him given unto the County, as was alſo the Plate and Money there found; all which he divided among the Souldiers according to their Deſerts. In the Turks Camp were alſo found certain Heads of the Chriſtians, with the dead Body of the Lord Brandenſteine, ſlain in the conflict but the day before, which the Chriſtians carried away with them into the Camp, and there honourably buried them. Thoſe that remained of the Turks Army hid themſelves in the Mountains and Woods, and ſo holpen by the darkneſs of the night, made beſt ſhift for themſelves that they could. The Baſſa himſelf, accompanied but with twenty Horſe, came to Buda about midnight, and by his coming filled the City with great heavineſs, every man lamenting his loſt friends. The Hungarian Heidons, beſt acquainted with the Country, pricking up and down the Mountains and by-ways, for certain days after the Battel, brought in daily into the Camp ſuch Priſoners as they took, or elſe the Heads of ſuch Turks as they ſlew. Of this ſo notable a Victory, the County by a ſpeedy Meſſenger certified the Arch-duke at Vienna, who rewarded him for his good News with a chain worth five hundred Duckats; and preſently cauſed the Song of Thankſgiving to be ſung in the Church of the Auguſtine Friers, and afterward in all the Churches of the City. The County alſo, to gratifie the Emperour, ſent him by the Lord Chalon, his Nephew, unto Prague, two of the chief Priſoners taken in the late Battel, with four Horſe-men's Guidons cunningly made of Horſe-hairs, ſuch as are commonly carried before the greateſt Commanders of the Turks Armies, and fourteen other Enſigns of the Turks, with fourteen moſt goodly Horſes of the Turks, for a Preſent.

A cruel Battel betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks before Strigonium.

The Turks overthrown.

The next day after this Battel, the County ſent the Lord Palſi, with an Interpreter, unto the City, to demand it to be yielded; who having Audience, declared unto the Turks in what danger they were, that the help they looked for was now quite overthrown, new relief could not, but in long time, be ſent unto them; and that therefore it ſhould be good for them, whilſt yet they might, to be well adviſed, and betime to bethink themſelves of yielding up the City, leſt haply when they would, it then would not be accepted; promiſing to intreat with the General, that they might in ſafety depart, and with ſure Convoy be brought unto ſuch place of ſafety as were convenient: Whereunto the beſieged Turks anſwered, That the Chriſtians had now five Weeks layn at the Siege, and muſt yet lye three Weeks longer: and that whereas of late ſome few of their Friends came to have relieved them, and had failed therein; there was yet an hundred thouſand more to come after them, who if they ſhould not be able to perform that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliver or forſake the City, before they were ready to be drawn out of it by the heels, and that yet they would then take three days to reſolve thereupon.

Now had the Chriſtians with long and continual Battery ſore beaten both the upper and the lower Town, which Battery they now maintained with greater fury than at any time from the beginning of the Siege, and within the City their wants increaſed daily, having nothing left to live upon but a little Wheat and Barley, with ſome Horſe-fleſh; unto whom thus diſtreſſed, the Lord Palſi, by the commandment of the County (to try what confidence they yet had in themſelves) the Ninth of Auguſt, ſent two Gentlemen to the City, to do a Meſſage from him to the Governour: who advertiſed thereof, being a very aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Janizaries, came to the Walls to hear what they had to ſay; where one of the ſaid Gentlemen in few words delivered him this ſhort Meſſage.

The Meſſage ſent by the Lord Palſi, to the Governour of Strigonium.

MY moſt gracious Lord, the Lord Palſi, moſt worthy Governour, greeteth thee well; and knowing thee to be a Captain both valiant and wiſe, and one that hath always courteouſly uſed ſuch as have fallen into thine hands, hath Compaſſion of thy deſperate Obſtinacy: and therefore, whereas thou art to look or hope for nothing elſe but preſent Death and Deſtruction, he, as thy Neighbour, and a Lover of thy Vertues, adviſeth and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt ſave thy ſelf and thine from moſt undoubted and imminent Death, and utter Confuſion, without delay to deliver up this City, which thou canſt not longer hold.

Unto whom the old Governour thus, without ſtay, courteouſly anſwered:

The reſolute Anſwer of the old Governour, to the Meſſage ſent him by Palſi.

THY Speech, my Friend, and thy Maſters Advice, are unto me both vain. Tell the Lord Palſi, in my Name, that I cannot pleaſure him with the leaſt ſtone in this City. One foot I have already in the grave, and will with Honour carry theſe my gray Hairs into the ſame; and am yet comforted with a moſt certain and undoubted Hope, that my moſt dread and mighty Sovereign, and my Lord Sinan Baſſa, will not forſake me: yea, and that if they ſhould write unto me, that they could find no means or way to relieve me (which I am ſure they can) yet would I well, and at leiſure, conſider whether it were fit for me to deliver up this City or not; ſeeing that of the defence thereof dependeth all mine Honour and Credit. Beſides that, what Reward they have on both ſides that ſo eaſily deliver over the Cities they have in charge, all the World doth ſee.

With this Anſwer he ſent them away. All this while the Aga of the Janizaries ſtanding by, ſpoke not one word, but ſighing in ſilence and grinding his Teeth, declared by his Countenance his Indignation and inward Grief.

The lower Town taken by the Chriſtians.

In the mid-way between Buda and Strigonium, in the midſt of the River of Danubius, lieth a little Iſland called Vizze, wherein many rich Clothiers dwelt: this Iſland the Hungarian Heidons ſpoiled, and in returning thence, met with twenty four Wagons laden with Corn, going to Buda, which they took, with eight and twenty Priſoners which they brought into the Camp. The lower Town being with long and continual Battery made aſſaultable, was by the Chriſtians, the Thirteenth of Auguſt, in three divers places at once aſſaulted. The Bavarians were by lot to give the firſt Charge, who in the performing thereof beginning to faint (for that they were notably repulſed by the Turks) but ſeconded by them of Reitnaw and Suevia, pluck'd down a great Paliſado, filled the Ditches, removed whatſoever ſtood in their way, and ſo long fought with the Turks in the breaches, that by the coming in of the Marqueſs of Burgawe with ſix Enſigns of freſh men, they prevailed upon the Enemy, and ſo all together brake into the Town. In the midſt of this dangerous Fight was the Marqueſs himſelf, who both with his Preſence and chearful Speech ſo encouraged his Souldiers, that they, as men fearing no peril, ran headlong into all danger, until they had entred the Town: there might a man have heard a moſt miſerable Cry, eſpecially of Women and Children throughout the City; whenas the Chriſtians breaking in on every ſide, ſlew whoſoever came in their way, without reſpect of Age or Sex, ſparing neither Woman great with Child, neither the little Children hanging at their Mothers Breaſts. Yet did not all that were entred ſo much attend the preſent Execution, as ſome of them did the Spoil and Prey; and eſpecially the Hungarians, unto whom all was good Booty, even the very Hinges of the Doors and Windows; whereby many eſcaped into the Caſtle and upper Town, with the Baſſa and Alis-Beg the old Governour. The Chriſtians had not many hours poſſeſs'd the Town, but that divers fires began to break out in divers places, but by what means was not at the firſt known: at laſt it was found out, that the Turks, doubting the loſs of the Town, had before, where they thought beſt, left Gun-powder, which taking fire by Matches left burning for that purpoſe, ſhould at a certain time ſet all on fire; by which means many moſt horrible Fires were raiſed in the Town, which conſumed many goodly Buildings, and other things which might have ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead, and could hardly in a day or two be quenched:

County Mansfield died at Komara.

This ſo joyful a Victory ſaw not he, by whoſe good direction, next under God, it was gained, the worthy County; for he a few days before being fallen ſick of a Fever, taken by drinking too much cold drink in his Heat, with immoderate pains taking in the late Battel, and ſo afterwards falling into a great flux with a Fever, was, by the counſel of his Phyſicians (for the better recovering of his Health) removed to Komara, as a place of more quietneſs; having before his Departure ſent for the Arch-duke to come into the Camp, and for Blankemier into Bavaria, to ſupply his own room. But his Diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, became at laſt deſperate, ſo that the Phyſicians themſelves now deſpaired of his Health. Yet lying thus drawing towards his end, he almoſt every hour enquired how the Army did, and whether the City were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking thereof. But when it was told him a little before his Death that the lower Town was won, he thereat greatly rejoyced; and the next day, being the Fourteenth of Auguſt, towards night, quietly departed this World, to the great loſs of the Chriſtian Commonweal, and the exceeding grief of the whole Army. A Man even from his Child-hood brought up in Arms, of Stature great, but of Courage greater, and painful above meaſure, not the leaſt cauſe of his untimely Death. All the time of this Siege he took little Reſt either by day or night, ſcarce ſo much as to lie down upon his Bed in two or three nights together. The little Meat he did eat, he moſt part eat it ſtanding or walking, yea, and ſometimes on Horſe-back. He was a moſt ſevere Obſerver of Martial Diſcipline, which cauſed him to be of his Souldiers both beloved and feared. His Bowels were with due Solemnity buried at Komara, where he died; but his Body was brought back again to Luxenburg, there to be honourably interred with his Anceſtors.

About which time, Theodore, the great Duke of Muſcovia, hearing of the Wars betwixt the Emperour and the Turk, ſent two Ambaſſadours with Letters and Preſents to the Emperour; which Ambaſſadors coming to Prague the ſixteenth of Auguſt, accompanied with two hundred and fifty Horſe, were, by the Emperours appointment, honourably received and entertained. And afterward having Audience, firſt delivered the Letters of Credence from the great Duke, reported to have been of this purport.

The Copy of the great Dukes Letters unto the Emperour.

Your Majeſty hath ſent unto us your Ambaſſador Nicholas Warkotſie, requeſting our brotherly Aid againſt the hereditary Enemy of all Chriſtianity, the Turkiſh Sultan. Wherefore, we alſo deſiring to live with you our dear and well beloved Brother in all perpetual Amity and Friendſhip, ſend unto you by our faithful Counſellor and Servant Michael Iwanowitze, and John Sohnie, Aid out of our Treaſury againſt the ſaid Enemy; unto whom we have alſo given other things in charge to be propounded to your Majeſty, requeſting you to give unto them full credit in all things. Given in the great Court of our Power at Muſco, in the year of the World 7103, and from the Nativity of Chriſt 1595, in the Month of April.

What things in particular theſe Ambaſſadors were ſent for, was not commonly known, but among others it is ſaid, That the Muſcovite requeſted the Emperour to ſend an Ambaſſador unto the Perſian King, to draw him alſo into the League with them againſt the Turk; which Ambaſſadour ſhould firſt come into Muſcovia, and that way to paſs into Perſia. The Preſents which the great Duke ſent unto the Emperour, were, an hundred and fifty thouſand Florens of Gold, great ſtore of moſt rich Furs, and precious Perfumes deemed to be of exceeding value, two white Faulcons, and three Leopards alive. And Iwanowitze the Ambaſſador himſelf, preſented unto the Emperour of himſelf, certain rich Turky, Perſian, and Babylonian Hangings and Carpets, certain Timbers of Sables, with other rich Furs no leſs precious than Sables, ſo many as eight Porters could hardly carry. Theſe Ambaſſadors tarried at Prague until the ſeven and twentieth day of December, and then taking their leave, returned with the Emperours anſwer to the Duke.

Alis-Beg the old Governour of Strigonium ſlain with a great Shot.

But to return again unto Strigonium. The Chriſtians now poſſeſſed of the lower Town, bent their whole battery upon the higher Town, where it fortuned the fourteenth of Auguſt, that the old Governour Alis-Beg, whilſt he was carefully walking from Place to Place to ſee where moſt danger was, had his Arm ſtruck off with a great ſhot, of which hurt he preſently died. He was as man of great Gravity, about the Age of fourſcore years, and had of long time notably both governed and defended that famous City, the loſs whereof was like enough to have been unto him greater Grief than was the loſs of his Life there. Much about the ſame time alſo died the Aga of the Janizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chief Commanders thus ſlain, the Janizaries with the other Souldiers and Citizens made choice of the Baſſa of Natolia (who as is aforeſaid eſcaped out of the late Battel into the City) for their Governour; who with heavy chear took upon him that forlorn charge. The Chriſtians, not ignorant of the death of theſe two worthy Men, in whoſe great and approved Valour they ſuppoſed the chief Defence of the City to have reſted, were in good hope that now the reſt would the more readily hearken to ſome good Compoſition; and therefore ſent a Meſſenger to demand if they would yet, whilſt there were ſome Mercy left, yield the City. Who, though they had loſt their chief Commanders, with the greateſt part of the Garriſon, and were in great wants both of Victuals and all Things elſe neceſſary for their Defence; yet their Anſwer was in few Words, That they would hold it out even to the laſt man. The greateſt cauſe of which their obſtinate Reſolution, was the ſtrait charge the Baſſa of Buda had given them for the defence thereof; beſides that, they accounted their City holy, as won by their magnificent Emperour Solyman, whom the Turks generally yet have in a devout remembrance, and therefore thought it a great Impiety to deliver it up unto the Chriſtians. The next day after came Matthias the Arch-duke into the Camp; who, after he had well viewed the whole Army, and the manner of the ſiege, he called together into his Tent the chief Commanders, namely, the Marqueſs of Burgaw, his Couſin, John de Medices the Florentine, and the Lord Palſi the Hungarian; to conſult with them what was further to be done for the winning of the City. Shortly after, he commanded the City to be aſſaulted in two Places at once, which was by the Walloons and Germans couragiouſly performed; but ſuch was the Valour of the Defendants, that when the Chriſtians had done what they could, they were glad at laſt to give over the aſſault, and with loſs to retire. About this time came the Duke of Mantua, with the three Counties his Brethren to the ſiege, and now the Turks began again to draw together near unto Buda, there to make head for the relief of Strigonium, and to be revenged of the loſs they had there before received. Whereof the Arch-duke having Intelligence, ſent out againſt them eight thouſand choſen Souldiers out of the Camp, who ſuddenly ſetting upon the Turks in their Camp, before the riſing of the Sun made a great ſlaughter amongſt them, and took certain Priſoners, of whom the Sanzack of Copan was one; and ſo with Victory returned to the ſiege.

Strigonium yielded unto the Chriſtians.

The beſieged Turks in Strigonium underſtanding of this overthrow of their Friends, from whom they expected moſt ſpeedy relief; and beſide the Terror of the continual Battery and ſtill feared Aſſaults, pinched alſo with extream wants of all things; began now to faint. Wherefore the Baſſa with the other Captains, overcome with the aforeſaid Difficulties, and the general out-cry of the fearful People, reſolved with one conſent to come now to parley, and upon reaſonable Conditions to yield up the City; whereupon a flag of Truce was ſet up, and Parley craved. Which granted, the Arch-duke after the going down of the Sun came into the lower Town, where nine of the Turks attended his coming; who entring into Parley, required that they might under ſafe Convoy, with Bag and Baggage depart, and ſo leave him the City; which the Arch-duke would not by any means agree unto. At length, with much Intreaty, they obtained that they might upon the ſame Conditions depart that the Chriſtians did at Rab; with their Scimitars by their ſides, and ſo much of their Goods as they could carry upon their Backs, unto ſuch Ships as were to be appointed for the carriage of them to Buda. For the performance whereof, Hoſtages were on both ſides given; and ſo the next day (being the ſecond of September) they began to come out of the City, more in number than either the Priſoners taken in the time of the ſiege had confeſſed, or the Chriſtians had thought. Thirty Ships were appointed for the conveying of them down the River to Buda, which not ſufficing, many of them tarried in the City until the next day, at which time the Baſſa, with the ſick and wounded, ſailed to Buda, the Priſoners and Pledges on both ſides being before faithfully delivered. Thus by the Goodneſs of God, and the good Conduct of a few valiant Chriſtians, was Strigonium, the Metropolitical City of Hungary, after it had fifty two years groaned under the miſerable Yoke of the Turkiſh Servitude, again reſtored unto the Chriſtian Common-weal; which the Chriſtians forthwith repaired and new fortified, as was thought beſt for the defence thereof againſt the Enemy. All which being done, about the midſt of this Month the Arch-duke ſent eighteen thouſand to beſiege Vicegrade, otherwiſe called Plindenburg, a ſtrong Caſtle of the Turks upon the River between Strigonium and Buda; which Caſtle they took. Which, when they of Buda underſtood, they were ſtrucken with ſuch a fear, that many of the better ſort were ready to forſake the City; inſomuch, that the Baſſa to ſtay their flight, was glad to command the Gates of the City to be ſhut upon them, and no man ſuffered to paſs out. This good Succeſs of the Chriſtians in theſe Wars, cauſed great rejoycing to be made in moſt parts of Chriſtendom.

All this while the Chriſtians were thus buſied at the ſiege of Strigonium, the Tranſilvanian Prince was not idle, but in divers places did the Turks exceeding much harm; ſo that now his Name began to be dreadful unto them. It fortuned that the ſame day that the County Mansfelt departed at Komara, that the Prince at Alba-Julia with great Solemnity married Maria Chriſtina, the Daughter of the late Arch Duke Charles the Son of the Emperour Ferdinand; her other Siſter Anna being before married unto Sigiſmond, now King of Polonia; for ſo it was agreed for the more aſſurance of the League between the Emperour and him, that he ſhould take his Wife out of the Houſe of Auſtria, which he now did. Of this Solemnity the Turks (his evil Neighbours) having Intelligence, aſſembling to the number of 30000, or more, thought, as unwelcome Gueſts, to have come unbidden or unlooked for thereunto; but the vigilant Prince underſtanding of their coming, provided for their Entertainment accordingly, and ſetting his Pleaſures for a while apart, and coming upon them when they leaſt looked for him, in a great Battel overthrew them, and ſlew moſt part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant Victor, the whole ſpoil of his Enemies.

Lippa taken by the Tranſilvanians.

About the ſame time, the Tranſilvanians alſo beſieged Fagiat, a Town holden by the Turks not far from Temeſwar, where, after they had lain 12 days, they of the Town, diſpairing to be able long to hold out, came to Parley, and covenanting to depart with Bag and Baggage, began to go out of the Town. But in their departure, underſtanding that the Baſſa of Temeſwar, with the Sanzacks of Lippa and Jenne, were coming to their relief, they that were yet in the Town began to find delays, and they that were already gone out, began to return. Wherewith the Tranſilvanians much moved, by plain force entered the Town, and put them all to the Sword; and afterward turning upon the Baſſa, who with ten thouſand Turks and certain Field-pieces was coming to have relieved the Town, had with them a cruel Battel; wherein moſt part of the Turks fell with ſmall loſs of the Tranſilvanians; who ſo eagerly purſued the Victory, that the Baſſa himſelf had much ado with five hundred others, to eſcape. The two Sanzacks, with divers others of good Place, were taken and ſent Priſoners to the Prince. Not long after, about the latter end of Auguſt, the Tranſilvanians alſo beſieged Lippa, a famous City of Hungary, ſtanding upon the River Maracz, not far from Temeſwar, which the Turks being not able longer to hold, fled into the Caſtle; where finding themſelves in no great ſafety, after three days ſiege they came to Parly, and ſo yielded, upon Condition that they might in ſafety depart with ſo much of their Goods as they could themſelves carry. About which time alſo the Baſſa of Boſna, with ten thouſand Turks and Tartars, went forth to have again recovered Babotſca, a frontier Town, before taken by the Chriſtians; which the Stirians and the reſt of the Chriſtians dwelling thereabouts, between the two Rivers of Sauus and Drauus, underſtanding, conducted by the Lords Herbenſtein, Leucowitz, and Eckenberg, that had the charge of thoſe Frontiers, overtook the ſaid Turks and Tartars near unto Babotſca, fought with them, and in the plain Field overthrew them.

Ferat Baſſa ſent for to Conſtantinople, and there ſtrangled.

Sinan Baſſa ſent in Ferats ſtead.

Mahomet, not a little grieved with the good Suc-Succeſs of the Chriſtians in every part of Hungary, and above meaſure offended with Ferat Baſſa, his General, through whoſe Negligence all, or at leaſtwiſe moſt part of this had hapned (as he was by the Envy of Sinan Baſſa perſwaded) ſent for Ferat home, and in his Place ſent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultans Diſpleaſure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned thereof by her that beſt knew, even the Sultans Mother, and adviſed not to come in ſight until his Peace were made. Who, nevertheleſs truſting to his own Innocency (the comfortable, but moſt dangerous and weak ſtay of the great) and doubting not to anſwer whatſoever Sinan ſhould be able to charge him with, came to the Court; where he was by the Commandment of Mahomet ſhortly after ſtrangled, and his Goods, to the value of five hundred thouſand Duckats, confiſcated.

A mortal Battel betwixt Sinan and the Tranſilvanian Prince.

The Turks overthrown.

Sinan in flying like to be drowned.

Among all the dangerous Enemies of the Chriſtian Common-weal, was none at this time more cruel than was Sinan, an Epyrot born, a Fiſhers Son, of a rough and uncivil Diſpoſition, now about fourſcore and three years old, even from his Youth brought up in the Wars; and yet (as his Motto was) breathing nothing but Blood and War. He had many times fortunately led the huge Armies of the Turkiſh Emperours, Solyman, Selymus, and Amurath, and is now ſent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fitteſt man to reduce the late revolted Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, to their former Thraldom; which to do, he before promiſed unto Mahomet, upon peril of his Head. He having raiſed a right puiſſant Army, by a Bridg made of Boats (after a Months Labour ſpent therein) paſſed over the great River of Danubius, into Valachia; of whoſe coming the Tranſilvanians, with the Valachians and Moldavians having Knowledge, had before ſo ſhut up the Paſſages of the Country, as that he could not without much danger have entred far; and were alſo ready with their united Forces, even at his firſt entrance, to give him Battel. Which he not refuſing, there began a moſt mortal and cruel fight, with much bloodſhed on both ſides. Thrice were the Tranſilvanians inforced to retire, but ſtill relieved with new Supplies, and knowing that they then carried in thier Arms the welfare of their whole Country, came on freſh again, and as hardly charged the Turks, as they had been by them charged. Thus with doubtful fortune and great ſlaughter was the Battel maintained from the Morning until Night, Victory with doubtful Wings hovering now over the one ſide, now over the other; until that at length, the Turks, overcome by true Valour, their Battels being quite diſordered and broken, were now glad to ſeek to ſave themſelves by flight. In this Battel, being fought the eleventh of September, beſides many thouſands of the common Souldiers, were ſlain alſo divers of great account amongſt the Turks; and amongſt the reſt, Haider Baſſa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead even in the ſame Place where the Battel was fought. Sinan himſelf, in making too much haſte to get over the Bridge, fell into the deep Mud, and in that general Confuſion of his Army, was like enough there to have periſhed; but as the common Proverb goeth, Seldome lyeth the Devil dead in a Dike, the old Veiliard was with much ado drawn out by them of his Guard, and ſo ſaved to further Miſchief. Nevertheleſs, the danger was ſo great,

great, that for certain days it was commonly reported, that he was there drowned, moſt of his own people not as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. All the ſpoil of the Turks became a Prey unto the Chriſtians, as did alſo their great Ordnance, and many of their Enſigns; amongſt which, was one green one, which they accounted religious, as ſacred to their Prophet Mahomet, whereunto they in time of their greateſt Diſtreſs fly, as unto their laſt Refuge: there was taken alſo all their Tents, with great abundance of Victuals, and other warlike Proviſion.

The old Baſſa thus overthrown, full of Grief, and even mad for deſpight, poſted himſelf in all haſte to the Court, thinking it better himſelf to make the beſt of that which was indeed nought, than to have it made worſe than nought by the envious Report of others; and withal to fill the mind of the great Sultan with deſire of Revenge, which no man ſo much longed after as himſelf: wherein he ſo diſcreetly uſed the matter, as that the late loſs was eaſily paſſed over, as received by the common chance of War, or any other occaſion elſe whatſoever, rather than by any default of his; and new Commiſſion given him for the raiſing of another Army for the ſubduing of the late revolted Countries. In the mean time, to ſhew his Hatred unto the Chriſtians, and to pleaſe the eyes of them of the Court with the novelty of the Sight, he cauſed an hundred and twelve Chriſtian Captives, whom he had in Priſon at Belgrade, to be brought in chains like Beaſts to Conſtantinople; and ſo being led thro' the principal Streets of the City, to the vain contentment of the Citizens, to be brought to the Court-gate, for the Sultan to look upon, and the Courtiers to deride; from whence they were, after many unſpeakable Indignities, conveyed to moſt miſerable and loathſome Priſons, there to be fed with the bread of Tribulation.

The Turks overthrown in Croatia.

About this time, the Turks, under the Command of the Baſſa of Boſna, to the number of almoſt twenty thouſand, made a Road into Croatia, where they were by the Chriſtians, under the leading of the Lord Eckenberg and Leucowitz, overthrown, and almoſt all ſlain: the Chriſtians following the Chaſe even into the Turks Frontiers, burnt fifteen of their Villages, and took the Caſtle of Varvivar: immediately after, their Forces increaſing by the coming in of the Lord Herbenſtein, Governour of Valeria and Windiſmarche, and certain other Troops of Horſe-men out of Carinthia and the Countries thereabouts, they returned, the thirteenth of September, to beſiege Petrinia, otherwiſe called Petrowina; which, becauſe they were in hope to take by aſſault, they even at their firſt coming courageouſly aſſailed. But after two hours hard Fight, finding both greater reſiſtance, and more difficulty than they had before ſuppoſed to have found, and that without great Ordnance (which could not in ſhort time be got over the Mountains) there was no good to be done, they were glad to give over the Aſſault, and with ſuch loſs as they had received, to return to Siſeg, there to conſult farther of the matter. But the ſame night, a fugitive Horſe-man fled from the Enemy, came to the Camp, and told the Chriſtians, That Ruſtan Beg, Governour of Petrinia, was in the late Aſſault wounded in the Breaſt with a ſmall Shot, and dead; and that the Turks in the Town, diſcouraged with his Death, and the late Overthrow of their Friends in Croatia, would upon the firſt ſight of them abandon the Town, if they would but again return to beſiege it. Upon which good hope the Chriſtians preſently riſe, and ſet forward again towards Petrinia: which the Turks (hearing of their coming) had before, as the Souldier reported, for fear abandoned. So the Chriſtians, without Reſiſtance, entering the Town, found therein ſome Pillage, but better ſtore of Shot and Powder; and preſently ſending for certain Troops of Horſe-men to purſue the flying Turks, took divers of them, and among the reſt the late Governours Lieutenant, whom they brought back again into the Town. Thus was Petrinia again recovered from the Turks, to the great quiet and ſafety of all that ſide of the Country.

Petrinia taken by the Chriſtians.

Sigiſmund, the Tranſilvanian Prince, not ignorant with what an Enemy he had to do, either of the malice of old Sinan, who he knew would not be long before he returned, or yet of the ſecret Practice of the Polonians, for the withdrawing of the Country of Moldavia from him, ſought now, by all means (as it ſtood him upon) to make himſelf ſo ſtrong as he could againſt ſo many Storms ariſing. It fortuned, that even at the ſame time the Zaculians (better known by the name of Siculi) in former time a free People, but as then tributary unto the Turks, bordering upon the North-eaſt part of Tranſilvania; now weary of the Turkiſh Thraldom, and ſeeing the good Succeſs of the Prince, and the late revolted Countries, their Neighbours, offered unto the Prince their Service; promiſing of their own charge to maintain forty thouſand men in the Field during his Wars with the Turk, and yearly to pay him of every houſe a Dollar, with a certain meaſure of Wheat, Oats, and Barley, after the manner of their own Country: and further, That if God ſhould bleſs him with a Son to ſucceed him in his Government, every Houſholder ſhould give unto him a good fat Oxe. For all which Service, they craved no more, but that they might as his Subjects live under his Protection; yet ſo, as to be governed by their own ancient Laws and Cuſtoms. Of which their Offer the Prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their Camp, and all the People ſworn to the performance of the aforeſaid agreement. And having at that preſent but five and twenty thouſand in the Field, they, without delay, ſent out their Officers to preſs out fifteen thouſand more, for the filling up of the promiſed number of forty thouſand; wherewith they came unto the Prince, who, taking a view of his Army, found himſelf to be now fourſcore thouſand men ſtrong, to welcome the Baſſa withal when he ſhould come again into his Country.

The Prince taketh a view of his Army.

Now had Sinan, with great ſpeed, raiſed an Army of 70000 choice Souldiers, amongſt whom were many whole Bands of Janizaries, the ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire. With which Power, joyned unto the Reliques of his other broken Forces, he thought himſelf ſtrong enough for the ſubduing of the Prince: unto whom came alſo afterward Haſſan Baſſa, the Son of the great Baſſa Muhamet, one of the Turks moſt renowned men of War, and Bogdanus, the late expulſed Vayvod of Valachia, with many others of great name. With this Army, the old Baſſa, by a Bridge, which he with exceeding charge had made of Boats, paſſed over the great River Danubius, at a Town called Zorza or Giorgo (with us S. George) in Valachia, a great way beneath that place where ſometime the Emperour Trajan built his famous Bridge of Stone, worthily accounted amongſt the rare and wonderful Buildings of the World. From Zorza he marched with his Army to Tergoviſta, (ſometime the Vayvod's chief City, but then in the Power of the Turks) where is a notable Monaſtery, which he converted into a Caſtle, fortifying it with deep Trenches and ſtrong Bulwarks, and good ſtore of great Ordnance, purpoſing to make that the Seat of his War, until he had again reſtored thoſe late revolted Countries unto the Turkiſh Empire, which he, upon pain of his Head, had undertaken to perform. The Prince, both by Meſſengers and Letters, underſtanding of the Baſſaes arrival there, and having his Army in good readineſs, ſet forward to meet him, and to give him Battel. But being come into Valachia, and there incamped, it is reported, That a great Eagle, deſcending from an high Rock thereby, called the Kings Rock, and hovering over the Chriſtian Army, flew about the Princes Tent, and there lighting, was taken and preſented to the Prince, who commanded her to be kept as the preſage of his good Fortune, holding ſtill on his way; and the fifteenth of October, being come within half a days march of Tergoviſta, he underſtood by two Chriſtians lately eſcaped from the Turks, That two days before, the Turks hearing of his coming were ſtrucken with ſuch a general and ſudden fear, that Sinan had much ado, either by fair means or by foul to ſtay the Janizaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certain Companies of them were quite fled and gon. But the Truth was, That Sinan, ſeeing the general fear of his Army, and he himſelf no leſs fearful than the reſt; upon the Princes approach fled with all his Army, leaving his Tents behind him for haſte, his great Ordnance, with much Victuals and other warlike Proviſion, carrying with him only ſuch things as were of moſt value. As for the City of Tergoviſta, with the Caſtle which he had made of the Monaſtery, he committed to the keeping of Haſſan Baſſa and Bogdanus the late Vayvod, now become a Renegade Turk, with a Garriſon of 4000 choſen Souldiers, promiſing within a few days, if need ſhould be, to relieve them, but fled himſelf in all haſte with his Army to Buchareſta, a days Journey from Tergoviſta. From whence he preſently writ back again to Haſſan Baſſa, willing him if he could to defend the Caſtle; but if he ſhould think it not poſſible to be kept againſt the Power of the Prince, then betime to forſake it and to ſhift for himſelf. But theſe Letters being intercepted by the Chriſtians, never came to the Baſſaes Hands. Not long after the departing of Sinan, the Prince coming to Tergoviſta, entred the forſaken Camp, where he found many Tents, with ſome Ordnance, and great ſtore of Victuals, and without further delay ſummoned both the City and the Caſtle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day after, Haſſan, conſidering the flight of Sinan, the Power of the Prince, and withal, doubting, if need ſhould be, to be relieved by Sinan, whom, he not without cauſe ſuſpected not to love him, was about ſome reaſonable Compoſition to have yielded up both the City and the Caſtle; whereunto the Garriſon Souldiers (being moſt part of them Janizaries) would not in any caſe give their Conſent, but ſtood upon the defence of the Place. Whereupon the Prince began furiouſly to batter both the City and the Caſtle, and after ſome few hours battery, by aſſault took both, and put to the Sword the whole Garriſon; only Haſſan Baſſa, as taken with his own hand, he ſpared, and two other Sanzacks. Bogdanus the Renegade was there ſlain among the reſt. The Chriſtians had there a rich Prey, beſides forty two great pieces of Ordnance, and good ſtore of all manner of warlike Proviſion. Haſſan thus taken, grievouſly complained, That Sinan had of a malicious purpoſe expoſed him to ſo manifeſt Peril, for the grudge he bare unto his dead Father, the Viſier Muhamet, upon whom, becauſe he could never be revenged, he now by ſiniſter means had cunningly performed it upon his Son; yet he craved of the Prince to be well uſed, offering for his ranſome 100000 Hungarian Duckats. Yet whilſt the Prince thus lay at Tergoviſta, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence, ſent forth to ſpoil the Country, and to ſeek after Prey, thinking to have there found him ſtill; who now falling into the Hands of the Chriſtians, were there all ſlain, and 60000 head of Cattel recovered, which theſe Turks had taken out of Valachia and Moldavia, and ſhould by Sinans appointment have been ſent to Conſtantinople. For Valachia and Moldavia do ſo abound with Corn and Cattel, that they plentifully ſerve the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, not only with Corn and Fleſh, but alſo yearly ſend at the leaſt 150 Ships thither by the black Sea, laden with other kind of Victuals. Of which ſo great Commodities the Turks were now deprived, by the revolt of the aforeſaid Countries.

Haſſan Baſſa taken.

The fruitfulneſs of Valachia and Moldavia.

The Prince, leaving a ſtrong Garriſon in Tergoviſta, ſet forward with his Army towards Bucareſta, hoping there to have found Sinan. But he hearing of the loſs of Tergoviſta, and thinking himſelf in no good ſafety at Bucareſta, fled thence alſo to Zorza. The Prince coming to Bucareſta, found it abandoned by the Turks, and ſo took it without reſiſtance, yet had therein certain Field-pieces, with good ſtore of Shot and Powder, left there by Sinan. Having there ſtayed a while for the manning of the Place, he ſet forwards again towards Zorza; and that with ſuch ſpeed, that he overtook great numbers of the Turks, all whom he put to the Sword; ſo that the Fields betwixt Bucareſta and Zorza, were in many Places covered with the dead Bodies of the Turks. Nevertheleſs, he could not make ſo great haſte, marching ſtill in good order, but that the fearful Baſſa, diſorderly haſting, was about ſome ſix hours or more before come to the Bridge he had with great charge made over the River of Danubius.

Bucareſta taken by the Prince.

Sinan flyeth over Danubius.

Over the hithermoſt part of which Bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greateſt part of his Army (before the coming of the Prince) got over into an Iſland in the midſt of the River, wherein he had at his coming over incamped; but doubting now there to ſtay, with all the ſpeed he could, got him over the other part of the Bridge alſo unto the farther ſide of the River, with ſo many of his Men as in ſo ſhort time poſſibly could. Where to ſtay the farther purſuit of the Prince, he brake the Bridge on that ſide, and ſet it on fire; and thereby cut off alſo many of his own men that were not as yet come over. Whom the Prince incloſing, forced many of them into the River, where they periſhed; the reſt flying into the Iſland, were by the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing them, either there ſlain, or ſeeking by the other part of the Bridge to have got over, (whereof the farther end was before broken down by Sinan, and the hither end toward the Iſland now cut off by the Chriſtians) were, together with the Bridge, carried away by the violence of the River, and ſo altogether periſhed. Other ſome of the Chriſtians in the mean time took the Bridge that leadeth unto the Caſtle of Zorza, which ſtandeth compaſſed about with an Arm of Danubius, and being not very great, was kept by a Garriſon of ſeven hundred ſelect Souldiers. Unto which Caſtle the Prince preſently laid ſiege, (the reſolute Souldiers being not by any means to be perſwaded to yield it up, but to hold it out even unto the laſt man) and after he had ſore battered it, by plain force took it, and put to the Sword all the Garriſon Souldiers he could lay hands upon. About an hundred of theſe Turks, ſeeing they muſt needs fall into the Power of their Enemies, deſperately leapt from the top of the Caſtle into the River, where not one of them eſcaped, being all either drowned or ſlain with ſmall ſhot. In the winning of this Caſtle, two hundred and fifty of the Chriſtians were loſt, and many wounded; but of the Turks and Tartars, betwixt the eighteenth and the laſt of October, periſhed above ſix and twenty thouſand. In this Caſtle were taken thirty nine great Pieces, with ſuch ſtore of Armour and other warlike Proviſion, as might have ſerved for an whole Kingdom, and four thouſand Chriſtians, beſide Women and Children, whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, reſtored to their former Liberty. With whom, the Prince, after he had ſet all things in order, returned in great Triumph to Tergoviſta,-and ſo afterwards to his Palace at Alba-Julia, where, as alſo at Claudiopolis, and other Cities through his Dominions, he cauſed publick Prayers, with Thankſgiving to Almighty God, to be devoutly made for ſo great a Victory: as did alſo Michael the Vayvod in Valachia; who in all theſe great Wars againſt the Turks was nothing inferiour unto the Tranſilvanian himſelf. A greater loſs than this, the Turkiſh Emperour received not at Land in many Years before, being by this ſo happy and victorious a Prince, and the Revolt of theſe three Countries, deprived of ſo much Territory as they had not from the Chriſtians of long time gained. It was by ſome of them of the better ſort of the Turks that were taken, reported, That Sinan Baſſa ſhould oftentimes ſay, That this young Tranſilvanian Prince had bereft him of all the Honour and Renown he had with great travel got in the courſe of his long Life; and that although he had eſcaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cauſe for him in theſe his great years, even in the winding up of all, to loſe his Life together with his Goods and Honour. Now was the Tranſilvanian Prince's Name (after the Overthrow of this great Baſſa) become dreadful unto the Turks, and alſo famous through all Chriſtendome.

The Prince returneth with Victory to Alba-Julia.

The Opinion Sinan Baſſa had of the Tranſilvanian.

Jenna yielded to the Tranſilvanians.

Whilſt this worthy Prince was thus buſied in this Expedition againſt Sinan, he cauſed the Caſtle of Jenna (ſtanding upon the High-way between Temeſwar and Giula) to be beſieged by certain of his Captains appointed to that Service; in which Caſtle lay one of the Turks Sanzackes, with a Garriſon of ſeven hundred Turks, who much troubled ſuch as paſſed that way. They, now brought to ſome Extremity, and terrified with the Succeſs of the Prince, offered to give up the Caſtle, ſo that as Souldiers, with their Scimiters by their ſides, they might in ſafety be brought to Panoda. Which their Offer being accepted of, and they now upon their way, the Hungarian light Horſe-men that ſhould have conducted them, informed that theſe Turks now under their charge had ſecret Intelligence with the Turks in Garriſon at Giula and Temeſware, That they ſhould lie in Ambuſh for them near Panoda, and ſo cut them off by the way; ſet upon theſe Turks whom they ſhould have conducted, and cut the Throats of four hundred of them: and yet ſtill holding on their way, met with theſe Turks that lay in Ambuſh for them, whom they, after a ſharp Skirmiſh, overthrew; and having ſlain a great many of them, put the reſt to flight. By the taking of Jenna the ways thereabout were quieted, eſpecially for them of Waraden. The Sanzack of Jenna reported, That Mahomet had a little before ſent word unto his Baſſaes and Sanzanckes in Hungary, That ſuch Caſtles and Towns as they thought were not to be defended againſt the Chriſtians, they ſhould betimes, as occaſion ſerved, yield them up, or forſake them, ſo to ſpare the needleſs loſs of his good Souldiers; of whom he had, with ſo many Towns and ſtrong-holds, loſt no ſmall number this Year in Hungary. Jenna thus taken, divers of the richer ſort in Temeſware, fearing to be even preſently beſieged, ſent their Wives and Children, with their Treaſure and ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, out of the City, in Waggons, to be conveyed unto Places of more Safety; of which Waggons, ſeventy were by the Chriſtians (lying thereabout in Garriſon) intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich Booty.

Mahomet calleth in the Tartars to invade Moldavia.

Mahomet having this year fully purpoſed the utter Ruine of the Tranſilvanian Prince, and the reducing of the Countries of Tranſilvania, Moldavia, and Valachia, unto his Obeiſance, by the great Baſſa Sinan; had, for the better effecting thereof, before provided, that the Crim Tartar (ready ſtill at his call) ſhould with his own People (whereof he hath great ſtore) and certain Bands of the Turks, at the ſame time invade Moldavia; and poſſeſſing himſelf of this Country, to place one Sidriake Vayvod, inſtead of Stephen, placed by the Prince, and to people the Country with his Tartars, in reward of his good Service, as he ſaid; but indeed to have them always near at hand to do his Commandments in Hungary, Polonia, Tranſilvania, or the other Countries of the Chriſtians thereunto adjoyning. The Tartar, according to his Appointment, came with ſeventy thouſand Tartars, accompanied with their Wives and Children, to have planted themſelves in the Country, at the very ſame time that Sinan came to Tergoviſta. But being come upon the Frontiers of Moldavia, to have put in Execution what he was by Mahomet commanded, he found there Zamoſchie, the great Chancellor of Polonia, ready with a ſtrong Army to oppoſe himſelf againſt him, and to ſtay his farther Paſſage. Whereupon, ſome light Skirmiſhes paſſed between the Tartars and the Polonians; where the Tartars were ſtill put to the worſe, with the loſs of three thouſand of their men. The Tartar Cham, with Sidriake the Vayvod, appointed by the Turk, finding themſelves, though in number more, yet in ſtrength inferiour unto the Polonian, and that without his good leave he could not paſs; ſent unto the Chancellor to excuſe that was already paſt, as done without their conſent, by the Inſolency of their Souldiers; and to tell him, That their coming was not to fight with him, as having expreſs Commandment from the great Sultan Mahomet, in no caſe to diſturb the League betwixt him and the Polonians, but quietly to paſs by their Frontiers into Moldavia, and there to place Sidriake Vayvod, his Tributary, inſtead of Stephen, that now uſurped the place by the appointment of the Tranſilvanian; which, that they might do, they craved his leave, as Friends, to paſs. Whereunto the Chancellor anſwered, That he was come thither, by the commandment of the King, to defend thoſe Countries from the Invaſion of ſuch as had in them no right; and that there had of long time been an ancient League betwixt the Polonian Kings and Turkiſh Emperours, upon certain Conditions, which he would for his part keep inviolate, with the favour of the Turkiſh Emperour, yet ſo, as that the Kingdom of Polonia took no harm thereby, and that they might quietly live by him as their good Neighbour; which League he proteſted not to have been by him, but by them, infringed: as for to give them Paſſage, he ſaid he could not. Meſſengers paſſing thus to and fro, and ſome Parle had, at laſt certain Articles were agreed upon, to the reaſonable contentment both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor, (though not of Sidriake, diſappointed thereby of his Vayvodſhip) as alſo of the Turkiſh Sultan, whoſe Pleaſure they both ſeemed to have in ſpecial regard. Hereupon, the Tartar, with his Multitude, preſently returned, leaving the Chaneellor to his own deſigns. Now was it commonly thought, that the Chancellor had done the Tranſilvanian Prince great Service, by keeping out of the Tartars, and much Honour was, by many that ſaw leaſt, ſpoken of him therefore. But far was it from his thought to do the Tranſilvanian therein any ſuch good, at whoſe Glory he envied, and had with the Cardinal and his Brother, the Princes Uncles (but moſt deadly Enemies) ſecretly conſpired, ſo much as in them was, his utter Ruine and Overthrow; wiſhing thoſe Countries rather in the Subjection of the Turk than to ſee them ſo honourably at liberty, governed by the Prince; ſuch is the force of malicious Envy, the inſeparable Companion of worthy Vertue. Which the Chancellor (otherwiſe a man of great Fame and Honour) began now openly to pour forth; for preſently after the departure of the Tartars, he with all his Power paſſing over the River Nijeſter, or Tyros, into Moldavia, even at ſuch time as the Prince was going againſt Sinan at Tergoviſta, firſt ſeiſed upon the Caſtle of Chotiim, which he furniſhed with his own Souldiers: and from thence marching to Zorona, the metropolitical City of that Province, and Seat of the Vayvod, had it yielded unto him; and ſo proceeding on, had in ſhort time almoſt the whole Country delivered unto him; Stephen the Vayvod, placed by the Prince, flying from place to place before him, from whom he leſt feared any ſuch thing, having made account of no other Enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayvod thus driven out, and the Chancellor poſſeſſed of the Country, he preſently placed one Hieremias Vayvod inſtead of Stephen, to hold that Honour of the Polonian King as his Sovereign. Yet nevertheleſs, to ſatisfie the Turk, he ſent a Meſſenger to Sinan Baſſa, then but newly come to Tergoviſta, requeſting him not to take it in evil part that he had entred into Moldavia, and there placed a new Vayvod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mahomet to confirm this his doing, and the Vayvod by him placed; promiſing the Country of Moldavia to remain tributary ſtill unto the Sultan, and that this new Vayvod ſhould forthwith pay unto him what Tribute was behind, and from thenceforth a far greater Tribute yearly than had the Country of Moldavia before. Whereunto the haughty Baſſa (then fearing nothing leſs than that which immediately after hapned, to be driven out of thoſe Countries by the Prince) proudly anſwered, That it was not the great Sultan's mind that the Polonians ſhould at all invade Moldavia, for that beſide he could, without their help, reduce thoſe Countries to his Obedience, he had given that Country unto the Tartar, in reward of his good Service already done in Hungary and other places; whoſe Subjects, the Tartars, would e're long be ready, with their Wives and Children, to take Poſſeſſion of. Nevertheleſs the Chancellor proceeded to defend the new Vayvod by him placed; which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan, the Turks Champion (as is before declared) being preſently after overthrown, and driven quite out of thoſe Countries by the Prince: who, if he had not then gained the Victory, the Chancellor had not now holden Moldavia, but the Turk, whoſe Quarrel he ſeemed rather to favour than the Princes. The Chancellor, to colour this his Invaſion, pretended that the Country of Moldavia did of ancient Right belong unto the Kingdom of Polonia; which the Tranſilvanians took to be no other but mere and open wrong. This ſuppoſed Title, ſuch as it was, the Chancellor had ſo faſhioned out unto the King and the States of that Kingdom, that they referred it to his Diſcretion to invade the Country, and removing the Vayvod placed by the Prince, to place another in his ſtead; and the rather to perſwade them, laboured by many forced Reaſons to ſhew the Power of the Tranſilvanian Prince to be ſo far inferiour unto the Turks, that it was to be feared he ſhould at length be thruſt out of all his Dominions, and ſo they, together with Moldavia, become ſubject to the Turks; which if it ſhould ſo come to paſs, then ſhould the Polonians have an untruſty and troubleſome Neighbour: and that therefore it were better that Moldavia were poſſeſſed by them that were better able to defend it than was he, that ſo the Turk might be kept farther off from Polonia. Which occaſion he ſaid was not longer to be delay'd, but now betime to be laid hold upon; perſwading himſelf to find ſuch Grace and Favour with the Turkiſh Emperour, as that he ſhould be therewith right well contented; which was like enough for a time to be, for that the Tranſilvanian ſhould thereby be much weakened. By theſe and ſuch like Reaſons, framed to ſerve his own turn, the Chancellor ſo prevailed with the King and the States of the Kingdom, that he received (as I ſaid) full Authority to proceed in the matter as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the Prince, and benefit of the Turk; the late choſen Vayvod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into Tranſilvania, one by the Country of Siculi, another by the way that leadeth to Alba-Julia, and the third by Valachia.

The late choſen Vayvod opens three ways unto the Turks and Tartars into Tranſilvania.

The Tranſilvanian Prince, ſeeing the Country of Moldavia, by the practice of the Chancellor, thus taken from him, and diſſevered from the other united Provinces, to the great weakning of his Eſtate, after the flight of Sinan ſent certain Companies both of Horſe and Foot, to Stephen the late Vayvod, but now driven out by the Polonians, to prove if haply he could by that means drive out the Polonians again, and recover his former Dignity. With this aid ſent from the Prince, and others that favoured his Quarrel, he joyned a bloody Battel with the Polonians; but being therein by them overcome and taken, and for a ſpace kept (as the Prince feared, to have been delivered unto the Turk, he was by them (as is reported) cruelly afterwards put to death.

This foul dealing of the Polonian in Moldavia much grieved many good Chriſtians, as tending to the general hurt of the Chriſtian Commonweal. For which cauſe, the Emperour, by his Ambaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe unto the Polonian King, ſought to perſwade him to deſiſt from ſuch Invaſion of the Tranſilvanian Prince, by his Chancellor, as nothing ſtanding with his Honour; and that ſome good Reconciliation might be made between the Prince and the Cardinal Bator and his Brother, the Princes Uncles, Authors of all theſe Troubles. To which purpoſe alſo the Pope ſent a Meſſenger with like Inſtructions and Letters unto the King, perſwading him, not ſo to proſecute his Wars againſt the Prince, but to turn his Thoughts unto a more peaceable and Chriſtian-like courſe, eſpecially with him with whom he was ſo near linked in Marriage. To the like effect he writ alſo unto the Cardinal Bator, and after many grave Admonitions peremptorily cited him to Rome. But foraſmuch as the Proceedings of the Polonian againſt the Prince are more plainly to be gathered by the Pope's Letters unto the King, it ſhall not, I hope, be miſtaken, if I here ſet them down thus as I find them by others reported.

The Pope's Letters unto the King of Polonia to diſſuade him from invading the Prince.

'Pope Clement the Eighth, to our beſt beloved Son in Chriſt, Sigiſmund, by the Grace of God King of Polonia, with the Benediction Apoſtolical ſendeth greeting. By how much greater affection of fatherly Love we embrace your Majeſty in the Lord, ſo much the more fervently we wiſh all your Actions to be adorned with the greateſt commendation of true Godlineſs and Wiſdom, both before God and Men; whereof it proceedeth, that we are ſo much the more vehemently and grievouſly moved, if we hear any ſuch thing of you, as may ſeem not agreeable to your Vertue and approved Zeal toward the Catholick Religion, or tending to the obſcuring of the Glory of your Name, as is now brought unto us concerning the Affairs of Moldavia; whereof, not without great grief, we write unto you. And to rehearſe things a little before paſt: with what earneſtneſs and fervency dealt I with you, that for God's Cauſe, and 1595 the defence of the health and liberty of the Chriſtian Commonweal againſt the Tyranny of the Turks, you would combine your ſelf with our moſt dearly beloved Son Rodolph the Emperor, and divers other Chriſtian Princes? and that you ſhould not let ſlip ſo notable an occaſion, ſo worthily to deſerve of God, of the Catholick Faith, and of the Chriſtian Commonweal in general? And albeit we then thought, as well for many your own private reſpects, as alſo of your Kingdoms, That you were to be borne withal and excuſed if you did not now openly deſcend into this Confederation of the Chriſtian Princes againſt the moſt mortal and common Enemy, neither apertly joyn your Forces or give aid for the repreſſing of his Inſolency; yet we always aſſured our ſelves, that no let ſhould in any caſe proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Chriſtian Princes ſhould be the rather hindered, juſtly to proſecute their Injuries, or to caſt off from their Necks the heavy yoke of the moſt cruel Tyrant; whoſe deſire of Sovereignty is not compriſed within the compaſs of any bounds. But that you ſhould in favour of the Turks impugn the Catholick Princes and Defenders of the Chriſtian Faith, and ſo joyn hands with the Enemies of the Croſs of Chriſt, as that by your help their force and fury ſhould be encreaſed, and ours not only weakened, but in the very courſe of Victory hindered, and caſt into moſt grievous perils; this we have not only not thought of you, but not ſo much as once ſuſpected; yea and can now ſcarce be perſuaded to believe thoſe things to be done by you, which are reported unto us as moſt true and undoubted. For the report goeth, That you having Intelligence with the Turks and Tartars, have with them conſpired, and namely againſt our well-beloved Son Sigiſmund, Prince of Tranſilvania, who with invincible Courage fighteth the Battels of the Lord; and leſt he ſhould be able to abate the force and attempts of the moſt proud Enemy (which by the ſingular mercy of God he hath hitherto above his own power performed) but rather be enforced much to fear his own Eſtate, a new Vayvod and Prince, as it were by a triumvirate Authority, and compact, to be placed in Moldavia, and him by the Turks, You, and the Tartars together, to be made Governour of that Country. Which unto us ſeemed ſo new and ſo ſtrange, and contrary to the good Opinion we had always conceived of you, yea and ſo unbeſeeming your Zeal and Wiſdom, that for grief and admiration I had almoſt cried out with the Prophet, You Heavens be amazed at this, and you Gates thereof be you exceedingly heavy. For what could be ſuſpected or imagined farther from the Expectation of us and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigiſmund, the moſt religious King of Polonia and Sweden, who had always profeſſed himſelf a moſt earneſt Defender of the Catholick Religion, who was ready, even with his own Blood to redeem the Victory of the Chriſtians, and Glory of the Croſs, againſt the moſt wicked Enemies of the ſame, to be upon the ſudden become ſo unlike unto himſelf? and (ſo much as in him was) to cut off the hope and happy ſucceſs of that religious War; and to do harm to a Chriſtian and Catholick Prince, not to refuſe to joyn in league and friendſhip, even with the moſt barbarous Nations and the Tartars, the perpetual enemies of himſelf, and of the Kingdom of Polonia. For which Cauſes, our mind is tormented with ſuch bitterneſs of grief, that we could not but by ſpeedy Meſſengers write unto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the ſooner ſee the greatneſs of our grief; and we alſo without delay might ſignifie unto you, what our fatherly Love towards you requeſteth in ſo important a matter. For happily we will ſend one even of purpoſe to you concerning this cauſe, the care whereof grieveth us more than can well be expreſſed. Wherefore, 1595 moſt dearly beloved Son, we exhort you, and in the moſt effectual manner we can, adviſe you and beſeech you in the Lord, more attentively to conſider what great diſpleaſure both of God and Man this your Action and Reſolution may incur, what a ſtain it may bring unto your Crown and Dignity. For believe us, that are to you inſtead of a Father in Chriſt, who love you not feignedly, but faithfully, and indeed; who wiſh for your glory in this World, and your eternal Felicity in the World to come: believe us (I ſay) this doth much blemiſh your Fame with all Chriſtian Kings and Princes; all men take it in evil part, and deteſt it as a thing monſtrous, that it ſhould by your means be wrought, that the Chriſtian Affairs ſhould not proſper, that an heroical Prince, who had vowed himſelf for Chriſt and his Country, ſhould not have proſperous ſucceſs in this ſo religious and neceſſary a War againſt the Infidels, Turks, and Tartars, no leſs yours, or peradventure alſo more yours, and other Chriſtian Princes Enemies, than his. But what do we ſay? You to hinder the proceedings of the Tranſilvanian Prince? this were happily but a ſmall matter; nay verily, by this means not only a Chriſtian and Catholick Prince, and valiant Champion of the Chriſtian Faith (a Vertue both admirable and amiable in the very Enemy) but your own Brother-in-law, bound unto you with ſo many bonds of Affinity, whoſe Children ſhall be as it were your Childrens Brethren, is by this means brought into great danger, and expoſed unto the fury of the moſt mercileſs Turks. What do you then my moſt dearly beloved Son? Beware that all men, both now living, and hereafter to come, condemn you not of the greateſt Inhumanity; but beware yet more, that you ſeem not ingrateful, not only to your own nigh Kinſman, but to God himſelf, who hath bountifully bleſſed you with two great Kingdoms, and ſo many good things; and that you provoke not him to Wrath againſt your ſelf, that rejecteth and confoundeth all evil and wicked Devices; and that this miſchief that you have brought upon your Brother, by the juſt judgment of God redound not to the greateſt deſtruction of you and your Kingdom, which he in mercy forbid. Do you think, that the Tranſilvanian being overcome, you ſhall in ſafety live from the treachery of the Turk? Do you not know him to be a faithleſs man, which meaſureth all things by his own profit, which keepeth faith with none but as ſtandeth with his own Commodity, who with an unſatiable deſire gapeth after every Kingdom, nay thirſteth after the Deſtruction of all Chriſtendom? Think alſo my Son, what wrong you ſhall do unto the Emperour your Couſin, out of whoſe Imperial Blood you have begotten Sons and Heirs, and by the Grace of God ſhall more; but alſo our Dignity, and the Dignity of this Apoſtolical Seat (which you have always ſo devoutly honoured) is thereby hurt, and your moſt dear Mother (which we know you of all other leaſt would) the Roman Church is offended, which for the maintenance of this ſacred War is at great and wonderful Charges; and our Forces, which by you ought to have been relieved and encreaſed, being in ſo unfit a time by theſe Stirs in Moldavia diſſevered and diminiſhed, and the Enemies on the contrary part encreaſed and ſtrengthened, into what danger and diſtreſs may both our Army of the Church and the Emperours fall? And withal, how greatly all the manner and managing of this whole War is thereby confounded, there is no man that ſeeth not. Yea and this moreover, which no little concerneth the Dignity of us and this Holy See, we have undertaken and certainly promiſed to our moſt dearly beloved Sons, Rodolph and Sigiſmund, That your Royal Majeſty ſhould ‘not in any thing hinder or hurt their Affairs; neither did we hereof aſſure them upon a light occaſion, but, moved with great reaſon, not only for that we deſervedly ought ſo to promiſe of you in ſo juſt a cauſe, but alſo for that it was ſo unto us plainly and expreſly written by the Reverend Father the Biſhop of S. Severus, our Apoſtolical Nuntio with you, whom we know to be both unto us faithful, and to you dutiful: neither can we by any means doubt thereof, becauſe he hath writ unto us concerning ſo weighty a matter, that he received it even from your own Mouth. Which things ſo ſtanding, ſeeing you of your ſelf ſee the manifold Abſurdities of this Fact on every ſide, not to ſpeak of the heinouſneſs thereof; we requeſt you again, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to apply the neceſſary Remedies to theſe Hurts. The Tranſilvanian Prince, your Brother-in-law, devoted to your ſelf, and deſirous of your favour, either protect with your defence, or at leaſtwiſe hurt him not; yea, hurt not the whole State of the Chriſtian Commonweal, and relieve not by any means the Quarrel of the Enemies of Chriſt. If you have any controverſie with the Prince Sigiſmund, or deſire of him any thing, referr it unto us; that is to ſay, unto your moſt loving Father: you know your Affairs to be of us favoured, and we hope, by the Power of God, that it may eaſily come to paſs, that ſome convenient means may be found whereby Peace and Quietneſs may be confirmed betwixt you, and good Unity grow betwixt you two Brethren our Sons, and ſo all the root of Bitterneſs and Diſpleaſure to be utterly pluck'd out of your Minds. This have I writ unto you my Son, frankly, and from a ſincere Heart, though truly much grieved, becauſe we love you, and are much careful of your Honour and Good: Shew you again in Deed that you take it ſo, as written from your Father; and that you altogether prefer our fatherly and wholeſome Exhortations before the ſiniſter Perſwaſions of others. Farther concerning theſe matters, you ſhall underſtand by the ſame Biſhop our Nuntio, now with you, to whom you may (as you have done) give credit in all things, as to our ſelf.

Theſe Letters dated from Rome the eighth day of November, were delivered to the King in December, with others to the Cardinal and Chancellor, whom the Pope ſharply reproved, as the Authors and Contrivers of all theſe Miſchiefs.

The Tartar Cham, before ſtirred up by the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet for the Invaſion of Moldavia, (as is already before declared) about this time ſent his Ambaſſador alſo unto the Polonian King, for the Confirmation of ſuch Articles as he had before argeed upon with the Chancellor: which, becauſe they manifeſtly declare the ground and purpoſe of his intended Expedition into Moldavia, with the foul colluſion of the Chancellor with the Turks and Tartars againſt the Tranſilvanian Prince, I thought it not amiſs, or from our purpoſe (for the more manifeſtation of that which is already ſaid) here to let them down, as they are tranſlated out of the Tartar Language.

The Copy of the Letters of the Tartar unto the King of Polonia.

CHam Kazikiery unto the King of Polonia and Sweden, our Brother, one of the great Lords among the Chriſtians, humbly boweth his Head. Firſt, we ſignifie unto you, that Aaron Palatine of Moldavia was a forſworn Traitor; who, having gathered a Power of the Valachians, and joyning unto him the Polonian Coſſacks, ſpoiled the Territories of the great Sultan. But afterward, Diſſention ariſing among them, the Hungarian Coſſacks living in Valachia ſent Aaron in bonds unto the King of Vienna: after him followed another Traitor called Rozwan, who alſo having raiſed certain Companies of Souldiers, began in like manner to forrage the Countries of the Turkiſh Emperour thereabout; which, as ſoon as he had knowledge of, he writ unto me his Brother, That I ſhould, with all poſſible ſpeed, go into Valachia, to chaſtiſe theſe Rebels, to burn their Houſes and Towns; and having with the edge of the Sword ſlain their men, to carry away with me their Wives and Children into Captivity. Having this in Charge, I, the great Cham of the great Territory of the great Lord Karyktery, with my Brother Letikerry Galga, and other my Brethren and Counſellors, warlike and valiant Captains and Murzis; mounting my Horſe, came with mine Army into Valachia unto the River Prut, where it meeteth in another River called Cocoza: here we chanced upon a faithful Servitor of yours, our Brother the Chancellor, who was alſo come a little before us into Valachia; with whom, after ſome light contention, when we began to be more tractable, he declared unto us, that he was of purpoſe come into Valachia to place there a new Vayvod, which (as he ſaid) of ancient Right belonged unto the Polonians, without any wrong or prejudice therein to be done to the Covenants and League they had with the Emperour of the Turks; and farther, that his deſire was, that one Jeremias, whom he had appointed Vayvod, might have the Command of that Province; and that the ancient Amity, ſuch as was in the time of Sultan Solyman and Cham Dawlethgerd, might be faithfully kept. Which, when I had for my part faithfully ſworn to do, and he likewiſe had cauſed the ſame to be done by ſuch of his as he had therefore ſent unto me, we decreed together, that the Coſſacks on the farther ſide of Nijeſter (diſordered and rebellious men) ſhould be utterly rooted out, that they ſhould not hereafter do any harm in the Territories of the great Sultan, and that the Preſents uſually ſent unto us of long, even ſince the time of Sultan Solyman, ſhould no more be detained, nor any harms be hereafter done in any part of our Dominions. And therefore, when the Chancellor had promiſed unto us, that he would take order that theſe Coſſacks ſhould be utterly deſtroyed, I alſo conſented, that according to the Pleaſure of the Royal Majeſty of you my Brother, Hieremias ſhould hold the Vayvodſhip of Valachia; which I forthwith by Letters ſignified unto the Turkiſh Emperour. Now if it be ſo, that your Majeſty ſhall give your Conſent unto thoſe things which we have here agreed upon with your Chancellor, you ſhall then for ever find brotherly Friendſhip with me, my Brother, and all other our Captains and Murzis: but if you ſhall not deſtroy theſe Coſſacks, you ſhall not then perform the Oath and Covenants made. Theſe things we have commanded to be declared unto you by our Ambaſſador, our Brother Gianach Metagra, whom we requeſt your Majeſty courteouſly to entertain, and by him to ſend the Preſents unto us; for we will not now this Year ſend any other. Given at the River Prut in the Year of Mahomet 1004.

The Preſents offered by the Tartar Ambaſſador to the King of Polonia.

After the Tartar Ambaſſador had delivered thoſe Letters unto the King, with a Speech in effect to the ſame purpoſe, he in the Name of the Cham gave unto him an Horſe and an Arrow for a Preſent: and afterward being brought to a Lodging appointed for him, was commanded there to expect his Anſwer. At length his Diſpatch was given him in Letters ſealed up, which he took much againſt his Will, requeſting the King to ſend an Ambaſſador unto the Cham; and farther, by word of mouth to tell him what to anſwer unto his Lord. But other Anſwer could he get none than was already delivered him in writing; and ſo, rewarded with a Gown furred with Sables, was diſmiſſed without the Preſent requeſted by the Cham, or any Ambaſſador to accompany him.

Thus the Tranſilvanian Prince, on the one ſide mightily impugned by the Turk, and on the other, 1595 by the ſetting on of the Turk, ready to have been no leſs endangered by the Invaſion of the Tartar, received greater harm from the Polonians being Chriſtians, than from both thoſe great Mahometan Princes; the Polonian in ſome ſort performing for the Turk, what he had plotted to have been done by the Tartar; and ſo by the taking away of Moldavia from the Prince, not only weakened his ſtrength, but alſo opened a way for the barbarous Enemies into his Country. Howbeit, much it is that the Polonians alledge for the excuſe of themſelves, and the defence of that which was by the great Chancellor then done in Moldavia; which, for that it cannot be better told than by the great Chancellor himſelf, let us hear how he by his Letters anſwereth the matter, even unto Clement the Pope himſelf.

John Zamoſchie unto Clement the Eighth, the Great Biſhop.

Zamoſchie the great Chancellor his Letters unto Clement the Pope.

‘MOST holy and bleſſed Father in Chriſt, and moſt gracious Lord; after the kiſſing of your moſt bleſſed Feet, and my moſt humble Commendations, I have by your Holineſs's Letters, directed both unto the Kings Majeſty and my ſelf, underſtood, as well his Royal Majeſty, and my moſt gracious Lord and Maſter, as alſo my ſelf as his Servant, to be both accuſed unto your Holineſs; as if by thoſe things by us done in Moldavia, the Endeavours of the Chriſtians had been hindered, and the Power of the Enemy confirmed. Whereof I am not with many Words to purge my ſelf unto your Holineſs, foraſmuch as I aſſure my ſelf your Holineſs to have already fully underſtood both what the things were that were done in Moldavia, and how they were done; partly by the Kings Majeſties Letters, and partly by his principal Secretary, for that cauſe eſpecially ſent unto your Holineſs. Yet doubt I not to requeſt this one thing of your Holineſs, that if it hath known me for a man, I will not ſay of any Capacity or Wit, but even of the leaſt Experience in the World, or of any Religion at all; ſo to perſwade it ſelf of me, nothing to have been done, eſpecially in this matter, either raſhly, or to the hinderance of the Chriſtian Common-weal. I will not now repeat what mine Opinion was concerning the League and Confederation to be made with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, for the combining of their Forces againſt the common Enemy, eſpecially his Sacred Majeſties; as alſo what mine own Labour and Endeavour was in the laſt aſſembly of the States in the high Court of Parliament. Which thing, after it was even by them whom it moſt concerned, either delayed or neglected, or utterly caſt aſide, and yet his Majeſty had ſtill a great deſire to do the Chriſtian Common weal ſome great good, I alſo to the uttermoſt of my Power laboured to that end; that by the common decree of the Kingdom, an Expedition might be made into Tartaria, not ſo much in revenge of the Injuries done by that Enemy in theſe late years paſt, as ſo in the mean time to turn him from the Necks of the Chriſtians, as that he ſhould not joyn his Forces with the Turks; or if it ſo pleaſed God to bleſs thoſe our Endeavours utterly at length to root out that ſo great a Miſchief. But how it came to paſs that this Expedition, ſo much by the King deſired (yet ſcarcely begun or taken in hand) took not effect; it is not needful for me to declare, for that I ſuppoſe your Holineſs hath by others, eſpecially your Nuntio, underſtood the ſame. In the mean time, by others and often Meſſengers News was brought, That Sinan Baſſa with a great Army was already come over Danubius; and I, by Letters from the Vayvod of the farther Valachia was advertiſed, how that he, not able to encounter him, had forſaken that Province, which at the firſt Impreſſion taken and almoſt utterly waſted by Sinan, he was now come faſt upon Tranſilvania, and in Moldavia the Tartar was ſtill expected, inſomuch that Roſwan (who having taken Priſoner Aaron the Palatine, whom he ſecured in his Houſe, and ſo himſelf invaded the Palatine) began now alſo to quake for fear, and to crave help of me, or rather to ſeek how he might fly away, (as not long after he did) neither having any great ſtrength about him, or expecting any greater from the People of that Country, for why, that Province was brought ſo low by the Miſeries of the former years, but eſpecially by ſuch as had evil governed the ſame, that at ſuch time as I entred into Moldavia, I aſſure your Holineſs there were not in it of Houſholders, above 15000, and thoſe alſo for the moſt part poor Country People of the baſeſt ſort, in whom there could neither be any great help, neither if they had been able to have done any thing, durſt Roſwan have truſted himſelf with them upon whom he had with all kind of Cruelty tyrannized. Chotiim, a Caſtle in the very Confines of this Kingdom, was kept with no greater Garriſon than 200 Hungarians, who, perceiving themſelves neither of ſufficient ſtrength to hold the Place, nor to withſtand the Enemy, they alſo by and by followed after Roſwan. All the reſt of the Province was not only unarmed, but altogether poor and naked, without any certain Government, without Counſel, without Strength, and without any Defence at all, two Caſtles only excepted; which, ſtanding upon the Confines of Polonia, might have ſerved better for the Enemy out of them to have infeſted us, than for the defence of Moldavia againſt them; ſo that had the Enemy once ſet foot into that Province, neither could it without a great Power have been recovered, neither being recovered, could eaſily have been defended againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy; and that which worſe was, was not it ſelf alone to have been conſumed with that Fire, but like enough to have carried away with it Podolia alſo bordering upon it, with a great part of Ruſcia. Wherefore, in this ſtate of things, when as both that Province was in greateſt danger to have been loſt, and ſo many Enemies hovered, not more over the Heads of all Chriſtendom than over this Kingdom, what was of us to be done? I know to whom I ſpeak theſe things, even unto him, not only whoſe divine Wiſdom, but ſingular Love alſo towards my native Country is to me moſt known. Verily I entred into Moldavia with no great Army, yet ſuch an one as haply (as in like caſe it often chanceth) Fame had made amongſt the Enemies a very great one; ſo that Sinan, fearing if he ſhould thruſt himſelf with his Army into the Streights whereby he was to break into Tranſilvania, to be ſhut in by our Army, ſtayed his Journey; and the Tartar, the more earneſtly he was called upon by Sinan, (by reaſon of the Fame of this our Army) reſolved to make himſelf ſo much the ſtronger. So that whilſt he aſſembled the Nogaian Tartars and others farther off, and ſo from all parts raiſed the greateſt Power he could, the matter was delaied almoſt unto the end of November; at which time he, with a moſt huge Army, accompanied with Sendziak Jehivenſe, and a great power of the Turks raiſed out of their Provinces thereby, came directly upon me in the Fields of Coroce. Sendziack, the Tartar Cham's Siſters Son, now called himſelf the Baſſa of Moldavia, as did the Tartars eldeſt Son name himſelf Prince of ano- 1595 ‘ther part of that Province alſo; for ſo that Country was to have been divided betwixt them, that that part which was next unto the Tartars Dominions ſhould be allotted unto the Tartar, and the other part confining upon this Kingdom, to be governed by Sendziak, as Baſſa thereof, and ſo to make it the ſeat of a perpetual War, from whence Podolia, Ruſcia, and the leſſer Polonia, might be with continual Incurſions waſted even before our faces: concerning which matter they now diſperſed their Letters, wherein they publiſhed the Power and Authority given them from the grand Seignior, exhorting the People of that Country to receive the ſame. A whole day we fought with this multitude, our men always, by the goodneſs of God, having not only the upper hand, but without any notable loſs alſo, yet not without great ſlaughter of theirs: and would to God I had had ſuch ſtrength, as that not only the conditions of Peace, but even the Enemies themſelves might have been in my power. But when we were oftentimes come to parle (they ſtill requiring the ſame) and ſo at length unto Conditions of Peace; if ſuch were given them, as whereby this only Kingdom had without the wrong of any other been delivered from ſo great and ſudden a danger, what reaſonable man could find fault therewith, if we ſhould have preferred the health and welfare of our Country (whereunto all good men owe all they have) before other mens Profits? But now theſe things were ſo done, as that it was no leſs provided for the good of the neighbour Chriſtians, yea and happily not the leaſt for theirs, who for the ſame ſlander this Kingdom unto your Holineſs: the fury of Sinan Baſſa was by this means repreſſed, who whilſt he feared to be ſhut up in the Straits by our Army now come into Moldavia, and expected the Tartars coming, ſpent almoſt all the reſt of the Summer idly, and without any thing doing. The Tartar himſelf was not only turned from the Bowels of Chriſtendom, whereinto he had purpoſed (as the year before) to have entred, we having with our own Breaſts received his force and fury; but being brought unto Conditions, was expreſly enjoyned in a moſt ſhort prefined time, and without any more harm doing to return again into his Country by the ſelf ſame way he came, and by no other: whereby it is come to paſs, that until this day Chriſtendom hath not this year yet felt the Tartars Weapons. But unto Tranſilvania and Hungary, what a ſpace and power was given for them to gather their Strength and Forces together, and out of the ſame places to oppoſe them againſt the Enemy, whenas our Army kept them ſafe at their Backs, and eaſed not only Moldavia, but Valachia and Tranſilvania alſo of that care? Whereas if this cauſe of delay had not been objected unto the Turks firſt, and after unto the Tartars, not to ſay any thing of the Turks, the Tartars at the very ſelf-ſame time that the Tranſilvanian Army was gone into Valachia againſt Sinan, might have broken into Tranſilvania before it could have returned home, or elſe marching directly towards that Army, might have met with it out of Tranſilvania. As for Moldavia, which together with the Memory of the Chriſtian name, yet left in it, had utterly periſhed, it was moſt manifeſtly preſerved by the coming of our Army. Which what end it would have had, if the Enemy might at his Pleaſure have raged as he did in the farther Valachia, thoſe moſt bitter remembrances in it yet at this day ſmoking, do well declare; out of which it is well known more thouſands of Chriſtian Captives to have been carried away into moſt woful Captivity, than almoſt out of any other Province in all the time of theſe miſerable Wars. Which altho it be thus, yet boaſt we not thereof, neither ſend we any triumphant Letters unto your Holineſs, nor brag we of our good Service done for the Chriſtian Common-weal; contenting our ſelves with the Conſcience of the thing it ſelf. In the mean time we are accuſed unto your Holineſs; but for what cauſe? If any man complain for the taking of Moldavia, I will not ſay it was by them before willingly forſaken, whilſt I was yet in the Frontiers thereof; but that this Kingdom hath a moſt antient Right unto it, and ſuch a Right, as that when our Kings being buſied in their Wars againſt the Muſcovite, the Cruciat Teutony Brethren, or others; ſome others alſo troubling the ſtate thereof, it for a time became a Prey unto the Turkiſh Tyrants; yet in all the Leagues made or renewed betwixt this Kingdom and them, was ſtill excepted, That all ſuch things as the Palatine of Moldavia was of duty to perform unto the King, ſhould by him ſtill be performed. Which Kings of Polonia, and namely Auguſtus himſelf, the laſt of the Jagellonian Race, appointed divers of thoſe Palatines themſelves. Which altho they be things moſt manifeſt, yet having more regard unto the welfare of that Province, as a Chriſtian Country, than of our Right, we reſtored the ſame into the ſame ſtate wherein it hath been for many Years before theſe * Wars. Wherefore, if any man think any thing done whereby the Enemies of the Croſs of Chriſt might be eaſed or ſtrengthened, or the Defenders of the Faith hindred, it is ſo far from any ſuch thing to be done, that rather (as is before declared) the Enemies force is repreſſed and averted, and greater means given unto the Chriſtians afront to impugne them, the Enemy being at their Backs by us ſhut from them. But I fear that they have not fully informed your Holineſs, how theſe things were done, who have reported unto your ſaid Holineſs not only the Name of the Turks to have been proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldavia, but alſo the Name of the Tartars, the proper Enemies of the Polonians, and by the Power and Decrees of them three, as it were confederate together, things to have been ordered in Moldavia. Which their Complaint if it tend to that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankly confeſs certain Conditions to have been given them, but ſuch as whereby is provided not only for the quiet and ſecurity of this Kingdom, but no leſs alſo for the whole Chriſtian Commonweal, as is before declared. All which things for all that, altho they were done for the good of this Kingdom, and all Chriſtendom in general, yet were they ſo done, that they were all by me referred unto the King's Majeſty and the States of the Kingdom; ſo that at this preſent the Kingdom is at free liberty either to joyn in Confederation with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes; or if that cannot upon certain and indifferent conditions be agreed upon, yet with no mans injury or hurt to ratifie this, joyned with the health and good of a great part of the Chriſtian Commonweal: only God grant that the Chriſtian Princes may ſeriouſly think both of this ſo Chriſtian a Confederation againſt the common Enemy, and ſtrive alſo all together againſt the enemy with their weapons, and not with Miſreports and Slanders one againſt another. They are not to aſſail the enemies feet, but his throat: neither is the ſeat of the war to be placed in the borders of Polonia, where it concerneth themſelves much to have all things rather peaceable behind them: but let the War be undertaken with no leſs charge & preparation, than if the enemies royal ſeat were to be aſſailed; which ſtanding in an open and plain Country ſhall always, without much ado, be his that being ſtrongeſt can take it. This have I written at large, as my purpoſe was, all which I moſt humbly beſeech your Holineſs, with your divine

* Viz. to become tributary unto the Turks.

‘ Wiſdom to conſider of, and with your wonted ‘ Clemency to accept the ſame. And ſo proſtrate ‘ at your Holineſs's Feet, I moſt humbly commend ‘ me to your Clemency. From Zamoſchie the tenth ‘ of January, 1596.

Thus much the great Chancellor, in defence of himſelf, and of that he had done in Moldavia; which, howſoever it contented the Pope, well I wot it nothing pleaſed the Emperour, and much leſs the Tranſilvanian Prince, now not a little weakened by the taking away of the Country of Moldavia from him.

To end this troubleſome year withal, many ſharp and bloody Skirmiſhes daily paſſed in divers Places of thoſe frontier Countries, the Turks almoſt in every Place ſtill going to the worſe. In the beginning of November, Leucowitz, Governour of Caroſtat, the ſecond time ſurpriſed Wihitz in the Frontiers of Croatia, where theſe Wars firſt begun; but being not able to take the Caſtle, contented himſelf as before with the ſpoil of the City, and afterward ſetting it on fire, departed. Maximilian alſo attempted Zolnoc, and the Chriſtians in Garriſon at Strigonium and Plindenburg, now become near Neighbours unto the Turks at Buda, did with continual Inrodes not a little moleſt them both all the latter end of this year, and the beginning of the next. And the Turks in Braila, in Valachia, upon the ſide of Danubius, fearing after the flight of Sinan to be beſieged by the Vayvod, forſook the City, and in ſuch haſte paſſed the River, that in that tumultuous paſſage three hundred of them periſhed. Sinan Baſſa, by the Tranſilvanian Prince of late driven out of Valachia, was not long after ſent for to Conſtantinople; but the crafty old Fox, not ignorant of the fierce Nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miſery of Ferat, found occaſions to delay the time ſo long, until that he was ſent for again, and after that, the third time alſo. In the mean while, he had ſo wrought by his mighty Friends in Court, and by rich Rewards, mightier than they, that at his coming to the Court he was there honourably received, as the chiefeſt of the Baſſaes, and being afterwards offered to be diſcharged of the Wars, as men of above fourſcore years old; he refuſed ſo to be; ſaying, That he was born and brought up amongſt Souldiers and martial men, and ſo wiſhed among them to dye, as not long after he did; dying as was thought of conceit of the evil Succeſs he had in his Wars againſt the Tranſilvanian.

Sinan Baſſa ſent for to Conſtantinople.

His Death.

Mahomet, the Turkiſh Emperour, exceedingly grieved with the loſs of ſo many his Cities and ſtrong Places this year loſt, as namely Strigonium, Vicegrade, Siſeg, Petrinia, Lippa, Jenna, Tergoviſta, Buchareſta, Zorza, and many others of leſs Name; and both by Letters and Meſſengers underſtanding daily of the ſlaughter of his People, and waſting of his Frontiers, commanded great Preparation to be made againſt the next Spring, giving it out, that he would then in Perſon himſelf, come down into Hungary with ſuch a Power as never had any his Predeceſſors the Othoman Kings and Emperors, and there take moſt ſharp revenge of all his former Wrongs. Nevertheleſs theſe his ſo haſty deſigns were by the Plague and Famine (which then both raged extreamly in moſt part of his Empire) and by other great occurrents of the ſame time, ſo croſſed, that by that time the Spring came, he ſcarcely well knew which way to turn himſelf firſt. For beſide theſe Troubles of the Weſt, of themſelves enough to have filled his hands, the Georgians in the Eaſt, a warlike People, moved with the good Succeſs of the Chriſtians in Valachia and Hungary, had taken up Arms againſt him; and the old Perſian King, but a little before dead, had left that great Kingdom to his Son, a man of greater Spirit than was like to endure the manifold Injuries before done unto his Father by the Turks, to the great diſhonour of that Kingdom, and prejudice of himſelf. Of which things the Baſſa of Tauris gave him ample Intelligence, wiſhing him betimes to provide for ſuch Storms; which, joyned to the reſt, filled his Head with many troubled Thoughts, whereunto we leave him until the next Spring.

Mahomet perplexed.

The Tranſilvanian Prince, careful of his Eſtate, and not a little troubled with the diſſevering of Moldavia, thought it not unfit for his Affairs, now after the flight of Sinan, and diſcomfiture of the Turks, to go in Perſon himſelf unto the Emperour, and to declare unto him the wrong done him by the Polonian; and further to confer with him concerning the managing of the Wars againſt the common Enemy. So having put all things in readineſs for his Journey, he ſet forward in January, 1596, and by the way of Caſſovia, the fourth of February, arrived at Prague in Bohemia, where he was by the Emperours appointment moſt honourably entertained. But immediately after his coming thither he fell ſick of an Ague, which grievouſly vexed him by the ſpace of three Weeks. In the latter end of February, having ſomewhat recovered his Health, he went to the Church; where after his Devotions done, he was by the Dean of the Cathedral Church welcomed with a moſt eloquent Oration, ſetting forth his worthy Praiſes, and further animating him unto the like Exploits againſt the common Enemy of all Chriſtianity. Whereunto he forthwith anſwered in Latine ſo eloquently and ſo readily, that all men marvelled that heard him; proteſting in his ſpeech, That as he and his Subjects had not hitherto ſpared their Lives or Goods in defence of the common Cauſe; ſo would they not afterwards ſpare the ſame, but adventure all for the benefit of the Chriſtian Common-weal; well hoping, that the Emperour and the other Chriſtian Princes would not, as occaſion ſhould require, be wanting unto him with their Forces, or the Clergy with their Prayers; which done, he doubted not (as he ſaid) by the Power of God, but to obtain more notable Victories than he had yet againſt the Turks, the Enemies of God.

1596

Whilſt he yet thus lay at the Emperours Court, it fortuned that the People called Siculi, offended to have their Liberties in ſome part infringed in the late Aſſembly of the States holden in Tranſilvania in December laſt, riſe up now in Arms in divers Places, refuſing to yield their former Obedience to the Prince. A matter like enough to have wrought him much trouble, and ſuppoſed not to have been done without the privity of the Cardinal his Uncle; but by the Wiſdom and Courage of ſuch as he had in his abſence put in truſt with the Government of his Country, divers of the Ringleaders of this Rebellion were apprehended, and in divers ſorts executed; and three hundred of their Complices, to the Terror of their Fellows, had their Noſes and Ears cut off. By which wholeſome Severity all thoſe Troubles were appeaſed, and the Country again quieted.

The Siculi rebell againſt the Prince.

At the ſame time alſo the Tranſilvanians obtained of the Turks a notable Victory, with an exceeding rich booty. Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had about this time ſent a new Baſſa for the Government of Temeſwar; againſt whoſe coming the old Baſſa, before Governour, had in ſeventy five Waggons truſſed up a wonderful deal of Wealth, which he had there gotten in the time of his former Government, to have been, together with himſelf, with a ſtrong Convoy conducted to Belgrade. Of this his purpoſe the Hungarian Heidons, lying at Lippa and Jenna, having Intelligence, lay in wait for him upon the way, and in his paſſing by ſet upon him; where in a ſharp conflict they overthrew the Convoy, and ſlew the Baſſa, whoſe Head they ſent for a Preſent to the Princeſs at Alba-Julia, and took the Spoil of the Baſſa's Carriages, wherein was taken a wonderful Wealth; for in one of thoſe Waggons is reported to have been found twenty thouſand of Hungarian Duckats.

The Baſſa of Temeſwar ſlain, and a great booty taken.

In this abſence alſo of the Prince, 10000 of the Raſcians revolting from the Turk, came and offered their Service unto the Princeſs; whereof, ſhe by Letters, with great ſpeed, certified the Prince her Husband; who thereupon haſted to diſpatch with the Emperour, and having procured both from him and the Pope the Promiſe of ſome Aid to be afterwards ſent him, took of him his leave; and being honourably accompanied, departed from Prague to Vienna, where he arrived the eleventh of March, ſitting in a princely Chariot drawn with ſix moſt beautiful Horſes, the gift of the Emperour. At his coming thither he was met by the Nobility of the Country, and by Aldobrandinus the Pope's Nephew, who preſented him with three goodly Horſes for Service, richly furniſhed. Him the Prince took into his Chariot, and ſo accompanied, entred the City, where he was with all due Honour received and joyfully entertained, and ſo brought unto the Emperour's Palace, where, by the learned Students of that Univerſity, was for his Pleaſure acted before him the notable Hiſtory of Joſhua. Having ſtayed there three days, and purpoſing to have in his Return viſited his Mother-in-law at Greies in Croatia; News was brought him, That the Turks and Tartars, by the ſetting on of Stephen Bathor, his Uncle, were about to break into Tranſilvania. Wherefore changing his purpoſe, he departed thence to Presburg, and ſo with all ſpeed kept on his way towards Tranſilvania; where he, to the great joy and comfort of his Subjects in general, arrived in ſafety in the beginning of April.

Wars proclaimed in Conſtantinople againſt the Emperour and the Tranſilvanian Prince.

In this while many hot Skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks in the Frontiers of their Territories; and now the Plague and Famine which had of long raged in Conſtantinople and other places of the Turks Dominions, began to aſſwage. Of which ſo great Calamities as had devoured many thouſands of his People, the Turkiſh Emperour finding himſelf ſomewhat eaſed, forthwith cauſed the continuation of his Wars againſt the Emperour and the Tranſilvanian Prince, to be three days together proclaimed in Conſtantinople, and a great Army to be raiſed to be ſent into Tranſilvania and Hungary; giving it out, that he would, with that ſo puiſſant an Army, in Perſon himſelf come into Hungary. At which time it was alſo reported, That he had already ſent his Tents and other his neceſſary Proviſion before to Hadrianople: for now was nothing more odious in the Turk's Court than the Name of the Tranſilvanian Prince.

Of all theſe things was not the Emperour ignorant, as fully thereof certified both by Letters and Eſpials, as alſo by the uniform Confeſſion of ſuch Turks as were daily taken Priſoners. For which cauſe, he alſo, with as much ſpeed and care as he could, provided for the raiſing of his Army, as he had the Year before; as alſo for the levying of Money, and proviſion of all things neceſſary, that the Enemy at his coming might not find him unprovided. Neither ſpared he to pray Aid of the other Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours, eſpecially of the Polonian, whom he had divers times ſought after to have drawn him into the Confederation with the other Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turk. To which purpoſe he now alſo ſent unto him the Biſhop of Preſlaw, and the Lord Poppelius, his Ambaſſadors; as did the Pope alſo ſend unto him the Cardinal Cajetane his Legate; and the Princes Electors alſo their Ambaſſadors: unto whom the Polonian gave good hearing and good words, but would not by any means be perſwaded to break his League with the Turk, or to afford any Aid unto the Chriſtians; altho the Cardinal, with many pregnant Reaſons, ſhewed him what ſmall aſſurance there was in the Turk's Leagues, and how dangerous it might be to his State, if the Turk, making Peace with the Emperour, ſhould turn his force upon him, which it was like enough he would, as knowing no man longer for Friend than ſtood with his Profit; beſide the immortal Blemiſh of his Honour, by diſſevering himſelf from the Union of the Chriſtian Princes, to hold Friendſhip with the Turks and Infidels. But all this and much more to no purpoſe, ſo reſolutely was the Polonian ſet down for the keeping of the Turks Favour. So that of all the Chriſtian Princes ſo near unto the devouring Enemy, none ſtood the Chriſtian Commonweal in leſs ſtead than he. Which for all that, moſt men imputed not ſo much unto the King, as to others about him, eſpecially to Zamoſchy the great Chancellor, by whom that State was moſt ſwayed, who was not only ſuppoſed, but openly reported to have ſecret Intelligence both with the Turk and the Tartar.

All this while the Lord Palſi, Governour of Strigonium, ceaſed not with continual Inroads to vex the Turks, even to the Gates of Buda, as did alſo the other Chriſtian Captains in other places of the Turks Frontiers in Hungary. Near unto Buda were two great Country Villages, for moſt part inhabited by Chriſtians, who having given their Oath of Obedience unto the Turk, lived a miſerable life for the payment of an exceſſive Tribute yearly. Theſe poor Chriſtians, weary of the Turkiſh Thraldom, and the continual ſpoil of their Labours by them of Strigonium; by ſecret Meſſengers requeſted the Lord Palſi, of Mercy, to carry them with their Goods and Cattel away into ſome other place of the Chriſtian Territory, that ſo they might yet live amongſt Chriſtians, as he had but a little before done for them of old Buda. Unto which their ſo reaſonable a Requeſt, the Chriſtian Governour charitably hearkened; willing them againſt a certain appointed time to put themſelves, with all their things in readineſs. There was of theſe Chriſtians about 755 Families, who with their Wives and Children, and ſuch traſh as they had pack'd up into eighty Waggons, drawn with fourteen or ſixteen Oxen a-piece, at the appointed time, about mid-night, committed themſelves, with all that they had, unto the conduct of them of Strigonium, ſent out of purpoſe for them; by whom they were in ſafety brought to Strigonium. Amongſt them were many rich men, who brought with them good ſtore of Coyn, with an exceeding great number of Cattel. Unto theſe new-come Gueſts Palſi aſſigned certain Fields betwixt Strigonium and Vivaria, on the North-ſide of Danubius; where they ſo commodiouſly lived as was poſſible in ſo troubled an Eſtate of a Country.

Six hundred of the Garriſon Souldiers of Lippa ſlain by the Turks.

Shortly after, 600 Garriſon Souldiers of Lippa, ſeeking after Booty, and adventuring too far into the Enemies Territory, were diſcovered by the Turks Scouts, and ſo beſet by the Turks and Tartars billeted in the Country about Temeſware, that there was no way left for them to eſcape. Which they well perceiving, reſolved among themſelves (as became valiant men) to fight it out even unto the laſt man; and with no leſs Reſolution performed what they had before determined; for being on every ſide beſet, and hardly charged by their Enemies, they, as men before reſolved to die, altho ſcarce one to twenty, fought moſt deſperately, ſeeking for nothing elſe but to ſell their Lives as dear as they could unto their Enemies; and ſo fighting were all ſlain, except except ſome few which by great fortune eſcaped, leaving unto the Enemy a right bloody Victory. Yet by this loſs of ſo great a Party was the Garriſon of Lippa greatly weakned, which the Enemy knew right well, and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to beſiege the Town. Which Barbelus the Governour (a moſt valiant man) wiſely foreſeeing, ſent in Poſt unto the Tranſilvanian Prince, to requeſt him with all ſpeed to ſend him four or five thouſand good Souldiers, with which Power he doubted not, by the Help of God, to be able to defend the Town againſt all the Forces the Enemy was at that time able to bring againſt it. Unto whom the Prince without delay ſent 8000, who all in ſafety, in good time arrived at Lippa; for ſhortly after their arrival, 40000 of the Turks and Tartars came and ſat down before the Town, incloſing it on every ſide, and ſo lay for certain days without any thing doing worth the ſpeaking of; they of the Town in the mean time doing them all the harm they could with their great ſhot, which they ſent amongſt them not ſparingly. But they had not ſo long lain, but that News was brought into the Camp, That the Tranſilvanian Prince was with a great Power coming thither to relieve the Town; whereupon they preſently riſe, and retired to the place where they had before encamped, about two miles from Lippa; where certainly underſtanding that the Prince neither was, neither could in ſhort time be in ſuch readineſs as was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more ſtraightly beſieged the Town than before. They had now brought with them ſeventeen pieces of battery, eight Waggons laded with Shot and Powder, and forty ſix others laded with ſcaling Ladders, and other warlike Proviſion; thus appointed they began to batter the Town, and afterwards gave thereunto divers deſperate aſſaults; which the Chriſtians valiantly received, and ſtill with great ſlaughter repulſed their Enemies. For that ſtrong Town was with Towers and Bulwarks flanking one another, ſo fortified, that out of them the Chriſtians with their murthering pieces made great ſpoil of their Enemies, and ſtill enforced them with loſs to retire, no bullet almoſt flying in vain. In the heat of one of theſe aſſaults the Governour cauſed one of the Gates of the Town to be ſet open, having before within the Town placed ſixteen great pieces at the very entrance of the ſame gate, charged with all kind of murthering Shot. Unto which Gate, as of mere Deſperation ſet open by the Defendants, the Turks and Tartars deſirous of revenge, came thronging as thick as might be, thinking to have thereby entred; when ſuddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforeſaid murthering pieces cut down as with a Sithe, and ſo again, and the third and fourth time, before they could clear themſelves of the danger thereof, their Heads, Arms, and Legs, and other rent Limbs, flying in the Air moſt miſerably to behold. Nevertheleſs the ſiege was by them continued, and the often aſſaults ſo reſolutely maintained, as if they had thereupon purpoſed to have engaged all their Lives. But this ſo obſtinate a Reſolution was by an unexpected accident, when they leaſt thought, converted into ſuch a deſperate fear and aſtoniſhment, that they upon the ſudden (no man forcing them) forſook their Trenches wherein they lay encamped; and leaving behind them their Tents, their great Ordnance, and whatſoever elſe they had, they betook themſelves to a moſt diſordered flight. The Tranſilvanian, who by chance were even then coming thither, purſuing them, ſlew divers of them, and took ſome others of them Priſoners. At this Siege the Baſſa of Temeſwar himſelf was mortally wounded, and Hamat, Sanzack of Giula, with divers others of good place ſlain, and 4000 of the common Souldiers. The cauſe of the Turks ſo great and ſudden fear was this; Whilſt the Baſſa of Temeſwar lay at the Siege of Lippa, as is aforeſaid, they that were left in the City fearing no harm, lived in great Security; in the mean time the Governour of Lugaz ſent out ſix thouſand Souldiers towards Temeſwar, now in the abſence of the Baſſa to ſeek after Booty: who coming to Temeſwar with great ſpeed, rifled the Suburbs of the City, ſlew all the Turks they could light upon, and ſet at Liberty a thouſand Captives: and ſo having truſſed up their Booty, ſet on fire all the Suburbs, and departed. Which fire grew ſo great and ſo terrible, that it was plainly ſeen into the Camp at Lippa, making a ſhew as if the whole City had been on a light Fire: which ſo daunted the Hearts of the Turks at the Siege, that they preſently fled (as is before ſaid) leaving all that they had behind them.

Lippa beſieged by the Turks and Tartars.

Plenia, a Town of the Turks ſacked by the Chriſtians.

The Tranſilvanian all this while buſied in raiſing of his Army, and providing of things neceſſary for the maintenance of his Wars, was come into the Confines of Hungary, towards Temeſwar, even as the Turks fled from Lippa. At which time certain Hungarian Heidons that ſerved him, getting over Danubius, not far from Nicopolis, took Plenia, a little Town of the Turks, which they ranſacked and burnt, and having ſlain in the Country thereabout above three thouſand of the Turks, returned with a rich Prey unto the Prince.

Cliſſa lately ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians, loſt again to the Turks.

Not long before, the Chriſtians had ſurpriſed Cliſſa, a ſtrong frontier Town of the Turks in Dalmatia, not far from Spalato; which Town the Baſſa of Boſna ſought now again to recover, and thereto layd hard ſiege. For the relief whereof, Leucowitz, Governour of Stiria, and the other Provinces thereabouts belonging to the Houſe of Auſtria, and the Governour of Zeng, with a Fleet of two and forty Ships, wherein they had embarked 4000 Souldiers well appointed with all things neceſſary, ſet forward toward Cliſſa; and by the way lighting upon a Galley of the Venetians, bound with certain warlike Proviſion towards the Turks Camp, took her as good Prize, and rifled her. This Fleet with a fair Wind arrived at Siret, near unto Trau, where the Governour landing his men, marched that Night part of his way toward Cliſſa, and all the next day lay cloſe. The Night following they ſet forward again, and having marched fifteen miles, came unto the Enemies Camp before day; where, ſetting upon the Turks in their Trenches, fearing no ſuch Peril, they brought ſuch a general fear upon the Turks whole Camp, that the Turks, as men amazed, fled ſome one way, ſome another, every man (as in ſuch ſudden fear it commonly happeneth) making ſhift for himſelf, leaving whatſoever they had in their Trenches behind them. The Chriſtians, contented ſo to have put their Enemies to flight, fell preſently to the ſpoil, as more deſirous thereof, than by the haſty purſuit of their Enemies to put themſelves in poſſeſſion of an aſſured Victory. Which the Turks quickly perceiving, and from the Hills with the dawning of the day diſcovering the ſmall number of the Chriſtians, and how they were diſordered, they gathered themſelves again together, and coming down, incloſed on every ſide the diſordered Chriſtians (greedily hunting after the ſpoil) and ſlew them downright. Leucowitz himſelf, with the Governour of Zeng, and ſome others, got into Cliſſa, where having ſtayed two days, and doubting to be able to keep the Town, they ſecretly by Night iſſued out with 600 men, in hope to have recovered their Fleet; but the Turks ſuſpecting ſuch a matter, had ſo beſet the Paſſages, that of all that Company, Leucowitz had much ado himſelf, with three others, to eſcape. The Enemy now again poſſeſſed of his Trenches, layd ſtraighter ſiege to the Town than before; which they of the Garriſon perceiving, and now out of hope of relief, agreed with the Baſſa, that they might with Bag and Baggage depart, and ſo yielded up the Town. Thus Cliſſa, one of the ſtrongeſt Towns of Dalmatia, through the greedy covetouſneſs of the diſordered Souldiers, fell again into the hands of the Turks.

Sombock taken by the Lord Palfi.

About the ſame time, Palfi, Governour of Strigonium, underſtanding of the meeting together of certain notable Adventurers of the Turks at Sombock, a Caſtle almoſt in the mid way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, raiſed the greateſt ſtrength he could, and ſo with certain pieces of Artillery, and other things neceſſary for an aſſault, ſet forward from Strigonium the two and twentieth of May, before the riſing of the Sun, and about three a Clock in the Afternoon came to the aforeſaid Caſtle, whereunto he preſently gave a moſt terrible aſſault, which he never gave over until he had taken it; for after he had by the ſpace of three hours together with great danger maintained a moſt deſperate aſſault, at length he with much difficulty prevailed, and put to the Sword all the Turks he found therein, Man, Woman, and Child; and with the reſt, fifty Janizaries, but that day come thither. This Caſtle was of great Beauty, and moſt pleaſantly ſcituated, whereunto the Baſſa of Buda oftentimes for his Pleaſure repaired; for which cauſe Palfi was very deſirous to have taken it without ſpoiling; but the Fire he had therein already raiſed, ſo prevailed, that it burnt down all the goodly Buildings thereof, with great ſtore of Victuals and other Proviſion, nothing remaining but what the Chriſtians had ſaved for themſelves.

Temeſware beſieged by the Tranſilvanian Prince

The Tranſilvanian Prince, having raiſed a great Army for the relief of Lippa, being by great chance a little before his coming relieved, came and laid Siege to the City of Temeſwar: where he had not long lain, but that the Turks and Tartars, fearing to loſe that ſo famous a City, aſſembled together from all places thereabouts, to the number of 40000, and ſo came to raiſe the Siege. Of whoſe coming the Prince hearing, riſe with his Army, and went to meet them, and had with them a great and terrible Battel, the Victory for a great while ſtanding very doubtful, yet ſeeming to incline rather to the Turks and Tartars, than to the Chriſtians: but at length the Turks, diſordered with the great Artillery, and the Tranſilvanians charging them afreſh, began to give ground, and ſo at laſt to betake themſelves to plain flight. In this Battel were ſlain of the Turks and Tartars 5000, and of the Chriſtians 1500. It was for a time reported, That the Prince himſelf was in this Battel ſlain; which was not ſo, being reſerved to the further Plague of the Turks, and comfort of his afflicted Country. After this Victory he returned again to the Siege, which he more ſtraitly continued than before, leaving nothing unattempted that he could poſſibly deviſe for the winning of the City. Where, whilſt he yet thus lay battering the City both night and day, News was brought him, That Giaffer Baſſa and the Tartars were coming with a great Army to the Relief of the Beſieged. Whereupon, he conſidering his own ſtrength, and the power of his Enemies, and that the Aid promiſed him both from the Emperour and out of Hungary was not yet ready, with great grief of mind raiſed his Siege, and retired with his Army to Lippa, there expecting new Supplies as well of his own as from his Friends. Whilſt he yet there lay, he was certainly advertiſed, That the Baſſa of Natolia (the fore-runner of the great Sultan Mahomet) was come to Belgrade with fourteen thouſand Horſe, and four thouſand Janizaries, to joyn with the Baſſa of Buda for the relieving of Temeſwar; whoſe Forces joyned together were in number about threeſcore thouſand; and that Mahomet himſelf (of whoſe coming had been riſe report all this year) was now coming after with a far greater Power. Whereupon he departed from Lippa, leaving therein a ſtrong Garriſon; and ſo returning to Alba-Julia, called there an Aſſembly of all his States, for the repreſſing of ſo puiſſant an Enemy.

The Prince raiſeth his Siege.

Mahomet, for the better ſucceſs of his Wars in Hungary, had drawn forth the Tartar with a mighty Power; who, altho he was at the firſt ſo unwilling to that Service (conſidering the great Loſſes he had therein before received) that he would not, as he ſaid, ſend ſo much as one Aſs thereunto; yet, overcome with great gifts, and the reſpect he had of the Turkiſh Sultan, was now ready with a ſtrong Army upon the Frontiers in Moldavia, to meet him in Hungary: unto whom the late choſen Vayvod ſent certain Preſents, with ſuch ſtore of Victuals as he could poſſibly provide for him. Yet foraſmuch as he was not that way to paſs without the leave of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by Letters, and divers his Ambaſſadors, intreated with the Polonian King for his Paſſage; as alſo for the Confirmation of the ancient League he and the Polonian Kings, his Predeceſſors, had, to their good, of long time had with the Othoman Emperours; from which he well knew the Chriſtian Emperour, with divers other the Chriſtian Princes, to ſeek by all means to withdraw him. Mahomet alſo, not ignorant how hurtful and dangerous the Confederation betwixt Michael the Vayvod of Valachia and the Tranſilvanian was unto him and his Deſigns, ſent unto him an Ambaſſador, by the ſhew of great dangers to deterr him from the Tranſilvanian, and by many glorious Promiſes to allure him to ſubmit himſelf again unto his Protection, and in token of his Fidelity to deliver unto the Sultan two of his Frontier Towns, ſuch as he ſhould require; in regard whereof, he ſhould, together with the Sultan's Favour, receive golden Mountains. Whereunto the Vayvod anſwered, That as yet he was not weary of the Friendſhip he held with the Prince: and for the Towns he required, that they were not in his Power to give, as belonging to the Prince; unto whom he ſaid he would write, and ſtay the Ambaſſador in the mean time until he had from him Anſwer.

The Emperour, on the other ſide, had with all carefulneſs, ſo far as in him was, provided that his Army might be ready to take the Field with the beginning of the Spring: but as it commonly chanceth, the ſpeedy Proceedings of great Actions (wherein the hands of many mighty is required) to be much hindered by delays, ſometimes of one, and ſometimes of another; ſo fell it out with him now: for albeit that his own Forces were in ſome good time ready, yet was the Spring, yea and a good part of Summer alſo far paſt, before the Aid promiſed from other Princes met together. At length, after long expectance, when ſome convenient number for an Army was from divers places come together at Vienna; they were by the Lord Swartzenburg, and their other Commanders, brought forth into the Field, and not far from Altenburg encamped, within the ſelf-ſame Trenches that were the laſt year caſt up by County Mansfield for the ſafety of his Army; there to expect the coming down of the great Ordnance, and other Proviſion, by the River from Vienna, as alſo the reſt of the Chriſtian Forces daily looked for. From Altenburg the Chriſtian Army removed to Komara, and not ſtaying there long, the four and twentieth of July marched towards Vacia, otherwiſe called Woczen; but before it came thither, the Turks hearing of the approach of the Chriſtians, forſook the Town, and with their Cattel and beſt part of their ſubſubſtance fled to Peſth, carrying alſo away with them the great Ordnance; the greateſt whereof they buried by the way, which was nevertheleſs afterwards found out by the Chriſtians. And although the Turks at their departure had ſet fire both upon the Town and the Caſtle, yet the Chriſtians left therein did what they might to quench the ſame; by whoſe diligence, and the help of two thouſand Foot-men, and certain Troops of Horſemen ſent thither by Swartzenburg, a great part both of the Town and the Caſtle was preſerved: the whole Army of the Chriſtians following after, incamped in the open Field, and with their Horſemen braved the Turks even to the Gates of Peſth. This ſo ſudden a coming of the Chriſtians brought a great fear both upon them of Peſth and Buda; inſomuch, that they ſent their Wives and Children, with the chiefeſt of their Subſtance, down the River, unto places of more Safety, and farther off from danger; which was done ſo diſorderedly (as it happeneth in ſuch common Fears) that many of them for haſte thruſt one another into the River, and ſo periſhed.

Hitherto, in the former Wars againſt the Turk, had Matthias been General of the Chriſtian Armies; but now of late, Ferdinand, the Emperour's Uncle, County of Tirol, being dead, Matthias was by the Emperour his Brother preferred to the Government of that rich Country and the Provinces thereabouts, not inferiour to ſome Kingdoms; and Maximilian, his younger Brother, appointed General in his ſtead: who, departing from Vienna in the latter end of July, came into the Camp the fourth of Auguſt, where he was by the Lord Swartzenburg, his Lieutenant, and the Lord Palfi, honourably and with great Triumph received.

Hatwan beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Hatwan won by the Chriſtians.

Extream Cruelty.

Cowardiſe puniſhed.

Now were the Chriſtians threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, and having fortified Vachia, and therein placed a convenient Garriſon, reſolved by common conſent to beſiege Hatwan, a ſtrong Town of the Turks in the upper Hungary. And thereupon riſing with their Army from Vachia the thirteenth of Auguſt, came the fifteenth of the ſame Month, about noon, and ſat down before the Town; and that with ſuch ſpeed, that they were, before ſeen of the Turks, in the Town, than that they heard any thing of their coming: inſomuch, that at the firſt ſhew of them, they of the Town took them to have been ſome come out to ſeek after Booty; and therefore ſallying out upon them, skirmiſhed with them a while, until they perceived the whole Battel coming. The Chriſtians approaching the Town, incamped themſelves, as they thought moſt convenient, and began in three places to batter the Counterſcarf. This frontier Town of the Turks, beſides that it was kept with a ſtrong Garriſon, was alſo ſtrengthned with a broad Ditch, and fortified with a broad Counterſcarf and ſtrong Paliſadoes. Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the Siege, the Turks ſallying out of the Town brake into their Trenches, and there did great harm; and like enough they were to have done more, had not the Horſe-men in good time come in upon them, and inforced them to retire. In this Sally, amongſt others, was one Greis, a notable Captain, ſlain, being ſhamefully forſaken of his own men; who for that their Cowardiſe, were all, in the ſight of the whole Army, diſarmed, and ſo turned out of the Camp, as men unworthy any longer to bear Arms. One morning alſo, as the Chriſtians were at their Devotions in their Trenches, a Turkiſh Prieſt from out of an high Tower not far off, railed moſt bitterly upon them, curſing and deriding them: wherewith one of the Chriſtian Canoneers much moved, made a ſhot at the Tower, which he ſo well beſtowed, that therewith he ſtruck down the Tower, together with the Idolatrous Prieſt, as he was yet railing and blaſpheming. At length the Chriſtians had with exceeding Labour and continual Battery made the Town aſſaultable: wherewith the Turks diſcouraged, offered (but all too late) to yield up the Town upon the ſame conditions that they of Strigonium did; whereunto they received no Anſwer, yea commandment was given throughout the Camp, That no man, upon pain of Death, ſhould have any Parle with them. Shortly after, all things being now in readineſs for the Aſſault, the Chriſtians, one day about five a clock in the afternoon aſſaulted the Town in four places; and after three hours hard fight, by ſtrong hand took it, with the ſchriching and lamenting of the Women and Children, and other fearful People, who now gave themſelves all loſt and forlorn. Four hours Execution was done upon all that came to hand, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition: Women were ſlain great with child, and young Children hanging at their Mothers Breaſts; it booted not to cry for Mercy, the bloody Sword devouring all. The fury of the Wallons here exceeded, who rip'd the Children out of their Mothers Wombs, and made Thongs and Points of the skins of Men and Women whom they had flead quick. Which their Cruelty they afterwards excuſed, when they were therefore reproved, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turks hereafter not ſo wickedly to blaſpheme againſt Chriſt, or with ſuch their wonted and barbarous Cruelty to torment the Chriſtians that fell into their hands, for fear of like themſelves. In this aſſault and fury periſhed of the Turks about four thouſand, and of the Chriſtians not paſt three hundred. In this Town, beſide that which the fire devoured, was found a very rich Prey. The firſt that entred the Town was one Tersky, a notable Captain, with his Company; after whom followed Ruſwurme, who each of them were thought, in their Entrance at the Breach, to have ſlain with their own hand eight or ten Turks.

Mahomet the great Sultan cometh to Buda with an Army of two hundred thouſand.

Now in the mean time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, removed thence to come down into the Heart of Hungary, ſending Cicala Baſſa before him; and at length, after long looking for, the ſecond of September arrived at Buda, having in his Army about two hundred thouſand men, and three hundred Field-pieces. From thence he preſently ſent 40000 to Temeſwar, but ſtayed there himſelf with the reſt of his Army.

The Chriſtians yet lying at Hatwan, and doubting leſt the Sultan ſuddenly paſſing the River ſhould come upon them not yet ready for Battel; departing thence, and retiring back again, came and incamped not far from Vachia. And albeit that the Arch-duke, before his Departure from Hatwan, had left a convenient Garriſon for the keeping of the Town; yet ſuch was the terror of the Turks approach, that the next day after, they that were there left in Garriſon forſook the Town, and ſetting it on fire, followed themſelves after the Camp. This coming of the Turkiſh Sultan to Buda, brought alſo a great fear upon them at Vienna, as much doubting leſt he ſhould that way have turned his Forces; which cauſed them both day and night to labour for the better Fortification of the City, and for the proviſion of all things, as if it had been for a preſent Siege.

But Mahomet, not provided for the undertaking of ſo ſtrong a place, and not ignorant of the diſgrace his great Grand-father, the victorious Solyman had ſometime received under the Walls thereof, had no purpoſe thereto, as having bent his thoughts quite another way. In the upper part of Hungary is an ancient famous City, well fortified and honoured with a Biſhops See called Agria, not far from Hatwan: upon this City, as the chief Fortreſs of the Chriſtians in thoſe Quarters, had Mahomet at his coming into Hungary caſt his eyes, and began now that way to make head, with purpoſe by taking of that City, and placing there a ſtrong Garriſon, to hinder the uniting of the Emperour's Forces with the Tranſilvanians, for the mutual ſtrengthning of the one the other by the way of the upper Hungary. Which the Arch-duke perceiving, ſent thither forthwith the valiant Collonel Tersky with a notable Company of Italians and Germans, and a thouſand other Harquebuſiers, who all arrived there in ſafety. At which time alſo the Lord Teuffenbach ſent into the City three thouſand Foot-men, under the conduct of County Turne, with good ſtore of warlike Proviſion needful for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet, attended upon by the great Baſſaes, Ibrahim, Giaffer, Haſſan, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his Army of an 150000 men, came and encamped between the two Rivers of Danubius and Tibiſcus, covering a great part of the Country with his Tents. Approaching the City, he with wonderful Celerity caſt up five great Mounts, and from them with ſuch fury battered the Walls, that the Chriſtians were glad night and day to ſtand in Arms for the defence thereof. And altho that the Walls were ſo great, and in many places ſo weakly fortified, as that they were not but by a greater Garriſon to be defended againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy; and that therefore the Defendants with their Honour lawfully might even the firſt day have ſet the City on fire, and retired themſelves into the Caſtle, which was both fair and ſtrong, and the only place to be truſted unto; yet, for the ſpace of ſix days they worthily defended the whole City againſt the fury of the Enemies; and out of it did them great harm. But ſeeing the danger greatly encreaſing, and that the City was not longer to be holden, they ſet it on fire; having before conveyed all the beſt of their Subſtance, with themſelves, into the Caſtle: which the Turks quickly perceiving, brake ſo ſuddenly into the City, as if they would, together with the Chriſtians, have entred the Caſtle alſo; but in the attempt thereof they were notably repulſed, and many of them ſlain. Adjoyning to the Caſtle was a great and ſtrong Bulwark, againſt which the Turks for certain days furiouſly thundred with their great Ordnance, and that without intermiſſion; and having in divers places ſore ſhaken it, in the ſpace of two days aſſaulted it 12 times, but not without the wonderful loſs of their men: and yet gave it not ſo over; but as men with their loſs more enraged, came on again with greater fury than before, and ſo at laſt by plain force took it; and there put to the Sword all them they found therein, except ſuch as by good hap got betimes into the Caſtle. This Bulwark thus loſt, the Chriſtians the next day ſallying out, again recovered; wherein they ſlew a great number of the Turks, with the loſs of ſome thirty men, and as many more wounded. The beſieged now divers times, both by Letters and Meſſengers, craved Aid of Maximilian the General, giving him to underſtand, that they could not long hold out for want of Shot and Powder, if they were not betimes relieved (whereof the Enemy alſo was not ignorant) yet were they reſolved to hold it out even to the laſt man; altho the great Sultan had oftentimes, by Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, willed them to yield it up, with promiſe that they ſhould in ſafety with Life and Goods depart; otherwiſe threatning unto them greater extremities than was of late ſhewed unto the Turks at Hatwan, if they ſhould as obſtinate men hold it out unto the laſt: whereunto they never anſwered him any thing; for Terskie had forbid them all Parle with the Enemy; and in the midſt of the Market-place had cauſed a pair of Gallows to be ſet up, threatning to hang him thereon, whoſoever he were, that ſhould once make motion of yielding up the City.

Agria beſieged by Mahomet.

A Bulwark twelve times aſſaulted in two days.

Whilſt the beſieged thus live in hope of Relief, the Arch-duke, upon the coming over of the Sultan towards Agria, having retired with his Army to Strigonium, and there ſtaid ſomewhat too long expecting the coming of more Aid; began now at length to ſet forward, and to make ſome ſhew as if he had indeed purpoſed to have relieved his diſtreſſed Friends ſo hardly beſet at Agria. But ſuch was the foulneſs of the Weather, hindering the paſſage of his great Ordnance (not to ſpeak of any thing elſe) that in fourteen days he marched ſcarcely twelve miles forward. Whereby the Enemy took occaſion to prevail as he did in his Siege: who now hearing of the coming of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing to how little purpoſe he had ſo long battered the Caſtle, converted all his endeavours to the filling up of the Ditch of the old Caſtle, with Faggots, Earth, and ſuch like matter; for the haſtening of which work, Mahomet himſelf ſpared not to ride up and down in all places of his Army, with his Preſence and cheerful Speech encouraging his men in that deſperate Work. But whilſt the Turks are thus buſie in fulfilling his Command, the Chriſtians ſallying out upon them made great ſlaughter of them, and put to flight Ibrahim the great Baſſa, with ſuch as were about him; after whom they ſo eagerly followed, that he in the flight loſt his Tulipant for haſte, and was there very like to have been taken. Nevertheleſs, the work went ſtill forward, and was now at length, with the reſtleſs labour of ſo great a multitude, brought to ſuch perfection, that the Turks thought it now no great matter by aſſault to enter the Caſtle; and thereupon, the tenth of October, gave unto it four deſperate Aſſaults one upon another, being ſtill with greater ſlaughter of his men repulſed. But coming on again the fifth time with freſh Supplies, and greater fury than at the firſt, they prevailed; and ſo entring, put to the Sword all they found in the Caſtle, in number about eight hundred: four hundred of whoſe Heads, one of the Turks Captains cauſed to be carried unto Mahomet in the Camp, in the beholding whereof, he is ſaid to have taken great Pleaſure, as in the undoubted Signs of his Victory.

The old Caſtle taken.

The old Caſtle thus taken, nothing remained but the new Caſtle, againſt which the Turks converted their whole Forces, wherein they repoſed not ſo much hope (altho their Battery were very terrible, and their Power great) as in the ſecret Mines wherewith they had in fourteen places undermined the Caſtle, and were now almoſt ready to be blown up. Which the beſieged perceiving, and withal conſidering the ſtate wherein they ſtood, and not hearing any thing of relief; reſolved amongſt themſelves (without the conſent of their chief Commanders) no longer to hold out, but to yield. And thereupon altogether, as if it had been but one man, riſe up in a Mutiny againſt their two Governours, Paul Niari, and Tersky; who at the firſt, by all the reaſons they could deviſe, diſſuaded them from ſuch Cowardiſe, putting them in mind of the Oath they had taken: which not prevailing, they afterwards upon their knees requeſted them, as men, to hold it out yet a while, in hope of ſpeedy relief; yea Tersky, with his hands caſt up, intreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out, but needs yield, then they ſhould firſt kill him with their own hands, that he might not live to ſee ſo great a Diſhonour. But what availeth Perſuaſion with men poſſeſſed with ſo great fear? And in the mean time 250 of the common Souldiers, among whom were many Italians, ſecretly eſcaping out of the Caſtle fled into the Camp, of whom divers became Renegades and turned Turk; which added to the former fear, ſo much diſcouraged the minds of the reſt, that they forthwith required to come to parle with the Enemy, and ſo agreed, That they might with Bag and Baggage, and their Swords by their ſides, in ſafety depart; the great Sultan giving his Faith for the performance thereof, with Hoſtages delivered on either ſide. So the thirteenth of October, about Noon, the Garriſon Souldiers came out of the Caſtle, in number about 2000; but they were not gone far, but that they were in a great Plane ſet upon by the Turks and Tartars, and there cut in pieces; ſome of them were ſlain quick, and ſome other of them otherwiſe ſhamefully diſmembred; the Turks in the mean time upbraiding them, and ſaying, That Faith was not to be kept with them that had ſo cruelly before dealt with them of Hatwan. This perfidious dealing much offended divers of the better ſort of the Turks, inſomuch, that ſome of them complained thereof unto the Sultan; who (as is reported) cauſed ſome of the chief Authors thereof to be put to death; and afterward, by open Proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them Priſoners, they ſhould forthwith ſet them at liberty. Thus is the famous City of Agria, of long time a Chriſtian Biſhops Seat, now become a ſure Receptacle for the Turks and Infidels.

Agria yielded unto the Turks.

Whilſt Mahomet thus lay at the Siege of Agria, the Baſſa of Boſna, with certain other of the Sanzacks thereabouts, having raiſed a great Army, came and beſieged Petrinia in the Borders of Croatia: which he at his firſt coming ſo furiouſly battered by the ſpace of ſeven days, that it was of many thought not poſſible for it to hold out two days longer. In the mean time, the Lord Herbenſtein and Leucowitze, with all the Power they could make out of Croatia and Windiſmarch, came towards Petrinia; but having no means in ſo great haſte to make a Bridge over the River of Kulp, they retired towards Siſeg, there to paſs over. The Turks hearing of their retire, and ſuppoſing them to have fled for fear, put ſix thouſand Horſemen over the River to purſue them: upon whom the Chriſtians turning, and charging them home, overthrew them; and having ſlain many of them, drave the reſt headlong into the River, where moſt of them periſhed. The Chriſtians nevertheleſs keeping on their way to Siſeg, there the next day by a Bridge paſſed over the River, and ſo marching towards Petrinia, and being come near unto the Town, were encountered by eight thouſand Turks, whom they alſo put to flight; and by certain Priſoners there taken, underſtood that the Baſſa, the day before, was riſen from before the Town, and gone: which they at the firſt believed not, but coming thither found it ſo, to their own good Contentment, and the great Joy of the late beſieged.

Petrinia beſieged by the Turks.

Petrinia relieved.

Maximilian the General marching on fair and ſoftly from Strigonium, at length, the ſeventeenth of October, came to Caſſovia, four days after that Agria was loſt; and there met with the Tranſilvanian Prince, who was come thither with eighteen thouſand men, and forty Field-pieces to aid him; of whom eight thouſand were mercenary Horſemen, fifteen hundred were of the Nobility of his Country, and the reſt Foot-men. The next day after, they ſetting forward from Caſſovia, joyned themſelves with the reſt of the Army led by the Lord Teuffenbach and Palſi, and ſo of all their united Forces made one Army, conſiſting now of 32000 Horſe-men and 28000 Foot; who drew with them an 120 Field-pieces, and 20000 Waggons, wherewith they every night encloſed their Army as with a moſt ſure Trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards Agria, with a full reſolution to give the Turks Battel, whereof the whole Army ſeemed to be very deſirous. By the way at length they came to a fair Heath two miles long and four broad, where they were to paſs over a certain River, the Paſſage whereof Giaffer Baſſa had before taken with 20000 Turks and Tartars, the reſt of the Turks Army lying ſtill not far from Agria. Now the purpoſe of the Baſſa was, to have enlarged the Paſſage of the River, and ſo to have made way for the whole Army to have afterwards paſſed to the other ſide, as moſt commodious for many purpoſes, eſpecially for Water, whereof they ſo might themſelves have had plenty, and yet kept the Chriſtians from it. But of this his purpoſe, by the coming of the Chriſtians he was quite diſappointed; for the next day, being the 23th. of October, they skirmiſhed with him in divers places, eſpecially at the Paſſage of the River; where, at the firſt Encounter he loſt 300 of his men, and in the end ſeeing himſelf too weak to withſtand the whole power coming on, fled to the Sultan, having loſt two of his Enſigns and 20 field-pieces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approach of the night hindered the purſuit of the Chriſtians, who were now become Maſters both of the paſſage of the River, and of the place where the Baſſa lay: which they finding not ſo commodious for them as they had at the firſt ſuppoſed (eſpecially for lack of Wood, the Weather being then extream cold, as alſo hearing of the approach of the Sultan with his whole Army) they forthwith forſook the ſame, and retired again over the River to the place where they lay before, incloſing themſelves with their Waggons, as if it had been a City ſtrongly incloſed with wooden Walls. The next day, which was the 24th. of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his Army ſhewed himſelf unto the view of the Chriſtians, and ſent 3000 Tartars to paſs the River; of whom the Chriſtians ſlew a great number with their great ſhot, and put the reſt to flight. Both the Armies were populous and ſtrong, and covered a great deal of ground, a moſt goodly ſight to behold: both drunk of the ſame River, as well the Men as their Horſes, and therefore kept continual watch all that night on both ſides of the River, eſpecially at the Paſſage. In the morning, betwixt ſix and ſeven a clock, Mahomet, with his Army ranged in order of Battel, came within ſight of the Chriſtians, his Squadrons as it were covering all the Country on that ſide of the River, as far as the Chriſtians could well ſee; and now again ſent part of his Army over the River; with whom the Chriſtians skirmiſhed from morning till night, both the Armies parted but by the River, all this while ſtanding faſt, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both ſides well wearied, and many ſlain, the Turks retired again over the River to the Camp; in the mean time (as if it had been by conſent) they reſolved on both ſides the next day to try the fortune of a Battel; and ſo Commandment was given through both the Armies, for every man, againſt a certain appointed time to make himſelf ready. So the next day, being the 26th. of October, Mahomet brought forth his Army again out of his Camp, which was not far from the Chriſtians, and began now to draw down towards the River. Near unto this place were the ruines of an old Church, where Mahomet placed certain Companies of Janizaries, and 24 field-pieces, and commanded 10000 of his ſelect Souldiers to paſs the River, which they readily did. The Chriſtians alſo ready for Battel, and now thinking it time upon the coming over of the Enemy to begin; with part of their Army thereunto appointed, ſo fiercely charged the Turks that were already come over, that they quickly overthrew them, and not them only, but certain Companies of Tartars alſo that were in another place come over the River; and not ſo contented, but following them they had in chaſe, put to flight them alſo that ſtood on the farther ſide of the River, of whom they ſlew a great num-number, and by the coming on of the reſt of the Army, took from them an 190 great pieces of Artillery; whereof ſo great a fear riſe in the Enemies Camp, that Mahomet, with Ibrahim the great Baſſa, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the Army, fled in all haſte towards Agria, ſhedding ſome tears by the way as he went, and wiping his eyes with a piece of Mahomet's Garment, which he for reverence carried about him as a Relique. It drew now towards night, and the Arch-duke was about to have cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and that day to have done no more. But the Tranſilvanian Prince, the Lord Palfi, and the reſt, perſuaded him in that ſo great fear of the Enemy to proſecute the Victory; and the rather, for that the Turks began again to make head, and to repair their diſordered Battels. Wherefore the Chriſtians ſtill keeping their Array, charged afreſh the Front of their Enemies reſtored Battel, conſiſting of 40000 men, and that with ſuch violence, as that they in ſhort time had ſlain the moſt part of them, and put the reſt to flight; and with the like good fortune charging the body of the main Battel, forced the diſcouraged Turks, with great ſlaughter, into their own Camp. Now Commandment was before given throughout the Chriſtian Army, that no man upon pain of Death ſhould in ſeeking after ſpoil break his Array, or forſake his Place before the Victory were aſſuredly gotten. But they in this hot purſuit breaking together with the Turks into their Tents, and there killing a great number of them, and ſeeing in every place great ſtore of rich ſpoil, contrary to the aforeſaid Commandment, left the purſuit of the Enemy, and diſorderly fell to the ſpoil of the Tents, until they came to the very Tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the miſchief with a moſt ſudden change of Fortune. For here theſe greedy diſordered men, not now worthy the name of Souldiers, light upon a ſtrong Squadron of reſolute men, with good ſtore of great Ordnance ready charged, which they diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of their Enemies, and rent in ſunder a number of them, and after that, came on reſolutely themſelves; when in the mean time Cicala Baſſa, with his Horſe-men yet untouched, brake in upon them alſo, and with the terror of his coming brought ſuch a fear upon them, that they began amain to fly, eſpecially the Hungarians and Germans, moſt buſied in the Spoil. Neither could they in that fear, by any threats or intreaty of their Commanders be perſuaded to make a ſtand, or ſo much as once to look back, or to ſhew any token of true Valour: which their haſty flight, was the overthrow not of themſelves only, but of others alſo that would have fought; for whilſt they fled head-long upon the Spur, and could not be ſtaid, they over-ran their own Foot-men, and ſo furthered the Enemies Victory. Thus for want of good order, thro the greedy covetouſneſs of a ſort of diſordered men, the moſt notable Victory that ever the Chriſtians were like to have had over the Turks, was let ſlip out of their hands. Many noble Gentlemen and Commanders, in ſeeking to ſtay the flight of their own men, were here ſlain: and altho the Enemy followed the Chace ſcarce half a mile, yet were the Chriſtians poſſeſſed with ſuch a fear, that they fled amain all over the Country, with greater ſhame than loſs, no man purſuing them. The Arch-duke himſelf ſeeing all deſperate, fled to Caſſovia. The Tranſilvanian, of all others moſt orderly, retired himſelf towards Tocaii, having not loſt in this Battel above 200 men, and of them never a man of name. All this loſs he imputed to the Covetouſneſs of the Hungarians, and Cowardiſe of the German Horſemen. The Lord Bernſtein having charge of the great Artillery, fled alſo, and made ſhift for himſelf, as did Palfi, and in fine all the reſt. Neither was the fear leſs amongſt the Turks (a wonderful thing to be ſpoken) than it was among the Chriſtians: for the Night following, they, for fear of the return of the Chriſtians, truſſing up the beſt of their things, fled alſo towards Agria. And it was afterwards known, that the Turks great Ordnance, Tents, and Baggage, ſtood three days in their Trenches, either altogether unguarded, or ſo ſlenderly guarded, as that they might have been eaſily taken by the Chriſtians, if they would but have made head again. Yea Mahomet himſelf is reported oftentimes to have confeſſed the danger and fear he was then in to have been taken, and all his Army deſtroyed, if the Chriſtians had (as they ſhould) purſued the Victory, and not ſo baſely run after the Spoil: by which danger he then warned, afterwards ever ſhunned to adventure his Perſon to the like Peril in the Field. In this Battel of Kareſta (for ſo it is of a place thereby called) and at the Siege of Agria, were loſt of the Chriſtians about 20000, and of the Turks 60000. Mahomet after this Victory fortified Agria, and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 Souldiers, and ſo returned to Belgrade.

The Chriſtians in ſeeking too greedily after the Spoil, overthrown and diſcomfited.

Twenty thouſand Chriſtians ſlain, and threeſcore thouſand Turks.

The Baſſa of Buda, perſuading himſelf that the Chriſtians, after ſo great an Overthrow, could not this Year to any purpoſe recover their Strength, came with all the power he was able to make, and the fourth of November beſieged Vachia, in hope to have eaſily carried it: but finding there greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined, and hearing that the diſperſed Chriſtians in the upper part of Hungary were making head for to come to the relief of the Town, he, more afraid than hurt, brake up his Siege, and ſo returned to Buda; for indeed the diſperſed Reliques of the late Army of the Chriſtians were drawing together, but unarmed and unſerviceable, as having in the late flight ſhamefully caſt away their Arms, and therefore could have done the Baſſa ſmall harm if he had continued the Siege.

Vachia beſieged by the Baſſa of Buda.

Mahomet, thinking it Honour enough for him to have thus won Agria, and driven the Chriſtians out of the Field, divided his Army into two parts at Belgrade; whereof the one he billeted in the Country thereabout, to be ready for all Events, and with the other he returned to Conſtantinople: but by the way he was ſet upon by Barbelius Januſchy the Tranſilvanian Prince's Lieutenant, and the Vayvod of Valachia, who with a great Power both of Horſe and Foot being got over the River Danubius, and ſecretly favoured by the Country People, lay in Ambuſh for him in places of advantage, and ſtill following in the Tail of his Army, cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them; and ſo with much trouble arrived at length at Conſtantinople, where we will for this Year leave him, until we hear of him more.

Maximilian, with a ſmall Retinue, arrived at Vienna in the latter end of November, where he found the Viſcount of Burgaw, Swartzenburg, and ſome other of the Commanders of his late Army; moſt of the reſt, eſpecially the Italians, being ſlain. The ſmall remainder of this unfortunate Year was ſpent with often Skirmiſhes and Inroads one into anothers Frontiers, as the manner of War is, without any other great thing done worth the Remembrance.

Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour, notwithſtanding the late diſcomfiture of his Army not far from Agria, made choice again of his Brother Maximilian the Arch-duke, for the managing of his Forces for his next Years Wars againſt the Turk. Whereunto the Pope by his Legate Fran. Aldobrandino promiſed of his own charge to ſend him 10000 Italians, under the Conduct of the Duke of Mantua; as did alſo the German Princes their wonted aid, with ſome others. All which ſlowly at length meeting together near unto Poſſonium and Altenburg, in the Months of July and Auguſt; departing thence, march-marched to Pappa, which after eight days hard Siege they took, and ſo again retired to Altenburg, where they took a general Muſter of the Army, and afterwards, in the beginning of September, ſhewed themſelves before the ſtrong Town of Rab: where the Lord Bernſtein approaching too near the Walls, was with a Shot ſlain. Nevertheleſs, the reſt there ſtayed, until that hearing of the coming of Mahomet Baſſa, the Turks General, with a great Army, they left the Siege, and the twenty fourth day of September, paſſing over the River Danubius, into the Iſland Schut towards Comara, there on the North-ſide of the River encamped. Where they had not lain paſt eight days, but that the Caſtle of Dotis, ſtanding upon the South-ſide of Danubius, was by the Baſſa, before their Faces, and as it were even under their Noſes, beſieged and taken; the whole Army of the Chriſtians in the mean time, as idle Beholders, looking on, but not daring to relieve their diſtreſſed Friends: but afterwards ariſing, marched to Vachia; where, hearing of the Turks coming againſt them from Peſth, they ſet fire on the Caſtle, and ſo retired along the North-ſide of the River, until they came over againſt Vicegrade, a Caſtle of their own, on the farther ſide of Danubius; where, by the good direction of the Lord George Baſta, a moſt expert Captain, and Lieutenant-General of the Army, they encamped ſo ſtrongly, as that the Turks, after many brave Attempts given to have forced them in their Trenches, were glad with ſome loſs to depart.

Michael the Vayvod yieldeth his Obeiſance unto the Turk, and yet refuſeth to aid him againſt the Chriſtians.

Neither went things this Year better forward with the Chriſtians in other places, than in this ſide of Hungary: for Sigiſmund the Tranſilvanian Prince, by his Chancellor, beſieging the ſtrong City of Temeſwar in October, was, by the valour of the Defendants, and the unſeaſonableneſs of the Weather, inforced to raiſe his Siege, and with diſhonour to depart. Michael alſo, the Vayvod of Valachia, who, moved with the example and perſuaſions of the Tranſilvanian Prince, had revolted from the Turks, and done them great harm (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often Invaſions and the ſpoil of his Country, almoſt brought to utter Deſolation, many thouſands of his Subjects being by the Turks and Tartars carried away Captives, and his Towns and Caſtles for moſt part razed; to give his People a time of breathing, ſubmitted himſelf again unto the Turkiſh Obeiſance, ſolemnly receiving at the hands of one of the Turks Chiaus (for that purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople) an Enſign in token of his Submiſſion unto the Turkiſh Emperour, as alſo of his favour towards him. Which the more to aſſure him of, he by another honourable Meſſenger ſhortly after received from Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour more kind Letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayvodſhip of Valachia by the grand Seignior's ſolemn Oath, unto Michael the Vayvod, and his Son Peter, then about thirteen years old, for the term of both their Lives, without diſturbance, paying but the half of the old yearly Tribute by the Turks before demanded. So glad they were upon any condition to have reduced that Martial man with his Country unto their Obeiſance: and in token of further Grace, together with theſe Letters he received alſo a goodly Horſe, moſt richly furniſhed, with a fair Scimiter and an Horſe-man's Mace, in ſign of the martial Power and Government committed unto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and Honours the Vayvod ſeemed thankfully to accept: nevertheleſs, not daring too far to truſt unto the Turkiſh Faith, of the ſmall aſſurance whereof he had before had ſufficient Experience, he ſtill kept ſtrong Garriſons upon the Frontiers of his Country, with ſuch other Forces alſo as he was wont, excuſing the ſame to be done for fear of the Tartars; by whom he alſo excuſed himſelf for not going with the Turks General this Year into Hungary, as he was by ſpecial Meſſengers from the grand Seignior himſelf requeſted; telling him, that he might not in any caſe ſo do, for fear of the Tartars moſt horrible Incurſions, and the Spoils of his Country; yet knew he right well, how that they were by the great Sultan's expreſs Commandment charged not to do any harm either in Moldavia, or Valachia, as they went into Hungary. But this wary Vayvod not greatly truſting either the Sultan or them, as alſo loth himſelf, a Chriſtian, to go againſt the Chriſtians, his Friends and late Confederates, excuſed himſelf by the neceſſary care he had of his Subjects and Country, and ſo requeſted that his reaſonable Excuſe to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted: but of him more is to be ſaid hereafter. Thus paſſed this Year without any great thing done more than is before declared; both theſe great Princes, the Emperour and the Turkiſh Sultan, being warned by the laſt Years Work what it was to put all to the Fortune of a Battel: and therefore now, contenting themſelves to have ſhewed their Forces, as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this years Wars more in ſhews than deeds.

A great Tribute.

The Prince of Tranſilvania reſigneth his Country unto the Emperour.

What great things might by the Chriſtian Princes at Unity amongſt themſelves be done againſt the Turk, is by the conſiderate Right eaſily to be gathered; but eſpecially by the notable Victory of the famous Tranſilvanian Prince Sigiſmund, who, confederated but with his poor oppreſſed Neighbours the Valachians and Moldavians, and ſtrengthened with ſome ſmall Aid from the Emperour and the Hungarians, not only delivered thoſe three Countries from the heavy burthen of the Turkiſh Thraldom, but vanquiſhed alſo their moſt renowned Captains, overthrew their mighty Armies, burnt and ſpoiled their Countries, razed their Towns and Cities; which, as it hath been before in part declared, ſo if it ſhould be all particularly ſet down, beſides that it would be tedious, ſo alſo might it haply ſeem almoſt incredible. Beſides which Calamities of War (commonly more felt of the Subjects than of the Prince) the great Sultan himſelf found no ſmall Wants, as well in his Coffers, as other his neceſſary Supplies for the maintenance of his Wars, eſpecially in Hungary; the only Country of Moldavia, before theſe Troubles, yielding unto him yearly a Tun of Gold, 2000 Horſes for Service, 10000 great meaſures of Wheat, with as much Barly, and a wonderful proportion of Butter, Honey, and other Victuals; the other two Provinces paying the like or more, as a yearly Tribute: whereof he had of late, to his great diſcontentment, by the general Revolt of theſe three Countries, been quite diſappointed. But this ſo wholſome a Confederation (to the great hurt of the Chriſtian Commonweal, and benefit of the Turks) now broken, and Moldavia by the Polonians diſſevered from the reſt, and again made tributary to the Turk, as is before declared, and now Valachia alſo in a ſort acknowledging the Turks Obeiſance; the noble Tranſilvanian Prince, who hitherto with great Cheerfulneſs and Courage had fought the moſt Chriſtian Battels againſt the Turk, now left as it were all alone, and doubting how with his own ſmall Forces to be able long to defend his Country againſt the Turk and the Polonian, whom he feared not much leſs than him; leſt the ſame ſhould, together with himſelf, fall into the hands of the Turks or ſome other his Enemies, by a wonderful Change voluntarily reſigned this his Country of Tranſilvania unto Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour, and his Heirs for ever: and ſo leaving his Wife in Tranſilvania, went himſelf into to Sileſia, there to take Poſſeſſion of the Dukedoms of Oppel and Ratibor, which, together with the yearly Penſion of 50000 Joachims, or the Revenues of the Biſhoprick of Vratiſlavia, he had in lieu thereof received of the Emperour: whereupon the Poſſeſſion of Tranſilvania, by the general conſent of all the States of that Country, was in the beginning of this Year 1598, delivered unto the Archbiſhop of Vacia, the County Nadaſti, and Doctor Petzi, the Emperour's Commiſſioners; and a ſolemn Oath of Obedience and Loyalty taken of them all in general; albeit the aforeſaid Commiſſioners, as alſo the Emperour himſelf, would have perſuaded the Prince, either not at all, or at leaſtwiſe not ſo ſuddenly to have forſaken his Country, but to have ſtill kept the Government thereof himſelf yet for a year or two; well foreſeeing, that the ſame could not ſo conveniently be governed by any other as by himſelf, a natural Prince therein born, and exceedingly beloved of his Subjects. The ſame Commiſſioners alſo, in June following, going into Valachia, there took the like Oath of Obedience of Michael the Vayvod and his People: who, loathing the Turkiſh Sovereignty, all willingly yielded themſelves unto the Emperour's Protection. Theſe Commiſſioners alſo at the ſame time came to agreement with the Tartars Ambaſſadors, offering unto the Emperour Peace and Aid for the yearly Penſion of 40000 Duckats, and as many Sheep-skin Gowns, their uſual manner of Apparel.

Michael the Vayvod ſubmitteth himſelf, with his People, unto the Emperours Protection.

All this while continued the Diet of the Empire, begun in December laſt paſt at Ratisbon, Matthias the Emperour's Brother being there his Deputy, and in his Majeſty's Name demanding a greater Aid for the maintenance of his Wars againſt the Turk, the common Enemy, than was by the Princes and States of the Empire offered: where, after great and long Deliberation, a large Proportion was by them all agreed upon for the defraying of the charges of thoſe Wars and defence of the Chriſtian Commonweal, to be paid in three years next; and ſo thereupon was the Aſſembly diſſolved. But as they were returning home, behold, contrary to all hope, Rab, one of the ſtrongeſt Fortreſſes of Chriſtendom, three Years before betrayed unto the Turks by County Hardeck, was now by the Wiſdom and Valour of Adolphus Baron of Swartzenburg, the Emperour's Lieutenant in the lower Hungary, again recovered, to the great grief of the Turks, and wonderful rejoycing of the Chriſtians, in ſuch ſort as followeth:

Two Italian Priſoners flying out of Rab, diſcover the ſtate of the Town to the Lord Swartzenburg.

This noble Gentleman the Lord Swartzenburg, of no leſs Courage than Experience, then lying at Komara, and ſtill in doubt leſt the Turks, ſo near unto him at Rab, ſhould attempt ſomething againſt him and his Charge, provided for his own defence all that Winter-time with a ſtrong Garriſon, keeping continual Watch and Ward, altho it were as then no time for the Enemy with any Army to keep the Field. So Winter paſſing, and the Spring approaching, it fortuned, that the two and twentieth day of March, about ſeven a clock in the night, the Gates being ſhut, were heard near under the Walls of the Town, two men, who by their Speech ſeemed to be Italians; with great inſtance requeſting, for the ſafeguard of their Lives, to be let in, for fear of the Enemies Purſuit: which by one of the Sentinels was forthwith reported unto the Governour; who, doubting it to be ſome ſubtil practice of the Enemy, commanded them there to take their Fortune until the Morning; at which time they were received into the City, and being brought before the Governour, proſtrating themſelves forthwith at his Feet, pitifully requeſted him to have compaſſion of their Miſery, and to comfort them with his charitable Relief, that ſo they might at length return again into their Country: who at the firſt asked them, What Country-men they were, and from whence they came at that time of the night? Whereunto they anſwered, That they were Italians, and that they had but even then eſcaped out of the cruel hands of the Turks at Rab. But deſiring to know of them ſome News, they, after their manner, humbled themſelves, ſhewing by their Geſture not to know any. Yet would he needs underſtand of them the Particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turks, and the means they had uſed to eſcape out of that cruel Servitude, in all order as had befaln them. Where the younger of them beginning, told him, That now almoſt two years ago, at ſuch time as the Chriſtians were overthrown by the Turks under Agria, and every man in that confuſion then ſeeking the beſt and neareſt way to ſave themſelves; they having by flight now eſcaped the greateſt danger of the Enemy, and ſo travelling over the Country towards Vienna, were, to their great Misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of Rab to ſcour the Country, and to ſeek after Prey) taken Priſoners, and as Slaves committed to the Chain, where they had almoſt two years, until now, with great Patience ſerved. Theſe two Fugitives, by their outward appearance, ſeemed to be men of good Spirit and Valour; which cauſed the Governour the more deſirous to know of them the means they had uſed for their eſcape. So the younger proceeding in his Tale, gave him to underſtand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had been three Months before ſtill carefully deviſing how to recover their loſt Liberty, which now ſeemed to make ſome offer of it ſelf unto them: for that ſince the time that the Emperour's Army riſe the laſt year from before the Town, they were not kept ſo ſtrait, or looked unto as before, but lay as men by the Turks not much regarded; which cauſed them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to reſolve either the ſooner to dye, or to ſet themſelves at liberty. And that ſo one day as they were carrying certain Munition from the Palace of Giaffer Baſſa for the Souldiers, they ſecretly conveyed three pieces of Cord of ſome reaſonable bigneſs, therewith by night to let themſelves down from the Wall, and ſo make their Eſcape: which ſtoln Cord, that it ſhould not be ſeen, and ſo their purpoſe ſuſpected, they buried in the ground. But the Night being come for them to effect in what they had ſo long deſired, and they roming up and down in the dark, and ſtill finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to ſtay, and to deferr it until the night following; which being come, and choice made of a moſt convenient place, they made faſt the Cord above, and ſo thereby ſlid down, firſt the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to ſwim, was yet by the good direction and help of his Fellow conducted over unto the farther ſide of the broad and deep Ditch; and that ſo, in the night (ſo dark as that one of them could hardly ſee the other) they were come by chance to Komara, thinking to have taken the way to Vienna. The Governour thus fully inſtructed of their Eſcape, demanded of them further, how the ſtrong Town of Rab was by the Turks governed and guarded; who told him, very evil, and with ſmall care, eſpecially ſince the Departure of the Emperour's Camp; and alſo that four Gates of the Town were filled up with Earth; which if they were broken open, would all fall into the Town-ditch, and ſo further them that would attempt to enter, with divers other Particularities. Whereof the Governour having well conſidered, thought with himſelf, that if by ſome ingenious Device he might by night, with ſome good ſtrength, upon the ſudden enter the Town, it might happily be ſo again recovered. Upon which ſo great a deſignment he thought good to conſult further with the Lord Palſi, whom he requeſted, in all haſte, and with as much Secrecy as was poſſible, with 1600 Foot, and as many Horſe as he could make, to come unto him to Komara. Who, upon this Advertiſement, ſtaid not, but preſently giving order unto his men, ſet forward by night, and the 26*th* of March, before day, with 1400 Foot and 120 Horſe arrived at Komara; where they were all joyfully received, and the Gates, after they were entred, again faſt ſhut, and ſo kept for fear of the Enemies ſecret Spies, of whom no man can be too wary, be he never ſo wiſe. Now whilſt theſe Souldiers were refreſhing themſelves, in the mean time, the Governour, with the Lord Palſi, diſcourſed to the full concerning the intended Enterpriſe; which reſolved upon, they found themſelves, upon the view of their men, to have 2600 Foot of the Garriſon Souldiers, and 300 Horſe, all good and courageous men, and well appointed for the intended Service: who there ſtaying two days after their coming, and many of them in the mean time (after the manner of their Religion) confeſſing themſelves, and receiving the Sacrament, were become ſo courageous, as that they doubted not, in the Quarrel of the Chriſtian Religion, to encounter a far greater number of the Turks than themſelves.

The notable Speech of the Lord Palſi unto his Souldiers.

And the more to ſtir them up, the Lord Palſi at the ſame time delivered unto them a notable Speech; not for all that telling them whither they were to go; but, That they were his Chriſtian Souldiers and Brethren, under his leading both of long and late time; who, never by him deceived of their wonted Pay at ſuch time as it was due, would not now, as he hoped, forſake him. And albeit that he well knew them to have deſerved at his hands a greater Contentment, nevertheleſs, being himſelf deprived of his Revenue by theſe late Wars, and his Poſſeſſions ſubject every hour unto the Incurſions of the Turks, could not therefore, according to his Deſire, and their Deſerts, ſhew unto them the great good Will he bare them; yet now and even preſently was come the time wherein they might not only abundantly inrich themſelves, but alſo adorn their Heads with an immortal Crown of Glory, and make themſelves for ever famous, by performing the moſt happy and glorious Exploit that ever was by valiant Souldiers attempted or atchieved in that part of the World. And to the intent that they might know how dearly he accounted of the Life and Honour of every one of them, he would therefore himſelf, with the Lord Swartzenburg, (of whom proceeded all that fair Device and new Stratagem) be preſent with them in the Action; and that therefore they were not to think that they were led forth to any private danger, farther than their Commanders themſelves, whoſe Folly were to be accounted great, if raſhly and upon no good ground they ſhould adventure their Lives and Honours together; whereof they ought not now to doubt, having by a thouſand Proofs known how much they had been of them always regarded. And that therefore it behoved them ſo much the more to ſhew their Valour in this piece of Service undertaken for the great benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweal, and the Honour of Chriſt Jeſu, unto whom they were with one accord to make their Prayers, with his mighty hand to ſtrengthen their Hearts, and with glorious Victory to bring to happy end the intended Exploit againſt his Enemies, to the honour of his Name, and the advancement of the Chriſtian Religion and Faith. At the end of which Speech, all the Souldiers cried aloud, That they were moſt ready to do any their Commands, and to follow them whitherſoever. So order was taken, that within three hours they ſhould every man be preſt and ready with their Arms according to their places; and ſo having well refreſhed themſelves, about eleven of clock the ſeven and twentieth day of March they in good order began to ſet forwards toward Rab. But for that the multitude of Souldiers oftentimes giveth the Enemy warning of that is intended againſt him, Palſi gave order to one John Stroine, his Serjeant-Major, to follow fair and ſoftly after him, with 1700 Horſe and Foot; which he well performed: and ſo upon the break of the day they began to draw towards Rab, and there lay cloſe in Ambuſh all that day until night, about ſeven miles ſhort of the Town; refreſhing themſelves in the mean time with plenty of Victuals, which they had brought with them from Komara. Night (the favourer of Deceit) being come, in two hours March they began to draw near to Rab, and there ſtaid about five hours; from whence they ſent before them a French Engineer, a man of great Judgment, with thirteen others (before rewarded with 1500 Duckats) having with them four Petards, Engines of Force to blow up into the Air any thing whereunto they be faſtened, be it never ſo great and weighty; where, by good chance, they found the Draw bridge down, and the Portcullis up; for that the Turks then caſting no Peril, expected every hour for certain Waggons with Proviſion from Alba-Regalis. By which good hap, the Chriſtians unperceived coming to the Gate, and thereunto faſtning their Petards, in good order gave fire to the ſame, which preſently took not hold; yet were they not far gone, but that they were by a Sentinel deſcried, who demanding what they were, was preſently anſwered by the violent Engines, which in a trice tore in ſunder the Gate, with ſome part of the Wall and of the Fortifications near unto it.

Rab ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians.

When now the Watch (but all too late) began to give the Alarm, and the Chriſtians in the foreward thruſting preſently in, took the Gate, none of the Turks yet coming to the defence thereof, or to hinder them from entring. The firſt that appeared were 200 Turks, which with their wonted Cry Alla, Alla, in ſuch hideous manner as if they would therewith have rent the Heavens, would have ſtaid the Chriſtians from farther entring, but were themſelves over-charged by 300 which were already entred.

Two of the Turks Baſſaes ſlain.

At which time alſo the Baſſa came on with more than a thouſand following him, and that with ſuch Courage and Fury as was never greater to be ſeen in any Turk: where, after a moſt terrible Fight, maintained by the ſpace of two hours, the Baſſa himſelf being ſlain, the Turks began a little to retire, whereby a thouſand Chriſtians more had leiſure to enter: when ſtraightway after came Giaffer the great Baſſa with above a thouſand tall Souldiers following him, all the Inhabitants alſo of Rab running after him, and that with ſuch force, that they conſtrained the Chriſtians to retire unto the Gate whereby they entred. Who, reſolved rather honourably to die within the Town, than with diſhonour to be forced out, there, with incredible Courage, ſuſtained the greateſt Impreſſion of the furious Enemy; where was to be ſeen the true Chriſtian Valour for the performance of ſo great an Exploit, well worthy of eternal Memory. But this Baſſa alſo (the other being dead of a Wound in his Neck) encountered by the Lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that ſharp Conflict ſhewed great tokens of his Valour, was there at length ſlain alſo: both whoſe Heads ſtruck off, were for a Preſent afterwards ſent to the Emperour at Prague, with all the particularities of the whole Action. But now the Turks perceiving that all their chief Commanders were ſlain, retired moſt part of them into the City: ſome 300 of them crept underneath one of the Bulwarks, where ſtood certain Barrels of Gunpowder, which they deſperately ſet on fire, and ſo together with themſelves blew up three hundred Chriſtians that were above upon the Bulwark; the greateſt loſs the Chriſtians had in all that Victory, who were otherwiſe ſuppoſed not to loſe therein above two hundred of their men. Thus the Turks diſcomfited, and altogether full of fear, loſing both their Force and Courage, fled in every place before the Chriſtians, they in every corner making of them a moſt horrible Slaughter. The Turkiſh Women all this while out of their Windows and other high places, ceaſed not to caſt down Stones, Timber, and ſuch like things, upon the Heads of the Chriſtians, whom they thought by all means to annoy, and to help the Turks. The bloody Execution continued all that day until night, the Chriſtians ſtill finding one or other hidden in the moſt ſecret places of the City upon whom to exerciſe their Wrath; who, ranſacking alſo every corner thereof, were by the Wealth therein found greatly enriched. But coming to the Palace of Giaffer the great Baſſa, they found ſuch great ſtore of rich Furniture, as better beſeemed ſome great Prince than a Turkiſh Slave. There they found alſo Letters, written in Characters of Gold, from the Baſſa of Buda to this Baſſa, greeting him, and promiſing him in his behalf to deal with the grand Seignior againſt the next Spring, with the firſt that his Army ſhould take the Field, that he might therein have ſome honourable place of Command, to the end he might in the Field ſhew his greater Valour, and no longer lie idle in that ſtrong Town. So found they there alſo many things written from the Great Sultan himſelf unto this Baſſa, with great ſtore of Coin, which all fell to the Souldiers ſhare; inſomuch, that by this ſo notable an Exploit ſo well performed, the publick State, together with the Souldiers private, was not a little bettered. There, amongſt other things, were recovered threeſcore and ſix pieces of Artillery, which were known to have been ſometime the Emperour's, and four and twenty others, which the Baſſa had cauſed to be brought from Buda, with great ſtore of ſhot and powder and other ſmall pieces, and meal ſufficient to have ſerved 4000 men for a Year and a half, but of Wine (little uſed of the Turks) only four Veſſels. In the Baſſa's Palace was alſo found of Armour and Weapons of all ſorts great ſtore, with abundance of Cloth and Apparel, which was all given in ſpoil to the Souldiers. Thus Rab, one of the ſtrongeſt Fortreſſes of Chriſtendom, not full four years before beſieged by Sinan Baſſa with an 150000 men, by the ſpace almoſt of three Months, and then at length, by the Treaſon of the Governour to him betrayed; was now in one night, by the Valour and Policy of a few reſolute men, to their immortal Glory, again reſtored to the Chriſtian Commonweal, the nineteenth day of March, in the Year 1598. Of which ſo notable a Victory the Chriſtians rejoyced not a little both in Hungary and elſewhere; the great Sultan, with the Turks, no leſs grieving and ſtorming, as well for the loſs of the Town, before got with no ſmall charge, as for the death of his People there ſlain, to the number of about ſix thouſand and more, with the loſs of ſcarce ſix hundred Chriſtians.

A great Tumult between the Janizaries and the Spahi.

Yet for all this, Mahomet the great Sultan ceaſed not to make great Proviſion for his Wars in Hungary, and that greater than before; and ſo with greater fury alſo to proſecute his wrathful Indignation to be revenged upon the Chriſtians. Whereunto, order was given unto Ibraim Baſſa his Brother-in-law, and General of his Army, with all convenient ſpeed to take the Field; which for all that fell out far otherwiſe; for that now thinking to have had all things in good forwardneſs, a great diſſention riſe betwixt the Janizaries and the Spahi; the Janizaries being the beſt Foot-men, and the Spahi the beſt Horſe-men of the Turkiſh Empire; both the faithful Keepers of the Perſon of their Prince, and the greateſt ſtrength of his State; whereby it cometh to paſs, that in ſetting forward towards the Wars, theſe two ſorts of valiant Souldiers, the one ſtanding upon their Strength, and the other upon their Honour, and both jealous of their Reputation and Credit, have no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and eſpecially of late in this corruption of their martial Diſcipline under their degenerate Emperours, fall at odds among themſelves, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their Affairs, and trouble of the General. Inſomuch, that to appeaſe this Tumult he was glad to put to death certain of the inſolent Janizaries, refuſing to ſet forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding farther, and thinking to have executed ſome others of them alſo, to the further terror of the reſt, he was by them and their Adherents put in ſuch fear of his Life, that to avoid the preſent danger, he was glad to excuſe himſelf by his Lieutenant, laying all the blame upon him as the cauſe thereof; who was therefore as a Sacrifice delivered unto the Fury of the Janizaries, by whom he was there preſently ſlain, with ſome others of the Baſſa's Followers. So theſe Broils, with much ado, overpaſt, Ibrahim having taken a general review of his Army at Sophia, there ſtayed, expecting Order from the great Sultan where to begin his Wars, in Hungary or in Tranſilvania, for as yet that was in queſtion: which could not well be before the beginning of July, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of Victuals even then ariſing in the Camp; for the ſupplying whereof, Mahomet himſelf had no ſmall care. But this long delay was the cauſe that a great number of the Janizaries coming from Hadrianople, and hearing by the way, that the General would not as yet ſet forward, not knowing the cauſe of his ſtay, and doubting to be deceived of their promiſed Entertainment, were about to have returned back again; which known at the Court, Commandment was preſently ſent thence unto the General, without longer ſtay to ſet forward toward Hungary, which the more haſtened his Departure with his Army.

In this the Turks ſo long delay, the Chriſtians had good leiſure to prepare their new Forces, being now the latter end of Summer: for well they might think that the Enemy ſlept not, knowing what Proviſion he had made as well in Conſtantinople as in other places. Wherefore reaſonably doubting that Summer well ſpent, and Auguſt now at hand, he would not ſo late turn his Forces into the lower Hungary, they thought it beſt to provide for the Safety of the upper Country: and to the end the Enemy approaching thoſe Frontiers, might there find Forces ready to encounter him, the Lord George Baſta, a man of great Experience and Valour, was appointed Lieutenant-General for that Country, to the great Contentment of the Souldiers in general, all ſhewing themſelves moſt ready at his Command. The Lord Swartzenburg in the mean time remaining in the lower Hungary at Rab, with eight thouſand good Souldiers; and the Arch-duke Matthias at Vienna for the diſpatch of George Baſta, and the haſting of him forward: for that the upper Hungary, to the great hurt thereof began now to feel the Incurſions of the Turks and Tartars: beſides that, he was afterwards to return himſelf to ſpeak with the Emperour his Brother, ſtill expecting a Chiaus of the Turks by the Appointment of the Grand Seignior, ſent by the way of Polonia for Prague, to intreat with the Emperour concerning a Peace.

They of Buda in the mean while ſeeing the delay of the Turks, of whom, no one band yet appeared in thoſe Quarters; and on the other ſide perceiving the great Preparation of the Imperials, and the great Garriſon at Rab ſo near at hand; began now to doubt ſome new Reſolution of the Chriſtians: wherein they were no whit deceived; for no Army of the Turks being then in field in the lower Hungary, and the Country plain and open, the Lord Palſi, with a convenient Power, and certain pieces of Battery, ſet forward to attempt the Enterpriſe, and the 16th of October, with 16 pieces of Artillery began to batter the City of Buda, to the great fear and diſcomfiture of them within; having firſt taken the Fort S. Gerard, with hope to have gained the reſt alſo. For which cauſe, the Men, the Women, and all that dwelt in the City, moſt inſtantly beſought the Baſſa, not to endure the deſtruction of the ſame, with the Inhabitants and Wealth thereof altogether; but, being not able long to hold out againſt ſo furious a Battery, in time to hearken unto ſome reaſonable compoſition, that ſo they might yet every man at leaſt with life depart. Whereunto, the Baſſa for all that would not hearken, but put them ſtill in hope that they ſhould be preſently relieved. Howbeit, the Battery ſtill continuing, and they not able longer to endure the force of the Imperials, not any Relief yet coming, they were glad, at length to abandon the City with the loſs of 2000 of the Janizaries, and but 300 of the Chriſtians ſlain, and 800 hurt; the reſt of the Turks at the ſame time retiring themſelves into the Caſtle, where they might for a ſpace deem themſelves ſafe. So the Lord Palſi poſſeſſed of the City, with all his Forces laid Siege unto the Caſtle; which, altho it were in ſome places ſhaken with the continual fury of the Canon, yet were the Defendants ſtill ready to make good the ſame: inſomuch, that Palſi, upon good hope of Succeſs, giving thereunto a general Aſſault, was by their Valour inforced to retire; they within in the mean time with great labour and induſtry repairing the Breaches and Gauls made by the Artillery. So that Palſi conſidering the difficulty of the Aſſault, thought it better, by undermining, to ſhake the Rock whereon the Caſtle ſtood, than by a new Aſſault to expoſe ſo many worthy men unto ſo manifeſt a danger: which his Purpoſe by the Enemy diſcovered, was by them alſo, by countermining, diſappointed; yet for all that were the Chriſtians ſtill in good hope, by another Mine not yet by the Enemy perceived, to ſort to the full of their deſire; and the more, for that they ſaw not ſo much bravery or ſhew of Courage in the Defendants as before: who now kept themſelves ſilent and quiet, as if they had been conſulting about the yielding up of the Caſtle, as men bereft of all hope of Relief and Succour; the Chriſtians being now poſſeſſed of a ſtrong Abbey and Fortreſs faſt by, and having broken down all the Bridges over the River Danubius, in ſuch ſort, as that the beſieged could not receive any relief either by Land or Water. But foraſmuch as the time of the year began now to grow tedious, and the Winter Weather ſharp, the Chriſtians thought it not beſt there long to protract the time; and therefore reſolved to preſent unto the Caſtle another general Aſſault, and at the ſame inſtant to blow up the Mine: but in giving this Aſſault, they were again repulſed with the loſs of 200 men. At which time alſo, a number of the Turks ſallying out of the Caſtle, courageouſly encountered the Chriſtians, but not with Succeſs anſwerable to their Valour, being there almoſt all cut in pieces: neither did the Mine take the deſired Effect, but being blown up did little or no harm at all. So that the Chriſtians, weary of their long ſuffering of the Extremity of the Weather, and withal conſidering the great Courage of the Defendants, were even upon the point to have riſen; yet willing to give a freſh attempt by the Mine, they began again to work in the ſame, and in hope to prevail, began to parle with the Defendants about the giving up of the Caſtle: but all to little or no purpoſe; for that the Mine having taken no effect, the Souldiers could hardly be drawn on through the deep and muddy Ditches to give a new Aſſault. In fine, ſeeing no hope to prevail, and hearing alſo of the coming of a great Army of the Turks for the relief of the beſieged, they raiſed their Siege, and at their departure burnt their Suburbs, carrying away with them a great Booty; and ſo retiring towards Strigonium, expected further direction where to Winter. Where, ſhortly after, Order was taken, that the Forces disbanded ſhould be diſperſed, ſome into the Garriſons, and ſome into the Country thereabout, to the intent they might ſo be in the more readineſs with the firſt of the next Spring to take the Field, or as occaſion ſhould ſerve to be otherwiſe employed.

Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtians depart from the Siege of Buda.

But Sigiſmund the Tranſilvanian Prince in the mean time repenting himſelf of the unequal Exchange he had made with the Emperour, in diſguiſed Apparel haſting in poſt out of Sileſia came to Clauſenburg in Tranſilvania; and there was joyfully received of his Subjects, and taking of them a new Oath of Obedience, by Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe certified Maximilian the Arch-duke (appointed by the Emperour for the Government of Tranſilvania, and now upon his way as far as Caſſovia) of the cauſes of his Return, perſuading him rather to convert his Forces againſt the Turks for the recovery of Agria, than to trouble himſelf to come any farther for Tranſilvania, now again by him, to the great contentment of his Subjects, repoſſeſſed: as did alſo the Princeſs his Wife (Maximilian's Couſin-German) wiſhing him to conſider what hurt and diſhonour he ſhould do unto the Emperour's Majeſty, Himſelf, the Roman Empire, and the whole Chriſtian Common-weal in general, if in ſo dangerous a time he ſhould attempt any thing againſt the Prince her Huſband, and unto him ſo nearly allied.

Veradinum beſieged by the Turks.

Now the Turks great Army being come into the upper Hungary, lay incamped under the Walls of the ſtrong City of Veradinum, where that worthy Captain George Baſta was Lieutenant-General for the Emperour; but not having ſuch Strength, as without further help to go againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, or to relieve the beſieged City, not as then furniſhed with a ſufficient Garriſon, he gave knowledge thereof unto Maximilian the Arch-duke, who (as is aforeſaid) with a convenient Power was but a little before come to Caſſovia, to have gone into Tranſilvania, had he not there by the way been ſtayed by Ambaſſadors from the Prince Sigiſmund, but lately before returned out of Sileſia; and having again taken upon him the Government, by theſe his Ambaſſadors requeſted him no farther to trouble himſelf with that Journey, offering to give him Aid againſt the Turks whenſoever he ſhould require it. The beſieged nevertheleſs in the mean time notably defended themſelves, and with certain brave Sallies did the Enemy great harm; ſtill expecting, that Baſta the Lieutenant, or the Tranſilvanian Prince, or Maximilian the Arch-duke, or they all, with their united Forces, ſhould ſend them relief: unto whom they gave knowledge the Nineteenth of October, how that the Turks with all the Force and Fury they had uſed, had as yet little prevailed, being by their Valour ſtill repulſed, and with many ſharp Sallies, to their great loſs encountered, and ſome of their great Ordnance cloyed, in ſuch ſort, as that they were in good hope to protract the time until they might by them their Friends be relieved; yet not doubting, but that the Turks, according to their wonted manner, would do what they might to ſubdue them. According to whoſe expectation, the Tranſilvanian Prince, with a great Power taking the Field to have relieved them, was letted ſo to do by the Tartars, to that purpoſe ſtirred up by the Turks: ſo that he could by no means joyn his Forces with Maximilian, for looking to the Safety of his own People and Country. Yet in token of forwardneſs, he ſent certain Companies of brave Souldiers unto the Lieutenant Baſta; who underſtanding that of 2000 good Souldiers in Garriſon in the City at the beginning of the Siege, there were ſcarce 700 left alive, all the reſt being, with continual Aſſaults, ſlain or mortally wounded, uſed a notable Stratagem to delude the Enemy withal: for having put his men in good order, and coming bravely on, as if he would even preſently have joyned Battel (a thing which the Turks moſt deſired) whilſt they likewiſe with great ſtir were putting themſelves in order of Battel, and wholly buſied therein, he by another way (of the Turks leaſt ſuſpected) cunningly thruſt into the City eight hundred good Souldiers; and that done, preſently retired again into his Trenches, wherein he ſtrongly incamped, feared not all the Turks Forces: who thinking even then to have come to a day Battel, and ſtill in vain expecting the ſame, returned deceived by this fineneſs. And ſo ſhortly after (inforced by continual foul Weather) raiſed their Siege, not without great difficulty and danger (Relief lying ſo near at hand, and the Defendants ſtrengthened with new Supplies) to have been longer maintained. So paſſed the Troubles of this Year, with no gain but great loſs of the Turk; who, at their departure, inforced by the unſeaſonableneſs of the Weather and fear together, left behind them in their Trenches many Tents, with ſome great pieces of Artillery, being not able to convey the ſame by Water to Buda: and withal fearing greatly to be encountered by the Forces of Baſta, ſtrengthened with new Supplies even then ſent unto him from the Emperour.

A new Supply put into Veradinum by Baſta.

The Arch-duke Matthias, Swartzenburg, and the other Commanders of the Army in the lower Hungary, being twelve thouſand ſtrong, with the Garriſon Souldiers of Rab, Strigonium, and Komara, in the mean time, becauſe they would not ſtand idle, together with the Hungarian Horſe-men, over-ran all the Country thereabout, even unto the Gates of Buda: in good hope alſo to have met with eight thouſand Turks (as they were by their Eſpials advertiſed) coming towards Peſth with Victuals for the relief of the Caſtle of Buda.

Whilſt things thus paſſed in Hungary, Mahomet, to ſhew his Greatneſs, as alſo the more to keep the Chriſtian Princes in ſuſpence, ſent Cicala (or as the Turks call him Cigala) Baſſa his Admiral, with a great Fleet to Sea: wherewith, being come upon the Coaſt of Sicilia, he requeſted the Viceroy of that Kingdom to ſend him aboard his Fleet the Lady Lucretia his Mother, which dwelt in Meſſina, for that he greatly deſired to ſee her, and to do her Honour; promiſing ſo quietly to depart without any harm doing. And the Viceroy again conſidering how that the angry Renegade for the like Courteſie to him at another time before denied, had in his rage done great harm all along the Sea-Coaſt; covenanting with him to ſend her in ſafety back again, ſent her honourably accompanied aboard the Admiral Gally: whom Cicala her Son received with great Joy and Triumph; and having kept her with him one day with all the Honour that might be, according to his Promiſe ſent her back again to Meſſina; and ſo without any any harm done for her ſake to any part of Chriſtendom, peaceably returned back again with his Fleet.

Now in the mean time, Michael the Vayvod of Valachia, with good Forces of his own, becauſe he would be doing ſomething alſo, reſolved to give an Attempt upon Nicopolis, a City of the Turks in Bulgaria: and ſo giving order to his People, cauſed a Bridge to be made over Danubius to paſs that great River by. Whereof the Baſſaes of Siliſtria and Badoua underſtanding, thought it good with all their Power to diſturb him in that work; and ſo coming, as the ſaid Bridge was by the Vayvod's Souldiers laid over the River upon Boats, without farther ſtay attempted to have broken the ſame, to the intent that the Vayvod ſhould not that way paſs. Who haſting thither with his Army, reſcued his Work, and inforced his Baſſaes to forſake the Exploit by them begun; where betwixt them for a ſpace was fought a moſt hard Conflict, until at length the Turks were with a great Slaughter overthrown, and ſo glad, ſome here, ſome there, by flight as they might, to ſave their Lives. After which Victory, he, without let paſſing over the River with his whole Forces, came and incamped under the Walls of Nicopolis; where they of the City underſtanding of the late Slaughter of the Turks, and finding themſelves not able to hold it out againſt the Force and Valour of the Valachies, and now out of hope of any help or relief in time to come from the Turks, without farther reſiſtance yielded themſelves into the Power of the Vayvod; who having ſacked the City and ſet it on fire, carried thence a great ſpoil and booty, with a number of the Bulgarians; chuſing out the beſt and moſt able Bodies amongſt them to ſerve him in his Wars, and appointing the reſt to inhabit and manure the waſted places of Valachia. The Report of this Overthrow given unto the Turks by the Valachian, with the ſacking of Nicopolis, running abroad, brought a general fear upon the Turks, even in the Imperial City of Conſtantinople. For the ſtaying whereof, Mahomet commanded the chief of his Baſſaes, with a great power of tumultuary Souldiers, taken up in haſte, to go forthwith againſt the Vayvod, to ſtay the courſe of his farther Proceedings, to the diſmaying of his People; himſelf thundring out moſt horrible Threats againſt him: who, encouraged with his late Victory, and well acquainted with the Turks manners, little regarded the ſame, as knowing that he was not with Words, but with Arms, to be vanquiſhed.

Nicopolis ſacked and burnt by the Vayvod.

Now Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, oppreſſed with Melancholy to ſee himſelf at once aſſailed with the Plague then raging in Conſtantinople, the bloody Wars in Hungary, and the horrible mortality and loſs of his People in both places; and withal not ignorant of the evil Succeſs of his Army at Veradinum, and of the great harm done at Nicopolis by the Valachian; yet for all that, ceaſed not, in what he might, to provide for ſo many Evils, but gave order to Taut Baſſa with all ſpeed to ſet forward (as we have ſaid) from Conſtantinople toward Valachia, as from whence he feared the greateſt danger: who without delay, to make the Vayvod to underſtand how highly the great Sultan was diſpleaſed with him, put himſelf upon the way with ſix hundred Janizaries towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe there to winter until the Spring, and ſo to expect the coming of the reſt of the Army, that ſo with the ſame, united unto the Forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the laſt year beſieged Veradinum) he might in the Field appear more terrible unto his Enemies. The Chriſtian Emperour alſo, at the ſame time reſted much diſcontented, that his People, in ſo fair a way for the winning ning of the Caſtle of Buda, had yet failed thereof: the Wallons laying the fault upon the Lords Swartzenburg, Palſi, and the reſt of the Commanders, that it was not won; for that when they, as valiant men, offered to have done therein the uttermoſt of their Devoir, their Leaders had made choice, by the Spade and Mattock, rather than by the Sword, to perform the ſame.

The Turks again ſpoiled by the Vayvod.

But Michael the Vayvod, ſeeing the Turks not a little diſmayed with the ſacking of Nicopolis, began afreſh, to their greater terror and hurt, to make new Inrodes upon them, in ſuch ſort, as that he was entred an hundred miles into their Territory: againſt whom, Mehemet Satergi (as yet the Turks General in Hungary) coming with his Forces, he again retired, carrying away with him the ſpoil of the Country by him waſted.

Buda diſtreſſed.

They of Buda in the mean time fearing ſome ſudden Aſſault to be given upon them, and ſuffering within great want of Victuals, expected long to be relieved both with Victuals and other Neceſſaries; underſtanding yet withal, that the grand Seignior had cauſed it to be given out in Conſtantinople, That he was raiſing a great Power of his beſt and moſt expert Souldiers, and had therefore ſent for unto the Court all his old men of War, ſuch as had ſerved in the Wars of Perſia, to be now again employed in Hungary. Where the Turks in the mean time providing to relieve the diſtreſſed City of Buda both with Men and many other Neceſſaries; certain reſolute Hungarians underſtanding by their Eſpials, that one of the Turks Baſſaes with 3000 Souldiers was coming thither to increaſe the Garriſon, laid themſelves cloſe in Ambuſh in a place whereby the Turks were to paſs; where they had not long ſtay'd, but that the Turks, as men without fear, diſorderedly paſſing by, were by them with ſuch force and fury aſſailed, that in a moment, when they leaſt thought, they were overthrown and put to flight, with the loſs of many of their Horſes, much Money and Jewels, and many Captains there taken Priſoners, the Baſſa himſelf, with much ado, hardly eſcaping into the City. But ſhortly after, 400 Chriſtians ſcouring the Country about Buda, and having taken a good booty of Cattel and other Pillage, returning loaded with the Prey, were by the way aſſaulted by the Turks, and inforced to forſake the ſame, and to fight for their Lives; whom, for all that, they notably repulſed, with the ſlaughter of divers of them; and ſo again recovering their Booty, returned with Victory. And about this time, or not long after, in the upper Hungary, a great power of the Turks and Tartars having foraged a great part of that Country, and done the Chriſtians great harm, came before Caſſovia, making ſhew as if they would even preſently have beſieged that City: which put the Inhabitants in ſuch a fear, that many of them, without farther Deliberation, fled forthwith as faſt as they could into the Mountains, thinking themſelves more ſafe there than in the City. Nevertheleſs, by the perſuaſion of George Baſta, the Emperour's Lieutenant in thoſe Parts, 2000 valiant and expert Souldiers ſtaid there with him, expecting what the Turks would do; who approaching the Walls, demanded of them in the City a great Sum of Money by way of Contribution; threatning otherwiſe the utter Ruine and Deſtruction thereof. Which their proud Demand was by Baſta ſtoutly rejected, and they, with the loſs of a great many of their Lives, inforced to get them farther off. Wherefore, ſeeing themſelves not able to prevail againſt a City ſo well provided, they, for fear, by night riſe, and departed quite another way than that whereby they came, doing great harm ſtill as they went. The free Haiducks of Valachia alſo, a warlike kind of People, living for the moſt part upon Prey, and willing to ſhew ſome token of their Hatred toward the Turks, by certain Bridges paſſing over the Danubius, encountered with the Baſſa of Natolia with a great Power, whom they overthrew with much ſlaughter of his People, and the loſs of his Brother there ſlain alſo; and ſo afterwards over-running the Country, did there exceeding harm, and took the ſame Baſſa's Son Priſoner. Thus paſſed the Winter with many light Skirmiſhes and Incurſions in divers parts of Hungary, and other the frontier Countries; which had done great harm, had it not been before-hand well provided for by the Imperials; who in moſt places ſtrengthened with new Supplies, ſtayed the fury of their barbarous Enemies. Maximilian the Arch-duke in the mean time coming from Prague to Vienna, found himſelf there to have in his Camp but four and twenty thouſand Foot and ten thouſand Horſe, ready againſt the next Spring, (divers of the German Princes this year not ſending thither any Aid at all, by reaſon of their Troubles nearer home with the Spaniards in the lower ſide of Germany) which made him the more to dread the Enemies coming, who he knew after his accuſtomed manner would that Summer appear in the Field with a far greater number. But to have holpen this want, the great Duke of Muſcovy, about this time, by his Ambaſſadors, amongſt other things, requeſted leave of the Polonian for forty thouſand Horſemen to paſs through his Country, which Horſe-men he had determined (as he ſaid) to ſend in aid of the Emperour againſt the Turk: which his Requeſt the Polonian would by no means grant, as dangerous to his Eſtate. Wherefore the Muſcovite, offended with the Polonian, ſent other his Ambaſſadors unto the Emperour, by Sea; who embarqued in an Engliſh Ship in the Port of S. Nicholas, and ſailing about the Kingdoms of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, after long trouble at Sea, at length arrived at Stoad, and ſo from thence by Land travelling to Hamborough, Lubeck, and Maidenborow, and in every place honourably entertained, came at laſt unto the Emperour into Bohemia, then lying at Pliſena, for that the Plague was then hot at Prague: where they having with great ſtate delivered their Preſents and Letters of Credence unto the Emperour, had Audience, and were by him moſt honourably uſed. Yet the Polonian, having thus denied the Muſcovite Paſſage, ſuffered the Turks Ambaſſador, who called himſelf Gabriel, a Jew, to paſs through his Country unto the Emperour, to intreat with him of a Peace to be made betwixt him and the Turk. Which Gabriel coming to Prague, as Ambaſſador from the great Turk, and having no Letters of Credence to ſhew for his Negotiation (for that they were, as he ſaid, upon the way taken from him by the Polonian Coſſacks, and certain of his Retinue ſlain) was there taken for a Spy, and ſo ſent to Vienna; where, at his firſt Arrival he was well uſed in a common Inn; but the night following, being taken in his Chamber by the Martial, was ſo clap'd faſt in Priſon, with as many Irons upon him as he could bear, and all his Followers, with Gyves upon their Legs, compelled as Slaves daily to work in the Town-ditch.

The Turks Ambaſſador taken for a Spy, and impriſoned at Vienna.

About this time alſo, Sigiſmund the Tranſilvanian Prince (whom hitherto all men admired, as a man even ſent from Heaven, for the benefit of his Country and of the Chriſtian Commonweal) by a wonderful change gave a moſt manifeſt token of a divers and unconſtant Nature, to the great wonder of the World: for having broken the Agreement made with the Emperour the laſt Year, and being ſecretly in Poſt returned out of Sileſia into Tranſilvania, and again taken upon him the Government (as is before declared) and having withal requeſted himſelf, and the Tranſilvanians his Country-men to be diſcharged of the Oath of Obedience and Loyalty by them before given unto the Emperour, and the City of Veradinum, with the Country thereabout, to be again reſtored unto him; and the Emperour pauſing thereupon, did now, (doubting of his own Ability for the keeping of that Country) in the beginning of this year 1599, by his Ambaſſadors, the Biſhop of Alba-Julia, and Stephen Paſchai his Chancellor, ſent of purpoſe unto the Emperour, requeſt him to have the firſt Agreements again renewed, and the Principality of Trebnits in Moravia to be added unto the two Dukedoms of Oppel and Ratibor in Sileſia, with fifty thouſand Duckats to be yearly paid unto him out of the Chamber of the Empire; and a general Pardon to be given unto all the Tranſilvanians that following him had of late revolted from the Emperour, and their antient Liberties to be again unto every one of them confirmed. With all which Conditions obtained at the Emperour's hands (as of him that ſaw how needful it was for him by any means to keep that ſtrong Country in his power) the ſame Ambaſſadors with their diſpatch returned from Prague the nineteenth of April.

But Sigiſmund, in the mean time, at home, was entred into new Conceits with certain of the Polonian Nobility, far differing from the former agreement with the Emperour; and having ſent for one of the Turks Chiaus from Conſtantinople, and for his Couſin Andrew Bathor, the proud Cardinal, out of Boruſia, and ſo meeting with them in an obſcure Village in the Confines of Tranſilvania, towards Polonia, accompanied with certain of the chiefeſt of the States of his Country; there, in the Preſence of the Polonians and of the Turkiſh Ambaſſador, reſigned all the Right and Title he had in the Country of Tranſilvania, unto the Cardinal his Couſin; commanding all the States there preſent to ſwear unto him their Obedience and Fidelity; who ſhortly after, together with the Polonian Ambaſſador, ſent one of his eſpecial Favourites to Conſtantinople, to deſire ſafe conduct for his Ambaſſadours to be ſent thither to conclude of all matters with the Turk. Which Meſſengers ſo ſent, together with the Polonian Ambaſſador, were both courteouſly received in the Turks Court, and, as with an eſpecial favour, rewarded with right ſumptuous Garments, and charge given them, That the Cardinal, within three Months next, ſhould ſend thither a ſolemn Ambaſſador, with the old accuſtomed Tribute by the Turk demanded. Thus through the Inconſtancy of the Prince, the Ambition of the proud Cardinal, and the foul Colluſion of the Polonian, the Country of Tranſilvania (one of the ſtrongeſt Fortreſſes of that ſide of Chriſtendom) falling from the Obedience of the Emperour, and ſo in ſort bereft from the Chriſtian Common-weal, became again tributary unto the Turk; moſt good men deteſting the Lightneſs of the one, the Ambition of the other, and the Slineſs of the third.

Sigiſmund yieldeth his Country of Tranſilvania unto the Cardinal Bathor his Couſin.

Now the Turks of Buda, not able longer to endure the great Famine therein, had moſt earneſtly requeſted relief from the other Turks their Friends in Hungary; who on all hands ran to have relieved them: but coming near thereunto, could not put therein ſuch Proviſion as they had brought for the relief of the ſame, being letted ſo to do by the Imperials; who about a League off diligently attended every motion of the Enemy: from whence the Lord Swartzenburg in the night ſecretly approaching one of the Gates with his Followers, thought with a Petard to have broken it open, and ſo to have entered. Which his Device taking not effect, as did that at Rab, the Gate being within ſtrongly fortified by the Enemy, he was inforced to depart, being alſo diſcovered by the Turks from the Wall. Now ſhortly after, the Baſſa of Buda with ſix hundred Horſe, iſſuing out of the City to have met with Victuals that were coming thither, fell into an Ambuſh of the Haiduckes, who after their manner fiercely encountered him, and putting him to flight, took him Priſoner, his Horſe in his Chaſe falling under him, whom his Souldiers ſeeking to reſcue, there began a new Skirmiſh, encreaſing their former Overthrow with the loſs of the greateſt part of them that were left: amongſt whom the Baſſa's Son, with the Aga of the Janizaries there, loſt their Lives alſo. Which Conflict thus ended, the Baſſa was with ſafe Conduct brought to the Camp, and there with great Threats inforced to reveal the ſtate of his City, with other the ſecret deſigns of the Turks. Whereupon, the Haiducks returned again towards Buda, ſeeking by all means to ſtop the coming of Victuals thither, ſo in hope at length to have gained the diſtreſſed City. But whilſt they thus lay upon the Paſſages, behold News was brought unto them, how that the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Sanzacks of Sigeth, Quinque Eccleſiæ, and Coppan, with 10000 Turks, were coming to oppreſs them, and to open the Paſſages by them holden. But they knowing their own Strength, and nothing fearing ſo ſmall a Force, ſtaid not for their coming, but went to meet them; and in a place of good advantage waiting for them, upon their firſt appearance, with great Aſſurance and Courage charged them, brake their Array, and ſlew the greateſt part of them, together with the Baſſa himſelf; yet with ſo much ado, as that had not the Lord Palſi in good time ſent unto their Aid certain Companies of freſh men, it was not without cauſe doubted but that the Haiducks had been put to the worſe, about three hundred of them having there already loſt their Lives. The Tartars yet nevertheleſs, in good number, held on their way towards Buda, with purpoſe to have over-run the Country, and ſo have withdrawn the Imperials from the City: but foraſmuch as that baſe Nation was known to be good for nothing but to rob and ſpoil, the Lord Swartzenburg's Regiment only going againſt them, and encountering them, overthrew them in ſuch ſort, that part of them being there ſlain in fight, and part for fear driven into Danuby, the greater number of them there moſt miſerably periſhed.

The Baſſa of Buda taken Priſoner.

The Turks overthrown, and the Baſſa of Boſna ſlain.

Baſta, the Emperour's Lieutenant in the upper Hungary, at the ſame time lay at Caſſovia, with eighteen thouſand men, doubting leſt the Enemies Army, which he heard to be at hand, ſhould come to beſiege that City. In the mean time, Ibrahim Baſſa, General of the Turks Forces, came to Solnoch with an Army of fifty thouſand ſtrong, among whom were ten thouſand Janizaries: but for all that, underſtanding that Baſta nothing diſmayed awaited his coming at Caſſovia, not thinking it good to go any farther (his Souldiers being already weary with long travel) neither yet ſafe there to ſtay ſo near unto his ſtrong Enemy, retired back again unto Belgrade, a place of more Strength and Security; expecting a great Fleet of Ships, which charged upon the Danubius, were to bring Victuals for the Army, as alſo for the relief of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and other ſuch diſtreſſed Places, with divers great pieces for Battery, and other leſs Artillery upon Carriages, with a number of Ladders and other Inſtruments of War, declaring their purpoſe for the performance of ſome notable Exploit, all guarded with five thouſand Turks, which conducted it up the River. Of all which the Imperials underſtanding, the Lord Palſi diſpatched his Lieutenant with a convenient Power, and the Captain of the Huſſars with his Followers, all good and valiant Souldiers, to cut off this Convoy: who, to make the matter ſhort, ſuddenly aſſailing them, and ſo coming to handy blows, cut in pieces the Convoy, and rifled the ſhips, of whom the greater part were there ſunk in the deep River; and ſo took an exceeding great booty, deemed to be worth a million of Gold: where, among other things of great value, there was found a-board 100000 Dollars, which were all divided amongſt the Souldiers as a reward of their travel. This great overthrow once known at Buda, Alba-Regalis, and the Cities thereabouts, brought upon them a great fear: yea the Army of Ibrahim grew thereby much diſcontented, as being at once diſappointed both of their Victuals and their Pay. Beſides that, the Imperials over-ran all the Country thereabout, ranſacking, ſacking, and deſtroying the Country Villages and Caſtles without Mercy, although the poor Inhabitants offred them large Contribution to have ſtaid their Fury, which would not be accepted. Upon this notable overthrow alſo the Lord Swartzenburg was determined with all his Forces to come again to the ſiege of Buda, in hope in ſo great a diſcomfiture and want of Victuals to have had it delivered unto him; and for that purpoſe ſent for certain great pieces of Artillery to Vienna. But whilſt things went thus well in the lower Hungary, Collonel Rodoler of S. Andrews, in the upper Country, took occaſion alſo, upon this Overthrow of the Turks, with 500 Horſe and 600 Foot, to ſhew himſelf with this ſmall Company before Agria, having yet left the greateſt part of his Forces a little off in ſecret Ambuſh; which ſmall Company the Baſſa of Agria beholding, preſently put himſelf in Arms, and ſo ſallying out, began an hot and brave Skirmiſh; when ſuddenly the other Souldiers left in Ambuſh, ſtarting out, and courageouſly aſſailing their Enemies, brake their order, and put them to flight, purſuing them at the heels even to the Gates of the City: and had there been a greater force of Foot-men, it was verily thought, that the Turks (diſmay'd with the flight, and altogether confounded) had abandoned the defence of the Place, and the Chriſtians even then become Maſters of the City, which had been the cauſe of their notable Overthrow in the Year 1596. Nevertheleſs, they, with great bravery and ſmall loſs retired, having ſlain a great number of the Turks, and carrying away with them an hundred Priſoners, with a Booty of five hundred Horſe, and much other Cattel.

The free Haiducks alſo, ſtrengthened with new Supplies, had done great harm in the Country about Buda, ſcouring freely all over it, finding none to oppoſe themſelves againſt them: for which cauſe, the poor Chriſtians, which yet dwelt in that Country, riſe up againſt the Turks, promiſing their Obedience unto the Emperour: and moreover, to the intent they might be no more moleſted by the Imperials, offered to take up Arms themſelves againſt the Enemy, and to the uttermoſt of their Power to hinder his Paſſage both by Land and Water. Theſe ſame Haiducks alſo had broken down all the Bridges which the Turks had made betwixt Buda and Alba-Regalis, to the end they ſhould not that way commodiouſly bring either Victuals or Munition from the one place to the other: and the Lord Palſi and Nadaſti underſtanding, by their Eſpials, That the Tartars, divided into three Companies, had over-run a great part of the Country, and with a great Booty were retiring towards Buda, preſently went out againſt them, and inforced them to fight: which barbarous People, better inured to filch than to fight, there loſt all their Lives, together with that they had before ſtoln. After which Victory, theſe valiant men turning their Forces againſt certain other places of the Turks there by, took two of their Caſtles with much rich Spoil; which Caſtles they ſacked and burnt, together with the great Town of Zolna, breaking down alſo the Bridge upon the River Trava.

The Turks, for fear, forſake the City at Buda, and fly into the Caſtle.

Now at this time the Turks at Buda held themſelves male-content within the City, having no Governour, their Baſſa being before taken by the Haiducks, and they themſelves pinched alſo with great want of Victuals: wherefore, doubting ſome ſudden Attempt of the Chriſtians, as men diſmayed, they for their more ſafety retired themſelves into the Caſtle, a place of great ſtrength, leaving the City unto the Imperials then ready to have beſieged it: but doubting of the Turks great Army which, as they heard, was marching thitherwards, the avantgard thereof being come to Moatcſh, where Sartes Baſſa was alſo looked for; the Report being given out, that the Turks having relieved Buda, would go to beſiege Caniſia or elſe Strigonium, they ſtayed to go any farther, as men in doubt what to reſolve upon. So were ſent certain Collonels and other Captains with their Souldiers, to fortifie certain Paſſages whereby the Turks Army was to paſs: the reſt in the mean time retiring, for that the puiſſant Enemy began now to approach; as alſo for that they knew the great deſire that Ibrahim Baſſa had to recover again Strigonium, and had therefore ſent a great number of Tartars to forrage and waſte the Country, and ſo ſuddenly having relieved Buda and Agria, there to reſolve whither to turn his Forces. The Imperials in the mean time incamping near unto Hatwan and Zolnoc, to hinder the Turks from victualling of Buda, as they deſired, cut off five hundred of them at their firſt Arrival, who to that purpoſe were going towards Buda; and took alſo one of the Turks Chiaus Priſoner; who, ſent from Ibrahim the General, was going to Agria to put them in hope of their ſpeedy Relief. They alſo at the ſame time attempted to have ſurpriſed Zolnoc; where, a good number of them, with certain Petards, approaching the Gates, in hope ſo to have broken them open, being diſcovered by the Watch, were inforced to retire, leaving forty behind them ſlain, and carrying away with them many more of their Fellows wounded: in revenge whereof, the reſt ſhewed their fury upon the Country thereabout, deſtroying the Villages, and intercepting a great deal of Munition, which, together with other Victuals, they met by the way as it was going to Buda and Agria.

The Chriſtians, upon the approach of the Turks great Army, retire.

Summer now almoſt ſpent, Ibrahim, the great Baſſa, in the beginning of September, came to Buda with an Army of an hundred and thirty thouſand ſtrong, and from thence, in the Name of his Lord and Maſter, gave the Emperour to underſtand at Prague, That for the ſaving of further effuſion of innocent Blood, and not for any fear or diſtruſt of his own Strength and Power, he could be content to hearken unto ſome reaſonable Conditions or Treaty of Peace. Whereunto, both theſe great Princes (having well wearied themſelves with theſe long Wars, and exhauſted their Treaſures) ſeemed not now unwilling, expecting (as was thought) nothing more than for the Honour to be the firſt entreated; and the rather, for that the old Sultaneſs, Mahomet's Mother (who by the weakneſs of her Sons Government, ſuch as never was in any the Othoman Kings or Emperours before, did bear the greateſt Sway in his Affairs) did what ſhe might to further the ſame. Wherefore, in the latter end of September a place was agreed upon for a Parle for Peace, which was in an Iſland in the River of Danuby beneath Strigonium: whither the Lord Swartzenburg, Nadaſti, Palſi, and the Biſhop of Vacia, being come for the Emperour; and Amurath the

A Parle for Peace.

Baſſa of Buda, with the Lieutenant-General of the Tartars, and ſome others, for the Grand Seignior; The Turks at the firſt, after their unreaſonable manner, demanded to have Rab, Strigonium, Filek, Setchin, and all the reſt of the Towns and Caſtles in five Years before taken from them by the Chriſtians, to be now again ſurrendred unto them, with a certain yearly Tribute by the Emperour to be paid unto the Great Sultan at Conſtantinople; as alſo there to have his Ambaſſador lieger continually attending upon the Turks Court: for which they offered to deliver again unto the Emperour the City of Agria only. All which their proud and unreaſonable Demands being by the aforeſaid Commiſſioners on the Emperour's behalf rejected, they were contented to come to ſome more reaſonable talk, offering to leave unto the Emperour Rab and Agria (whereof Rab was his own already) only for Strigonium, exchanging as it were Strigonium for Agria. Which when it could neither be obtained, the Parle was ſo broken off, and nothing concluded, and ſo the Wars again continued, without any memorable thing more this Year betwixt them done, either on the one ſide or on the other; the Chriſtians contenting themſelves to have diſtreſſed the chief Cities the Turks held in Hungary; and the Turks no leſs apayed to have relieved the ſame.

Michael the Vayvod with a great Army entreth into Tranſilvania.

But whilſt things thus paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks in Hungary, Michael the Vayvod of Valachia, yet the Emperour's Friend and Confederate, and under his Protection, certainly informed his Life to be ſought after in the Turks Court, by the ambitious Cardinal Bathor, his envious Neighbour, but lately become the Prince of Tranſilvania (as is before declared:) by Commandment from the Emperour, and to be revenged of ſo great a wrong, as alſo betimes to provide for his own Safety, with an Army of threeſcore thouſand ſtrong ſuddenly entred into Tranſilvania, in moſt horrible manner burning the Country, and killing the People before him as he went. Where, whilſt the Cardinal (who was thought to have purpoſed to have ſerved him in like ſort, had he not been by him prevented) was making Head againſt him, he in the mean time had the City of Corona (commonly called Braſſo) with the ſtrong Caſtle of Fogaras, yielded unto him: from whence he marching toward Alba-Julia, the 26*th* of October, with all his Army, before divided into three parts, but now again united, came into the Plains near Temiſon, about three Leagues from Hermenſtat; where, underſtanding that his Lieutenant, corrupted by Ibrahim Baſſa, had promiſed to kill him; and now well aſſured thereof, to rid himſelf of that danger, with his own hands preſently cut his Throat, and ſo diſpatched him. When by and by after came unto him the Pope's Nuntio, ſent by a fineneſs from the Cardinal, accompanied with another Ambaſſador, the better to countenance out the matter; telling him, That the ſame Ambaſſador had Commiſſion from the Emperour to will him forthwith to deſiſt from Arms, and without farther delay to depart out of Tranſilvania. Which thing ſeeming unto the Vayvod very ſtrange, and almoſt impoſſible, de deſired to ſee the ſaid Commiſſion. Whereunto the Nuntio, before inſtructed, anſwered, That he had left it with the Cardinal. But I (ſaid the Vayvod) have one here preſent from the Emperour of another purport, which I purpoſe fully to put in execution; yet was he for that day intreated by the Nuntio to ſtay his Army. And ſo in the mean time lying both ſtill and in great ſuſpence, the Vayvod deſired to know of the Nuntio, the cauſe why the Cardinal, forgetting himſelf, ſo troubled that Country, by intruding himſelf thereinto, to the great prejudice of them unto whom it of better Right belonged, not attending unto the Government of the Church, better beſeeming his Calling than the managing of Arms, to the diſturbance of the Chriſtian Peace. Whereunto he received no Anſwer. So the 28*th* of October, a day dedicated to the Commemoration of the Apoſtles Simon and Jude, theſe Meſſengers were ſent back again unto the Cardinal, who preſently returned them back unto the Vayvod with new Inſtructions, (being then buſie with his young Son, in ſetting his men in order of Battel preſently to go againſt the Cardinal) of whom they could get no other Anſwer, but that he was reſolved forthwith to come unto the Tryal of a Battel with him. So the two Armies lying incamped not paſt a quarter of a League the one from the other, and the ſame day meeting together, joyned a moſt terrible and cruel Battel, which for the ſpace of five hours was with ſuch deſperate Obſtinacy fought, as if they had every man vowed to have carried away the Victory over his Enemy, or there to have left themſelves dead upon the ground; until the Cardinal's People, at length overcome in a long and bloody Fight, were there utterly overthrown; amongſt whom were 30000 Turks and Tartars, ſent unto him from Ibrahim Baſſa the Turks General. The Cardinal himſelf, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his Army, was by ſome reported to have ſaved himſelf by flight; but by ſome others was ſaid to have been drowned in paſſing a River, as he fled from the Valachians that had him in chace. But the Truth was, That the Vayvod, now Maſter of the Field, ſent out certain Troops of Horſemen divers ways ſtill to purſue him; and himſelf, with the reſt of his Army, proſecuting the Victory, came to the Cardinals Camp, now by the Tranſilvanians and Turks quite forſaken, wherein he found forty five pieces of Artillery, with great ſtore of Coin and Wealth, beſide a number of Tents and Horſes, all which became unto him a Prey. From thence he marched unto Alba-Julia, where he was with great Joy received of his Friends and Confederates there: for, though the greater part of the Tranſilvanians, eſpecially the Nobility, had, together with the Cardinal, ſubmitted themſelves unto the Turks Protection, and followed his Enſigns; yet were there divers others alſo, who ſtill favoured the Emperour, and therefore rejoyced not a little of this Victory. The Vayvod after that ſent his Lieutenant to Claudiopolis, to ſee if they would yield alſo; which they willingly did, with many other Cities and Caſtles in divers parts of that Country, which having none to reſt upon, now yielded alſo; in ſuch ſort, that ſhortly after all Tranſilvania ſubmitted it ſelf again unto the Emperour's Obeiſance, and ſwore unto him Obedience; moſt of the Nobility of that Country being either ſlain in the Battel, or afterwards put to death by the Vayvod: amongſt whom were five, which, corrupted by the Cardinal, had before undertaken to kill him. Now the fourteenth of November, after divers Reports of the Cardinal's Eſcape, his ungracious Head was for all that preſented to the Vayvod: which, to the terror of others, being for a while ſet up in Alba-Julia, (where he but a little before had commanded as a Prince) was afterwards taken down, and ſent for a Preſent from the Vayvod unto the Emperour and the Arch-dukes his Brethren; his headleſs Body being afterward, by the Commandment of the Vayvod, honourably buried in a Monaſtery at Alba-Julia, in the ſame Tomb he had before made for his Brother, beheaded by his Couſin Sigiſmund Bathor. The Cardinal's Treaſure alſo fell into his hands, which was ſaid to have been three millions of Gold. Thus the Country of Tranſilvania, lately before by the Cardinal yielded unto the the Obeiſance of the Turk, was again by this worthy Vayvod recovered and reſtored unto the Chriſtian Empire; the proud Cardinal caſt out and brought to Confuſion, having not yet poſſeſſed theſe his new Honours full eight Months. His Couſin Sigiſmund, the late Tranſilvanian Prince, who almoſt all this while had ſtaied at Boruſia, and in diſguiſed Apparel ſeen Danske, and divers other the free Cities thereabouts; Now hearing News of the Cardinals overthrow, ſecretly got him away from thence into Polonia, to ſeek again his new Fortunes. The Lord Swartzenburg at the ſame time uniting his Forces in the lower Hungary with them of Stiria, and now twenty thouſand ſtrong, ſought by all means to reduce ſo many places upon thoſe Frontiers as he could, unto the Emperours Obeiſance, and ſo took in above 200 Villages; but afterward, thinking to have ſurpriſed the ſtrong Caſtle of Capiſuar, and by Night ſecretly approaching one of the Gates with a Petard, which took not the expected effect, he was diſcovered by the Watch, and ſo by the Garriſon Souldiers (now raiſed with the alarum) repulſed, and enforced to retire with the loſs of about an hundred men, and divers others wounded, all men of good account; in revenge whereof, Swartzenburg afterwards ſent out divers Troops of Horſemen, which ſcouring all over the Country as far as Sigeth, burned it alſo, and ſo returning, carried away with them a great Booty.

Ibrahim Baſſa, hearing of this overthrow of the Cardinal, with all the Forces he had ſent him, much troubled therewith, ſent News thereof in poſt to Conſtantinople; the brute whereof brought a general fear upon the whole City alſo, inſomuch that Commiſſion was forthwith ſent unto him from the great Sultan, giving him Power (if it might be) to come to ſome honourable Peace with the Emperour, and to bring it with him to Conſtantinople; whither he was ſhortly to return, being now no longer time to keep the field with his Army, which, beſide the cold ſeaſon of the year, ſuffered great want of Bread, the Plague alſo then raging therein; with the death of many of his beſt Souldiers, both Horſe and Foot, beſide the wonderful Mortality of their Cattel alſo; in ſuch ſort that the Souldiers, not able longer to endure, the famine and wants increaſing, fell to robbing of one another, and ſo at length into mutiny; wherein, divers of them being ſlain and cut in pieces by their Fellows, the reſt for the moſt part brake in ſunder of themſelves, and ſo by divers ways returned home, not well truſting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the preparation of the Turks, their Army being diſcomfited with wants and the evil Succeſs of their Affairs, as well in Hungary as in Tranſilvania. Neither did Ibrahim the great Baſſa, for the relief of thoſe Evils, at his return bring any concluſion of Peace unto his great Lord and Maſter, as was commonly expected.

The Turks great Army of it ſelf diſſolved.

Cuſahin Baſſa of Caramania riſeth up in Rebellion againſt the great Sultan.

Now beſide theſe Troubles of Tranſilvania, and the other revolted Countries, Cuſahin (or as ſome call him Caſſan) the Son of one of the Sultaneſſes, brought up in the Seraglio according to the manner thereof, and having long ſerved in the Wars of Perſia and Hungary, and ſo at length made Baſſa of Caramania, a man of great Spirit, and not able to indure the Imperfections he daily ſaw in the Othoman Empire, and the Cowardiſe of the grand Seignior; upon the report of the evil Succeſs of the Affairs of Hungary on the one ſide, and the deſire he ſaw in the Perſians to recover their loſt Fortreſſes, on the other, and grieved alſo with more particular wrongs concerning himſelf; as a man altogether diſcontented, reſolved to take up Armes; and calling unto him his Souldiers, and (as he was a well ſpoken man) laying before them the deformities of the preſent ſtate, gallantly perſuaded them, with the promiſe of Honour, Soveraignty, and rich Rewards, what an eaſie thing it were to chaſe the grand Seignior out of Aſia, and to ſet themſelves with all that part of the Empire at Liberty. And ſo even at the firſt having won unto him 3000 Harquebuſers and 5000 Horſemen, took the field, to the great hurt of the Turks, and trouble of the State. A ſtrange matter in that tyrannical Empire. The News whereof comming in poſt to the Court, Commiſſion was forthwith directed unto four of the Sanzacks of Aſia, neareſt unto him, for the ſpeedy ſuppreſſing of that Rebellion, but even then ariſing. Whereof Cuſahin underſtanding, and that they with ten thouſand Horſe and Foot were coming to ſuppreſs him; without further ſtay, went couragiouſly to meet them, and ſo encountering of them, overthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and took from them their Baggage with ſix pieces of Ordnance. And after with his People ſeiſed upon all the Caſtles thereabouts, giving whatſoever he found therein for a Prey unto his Souldiers; who alſo much enriched themſelves with the ſpoil of the Jews, as the People whom they moſt hated, and never reſted until he had made almoſt all the Country of Caramania his own. After that, he laid ſiege to Cogna, a City in the Confines of Natolia, which was forthwith yielded unto him. And yet not ſo contented, gave it out by open Proclamation, that for the reformation of the diſordered ſtate, he would e're long go to beſiege the Imperial City of Conſtantinople; and that therefore all ſuch as would follow him ſhould of him be entreated as his Friends and Companions, threatning unto the reſt moſt cruel Death and Deſtruction. Of which his Proceeding Mahomet (as then diſporting himſelf in his Gardens of Pleaſure in the Country all along the ſide of Propontis) underſtanding, and fearing to be there ſurpriſed, or that ſome ſudden Innovation might be raiſed in the City, haſted with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople, and from thence in all haſte diſpatched Mehemet, one of the Viſier Baſſaes, the Son of Sinan, with all the Forces he could make to go againſt him. Who paſſing over into Aſia with a great Power, and yet fearing to come to the trial of a Battel with him, whom he knew to be a man of himſelf deſperately ſet, and not a little favoured alſo even of his own Souldiers; ſo ſecretly wrought by large Promiſes, that Cuſahin's Footmen were even upon the point to have forſaken him. Which he quickly perceiving, fled forthwith through Siria into the Country of Arabia with his Horſemen, and the Horſemen of Simon the Georgian; purpoſing the next Spring by the help of the Arabians and Perſians, to appear in the field with greater Forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Baſſa following, came with his Army to Aleppo, there to winter, and to expect the return of the Rebel together with the Spring. This ſo dangerous a Rebellion, with the Troubles of Tranſilvania and Valachia, were the cauſe that the grand Seignior, ſeeing himſelf in ſo many places forſaken of his Subjects, was the readier to incline unto peace with the Emperour; whereunto for all that, the Emperour was not haſty to hearken, but upon honourable Conditions; as knowing that the Turk required the ſame not for any deſire he had to live at quiet, but for that his troubled affairs both at home and elſewhere abroad ſo required; his Janizaries and other men of War in this his ſo weak Government, being grown ſo inſolent, as that they were hardly to be by him commanded; openly threatning in their diſcontented humours, not only the depoſing of the principal Officers about him, but of himſelf alſo, and of the baniſhment of the Sultaneſs his Mother; ſaying, That ſhe had bewitched him, to the end ſhe might her ſelf rule, which ſhe indeed did in all his greateſt Affairs. But the Rebel Cuſabin, the next Year grown again very ſtrong, was now come into the Field, and even ready to have given the Baſſa Battel: who, as he was a Man of great Wiſdom and Experience, well conſidering with what a deſperate Enemy he had to do, thought it beſt again to prove if his rebellious Followers might by fair means be drawn from him; and ſo coming near unto him, by open Proclamation promiſed a free and general Pardon to all ſuch as had followed the Rebel in thoſe Wars, if forſaking him, they ſhould forthwith return home to their Dwellings, and ſo to the Obedience of their juſt and lawful Prince and Sovereign. Which general Pardon ſo proclaimed, was the Ruine of Cuſabin; for that the greateſt part of his Followers, now enriched with the great Booties they had gotten, and now alſo having free Pardon offered them, returned home into their own Countries, there at eaſe to live of their evil gotten Goods, leaving their Captain, with ſome few others which ſtaid with him, with little hope to be ſaved. So that within a few days after, Cuſabin, thus forſaken of his Followers, was himſelf taken and brought to Conſtantinople, where ſhortly after he was with moſt exquiſite Torments tortured to death.

The Emperour maketh Proviſion againſt the Turks.

The Troubles of this Year thus paſt, Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour with the beginning of the next (whilſt the ground yet covered with Snow, and the unſeaſonableneſs of the Weather would not ſuffer the Souldiers to keep the Field) cauſed a Diet of the Princes of the Empire to be called, to conſider with him of ſuch helps as were by them to be given againſt the next Spring, for the maintenance of the Wars which yet he had againſt the Turk; who all promiſed to ſend their Souldiers, with their Pay, and ſuch farther Contribution as might ſerve for the maintenance of that defenſive War againſt the common Enemy: whereunto alſo, Clement, now Biſhop of Rome (this year of Jubile) put to his helping hand, as he had divers times before, by ſending thither ſuch aid both of Men and Money as he had before promiſed: ſo that by this means great Preparation was made by the Chriſtians for the taking of the Field with the firſt of the Spring. At which time the Turks alſo began to ſtir; who, altho Ibrahim Baſſa their General, by the appointment of his great Lord, was then in ſome Speech with the Emperour about a Peace, yet ceaſed not they in the mean time that this Treaty was from day to day prolonged, with their Companies ſcattering here and there, to do what harm they could upon the Frontiers of the Emperour's Territories, the cauſe why he with more ſpeed called upon his Friends for their promiſed Aid. And for the better managing of this years Wars againſt the Turk, he appointed Duke Mercury (who had drawn a great number of French-men, both Horſe and Foot, out of France) General of all his Forces, ſending Ferant Gonzaga, ſirnamed the Lame, (whom, for his approved Valour and Experience in martial Affairs, he had ſent for to Mantua) Governour into the upper Hungary. So the Souldiers, now day by day, by Companies reſorting from divers parts into Auſtria, were from thence ſent unto ſuch places as were by the Turks moſt moleſted, ſo to repreſs their often Incurſions, as in many places they did. For eight thouſand of the Turks going out upon the ſudden to have ſurpriſed Pappa, were by the Garriſon Souldiers of that place encountred and overthrown. And on the other ſide, whilſt Ferdinand the Archduke was aſſembling his People in Croatia, for the defence of that Country againſt the Incurſions of the Enemy, ſix thouſand Turks, without reſiſtance, entring the ſame as far as Buccari, and burning the Country Villages as they went, had taken many Priſoners with a great Booty of Cattel; and ſo (merry and out of fear) being about to have returned, were ſuddenly ſet upon by the County Serinus, in certain ſtrait and troubleſome Paſſages, where they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, and overcharged alſo with their Prey, were (I ſay) eaſily by him for the moſt part overthrown, and the reſt put to flight, and ſo the Priſoners, with all the reſt of the Booty, again recovered. At which time alſo one of the Imperial Collonels, with fifteen hundred Horſe, making an Inroad into the Country about Alba-Regalis, and meeting with the Turks and Tartars thereabouts, ſlew ſix hundred of them, and took divers of their Captains Priſoners. Six thouſand other Tartars alſo at this time returning out of Hungary home towards their own Country, were by the Coſſacks, near unto the black Sea, ſet upon with ſuch force, that many of them being ſlain, the reſt for fear ran into the Sea, leaving all the Prey they had got in Hungary unto their Enemies. In the heat of theſe Broils, the noble Lord Palſi, Governour of Strigonium, a Man that all his Life long had done great Service for his Prince and Country, and whom we have ſo often in this Hiſtory remembred, died the three and twentieth of March in his Caſtle at Biberſpurg, to the great Grief of many, eſpecially the Hungarians his Country-men. And for that Strigonium (ſo near unto the Enemy) required in his ſtead to have a right valiant and courageous Governour, the Emperour appointed the Lord Swartzenburg to that Charge; the Fame ſtill running, that Ibrahim Baſſa would come thither with the great Army he was in providing, if the Peace went not forward; which was now ſtill leſs and leſs hoped for, by reaſon of his proud and inſolent Demands.

The Death of the Lord Palſi.

The French-men and Wallons mutiny in Pappa.

But whilſt theſe Troubles, with ſuch others, too long to rehearſe, thus paſſed in divers parts of this miſerable Country of Hungary, 1200 French-men and Wallons in Garriſon at Pappa (a ſtrong frontier Town of the Emperour's in the lower Hungary) for want of Pay began to mutiny: for which cauſe, it was thought good to the chief Commanders, to have them thence removed, and others placed in their room. Which they perceiving, and withal knowing themſelves too ſtrong for the reſt of the Garriſon, all Hungarians and Almains, not Partakers of their Conſpiracy; they firſt reſolved to thruſt their own Captains out of the Town, as lets unto their deſires: and then laying hands upon Michael Marotti the Pay-maſter, and other the Hungarian and Dutch Commanders, with their Souldiers, took from them their Weapons, and caſt the ſaid Marotti with the other Captains, and ſome of the better ſort of their Souldiers, into Irons, exacting of the reſt, as well Hungarians as Dutch, in number about 1000 Perſons, 1000 Duckats; threatning otherwiſe to deliver them into the hands of the Turks: and albeit that Marotti offered for his Liberty eighteen hundred Duckats, yet would they not be ſo contented, but ſpoiling both him and the reſt of all they had, with their Apparel and Weapons furniſhed ſuch Turks as were there Priſoners, and ſo ſent them away to Alba-Regalis: and afterwards, rifling every man's Houſe as if they had been Enemies, took from them whatſoever pleaſed themſelves: and that which worſe was, to increaſe theſe Outrages, compacted with the Turks of Alba-Regalis and Buda, for the Pay which they ſaid the Emperour owed them, to deliver them the Town; certifying them withal, how that the Lord Swartzenburg within two days was coming with Money to give them Contentment; promiſing, if he came into the Town, to deliver him with the ſame into their hands: or, to be the more ſure of him, they might, if they ſo pleaſed, intercept him him at the Paſſage Zeſnegkh, whereby he muſt needs come. For the more credit of which their wicked purpoſe, they ſent an Enſign of the Emperours, as a token unto the Turks at Alba-Regalis; who for all that, altogether believed them not, yet willing further to try them, ſent them for Hoſtages, two Chiaus; from whence the Rebels ſent alſo two others of the better ſort of them to Alba-Regalis; with Concluſion, that the five and twentieth of June at the furtheſt, the Money ſhould be paid, and the Town delivered. For the receiving whereof, and for fear of ſome hidden Treaſon, the Turks and Tartars began to make themſelves ſtrong; the Imperials alſo doing what they might for the appeaſing of ſo dangerous a Tumult. So the tenth of June, the Lord Swartzenburg, with two thouſand Horſe and Foot, came within two miles of the Town, and from thence ſent twenty four Horſemen to diſſwade the Rebels from yielding the Town unto the Turks, and to tell them that they ſhould ſhortly receive their pay; who ſhamefully deriding them, ſent them back again as wiſe as they came; ſo that Swartzenburg, perceiving himſelf with ſo ſmall forces to be able to do nothing againſt them, neither yet by fair means to perſwade them, retired again to Rab, until ſome greater ſtrength were come unto him. Immediately after, Doctor Petzen, Counſellor for the Wars, a man of great Authority, Gravity, and Wiſdom, was by Matthias the Arch-duke, with four hundred Horſe, conducted to Pappa, to ſee if he by his Diſcretion could have diſſwaded them from their ſo ungodly a purpoſe, for the yielding of the Town unto the Enemy; whom they not only refuſed to hear, although he ſpake unto them moſt kindly, but alſo bent their Muskets and Harquebuſſes upon him, threatning to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When ſhortly after, twenty of the Hungarians, impriſoned in a Cellar in the Town, brake out, and comming to Rab, brought News thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in Pappa, were at variance amongſt themſelves about the yielding up of the Town unto the Turks, (ſome better minded than the reſt, not willing to conſent thereunto) inſomuch, that they in the Caſtle ſhot at them in the Town, and they again at them in the Caſtle; and that they had already received from the Turks twenty thouſand Duckats, with ſome proviſion of Victuals, and were ſhortly after to receive from them the reſt of the Money promiſed them, and ſo to deliver the Town. For preventing whereof, the Lord Swartzenburg, the two and twentieth of June, ſent the Lord Sharpfenſtein with a French Collonel, 3000 Souldiers, certain Petards, and a number of ſcaling Ladders towards Pappa: whom the falſe Rebels ſuffered peaceably to enter the Town the four and twentieth of June, ſtill encouraging them to come on, calling them their Country-men and Brethren, and in token of Friendſhip ſhaking them by the hands, telling them, that having aſſurance of their Pay, they deſired no more. But having now received in ſo many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were well able to deal with, ſhutting the reſt out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards in deriſion called upon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of theſe Rebels at the ſame time had layd themſelves in ambuſh by a Mill faſt without the Town, who, by the Wallons and Haiducks without diſcovered, were alſo by them charged; upon whom for all that, by reaſon of the ſhot out of the Town, they could do no good; but having loſt three hundred men, and amongſt them Hannibal Kraks, the Lord Sharpfenſtein's Lieutenant General, and one Dell la Margoſe the chief Engineer, they retired; which loſs the deſperate Rebels (if it had been in their choice) had wiſhed rather to have happened unto the Dutches than to the Wallons or Hungarians. About three days after, three of theſe Rebels being by chance taken Priſoners by the Imperials, and brought to Rab, were not only apparelled, but alſo trimmed after the Turkiſh faſhion, as men not deſiring longer to be accounted Chriſtians, the reſt of their Fellows in the Town alſo imitating the Turks faſhions, as well in their Apparel as in their manner of Service; yet for all that, would not theſe metamorphoſed Monſters yield the Town unto the Turks, before they had the full ſum by them agreed upon; the Baſſa of Boſna being commanded from the Grand Seignior in all haſte to provide it for them, and ſo to receive of them the Town. Nevertheleſs, for their more ſtrength and more credit with the Turks, they received into the Town one Enſign of the Turks, with certain Wagons of Victuals, brought thither with ſo ſtrong a Convoy as that the Imperials durſt not meddle therewith; in which Wagons (being diſcharged) they ſent in Bonds ſix hundred Hungarians and Dutch, Men, Women, and Children, Priſoners to Alba-Regalis; being all of them glad to be ſo ſent away, in hope to find more Favour and Courteſie at the hands of their Enemies than they had found with theſe renegate Chriſtians. So ſhortly after, theſe Rebels ſent out certain Meſſengers unto the Governour of Alba-Regalis, to know his full Reſolution; which Meſſengers (conducted by certain Turks of great account) were upon the way by the free Haiducks all intercepted, and the Meſſengers taken, with an hundred Turks more. In the mean while, Michael Marotti, before impriſoned by the Rebels in Pappa, by Letters ſecretly advertiſed the Lord Swartzenburg of a certain place, whereby he might (as he ſaid) eaſily enter the Town, and the rather, for that the Rebels were at variance amongſt themſelves. Who thereupon, the twelfth of July, came to Pappa with nine thouſand Horſe and Foot; but diſappointed of his purpoſe for entering the Town, hardly nevertheleſs belayed the ſame; upon whom the Mutineers many times deſperately ſallied out, and right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were ſtill, without any notable loſs, by their Enemies (too ſtrong for them) beaten back again into the Town. In one of which ſallies it fortuned one of their Captains to be taken, who, to the terror of the reſt, was preſently ſlain quick, and his Head and Skin upon a Pike ſet up before the Town, for his Fellows to behold. But the Lord Swartzenburg, ſtill more and more prevailing upon them, they ſent ſecretly for Aid to the Turks; whereof he for all that getting Intelligence, ſent alſo for three Regiments of Souldiers more to come unto him to the Siege; by whoſe comming he well ſtrengthned, and bringing his approches nearer the Town, took from the Rebels the Mill, a ſtrength which they very unwillingly loſt, as in hope thereby to have the more eaſily received Aid from the Turks, who having made preparation to have relieved them, were letted ſo to do by the riſing of the Water, which had ſpoiled all the Proviſion for their relief at the Bridge of Eſſeg, as alſo hindered them for marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their Trenches even to the Town Ditches, out of which they had let out all the Water; where, ſome of the Townſmen eſcaping out of the Town, declared, how that the mutinous Souldiers within laboured both day and night to fortifie the Town, but to be in their work much letted by the continual aſſaults of the Imperials; as alſo, that they now had neither Bread nor Wine, nor other Victuals left, more than a little Salt, and threeſcore Horſe, of which they had already begun to eat; and that although they were not altogether ſo valiant, yet that they had reſolved to die by the Hands of the Souldiers, as men expecting no other Mercy. Yet ſhortly after, viz. the nine and twentieth of July, they deſperately fell out upon the Trenches of Maſpurgiſch, a Dutch Captain; of whoſe Souldiers they ſlew many, being drunk, and driving the reſt out of their Trenches, raiſed a great Alarm. Which the Lord Swartzenburg hearing, haſted thither to the Reſcue; where, with an unlucky Muſquet-ſhot he was ſtruck in the Head and ſlain: whereof the Rebels got knowledge the ſame evening; and Del la Mota their General, in reward of that Service gave unto them that had made that Sally a thouſand Dollars to be divided among them. The dead Body of that ſo worthy a man, as had done great Service for the Chriſtian Commonweal, was afterwards with great Solemnity brought to Rab, and there honourably interred. The like deſperate Sally they made again the next day, and ſlew of the Imperials an hundred and thirty, and took certain Priſoners: and in retiring back again into the Town, cried aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yield the Town, they would eat Chriſtians, whereof Marotti ſhould be the firſt.

The Lord Swartzenburg ſlain.

The Lord Swartzenburg thus ſlain, the Government of the Army was by Matthias the Arch-duke committed to the Lord Redern, a Noble man, both valiant and learned; who, although he were very ſickly, came unto the Camp before Pappa the eighth of Auguſt; where, underſtanding that the Rebels, now brought unto Extremity, had a purpoſe by night to fly away and ſo be gone, he cauſed a more vigilant and ſtrong Watch to be kept, when lo, according to his Expectation, the next night after, about two hours before day they began to iſſue out; whereof the Watch giving knowledge to the General, they were indeed ſuffered to go out as unperceived, but preſently after at their heels were ſent out the Lord Nadaſti and the Earl of Thurn, with 200 Huſſars, and after them the chief Collonel and County Solms, with part of their Horſe-men alſo, who in three divers places overtaking them near unto a great Wood called Packem, ſlew moſt part of them; Della Mota, their chief Captain or Ring-leader, being ſlain by the chief Collonel, becauſe he would not yield, and his Head afterwards by him preſented unto the General in the Camp; 200 Wallons, the Huſſars under the leading of the Lord Nadaſti, County Solmes, and County Thurn, found out in the Wood; who albeit that they for a ſpace made great reſiſtance, yet in the end were inforced to yield, and ſo with their two Enſigns were brought into the Camp. The Huſſars alſo, upon another Paſſage light upon other 200 more of theſe rebellious Wallons, who, becauſe they ſtood ſtrongly upon their Guard, and were more deſperately ſet than the reſt, the General ſent out other 200 of the Collonels Horſe-men upon them, by whom, and the Huſſars, they were almoſt all ſlain: divers others of them alſo were ſlain in coming out of the Town, and in the Mariſhes thereabouts. Their General's Lieutenant, with ſuch other of their principal Commanders as were taken, were by the Lord Rederns Commandment delivered unto the Provoſt Martial; the reſt of the rebellious Traitors he, at the requeſt of the Army, there, to the terror of others, to be executed, from whom the Souldiers could hardly be perſuaded even for the preſent to hold their hands. But afterwards having brought them to Rab, and leave given them to do with them their Pleaſure, they as far exceeded in the cruel manner of their Execution, as had they before in their outragious Dealings, eſpecially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithſtanding moſt of them were of the Wallon Countries. Some of them they impailed, ſome they brake upon the Wheel; ſome of their Skins they cut off their Bodies as it were into Thongs, and ſo poured into the Wounds Vinegar, Salt, and Pepper; from ſome others they cut off their Privities, ſome they roſted, and ſome they put into the Tenalia; upon ſome they dropped molten Pitch, and then caſting Gun-powder upon them, ſo burnt them to death; otherſome they hanged upon iron Hooks, and ſome they put in the ground up to the Chin, and for their diſport, with iron Bullets bowled at their Heads: in all which Torments, no ſign of Compaſſion was to be ſeen, the Tormentors, to make their Pain the greater, doing nothing but deride them; the miſerable Wretches, in the mean time, confeſſing the heinouſneſs of their Offence, and craving for Death as a Favour. A moſt horrible thing it was to ſee, how whilſt ſome were thus tortured, others were brought to ſee the ſame miſery they themſelves were by and by to endure. Amongſt the reſt of theſe exquiſite Torments, one Peter Orſy cauſed one of the Mutineers to be ſewed up in the Belly of a Mare, with his Head hanging out, and ſo to be roſted; in which miſerable Torment, he lived three hours, and then died: after which, he cauſed the loathſome Body ſo roſted, to be given to them that lay ſtarving upon the Wheel, to eat. Thus was the dangerous Mutiny at Pappa, with much ado ended, and that ſtrong Town, like to have been loſt, preſerved: the Rebels themſelves being become a dreadful example to all Poſterity, for all them to look upon that ſhall attempt the like Villany.

Pappa abandoned by the Mutineers.

Now at this ſame time alſo, though neither the Chriſtians nor the Turks had as then any great Army in the Field, yet many an hot and bloody Skirmiſh paſſed daily betwixt them in one place or other of Hungary; all which to recount, as it would be much tedious, ſo in ſilence to paſs them all over, were greatly to wrong thoſe worthy Perſonages by whom they were not, without their great Adventure, done. Amongſt the reſt, one Nicholas Horbath, County Serinus's Lieutenant, with 150 Souldiers, and Andrew Thuſſi, another great Commander, going forth to ſeek for Booty; Thuſſi hearing that the Turks were abroad for the ſurpriſing of certain Haiducks then gone out, ſtaid faſt in a ſecret place until he might hear farther News, Horbath another way ſtill going on. Now it happened, that the Baſſa of Sigeth having been abroad, in returning home, by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him overthrew him, and ſlew moſt of his men, Horbath himſelf by flight hardly eſcaping. But Thuſſi, hearing this Skirmiſh, as lying cloſe not far off, and now haſting thither to have been Partaker thereof, found the Baſſa yet in the Field on foot, viewing the Bodies of the ſlain; upon whom he came ſo ſuddenly and with ſuch Force, as that the Baſſa, with his diſordered men, had much ado to take Horſe, and ſo without any great reſiſtance to betake himſelf to flight; after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, ſlew many of the Turks, and amongſt the reſt the Baſſa himſelf, whoſe Head, preſently cut off, Horbath ſent to the County Serinus, who ſhortly after, by Thuſſi himſelf, ſent it to Matthias the Arch-duke. This Baſſa was a man of great Strength and Courage, a moſt expert and adventurous Captain, about thirty ſix years old, and for his Valour, of a common Souldier, created a Baſſa, by the Great Sultan. His Head being brought to Vienna, and there ſhewed to the Baſſa of Buda, then their Priſoner, and he demanded whether he knew it or not, ſighing anſwered, that he knew it well, and that it was the Head of the Baſſa of Sigeth, a braver man than whom the Sultan had none in all his Empire, earneſtly withal deſiring to know how he was ſlain. And not long after, the Adventurers out of Komara, Strigonium, and other places thereabout, having made a great Party, and taken a great Booty from the Turks at a Fair at Gombar, and by Tra and Eſſeg, thinking to have paſſed Danubius in hope of a greater Booty, ſeven hundred of them being paſſed the River, were by the new Baſſa of Sigeth and others, with five thouſand Turks, in an hot Skirmiſh overthrown; yet not without their great loſs alſo: the Baſſa himſelf, with two other Sanzacks and five hundred Turks, being there ſlain, and but fifty of the Chriſtian Adventurers left dead in the place, the reſt diſorderedly retiring to their Boats, being for moſt part drowned in the Danuby. The free Haiducks alſo ſurpriſed Jula, and ſet it on fire; in which Confuſion the Turks flying into the Caſtle, for haſte thruſt one another from the Bridge into the Caſtle ditch; wherein ſo many of them were drowned, that a man might have gone dry foot over upon the bodies of the dead. They took there alſo ſix hundred Priſoners, with much other Booty, and delivered two hundred Chriſtians which were there Captives. And albeit that theſe Haiducks after this Exploit done, were hardly purſued by the Turks from other places, yet they in ſafety retired with ſuch booty as they had already gotten.

Jula ſurpriſed and burnt by the free Haiducks.

But now to leave theſe the Troubles of Hungary for a while, as the fore-runners of greater 'ere long to enſue, let us again look back into Tranſilvania and Valachia, to ſee how Michael the Vayvod now in the mean time behaved himſelf there. The Cardinal Bathor overthrown and ſlain, and the Country of Tranſilvania again brought under the Emperour's Obedience; the Vayvod by his Ambaſſadors gave him forthwith to underſtand of all his Proceedings, with the whole Succeſs thereof, as alſo of a purpoſe he had to invade Moldavia; for that it was commonly reported, and alſo believed, That Sigiſmund the late Prince (not a little moved with the death of the Cardinal his Couſin, and the Revolt of his Country) aided by the Turks, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldavians, would now attempt ſome great matter for the recovery of Tranſilvania: all which, was ſhortly after the rather thought to be true, for that divers of his Spies being taken, ſome at Clauſenburg, ſome at Neſſen, beſide the Letters that were found about them from him unto the Nobility and States of Tranſilvania, (perſuading them to revolt from the Vayvod unto him, and that his meaning was ſhortly to come with a great Army out of Polonia for the repulſing of him) they alſo of themſelves confeſſed, How that Sigiſmund, in diſguiſed Apparel, had himſelf been in Tranſilvania, to conferr with divers his ſecret Friends concerning that matter. Which his Ambaſſadours the Emperour honourably entertained, and by them confirmed unto the Vayvod the Government of Tranſilvania, ſending alſo unto him divers honourable Preſents, forbidding him nevertheleſs to invade Moldavia, for fear of raiſing a new and dangerous War againſt the Polonians alſo, under whoſe Protection and the Turks the Palatine thereof then reſted. According unto which Command, the Vayvod ſtayed his intended Expedition; yet ſending ſome good part of his Forces unto the Frontiers of Moldavia, for fear of Sigiſmund, whom he heard to be hatching ſome miſchief in Polonia, and even then to lie upon the Frontiers of that Country. Some few months thus paſſing, Huſraim Aga (a grave reverend old man, and much employed by the Turkiſh Sultan) with five other Turks of good account, Ambaſſadors from the great Sultan, and a great Retinue following him, came to Gronſtat in Tranſilvania, where the Vayvod then lay. Of whoſe coming the Vayvod hearing, with four thouſand Horſemen moſt bravely mounted, went half a mile out of the City to meet them; the Foot-men in the mean time on both ſides of the Street ſtanding in good order, from the Gate of the City whereby they were to enter, even unto the Vayvod's Lodging, where ſtood alſo his Guard all in red and white Silk. So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their Horſes, with great reverence ſaluting the one the other: when preſently the Ambaſſador embracing the Vayvod, ungirt his Scimiter, and in the Name of the great Sultan put another about him, ſo richly garniſhed with Gold and precious Stones, as that no part of the Scabbard was therefore to be ſeen: beſides this, he preſented him with a fair Plume of black Hearns Feathers mixed with ſome white, (a right goodly Ornament, in form of a great buſh) which the Vayvod would not in the Field put upon his Head, although he were thereunto by the Ambaſſador moſt earneſtly requeſted, but cauſed it to be carried before him: he alſo preſented him with two very fair red Enſigns, in token of the Turks favour and protection; the one for himſelf, and the other for his Son Petraſco: moreover, he gave unto him two exceeding fair Horſes richly furniſhed, with four others, and a moſt fair Faulcon. The Vayvod himſelf was moſt bravely mounted, and (after the manner of his Country) had ten very fair ſpare Horſes led before him. At whoſe Entrance into the Town, all the great Ordnance was diſcharged, with great Vollies of ſmall Shot; and ſo the Ambaſſador ſtill riding on the left hand of the Vayvod, being brought to his Lodging, had ſix of his chief Followers every one of them preſented with a rich Robe of Cloth of Gold: in requital whereof, the Ambaſſador rewarded an hundred of the Vayvod's Followers every one of them with a good ſuit of Apparel: with this Ambaſſador of the Turks was alſo the Polonian Ambaſſador, whom the Vayvod in like manner honourably entertained. Theſe Ambaſſadors (as was thought) did what they might to have drawn this worthy and renowned Man, together with the Countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia, from the Emperour unto the Turks Obeiſance: howbeit, he ſeldom or never ſpake with them, but that either before or after he had Conference with the Lords Ungnad and Zeckel (the Emperour's Commiſſioners) concerning their Requeſts; always proteſting unto them, not to yield to any thing without the Emperour's Conſent and good-liking. Whereof Mahomet advertiſed, and that he was not by any thing yet ſaid or done to be removed from the Emperour, gave him by the ſame Ambaſſadors to underſtand, How that he was in ſome Speech with the Emperour concerning Peace (as indeed he then was by Meſſengers from the Baſſaes at Presburg) which if it ſorted to effect, that then it ſhould be well; but if not, that then it ſhould be good for him, whilſt yet he had time, wiſely to conſider of his own Eſtate, and to ſubmit himſelf unto his Protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vain praiſe of a certain fooliſh Conſtancy, to adventure himſelf, with all that he had, unto moſt certain Danger and Deſtruction: promiſing him in recompence of that his Loyalty, to give unto him for ever, the Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, and at his need to furniſh him both with Men and Money; offering moreover to make him a great Commander in his Army in Hungary, and the Baſſa of Temeſwar, as his Friend, to be at all times ready with fifty thouſand Horſe and Foot (as need ſhould be) to aſſiſt him againſt the Emperour, reſerving unto himſelf whatſoever he ſhould more win for him: for all which Bounty and Kindneſs, requiring only to have him unto him loyal. All which his large offers the Vayvod little regarding, declared the ſame unto the Emperours Commiſſioners: yet ſtill proteſting never to ſtart, but to ſtand faſt for the Chriſtian Emperour. Notwithſtanding, as a man deſirous to better his eſtate, he took hereupon occaſion to requeſt of the Emperour the Country of Tranſilvania, by him ſo lately taken in, unto him and his Son, in Inheritance for ever; with ſuch frontier Towns as in former time belonged unto Tranſilvania: and that whatſoever he ſhould win from the Turks, might be his and his Sons. He alſo requeſted, that all the Preferments and Dignities, in former time granted by his Imperial Majeſty, unto Sigiſmund the late Prince, might now be beſtowed upon himſelf; and for his Service done, to be furniſhed with Money for the payment of his Souldiers: And that the Emperour, with the other Princes of the Empire, ſhould aſſure him, That if he were taken by the Turk, they ſhould ranſome him; but in caſe he were by the great power of the Turk driven out of thoſe Countries, then, by the Emperours appointment, to have ſome convenient Place allotted for him in the upper-Hungary to live in, with the yearly penſion of an hundred thouſand Dollars. All which his requeſts, if it would pleaſe him to grant, he promiſed this year to do ſo much againſt the Turk, as had not been done in an hundred years before; with vaunt, that if he had had the Employment of the Money which was ſpent in the time of this War, he would not have doubted but to have brought all the Countries from the Euxine (or black Sea) to Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Solnock, under the Emperours Obeiſance. A large promiſe indeed, but hardly to have been performed by a far greater Prince than he.

Michael the Vayvod goeth againſt Sigiſmund Bathor, and the Vayvod of Moldavia.

Thus whilſt things ſtood in diſcourſe after the Cardinals Death, Sigiſmund, the late Prince, in the mean time ſupported by the Polonians, with the Aid of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldavians, was ready to have invaded Tranſilvania; yea the Tartars, (as the forerunners of his great power) were already entered the Country, and had out of the Frontiers thereof carried away ſome booty. Whereof the Vayvod underſtanding, in great haſte aſſembled his forces out of all places, which in ſhort time was grown to ſome good head, the Country People, together with the free Haiducks, (an adventurous and reſolute kind of Souldiers) in great number daily reſorting unto him. So being now eight thouſand ſtrong, and moſt of them brave and luſty men, he with them and twenty pieces of Artillery, removed to Cronſtat the four and twentieth day of April, ſending part of his Army (which every day more and more increaſed) before him to Neſſen; where all his forces being aſſembled to the number of almoſt fifty thouſand Horſe and Foot, he with great Celerity paſſed the rough and high Mountains into Moldavia, without reſiſtance, but yet not without ſome trouble, his Souldiers by the way being glad ſometimes to eat the Leaves of Trees, the Enemy having of purpoſe before carried away whatſoever he could that might have yielded him relief. Of whoſe ſpeedy coming and great ſtrength, Sigiſmund, and Jeremias the Vayvod of Moldavia hearing, and upon the reaſonable eſtimate of their own Forces, finding themſelves too weak to incounter him, retired themſelves out of Moldavia into the Frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater ſtrength, and ſo to meet him; for as yet Jeremias the Voyvod had not received from the Turk ſuch Forces as were unto him promiſed, and as he ſtill expected. Michael the Vayvod in the mean time (his Enemies thus fled) with Fire and Sword entering into Moldavia, took in the greateſt part thereof, the fearful Country People ſtill yielding unto him as he went; and the rather, for that Jeremias their Vayvod (placed by the Polonian, but tributary unto the Turk) had laid upon them a moſt grievous Impoſition, as upon every man a Duckat a Month, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in Moldavia, Michael the Vayvod (having ſtill in his Company one of the Emperours Commiſſioners in Tranſilvania, moſt truſty Servants, who might faithfully report unto them the whole manner of his Proceedings) after the departure of Sigiſmund and Jeremias, his Enemies, ſtaied not long; but hearing that they were retired towards the Confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the Caſtle Othune, near unto the River Neſter, being thirty thouſand ſtrong, Polonians, Moldavians, Turks and Tartars; with whom he joyned a moſt fierce and cruel Battel, which begun about ten a Clock before Noon, was with great Courage, but greater Obſtinacy on both ſides, maintained until the Evening. At which time the Fortune of the Valachian prevailing, his Enemies at laſt betook themſelves to flight, of whom there were ſlain eight thouſand, beſide many others of them drowned in the River Neſter: where, of the Valachians were loſt two thouſand onely. Concerning Sigiſmund and Jeremias, divers reports were after this overthrow given out; ſome ſaying that they were ſlain, and ſome, that they were in flying drowned; howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight eſcaped, to the greater trouble of themſelves, as of their afflicted Countries alſo. Michael, after this ſo notable a Victory, taking in the reſt of Moldavia, cauſed the People to ſwear their Obedience unto the Emperour, himſelf, and his Son, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as they took it) wronged therein; but eſpecially of the great Chancellor, an old Enemy unto the Houſe of Auſtria. Whereof enſued greater Troubles in thoſe frontier Countries than before, to the further effuſion of more Chriſtian Blood, much better to have been imployed againſt the fatal Enemy, in defence of the Chriſtian Common-weal. Yet thus the three warlike and frontier Countries of Tranſilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, the ſureſt Bulwarks of that ſide of Chriſtendom, and moſt expoſed unto the Fury of the common Enemy, were now once again united under the Obeiſance of the Emperor, to the great benefit (no doubt) of the Chriſtian Common-weal, and hurt of the Turks; if they might have ſo continued, as, God wot, they did not long.

Sigiſmund and the Moldavian overthrown by Michael the Vayvod.

Moldavia ſubdued by Michael.

Now the Vayvod, notwithſtanding this ſo great a Victory, well conſidering that he of himſelf could hardly keep this new gained Province of Moldavia againſt the Power of the Turk, (pretending that to him it belonged as his own to give to whom he pleaſed:) as alſo againſt the Polonians, (not more deſirous to reſtore Jeremias again into Moldavia, than the Prince Sigiſmund into Tranſilvania) without the help of ſome other more mighty Prince whom he might reſt upon; by his Ambaſſadours (ſent for that purpoſe) offered the ſoveraignty of all thoſe three Countries unto the Emperour, with Condition, that he ſhould appoint him perpetual Governour of the ſame under him. The Emperour alſo underſtood, how that Mahomet the great Turk had not long before again ſent unto him another of his Chiaus, commanding him without delay to reſtore the Country of Tranſilvania unto the Prince Sigiſmund (unto whom he was by the Mediation of the King of Polonia now before reconciled) threatning otherwiſe, with Fire and Sword to deſtroy Valachia, and by force of Arms to deprive him both of Tranſilvania and his Life together. Wherefore the Emperour, doubting leſt the Vayvod, either for fear, or for the better aſſuring of his own eſtate, ſhould to his Prejudice fall to ſome agreement with the Turk, yielded to all that his Ambaſſadors had of him requeſted; with Condition, that he ſhould be bound, as need ſhould require, to ſerve with his People againſt the Turk; and that in Tranſilvania, near unto his own Perſon, ſhould be always reſident one of the Emperour's Counſellors, as Superintendent over the whole Country. Wherewith the Vayvod being contented, the Emperour ſent thither Doctor Petzen with ſix thouſand Souldiers, and a great Sum of Money to pay the Vayvod's Souldiers, as he had before requeſted; and ſo take of them an Oath, That they ſhould from thenceforth become his Majeſties faithful Servants. Which Superintendent, ſo by the Emperour ſent, the Vayvod received with great Honour, as unto him of all others moſt welcome. Nevertheleſs, being again returned into Tranſilvania, it was not long but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppreſs the People of the Country, and in ſome ſort to tyranniſe over them; uſing great ſeverity againſt divers of the Nobility alſo, eſpecially ſuch as he knew to have taken part before with the Cardinal, or now of late with Sigiſmund his Couſin, or any way to have favoured his Quarrel. All which he did without the conſent or good liking of Petzen, contrary to his Promiſe made, No more to imbrue his hands in the blood of the Nobility of Tranſilvania, without the Knowledge or Conſent of his Imperial Majeſty, or the Superintendent by him appointed; which for all that, if he had not done, he could not poſſibly have kept them (diſdaining to be governed by him) under his Obeiſance. Nevertheleſs, the Tranſilvanians, taking it in evil part to be ſo oppreſſed, and the Nobility almoſt extinguiſhed, yea and indeed to be at all ruled by him; by general Conſent, as if it had been but one man, riſe all up in Arms againſt him; inſomuch, that he finding himſelf with his Valachians and other his Favourites too weak for them, retired with all ſuch as would follow him, into the Mountains; and from thence ſent preſently for Aid unto the Lord George Baſta (a worthy Captain, and then the Emperour's Lieutenant in the upper Hungary) for the ſubduing of theſe rebellious People, and the reducing of them to their former Obedience. Who, by Letters from Matthias the Arch-duke, at the inſtance of the Vayvod, commanded ſo to do, with about 6000 Horſe and Foot, and eight Field-pieces, removed from Caſſovia in the upper Hungary the fourth of September. Where, by the way, came unto him Ambaſſadors alſo from the People of Tranſilvania, now up in Arms, and Confederate alſo againſt the Vayvod; who in like manner alſo requeſted his Aid, pretending themſelves to be the Emperour's moſt loyal Subjects, but not under the Government of ſuch a Tyrant as was the Vayvod; alledging and exaggerating many his moſt cruel Actions, and clearly proteſting, That for the preſent want of a good Governour, they were inforced, for the ſafeguard of their Lives, to band themſelves together: which if haply it might be in any thing prejudicial unto the Emperour's claim and intereſt, which he with ſo great toil and coſt had procured in that Province, it was againſt their Wills, as inforced by neceſſity to do that they did in defence of themſelves. Which Ambaſſadors ſo ſent from the People, Baſta with all ſpeed diſpatched away back again, comforting them, without farther ſtir to expect his Arrival in Tranſilvania; yet covenanting withal, That they ſhould before conceive into writing the Oath of their Fidelity and Allegiance unto his Imperial Majeſty. Now might many and important Conſiderations trouble the Mind of Baſta in ſo doubtful a caſe. To give Aid unto the Vayvod againſt the People, was the expreſs Order from Matthias the Arch-duke, the Emperour's Lieutenant-General; but to aid the People confederate againſt him, as they had requeſted, ſeemed now both more profitable and honeſt, eſpecially having moſt certain Tokens of the ſmall and doubtful Faith of the Vayvod; who, only by diſputation intereſſed in that Province, was not ſo careful of another man's; neither ſeeming to have regard to Petzen, or of his own word given for not farther imbruing his hands in the Blood of the Nobility of Tranſilvania, without the Emperour's knowledge and leave: upon which Promiſe was likewiſe grounded the Arch-duke's Order for giving of him Aid: ſo that ſuch breach of his Faith, and contempt of Petzen, had haſtned the Conſpiracy of the People againſt him, deſpairing of all other Health than that which by force of Arms they could procure unto themſelves. To ſtand doubtful himſelf, or to hold others in ſuſpence, until that by Curriers in this new caſe he might receive new Inſtructions from the Emperour or the Arch-duke, had in it too much danger, as giving leiſure to each Party to make ſides, and to increaſe the ſlander of the laſt Year, That he might ſo eaſily (and eſpecially from the Valachian) have aſſured that Province to his Majeſty, had he not been an heartleſs man of no Reſolution, even ſuch an one as durſt not look upon a Cat, (as ſome had ſaid) all which might not a little prick an honourable Mind. To take part with the People confederate againſt the Vayvod, if it ſhould not happily fall out at the firſt Encounter, might betwixt the two Contendants give an entrance unto the third, either the Turk or the Polonian, in the favour of Bathor: but if it ſhould ſort to the quite contrary, and ſo himſelf to loſe the day; then he ſaw himſelf void of all defence againſt the malicious, eſpecially in that the World commonly meaſureth the Wiſdom uſed in any Action according to the Succeſs thereof, than which nothing can be more unreaſonable, but above all others, in matters of War. In this ſo troubled a Tempeſt of contrary Winds, of power to have driven a right good Mariner out of his Courſe, Baſta laid hand upon the Helm of good-meaning, and ſpread the Sails of ſuch Diſcretion, as taught him in matters of War to be lawful for a General to depart even from the Inſtructions of his Prince, not concerning the end, but the means leading to that end: eſpecially when the preſent Occaſion ſo requireth, which the Prince could not with reaſon before comprehend, as depending on the moſt mighty Fortune of War, which ſuffereth not ſo much delay as to expect Counſel from far. So in this Ambiguity Baſta reſolved to joyn himſelf unto the Confederates, moſt, in his Judgment, concerning his Imperial Majeſty, as being the uttermoſt ſcope of his ſo great coſt and charge, to keep the Country of Tranſilvania at his Devotion, which conſiſted in the People, and not in the Woods or Mountains: the matter being not great by what means ſoever it were done, ſo that it were honourable and honeſt.

Baſta taketh part with the Tranſilvanians againſt the Vayvod in whoſe Aid he was ſent.

Upon this Deſire Baſta ſet forward, and the 14th day arrived at Torda, and there joyned himſelf unto the Confederates, to the great wonder of the Vayvod, in whoſe help he was ſent: where, repoſing himſelf one day, conſulting and conſidering of their Forces, about 12000 ſtrong, with four Field-pieces, beſides eight of his own, with the ſix thouſand Souldiers he brought with him, in all about eighteen thouſand, he determined not to give leiſure unto the Vayvod to call unto him farther help, having now with him about twenty thouſand Foot and twelve thouſand Horſe, with ſeven and twenty Field-pieces; amongſt whom were divers of the Siculi, in hope of their ancient Liberty, Men of good account and ſort, with a mixture of the Coſſacks, Valachians, Raſcians, and Servians, People of Prey, ſerving only to ſpoil:

whom

1600 whom Baſta knew to be far inferiour in Courage to his twelve thouſand Foot and ſix thouſand Horſe; not only for the Valour of his own Men, accuſtomed unto the frontier Service, but alſo for the Confederates, who engaged with their Goods, Lives, and Honour, and deſirous to be revenged of the Vayvod, were like enough to ſtand well by it. Wherefore he ſet forward the ſixteenth day, and in two days march came within ſight of the Vayvod; who having ſent out certain great Troops of Horſe-men to take view of the Enemy, and ſeeing them repulſed, ſet fire on Miriſlo, a Village faſt by, out of which they had before drawn certain ſmall Field-pieces into the Camp.

Miriſlo is a Village two Leagues on this ſide of Alba-Julia, directly upon the High-way, ſtretching from the ſide of Maracza navigable River, unto the foot of an Hill; along which the River running, ſometimes nearer, and ſometimes farther off, together with the riſing of the Hill, maketh an unequal liſt of ground, in ſome places half a mile broad and more, and in ſome other ſhut up as it were into a narrow Throat, as in the ſelf ſame place where the aforeſaid Village ſtandeth, and where the Vayvod lay incamped in a place of great Advantage, behind a great Trench drawn from the River, croſs that little ſpace of ground betwixt the Mountain and the River. On this ſide, which from Miriſlo the farther a man goeth, the farther the Plane enlargeth, Baſta incamping cloſe unto the Village, oppoſed againſt the coming of the Enemy three great Corps du gard, two of them Hungarians, towards the Hill, favoured with a Church, and the third toward the River, of the Almain Foot-men, under the Charge of County Tomaſo Caurioli of Breſcia, Serjeant-Major of the Field, with all the Artillery; who, as in a place near and very open unto the Enemy, there intrenched himſelf, ſtill approaching nearer and nearer both on the one ſide and the other. Towards the evening of the ſelf-ſame ſeventeenth day, came to Baſta one Peter Armenio, with Letters from the Vayvod, containing, That having underſtood of his Arrival in the Camp of the Conſpirators, he now farther deſired to know whether it were by the Conſent and Commandment of the Emperour or not; and how it came to paſs that he would ſo do, conſidering the divers chances of War, the Sword hanging as it were even over his Head if he ſhould chance to loſe the Battel? Whereunto Baſta anſwered, That the morrow following he would ſhew him the Authority he had from the Emperour (alluding to the Imperial Standard he carried with him;) and that as concerning the Fortune and Danger to enſue, he referred that wholly unto the Will and Pleaſure of the Almighty, the juſt Judge of all Controverſies. But in the mean time he exhorted him to leave that Province he had ſo evil governed unto his Imperial Majeſty, as he was in duty bound; promiſing him free Paſſage into Valachia, and giving him time to conſider thereupon until Eight a clock the next Morning, after which time it ſhould be free for every Man to do for himſelf what he could. Which Anſwer the Vayvod having read, inflamed with diſdain, with many proud Words, full of Threats and Diſgrace, although it was then night, preſently cauſed, by the Sound of the Drum and Trumpet, the Battel to be proclaimed againſt the next day.

On the other ſide, Baſta, after he had aſſured his Camp, having not only ſent, but gone himſelf to have the counſel of his own Eyes, for his better underſtanding how the Enemy lay; and finding no reaſonable means for him there to attempt any Exploit by, as well for the ſtrength of the Trench before the Front, and in part along the ſide of the Enemies Camp, as alſo for the danger of a riſing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the Plane betwixt the Enemies Camp and the Village was ſubject, thought it beſt to remove, and make a ſhort Retreat about the ſpace of an Italian mile, according to the commodiouſneſs of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of ſo proud an Enemy, and not altogether ſo well acquainted with martial Stratagems, to gain a notable Victory. This his purpoſe propounded in Council, was greatly diſliked of the Captains of the Confederates; unto whom it ſeemed more ſafety to aſſault the Vayvod, yet lying in his Strength, than to retire before the face of an Enemy ſo ſtrong and adventurous; for that ſuch a Retreat, according to the manner of that Country, would be deemed no other than a plain flight; and to break his Order and ariſe, was (as they ſaid) but to diſcourage his own People, and to encourage his Enemies. But Baſta, the better to perſuade them, promiſed therein to ſhew to them a more cunning kind of Fight than was yet unto them known; and declared the aſſurance that he in his own Perſon, with the Almains, in the Reteward would give them in that Retreat, in ſuch ſort, as that they ſhould not loſe ſo much as a man, much leſs they needed to fear to fall into any diſorder in ſo ſhort a ſpace, his purpoſe being only to give the Plane unto the enemy, wherein to ſhew himſelf in the open Field. So the Retreat being agreed upon, the Morning following, being the 28*th.* of September, the three Corps du guard, (before ſpoken of) were betimes called back, and the Baggage ſent away; after which followed the Tranſilvanians and Hungarians, the Almains in the Reteward incloſing the great Ordnance.

The Battel of Miriſlo betwixt Michael the Vayvod and Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant.

The Vayvod, aware of their Departure, ſent forthwith a great Troop of Horſe-men, eſpecially of the Coſſacks, to take view of them, and to ſkirmiſh with them; which were ſo far kept off by a Company of Muſqueteers in the Reteward, as that they could not come ſo nigh as to do any harm, although that all the way they went they were by them ſtill charged, to the great Contentment of Baſta, to ſee ſo good a beginning of his Deſigns as might bring them all to their wiſhed Effect. But when he ſaw the great Artillery upon the Carriages to come out of the Village, a certain ſign that the Enemy ſet forward with all his Forces, he marched fair and ſoftly to give him hope to overtake him; and ſo retired as far as he thought good from the Village, having before thought of a convenient place wherein his People might, with room enough, upon advantage ſtay; whenas about half a mile from him, and as far from the Village, he might ſee the Enemy march with his People in order of Battel: then began he to march towards him alſo; and perceiving the Enemy to come on in one only thick Front, by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the place, having on the right hand towards the River placed as it were all his Horſemen, and towards the Mountain his Foot-men alone, and 500 Foot placed aloft without any Artillery, as it ſeemed he would have done, having planted ſome below at the foot of the Hill in the way, and in the midſt, even before the Front of the Battel, where the Horſe-men came after the Foot-men; he alſo placed his Squadron in one Front only, to the intent not to be incloſed by the Enemy on the flank of his Army. The body of his main Battel conſiſted of one great Squadron of about 3000 Almain Footmen, flanked on each ſide with 150 Rutters of Sileſia; before the Squadron toward the right hand he had ſet a looſe Wing of three hundred Muſqueteers; in the right Wing towards the Hill he placed a Company of Launces, with two Squadrons of the Country-Footmen; and in the left Wing toward the River one Squadron of Tranſilvanian Foot-

Foot-men, and two of Launces, for that the Enemy was at that time very ſtrong in Horſe-men; the Coſſacks, Archers, and Harquebuſers, he placed in the Rereward; of his great Artillery he would make no uſe, for that having not much, he would not ſtand upon the defence thereof, but deſired rather, with all ſpeed, to come to the Sword with the Enemy, unacquainted with ſuch cloſe fight, foot to foot; and well the leſs fit, by reaſon of their light Armour. And therefore he thought it beſt firſt to ſet forward his Squadron of Almains to give the charge, bending towards the right hand, amongſt the thickeſt of the Foot-men towards the Artillery at the foot of the Hill, as there whereas was the ſtrength of the Enemies Infantry. And doubting in the performing hereof, to be charged on the left ſide with a great Squadron of about 3000 Launces, which ſeemed to ſtand upon that Wing to give the firſt charge, he gave order unto Rodoniz, his Lieutenant, and Colonel of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left Wing, that he ſhould at a certain ſign given, ſet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great Squadron. So his People being ſet in order, and the manner of proceeding ſet down, he putting on his Helmet, with chearful Countenance ſaid, That at that time he truſted he ſhould ſhew unto the Vayvod, that his Truncheon could do more than his Scimitar; and himſelf ſetting forward betwixt the Squadron of the Almain Foot-men and the Wing of the Muſqueteers, about two hours after Noon, marched fair and ſoftly towards the Enemy; who without moving, expected the diſcharging of their Artillery, whereunto the nearer that the Enemy came unto it, the leſs harm it did him, by ſhooting either over or ſhort in the Field, which eaſily aſcended. The Wing of Muſqueteers went directly to give a charge unto the Artillery; and the Squadron toward the foot of the Hill, where Baſta deſired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might be enforced to ſpend their firſt Vollies, and with ſome diſcouragement or diſorder to retire, preſently came in, all afront, juſt upon the ſign given; and ſo with his Almain Foot-men, and the Rutters on the right hand, encloſed and compaſſed in behind the greateſt part of the Enemies Foot-men. At which very inſtant, the Rutters on the left hand alſo ſo courageouſly charged upon the three thouſand Launces, that better could not have been deſired of any band of moſt old and expert Souldiers. The Launces retiring without any hurt, and the firſt Volley diſcharged, forced the Infantry, and ſo diſordered the reſt. Whereupon the Wings charging, there enſued preſently a great ſlaughter and overthrow, only forty of Baſta's men being ſlain, and as many hurt; where of the Enemies were loſt in the battel ten thouſand; and greater had the ſlaughter been, if the Village and approach of the Night had not covered many of them that fled, and ſtaied the purſuit of the Victors that followed them. Which putteth me in remembrance of the great Victory that Scipio Aſiaticus had againſt Antiochus, wherein were ſlain of the Romans, but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the Wings ſtood for a time doubtful) there being loſt of the Enemies above fifty thouſand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the Peaſants of the Country reported) twenty thouſand ſlain in this Battel. By this Victory Baſta recovered many Enſigns and much Armour, before ſent by the Emperour unto the Vayvod, together with all his Tents and Baggage. And preſently after the overthrow, there were many Troops of Horſemen ſent out every way with Proclamation, to ſpare the Lives of ſuch of the Siculi as ſhould lay down their Arms; of whom, many were ſent Priſoners unto divers Places, eſpecially to Fogaras, a ſtrong Town towards Valachia. As for the Vayvod himſelf, he with certain Coſſacks eſcaped by flight.

Michael the Vayvod overthrown.

The Morrow following, Baſta diſpatched away the County Caurioli to inform the Emperour of all the Particularities of the Succeſs of that Expedition; who ſeemed to be therewith pleaſed, yet neither gave Reward unto the County, neither commended Baſta in that he had done (foreſeeing perhaps what was to enſue thereof) although he had in Writing before approved his Reſolution and Motion made in Favour of the Confederates. Staying that day in that quarter, Baſta gave order unto the Chiaki, to ſend out a Thouſand Horſemen to purſue the flying Vayvod; who, inſtead of ſo doing, joyning themſelves with other their Conſorts, ſetled themſelves to ranſack Alba-Julia, under the Colour, that there was the Vayvods Wealth and Subſtance; yet (as the manner of ſuch men is) ſparing neither Merchant nor Citizen; which worthily ſeemed unto Baſta a great wrong, for to ſee the innocent puniſhed, and the guilty to eſcape free. And albeit that he made what haſte he might thitherwards with all his Camp, and ſo ſtayed one day not far from thence, to have given ſome redreſs unto the ſpoyl that had happened; yet was all that his Labour loſt, for that ſo many of the greater ſort and chiefeſt amongſt them had their hands therein, with whom he thought it more Wiſdom as then to diſſemble, than to fall into any termes of Severity, without hope of doing any good. So he reſolved in all haſte to march towards Fogaras (whither he heard ſay the Vayvod was come with new Forces out of Valachia and Moldavia) and in ſix days march came to Cibinium, where he received certain News, That the great Chancellour of Polonia and Sigiſmund (ſometime the Tranſilvanian Prince) were with a ſtrong Army upon the Frontiers of Moldavia; having ſent before them Moyſes the Siculian, with about eight thouſand of the Siculi (his Souldiers) to what purpoſe was eaſie to be ſeen. Which Advertiſement interrupted the Courſe of Baſta's Victory; for that it ſeemed not reaſonable to purſue the Enemy, and to leave behind him a doubt of ſo great Importance; and eſpecially, for that he thought he could not aſſure himſelf of the Aid of the Country-people, in caſe that Sigiſmund their old Prince were once ſeen in Tranſilvania. Wherefore he thought good to ſtay where he was, to provide for all Events as need ſhould be; and ſo reſolved to ſend the Chiaki, and one Ladiſlaus Pithi, to Parley with Moyſes, who made a ſhew of no great Moment of his good will towards the Confederates. In the mean time, came two Meſſengers from the Vayvod, offering in his Name, that he ſhould do whatſoever were in the behalf of the Emperour to be impoſed upon him. Unto whom theſe Conditions were by Baſta and the reſt of the Council propounded; Firſt, That he ſhould for ever reſign all the claim he had or might have into the Country of Tranſilvania; then, That he altogether with his Army, ſhould give his Oath of Fidelity unto his Imperial Majeſty; alſo, That he ſhould forthwith through Valachia go with his Army unto the Frontiers of Moldavia, to ſtay the Polonians from farther entrance: and moreover, to give his Wife and little Son in Hoſtage for the performance of theſe things. With which Meſſengers was ſent one Sebaſtian Techelli, to receive the Oath and promiſed Hoſtages, unto whom was appointed for the place of their ſafe keeping, the Biſhops Caſtle in Alba-Julia, the Vayvod having before requeſted, That they might be ſo kept in Tranſilvania; although

The Chiaki was the chief man, and as it were, the Ring-leader of the Tranſilvanians into Rebellion.

A Reconciliation made betwixt Michaël the Vayvod, and Baſta.

Baſta thought it much better to have had them kept in the upper Hungary. This agreement being made, Baſta kept on his way towards Fogaras, which he found already poſſeſſed by the Chiaki, and ſo from thence to Corona. After which, the Vayvod diſtruſting of the Articles agreed upon, went directly into Valachia, but not at all into Moldavia; not ſo much diſcomfited with the Forces of the Polonians whom he went againſt (not doubting to give them a great overthrow) as for the diſtruſt he had of Moſes the Siculian, who in the Battel might ſhew himſelf his Enemy behind him. Now whether it were for the diſtruſt he had in his own followers, or only for fear of Treaſon by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with ſo ſmall Forces were come to fight, without ſome greater ſecret deceit; he not knowing whom to truſt or to fear, of his own accord took his flight into the ſtrength of the Mountains, without any great loſs of his People, having left his Baggage behind him, which was aſſailed and taken by the Haiducks, and ſuch other ſharkers inured to Prey, and always ready in like occaſion, to help to ſpoil and chaſe them that are already running; although that afterwards in divers Skirmiſhes with the Turks (who to cauſe him the rather to turn his back unto the Polonians, had preſumptuouſly ſcoured up and down the Country) he loſt many. In fine, giving Moldavia loſt, he was now out of hope how to be able to hold only Valachia, his old Government. Even he which but a little before commanded above an hundred thouſand Souldiers in Field; he, which in deſpight of who ſaid nay, was able to command Valachia and Moldavia, and happily the other Countries alſo near unto him, as having received the command of Tranſilvania, as Governour for the Emperour; he that made Conſtantinople to tremble, and found no Empire equal to his Deſigns. But it fareth oftentimes with the Great, as with Birds of Prey, who greedily ſeeking to prey upon others, become themſelves a Prey unto other greater than themſelves; for they, never contented, and attributing only unto their own Valour and Wiſdom, their own proſperous Proceedings, are the true ſhewers of the unſtable wheel of Fortune: or what ſay I of Fortune? being rather the very Children of Folly. So commonly falleth it out with Princes (eſpecially the new) which in the Garboiles of War betwixt their mighty Neighbours, not governed by their own Wiſdom, reſt themſelves only upon the Advice of their Counſellors, are by them led they wote not whither, for the greateſt intereſt they have in them. For had the Vayvod had but the leaſt inſight into Political Government, he might well have underſtood, that amongſt ſo many mighty Princes he could not much grow, or yet well root himſelf, without the aſſured ſtay of ſome one or other of them. He ſhould alſo have known within what compaſs a new Prince ought to have uſed Severity and Rigour; and that he ought to abſtain from all offence in good or otherwiſe, which might any way procure unto him the diſpleaſure or hatred of his Subjects. Whereas his Counſellors, not ſo much reſpecting his Profit as their own, had not the Power, or not the Will to perſuade him ſo by good means to plant himſelf ſure in Tranſilvania; but ſo both caſt him headlong from his high Eſtate, and at the ſame time furthered the loſs of Caniſia, a matter of important Conſequence.

Michael for fear of being betrayed unto the Polonians, takes his flight into the Mountains.

Now lay Baſta encamped in the Field in Tranſilvania, when a Meſſenger came unto him from the great Chancellour of Polonia, to declare unto him, That it was not his purpoſe to trouble Tranſilvania, having no ſuch order from the King; albeit that he would adviſe the Tranſilvanians, if they wiſhed to live in quiet, to make choice of a Prince of their own Nation, and ſuch an one as the Turk ſhould well like of, whereas otherwiſe they ſhould but ſeek their own Deſtruction, together with their Neighbours. Which his Counſel was well marked of them all, albeit it was thought by many of the wiſer ſort, not ſo much to proceed of any good meaning he had towards the Tranſilvanians, as of an old grudge and inveterate hatred he had always born againſt the Houſe of Auſtria; as alſo, that he even then countenanced the Prince Sigiſmund with his Army to no other end, but by him to raiſe up new ſtirs in that Province, and ſo to draw it from the Emperours Obeiſance, although thereby it became again tributary unto the Turk, who in all theſe matters had a great hand. Yea, ſome ſticked not to ſay, That he covertly aimed at that Principality for his Son, howſoever he masked the ſame under the ſhew of Sigiſmund the late Prince. But unto him anſwer was given by the Tranſilvanians, (with thanks for his good will) That in all their Conſultations they would have a principal regard of their own welfare, together with the common. Which anſwer he having received, forthwith placed one Simon (the Brother of Hieremias the Moldavian) Vayvod of Valachia inſtead of Michael, by him driven out, and ſo leaving a convenient number of Souldiers with him, returned himſelf towards Polonia. Unto which election ſo made by the Polonians, the Turks craftily gave place, knowing well to play the Foxes where they could not play the Lyons; wiſely for a time comporting the Injury; and the old Chancellor, as crafty as they, having a ſecret purpoſe by occaſion of theſe preſent Troubles, to prefer his Son at length unto the Principality of Tranſilvania, and thereunto alſo to joyn the Countries of Moldavia and Valachia, had therein of purpoſe placed the aforeſaid Simon, a man of no Valour, and of a ſmall Apprehenſion, whom he might again at his Pleaſure diſplace, and joyn thoſe Provinces unto his new purchaſe: which he could not ſo well do if he ſhould have there placed a man of greater reach and courage. So work the heads of the Great, and ſo travel the brains of the ambitious aſpiring.

The Chancellor placeth a new Vayvod in Valachia inſtead of Michael, by him driven out.

False Rumours raiſed to have terrified Baſta.

Baſta underſtanding of the retiring of the Polonians, entred into Conſultation with the Chiaki, and other the principal men of that Province, (which lodged with the Army in the Country Villages thereabout) for calling together the States and People, to make choice of ſome ſuch men as they thought meeteſt to be ſent unto the Emperour, to know his pleaſure for the Government of that Province. But now in the mean time, whilſt there was ſuſpition of the foreign Enemy, began to work certain Malecontents, which thinking with greater liberty to live under a weak Prince, than under one of greater Power; with one Voyce cryed out, That Sigiſmund with a great Power was entred into the Confines of Tranſilvania, one while towards Valachia, another while by the way of Moldavia; and that the ſtrength of the Country and others thereby ſtill reſorted unto him; with other ſuch like Inventions, of purpoſe deviſed to have made Baſta ſuddenly depart, or at leaſtwiſe, to have troubled the Dyet or Aſſembly called, and the Conſultation alſo. But he, well adviſed of their purpoſe, moved not out of his quarter, but there lay very privately, to declare thereby the great Confidence he had in the thankfulneſs of the Nobility of that Country, as by him delivered from the oppreſſion of the Vayvod; as alſo to make them to underſtand, That the Government to be appointed was not to be ſettled in the ſole power of a Tyrant, but in the fidelity of the Subjects, protected under a moſt gentle, royal, and moſt father-like 1600 father-like Government, not ambitiouſly ſought after, but voluntarily of themſelves offered, and for the common good, by the Emperour accepted. Beſide that, he knew right well, how that Caſtaldo (in like caſe before in the year 1551, ſent into Tranſilvania with 8000 Almains) left behind him his Army, and without any precedent courteſie went privately to Alba-Julia, where Queen Iſabel had for her defence aſſembled a Dyet of all the States, and there by well handling of the matter, got to Ferdinand the Emperour that Kingdom, which he could not by the fear of his Forces have gained; for which doing, Writers attribute unto him the name of great Wiſdom, notwithſtanding that the year following he was forced to abandon his Conqueſt, but yet not through any default in himſelf.

But it is truly ſaid, That men pleaſured, according to the occaſion change their manners, as doth the Camelion his colour, according to the place; nothing being by nature ſo ſhort, nothing of leſs Life, than the remembrance of a benefit with the unthankful; which the greater it is, the more it is repaired with Ungratitude; either by making it to have been of little worth, or to have proceeded not of Courteſie, but from ſome other more private and proper Conſiderations of the Giver. The diet aforeſaid being aſſembled, divers broils were there raiſed by the male Contents, as uſually it cometh to paſs where the People have to do with the Government; apt to be moved with every Rumour, always ready to change their Opinion, as ſtraight glutted therewith, head-ſtrong, faithleſs, all in words to no end; ſome of them in that aſſembly cryed out, that the Almains might be paid, diſcharged, and thanked for the pains they had taken for them as their Neighbours, with offering to do them the like Pleaſure, as their Occaſions ſhould require; otherwiſe cryed to have them put all to the Sword, ſo much they were devoid of Reaſon: others cryed out as faſt, that they were not by any means to endure the Government of Maximilian the Arch-duke, but by ſome, nominated unto them, would needs have a Prince of their own Country, and ſuch an one as the great Turk ſhould well like of, as the Chancellour had perſwaded them. Baſta for all that not diſmaid with ſo unexpected an encounter (albeit that he began to ſuſpect that he had loſt all his Labour, if he were not in ſhort time with greater Forces relieved) at ſuch time as the Chiaki, with other the chief men amongſt the People, came, as their manner was, every other day to viſit him; with couragious Speech and unappalled Countenance, told him plainly, That he well perceived their drift and purpoſe; and yet doubted not either of their Oath of Obedience given unto his Imperial Majeſty, either of the freſh remembrance of the great benefit they had from him ſo lately received; and in caſe it might happen them little to eſteem of thoſe things (greater than which could not happen amongſt men) that yet they ſhould well know, that he was not a man to be feared with words, but fully reſolved not to ſtir one foot thence with his Forces, but rather to loſe his Life, which he would for all that ſell as dear as he could. Whereunto anſwer was given with much courteous ſpeech, That he ſhould not give ear unto any the Speeches of the light vulgar people; but to content himſelf that the Nobility, in whoſe hands the chief power of that Province was, had not done any thing not beſeeming themſelves. So after much diſpute, were appointed three Perſons according to the three eſtates (the Nobility, the Commons, and the State in general) to go unto the Emperour, to requeſt of him Maximilian the Arch-duke of their Governour; with ſpecial requeſt alſo, that it would pleaſe him not to overcharge with foreign Souldiers that Province already ſo impoveriſhed, eſpecially having in it ſelf People ſufficient for the defence thereof, and more nimble to encounter with the Turks, than the heavy and ſlow Almains, and they alſo of double charge. Theſe difficulties with much ado thus appeaſed, by ſuch as ſtood faſt for the Emperour, Baſta thought it not good again to call any ſuch aſſembly, hoping that time, and the Emperours great Wiſdom, would for all theſe matters find convenient remedy. Yet ſaw he plainly, the mind of the People was to reſolve to remain for ever free, if they ſhould have come to a ſecond Conſultation; and in them a princely deſire to command rather than to be commanded; yea in that ſelf ſame Diet the Chiaki was declared Governour on the behalf of the People, with Authority in many things of himſelf to determine, without calling together of any aſſembly of the reſt of the States; which they ſaid they did only until they were by his Imperial Majeſty provided of a Governour. Nevertheleſs, Baſta well perceived more than a Tribunal Power to be now joyned by the People unto the Emperour's Commiſſioners, knowing that this Chiaki was in great hope to have been proclaimed Prince of the Confederates, in caſe they had not been preſently relieved againſt the Vayvod; and having in him yet noted ſtill his great ambition, for that marching from Torda toward the Vayvod, he cauſed to be carried before him a Spear with an Hungarian Cap, and a Plume of Feathers upon a Lance, in token of his chief command, albeit that afterwards, at the Complaint of Baſta, pretending therein a wrong to be done unto his Regiment marching under the Imperial Standard, he took it down; neither was he then a little ſuſpected to have ſuffered his Souldiers to have ſacked Alba-Julia, as alſo to have ſurpriſed Fogaras, and to have uſed divers other means all tending unto popularity and ambitious aſpiring; wherein he deemed it yet better to diſſemble than to proceed farther, and then to do it indeed when he had power ſufficient.

The ſtout Speech of Baſta, unto the Chiaki, and the reſt of the Nobility of Tranſilvania.

The next day following came all the Counſel of that Province, with the Deputies (appointed to have gone unto the Emperour) and the People unto the Houſe of Baſta, requeſting him (although ſuch their manner of coming might ſeem to exceed the bounds of requeſt) that he would ſend his Germans out of the Country, and ſo after ſo many troubles to give it leave a little to breath; as for himſelf, that he might ſtay at Alba-Julia, until the men deputed to that purpoſe might go unto his Majeſty with their requeſts. Baſta not a a little troubled with ſuch an Imperious Requeſt, and now (but not before) perceiving the occaſion of this great diſcontentment, ſaw himſelf much deceived in a moſt material point, and the ground of all this action, by truſting too much unto his own too ſmall Forces, too weak for the defence of his own Perſon, much leſs to keep under ſo populous a Province, ſuch as before in the year 1552, under the leading of Caſtaldo, had of it ſelf ſent out 70000 fighting men for the beſieging of Lippa, and now upon the ſudden 12000 with a few Noblemen in the face of a mighty and armed Enemy, where they now held an armed Conſultation with him, the Nobility meeting together with their great Retinues; and ſo much the greater, by how much the Suſpicion was the more by them feared, for them to be enforced to reſolve upon any thing contrary to their good liking; whereas he contenting himſelf only with their Oath, without any other Hoſtages, and ſo giving Aid unto the Confederates, had put himſelf upon their Faith, together with all his People, into the midſt of Tranſilvania, a matter of far greater importance than any pleadge they were able to have given him. Beſides that, of the ſix thouſand men which he had brought with him into that Country,

The Error of Baſta.

1600 three thouſand five hundred of Sileſia, now brought to 2000, could not be perſuaded longer to ſtay without their Pay before hand, the Pay of their Country being already ſpent; and the reſt drawn out of the Garriſons of the upper Hungary, or elſe there preſſed, were at a certain time to return. Yet nevertheleſs he attempted in ſome ſort to ſatisfie their Requeſt, for not grieving of the Country, by requeſting of them to deliver unto him ſome ſtrong Place, whereinto he putting his men into Garriſon, they might ſo lye without any farther charge or trouble to the Country, living upon their own Wages. Which, when he could not obtain, and withal conſidering, that if thoſe few of his People which yet remained could be contented to ſtay with him, the retaining of them might give occaſion unto the deſirous of new Stirs, upon every the leaſt diſorder of the Souldiers, to alter the matter at their pleaſure, (as had hapned unto the eight thouſand Almains of Caſtaldo, driven ſometimes out of that Country under the colour of ſome Inſolency by them committed, altho others had been the chief doers thereof, namely, about ſome twenty Polonians) he reſolved of all theſe things to give notice to the Court, and ſo fair and ſoftly to march with his Souldiers unto the Confines of that Country, and to ſave his eight pieces of Artillery, with his other Munition, in Samos Vivar Caſtle, a ſtrong Fortreſs a good way within the Confines, which, together with the ſtrong Caſtle of Kuivar, Aga Leche, an Albanoiſe, and General of the Vayvod's Horſe-men, delivered to Zakell Captain of Zaccomar, one of his Majeſties Commiſſioners; who there provided for the Governour Baſta, his familiar Favourite: altho that the Tranſilvanians had with great Promiſes ſought to have croſſed ſuch delivery of the aforeſaid Caſtles, and to have had them in their own Power.

The Diſcretion of the doer is not always to be deemed by the event of the thing done.

Wherefore Baſta, not deceived, but by neceſſity inforced, yielded that he could not hold, and gave that he could not ſell, making a vertue of Neceſſity; deceived in the event of the matter which he had propounded unto himſelf from the beginning, for the aſſurance of that Country to the Emperour; by an excuſable error, if it be true that ſome wiſe men ſay, nothing to be more unreaſonable than by the Event of Matters to judge of their Wiſdom by whom they were managed; which conſiſteth not in divining before of the certainty of the Event, but in the reaſonable Conjecture thereof, by the means leading thereunto, than which nothing is more deceitful, as not depending from our own Actions only, but from other mens alſo more groſs and unreaſonable; none knowing better how much the Wiſdom of Man deceiveth it ſelf, than thoſe which are unto themſelves true Witneſſes of the event of their own Conſultations. Nevertheleſs the matter was afterward ſo well handled by Baſta, Petzen, and others the Emperour's great Favourites in Tranſilvania, that in a Diet holden by the Tranſilvanians, he was with a convenient Guard again by them received as the Emperour's Lieutenant, until further Order were by him taken for the Government and Aſſurance of that Country: the Chiaki and his Complices faintly conſenting thereunto, as not greatly pleaſed therewith. Neither had Baſta much cauſe to be proud of ſuch his Government, having thereof no longer aſſurance than pleaſed that fickle People to afford him; yet ſith no better could be had, he muſt take it as he might, deeming it better in ſome ſort for the preſent to hold it for the Emperour, than not at all: with which his weak State, amongſt more Enemies than Friends, we will for a while leave him.

But whilſt things thus paſſed (as we have ſaid) in Tranſilvania and Hungary, (the Treaty for Peace betwixt the Emperour and the Turk being vaniſhed into Smoak,) Ibrahim Baſſa the Turks General in Hungary, having all the laſt Winter made great preparation for the Invaſion of the Emperour's Territories, and the doing of ſome notable Enterpriſe for the recovery of his Reputation, ſomewhat impaired by the evil ſucceſs of the laſt Years Wars; and even in theſe his greateſt Preparations of this Year, not a little troubled by the Mutiny of the Janizaries and Spahi for want of their Pay, at Conſtantinople, as alſo with the Rebellion in Caramania: now at length in the latter end of Auguſt (by order from the Grand Seignior, his great Lord and Maſter) began to ſet forward with his Army from Belgrade, ſuppoſed to be above two hundred thouſand men ſtrong. And coming to Babotſca, a ſtrong Fortreſs of the Chriſtians in the nether Hungary, ſat down before it, and having planted his Artillery, furiouſly battered it, with purpoſe to have the next day aſſaulted it: but the Captain of the Caſtle, conſidering the weakneſs of his Garriſon to withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy, and that the Walls to be already ſore ſhaken with the fury of the great Ordnance, came to a reaſonable Compoſition with the Baſſa, and ſo delivered unto him the place. Which Exploit done, and the Caſtle to him ſurrendred, he marched from thence to Caniſia, a ſtrong Town in the Frontiers of Stiria, of moſt men before ſuppoſed a Place impregnable; for that it was ſcituate in a very deep Marſh, and furniſhed with a ſtrong Garriſon of valiant Souldiers, part Hungarians and part Almains: after this ſtrong Town Ibrahim the great Baſſa eſpecially longed, ſo to free thoſe Frontiers of the Turks from the often Incurſions that the Garriſon Souldiers of that place made therein; as alſo by the taking of that ſo ſtrong a Fortreſs from the Chriſtians, to open a more ſafe and free Paſſage for the Turks into Auſtria, to the indangering of other places of the Empire alſo farther off. Wherefore incamping his great Army on the ſide of the Marſh which compaſſed the Iſle round whereon the Town ſtood, he began with Faggots and Earth to fill up the Marſh, ſo to paſs over his Army; they in the Town in the mean time not ceaſing with their thundring Shot to diſturb them, and to do them what harm they might: who for all that, proceeding in their Work, had brought it now almoſt cloſe unto the Iſland, where, whilſt they were about to have landed, they were by the Souldiers of the Garriſon ſo encountered, that having loſt a number of their men, as well Janizaries as others, with two of their beſt Captains alſo, they were by plain Valour inforced to retire. But preparing themſelves againſt the next day with a greater force to have again returned unto the Aſſault of the Iſle, they ſaw the Imperial Army now at their Backs, and come ſo near them, that with their Artillery they did them great harm; which put them in no ſmall fear, ſeeing themſelves incloſed betwixt the Town and the Camp, and both out of the one and the other to receive no ſmall hurt, as well with the ſmall Shot as the great; beſides that, out of the Camp divers whole Bands ſometimes ſallied, diſcharging great Vollies of Shot even into their Trenches. In the Imperial Army were about two and forty thouſand Horſe and Foot, men of divers Nations, under the leading of Duke Mercury, now General of the Emperour's Forces in Hungary; with whom were alſo the Lords Nadaſti, Eſdrin, Bacchian, and the Governour of Croatia, with divers other famous Captains, come thither for the relief of Caniſia, a place of ſo great Importance for the defence of that ſide of the Country, and to help that it fell not into the Power of the barbarous Enemy. But Ibrahim Baſſa, underſtanding by his Eſpials the ſmall number of the Chriſtians; and well knowing how much he was too ſtrong Caniſia beſieged by the Turks.

The Battel betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks before Caniſia.

Caniſia yielded unto the Turks.

Stiria forraged by the Turks.

ſtrong for them by reaſon of his great Multitude, went out againſt them, and finding them as ready as himſelf, joyned Battel with them, with great ſlaughter of men both on the one ſide and the other: which bloody Fight (the Victory yet ſtanding doubtful, but in all mens Judgment more inclining unto the Chriſtians than to the Turks) was at length, by the coming on of the night, broken off. At which time, the Chriſtians retiring themſelves into their Trenches, the Turks ſtood all the night in the Field with their Weapons in their hands, as fearing to have been again in the night by their Enemies aſſailed. Mean while the Chriſtian Captains in the Camp, at variance amongſt themſelves, and ſo not now to be commanded by Duke Mercury their General; at ſuch time as the Turks, preſuming on their Multitude, dared them to Battel the next day, could by no means be perſuaded to go out againſt them, or once to ſtir out of their Trenches. Inſomuch that the General of the Tartars thereupon taking Courage, made an Inroad into the Country thereby, and meeting with two hundred Waggons laden with Victuals going unto the Chriſtian Camp, ſlew the Convoy that guarded them, and ſo carried them quite away. Whereby ſuch want aroſe in the Chriſtian Camp, that having not what to eat, and out of hope of any new Supply of Relief in time to come, they were glad by Night to diſlodge and retire; which could not ſo ſecretly be done, but that it was by the Turks perceived, who preſently following after them in the Tail of the Army, cut off about three thouſand of them, with certain pieces of great Ordnance, and moſt part of the Baggage; the reſt of the Army in the mean time retiring farther off into places of more ſafety. From this Victory the Turks returned again to the Siege of Caniſia, where, after a few days, the Garriſon Souldiers, now out of hope to be in good time relieved, ſuddenly fell into Mutiny, refuſing any longer to defend the Town, now hardly laid unto by the Turks; and the rather, for that divers of the Hungarians were already fled out of the Town unto the Baſſa, having (as it was thought) revealed unto him the whole eſtate of the beſieged: ſo that now there was no remedy but that the Town muſt be delivered unto the Enemy, although Paradiſer, with ſome other of the Captains, did what they might (as they ſaid afterwards) to have perſuaded the contrary. Whereupon, they came to Parle with the Baſſa, and covenanting with him, that they might with Bag and Baggage depart, and with a ſafe Convoy be brought over the River Mur, promiſed to yield unto him the Town: all which the Baſſa granted, fearing how to have been able to have kept the Field, if they ſhould for any long time have holden out, Winter now ſo faſt approaching. So the two and twentieth of October the Town was unto the Baſſa right cowardly delivered, and the Garriſon Souldiers with their Baggage in a hundred Waggons lent them by the Turks, ſafely conducted over the Mur, as was unto them promiſed. After the Agreement made for the yielding up of the Town, the Baſſa, in Courteſie, ſent unto Paradiſer the Governour a very rich Gown of Cloth of Gold; which albeit that he refuſed, yet was it afterwards laid to his Charge as a Preſumption of ſome treacherous Colluſion betwixt him and the Baſſa for the betraying of the Town, which it was thought he might much longer have kept. Ibrahim now thus poſſeſſed of the Town he ſo much deſired, fortified it more ſtrongly than ever it was before; and for the more aſſurance thereof, put into it a ſtrong Garriſon of four thouſand Foot and five hundred Horſe, all old expert Souldiers. And immediately after, without reſiſtance, forraged the Country round about Caniſia, burning all before him as he went; the poor Chriſtian Inhabitants ſtill flying as faſt as they could for ſafeguard of their Lives. But having thus with the Spoil of the Country well pleaſed his Souldiers, he, deſirous to have the ſame again in time re-peopled, as thereby to yield unto the Turks the more Profit, ſtaid their farther Outrage, upon great pain forbidding the ſame; by open Proclamations in every place ſet up, inviting the Chriſtians, without fear of farther harm, to return again into the Country, where, ſubmitting them unto the Great Sultan's Obeiſance, they ſhould under his Protection ſafely dwell, without any Tribute to be of them exacted for the ſpace of three Years next following. Which Proclamations were in his Name thus publiſhed:

Ibrahim Baſſa, to the Inhabitants of the Country about Caniſia, greeting.

Ibrahim Baſſa's Proclamation.

WE Ibrahim Baſſa, by the Grace of God, Viſier, and Couſin unto the moſt puiſſant and invincible Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the Turks, unto all the Inhabitants of the Marches about Caniſia, and the reſt of the Country of Steirmarck, from the greateſt unto the leaſt, greeting: Whereas we have willingly heard, that ſome of you, willing to ſubmit your ſelves to the great Sultan, and to ſwear unto him Fealty, are again returned unto your old Dwellings: We promiſe and aſſure you, upon the Faith of the ſaid Emperour, That whoſoever ſhall be found near unto the Fortreſs of Caniſia, now belonging unto the great Sultan, with all Reverence ſubmitting himſelf as his Subject, under his Government, acknowledging him for his Sovereign, ſhall enjoy more Priviledges than ever he did before, and alſo be protected in the ſame. And for that we know that your Houſes are for the moſt part deſtroyed, as alſo your Poſterity, you ſhall therefore for theſe three years next following be exempted and free from all Tributes and Charges whatſoever, to the intent you may the better recover your ſelves. Of which Grace if you ſhall willingly accept, we promiſe you, that neither You, your Wives, or Children, ſhall be in any thing wronged, or your Goods in any part impaired, but ſo much as in us poſſibly is, to be defended: ſo that ſo many of you as pleaſe may in ſafety return into your own old Dwellings, giving before knowledge thereof unto the Governour of this our Fortreſs. Given in our Camp after the Conqueſt of Caniſia.

Many of theſe poor Country People before fled for fear of the Turks, and not knowing where to beſtow themſelves, now upon this Proclamation returned again to their ancient dwelling Places, there to begin the World again under the Turkiſh Obeiſance. But for that County Serinus was the Man whom of all others in that Country the great Baſſa ſought after, as him whom he moſt feared after his Departure to trouble this his new Conqueſt, and to ſeek to be revenged; having in this ſo general a Calamity of Stiria, his Country, loſt twenty Villages of his own, quite burnt by the Turks, and the People moſt ſlain or elſe taken Priſoners: the Baſſa having many times before ſought to have perſuaded him to have yielded his Obedience unto the Turkiſh Sultan, and now in hope after ſo great loſs to bring him in, before he were come into the utter ruine of all his Fortunes, (now by the loſs of Caniſia, and the entrance of the Turks into Stiria, not a little endangered) writ unto him as followeth:

Ibrahim Baſſa's Letters unto the County Serinus.

WE Ibrahim Baſſa, chief of the Viſier Baſſaes, and Couſin unto the moſt puiſſant Sultan Mahomet; to the County Serinus ſendeth greeting. We have oftentimes heretofore written unto thee concerning the matter thou knoweſt of: but what the cauſe is that we received no Anſwer, we cannot tell. Yet could I not but write to thee again, That if yet thou canſt be content to begin the matter aright, and to ſubmit thy ſelf unto our Protection, we will be ready to receive thee. Thou ſeeſt, that what we foretold thee is now more than fulfilled both upon thee and thine, which thou wouldſt never believe. Nevertheleſs, for the ſtaying of the farther effuſion of the Blood as well of thy Subjects as ours, and to come to ſome good Attonement, it is high time for thee to lay thine Hand upon thy Heart, and to conſider how much more it concerneth thee than us, and that the benefit thereof redoundeth more unto thine than ours. What our Affection is towards thee, Hierom the Vayvod can tell thee. Fare thou well. From our Camp after the Conqueſt of Caniſia, the ſeventh of November, 1600.

Ibrahim Baſſa returneth with his Army to Belgrade.

But theſe Letters being alſo, as the reſt, anſwered with Silence, the great Baſſa having diſpoſed of all as he thought beſt at Caniſia, and in the Country thereabout, returned with his Army to Belgrade, there to Winter: having before fully certified the great Sultan of all his Proceedings, and the Succeſs of this War; vaunting after his vain manner, the next Spring to beſiege Vienna alſo, if it ſhould pleaſe him ſo to command. Of all which things Mahomet underſtanding, and not a little therewith pleaſed, cauſed great Triumphs to be made by the ſpace of four days at Conſtantinople, and in token of his Love and Favour, ſent a rich Robe of Cloth of Gold, with a leading ſtaff, all ſet with Pearl and precious Stones, unto the Baſſa, yet lying at Belgrade.

This loſs of Caniſia much troubled all that ſide of Chriſtendom, eſpecially them of the Territories belonging unto the Houſe of Auſtria, in a ſort diſmay'd to ſee the Turks ſo eaſily poſſeſſed of a Town, before thought almoſt impregnable, and the ſtrongeſt defence of all that Country againſt the furious Impreſſions of the Turks, to whom it was now become a moſt ſafe and ſure Receptacle, all men with one Voice blaming the diſcord of the Captains in the Imperial Army, for ſo retiring without any good doing; but above all deteſting the Cowardiſe of Paradiſer, who known to have in the Town a ſtrong Garriſon, with good ſtore of Munition and Victuals (as was ſuppoſed) had ſo baſely delivered the ſame unto the Enemy, not doing the uttermoſt of his Devoir as had beſeemed him for the defence thereof: whereas if he had ſo done, happily in the mean time the Cold and unſeaſonableneſs of the Weather (tho no other Relief had been) Winter being now come, might have inforced the Turks to have raiſed their Siege. Whereupon, he was for this ſo foul a Fact, by the Emperour's Commandment, apprehended and caſt in Priſon at Vienna, where after he had long lain, and his Cauſe oftentimes examined, he was the next year following condemned of Felony and Cowardſe, and ſo the 15*th* day of October executed, having firſt his Hand at four ſtrokes of the Executioner ſtruck off, and after that his Head; with him was alſo in like manner executed his Enſign-Bearer; and after them his Lieutenant with the Mayor of the Town, who both bound faſt to a ſtake, had firſt their Tongues cut out, and afterwards their Heads chopt off.

Paradiſer executed for the yielding up of Caniſa to the Turks.

Now the Rebellion before raiſed in Caramania by Cuſahin Baſſa (as is aforeſaid) was not with his Death altogether appeaſed. Alſo Orfa, a great City of that Country (which having taſted the ſweetneſs of Liberty in the time of Cuſahin) yet ſtill holding out againſt Mehemet the great Baſſa the Sultan's Lieutenant-General there. At which time alſo a Companion of Cuſahin the late Rebel, called the Scrivano, and one of his greateſt Favourites, ſeeing how hardly not only Cuſahin himſelf, but the reſt of his Followers, had been handled by the Turks, began to make Head, and to call unto him all ſuch as loved their Liberty; unto the ſweet Name whereof, ſo many were in ſhort time come about him, as that out of them he formed ſuch an Army, as made him now dreadful unto the Turks his Enemies. Againſt whom, Mehemet Baſſa going with all his Power to have oppreſſed him, found him with thoſe his rebellious Followers ſo courageous (for the deſire they all had to break out of the Othoman Slavery, and to live in ſuch Liberty as was promiſed them by their Captain and General) that joyning Battel with them, he received of them a notable Overthrow; inſomuch, that fearing to have loſt his whole Army, he was glad to retire, and to ſend out Commiſſions for the raiſing of greater Forces. Sultan Mahomet in the mean time, whether it was for fear of this new Rebellion, or for that he underſtood of the Ambaſſadors ſent from the Perſian unto the Chriſtian Princes, began to ſuſpect leſt that King ſhould break the League he had with him, and ſo to his farther trouble take up Arms alſo againſt him. Wherefore, upon a Turkiſh Pride, he ſent an Ambaſſadour into Perſia, to give the King to underſtand, That for the more aſſurance of the League betwixt them, he demanded to have one of his Sons ſent unto him in Hoſtage, as a Pledge of his Fathers Faith: Which ſo proud a Demand, the Perſian King took in ſuch diſdain, that he commanded in his Rage the Ambaſſador to be forthwith ſlain; but that his fury being by his grave Counſellors ſomewhat appeaſed, he remitted the Severity of this his rigorous Command, and ſparing his Life, was contented, that in deſpight and contempt of him that had ſent him, he ſhould be put to the Baſtonado only: and ſo grievouſly threatned, ſent back again unto his Maſter. Who having received this ſhameful Anſwer, and in doubt of ſome farther matter from that angry King, commanded new and ſtrong Garriſons to be put in all his ſtrong holds confining upon the Perſian Kingdom.

This troubleſome Year of Jubile thus paſt, the Emperour much troubled with the loſs of Caniſia, and in doubt of worſe to come (albeit that Ibrahim Baſſa, whom for all that he truſted not, did afreſh intreat with him concerning Peace) and ſeeing alſo the great need he had of greater Aid to withſtand the mighty Power of the Turk, with great inſtancy requeſted Aid of the Pope and of the other Princes of Italy: who, conſidering alſo how much it concerned the reſt of the Chriſtian Commonweal, to have the Frontiers of Hungary defended, condeſcended unto the Emperour's Requeſt; and ſo the Pope with the beginning of the Spring ſent him eight thouſand Souldiers in Pay, under the leading of Io Franciſco Aldobrandino his Nephew their General, who with the like charge had now ſerved ever ſince the Year 1599: King Philip alſo, at the inſtance of the Emperour, gave Order unto the County Fuentes to ſend into Croatia certain Bands of Dutches; who, by direction from him, were forthwith conducted to Millain. The great Duke of Florence alſo, ſent unto him two thouſand Souldiers, under the leading of Franciſco de Monte; with whom alſo, by his Appointment, went the Lord Io. de Medices, whom Ferdinand the Arch-duke forthwith requeſted for to be Maſter of his Camp: thither came alſo the Duke of Mantua with an honourable Company both of Horſe and Foot, being forthwith by the Arch-duke made his Lieutenant-General. And ſo whilſt theſe People aſſembled together into Croatia, the Emperour ſent alſo another good Army into Hungary, drawn for moſt part out of Germany, which under the leading of the Arch-duke Matthias his Brother, and the Duke Mercury his Lieutenant-General, went into thoſe Parts to withſtand the Turk. A third Army he alſo made of the Imperials; which, ſtrengthened with the Forces of Don Ferrant Gonzaga, Governour of the upper Hungary, joyned themſelves with Baſta for the Recovery of Tranſilvania, out of which he had been of late driven, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

The Aid ſent out of Italy unto the Emperour.

Alba Regalis beſieged by Duke Mercury.

And ſo whilſt theſe Armies were in preparing, many hot Skirmiſhes paſſed in Hungary betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, the loſs falling ſometime to the one ſide and ſometime to the other. But the time now come that Souldiers might well take the Field, Ibrahim Baſſa, being now before dead at Belgrade, whilſt he was yet intreating of a diſſembled Peace, and Haſſan, one of the Viſier Baſſaes, by Mahomet appointed General in Hungary in his place, yet delaying his coming, the Parle for Peace laid aſide (as never indeed by the Turks intended, but only by them entertained to dally off the time to their own more advantage) Duke Mercury, General of the Emperour's Forces, taking the offer of ſo fit an Opportunity, came with his Army from Komara (where he had lain expecting the Event of the Parle) and laid Siege to Alba-Regalis, one of the chiefeſt and ſtrongeſt Cities of Hungary; which, ſeated in the midſt of a Marſh, was thought almoſt impregnable, being hardly to be approached but by the Suburbs; which, ſtrongly fortified and defended by the Marſh, ſerved the City inſtead of three moſt ſure Bulwarks, within which ſtood alſo the City it ſelf, well defended with a good Wall and a Ditch. This City, the Duke for certain days continually battered, as if he had purpoſed at length to have taken it by aſſault: but, in the mean time certainly informed by a Fugitive (but lately fled out of the City) that the broad Lake on the other ſide of the City over againſt the Place where he lay, was not ſo deep, but that it was to be paſſed, (contrary to the Opinion both of the Turks Captives, and of the natural Inhabitants, whom he had upon that Point examined) and that the Turks, preſuming upon the ſtrength thereof, and thinking themſelves on that ſide ſafe, had turned almoſt all their Care and Forces unto that ſide of the City which was now by him battered, without regard of any great Peril to be from the other ſide feared; he appointed the Lord Ruſſworm with his Souldiers to make Proof if the Sigeth Suburbs (for ſo they were called) on the aforeſaid ſide of the City, ſo little regarded by the Turks, were not to be ſurpriſed; for that theſe Suburbs being taken, the City could not long hold out: for the undertaking of which Enterpriſe, Ruſſworm was, both by the captive Turks and Country People thereby dwelling, much diſcouraged, they all with one conſent affirming, That albeit he ſhould find no other Difficulties in the attempting thereof, yet the Lake it ſelf was not poſſible to be paſſed: who nevertheleſs not altogether truſting them, ſent certain of his Men ſecretly to try the matter; who having ſo done, brought him word, That the Lake was undoubtedly (though with much difficulty) to be paſſed. Whereupon, he with 1000 ſelect Souldiers, with every one of them a good Faggot on his Back beſide his Arms, to fill up the deepeſt of the Marſh, by night entred the ſame; wherein he had not gone far, but that he, almoſt with the danger of his Life, found it much deeper and more troubleſome than the Spies had unto him before reported: but carried with an invincible Courage himſelf, and his Souldiers moved by his Example, he ſtill went on, they alſo following of him. It is almoſt a thing incredible, to tell what theſe adventurous men endured, plunged in the deep Mud among the Flags and Bulruſhes, going ſtill up in Water and Mud unto the Waſte, even where the Marſh was the ſhalloweſt; where alſo if one miſſed but a ſtep, he was by and by over Head and Ears, and in danger to be drowned, if he were not by his Fellows preſently holden; yet at length, by God's help, having with the loſs but of ſix or ſeven men, a little before day got over, the Duke by an appointed Sign advertiſed thereof, with greater Stir and Tumult than at any time before, aſſailed that ſide of the City where he lay, as if even then and there he had only meant to have ingaged his whole Forces for the winning thereof. When in the mean time the Lord Ruſſworm on the other ſide with his reſolute Souldiers, with Ladders provided for the purpoſe, ſcaled the Walls of the Suburbs, and almoſt unperceived, recovered the top thereof, (the Turks being at the ſame time wholly bent for the defence of the other ſide of the City, where moſt ſtir and apparent danger was) and ſo being got into the Suburbs, with a great and terrible Cry aſſailed the Turks, who, ſurpriſed with an exceeding Fear, and not well knowing which way to turn themſelves, without any great Reſiſtance fled into the City, the Chriſtians following them at the heels, and making of them a great Slaughter. In which ſo great a confuſion, even where was leaſt feared, the Duke by other his Souldiers took the reſt of the Suburbs, as he had before determined, the Turks there alſo for fear forſaking them, and retiring with all the haſte they could unto their Fellows in the City, there to live or dye together. The Chriſtians in theſe Suburbs, beſide much other rich Prey, took alſo fourteen great pieces of Artillery, with good ſtore of Shot and Powder. The Suburbs (the greateſt Strength of the City) thus happily taken, the Duke again ſummoned the City, requiring to have it delivered unto him; whereunto the Turks gave no other Anſwer but by their Pieces, which they diſcharged upon the Chriſtians ſo perſwading them to yield. Wherewith the Duke much diſpleaſed, ſent them word, That he would ſend them other manner of Meſſengers to morrow, and by God's help ſup with them in the City, altho he were not unto them welcome. Neither failed he of that his Promiſe; for the next day, having out of the Suburbs, by the fury of his Artillery, made two fair Breaches in the City, he by the Ruines thereof, with great ſlaughter of the Enemy, entred the City, albeit that the Turks did what they might to have defended the ſame, by caſting down upon the Chriſtians, as they entred, Darts, Wild-fire, and ſuch-like things, uſually provided for ſuch purpoſe. But ſeeing now no remedy, but that they muſt needs give place to the fortune of their Enemies, they fled amain into their Houſes, there to defend themſelves, or elſe to die; many of which Houſes they had before of purpoſe ſo undermined, as that they could eaſily overthrow them, and ſo overwhelm as many as ſhould come within the danger of them: which ſo ſtrange a Reſolution was by many of them as deſperately performed; inſomuch, that the goodly Church, the Palace, with many other ſumptuous Buildings, were left unto the Chriſtians all rent and torn, not much better than rude heaps of Rubbiſh and Stones. Howbeit, the Baſſa, upon promiſe of Life, yielded himſelf, and was by the Duke preſently ſent unto the Camp; the reſt of the Souldiers being (as in ſuch caſe it commonly hapneth) all or moſt of them put to the Sword. The greateſt part of the Prey fell unto the Wallons; who by heaps breaking into the richeſt Houſes, not only took what themſelves light upon, but ſtrip'd the Germans alſo of ſuch things as they had by chance gotten, to their great heart-burning and grief: yea theſe ravenous and irreligious men not ſo contented, opened the Tombs of the Hungarian Kings, there long before buried, to ſpoil even the dead of ſuch things, as had for Honours ſake been long before interred with them, (if haply any ſuch thing were there to be found) ſhewing themſelves therein more barbarous than the Turks, who by the ſpace of ſixty years having had the City in their Poſſeſſion, had yet ſpared thoſe reverent Monuments, and ſuffered the reliques of thoſe worthy Princes to reſt in peace. Of this taking of Alba-Regalis, the Baſſa of Buda, long before taken Priſoner, and then lying at Vienna, hearing, abſtained from Meat, with his two Servants, a whole day, proſtrate upon his Face, praying unto his Prophet Mahomet, who had (as he ſaid) all this year been angry with the Turks. Which had the ſiege of Caniſia taken the like effect, had then undoubtedly been unto them moſt unfortunate; but God in his Wiſdom ſtill tempereth the ſweet with the ſour.

Now in the mean while was Aſſan, the Viſier Baſſa and General of the Turks Army, with ſuch Souldiers as were already aſſembled at Belgrade, coming to have relieved Alba-Regalis; and albeit that he underſtood by the way as he marched, that the City was won by the Chriſtians, yet held he on his intended Journey; and ſo taking with him the Baſſa of Buda, with the other Sanzacks and Commanders of the Towns and Caſtles thereabout, had formed an Army of about threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, but for moſt part raw and unexpert Souldiers; with which power he ſtill held on his way towards Alba-Regalis, as well thereby to give ſome Contentment unto the angry Sultan, his Maſter, as in hope alſo to overthrow the Chriſtian Army, or at leaſtwiſe to find the City as yet unrepaired, and ſo to regain it. But vain was that his Deſignment, eſpecially for the recovery of the City; for that the Duke had no ſooner taken it, but that he forthwith cauſed the Breaches to be repaired, and for the more aſſurance of it, put into it a ſtrong Garriſon of old expert Souldiers; and being himſelf about twenty thouſand ſtrong, and hearing of the Baſſaes coming, ſet forward to meet him, and being come near unto him, began an hot and bloody Skirmiſh with him. Yet the Baſſa, to proſecute his intended purpoſe for the recovery of Alba-Regalis, the next day ſent away part of his Army, to make proof if happily the City might yet be again recovered; and himſelf in the mean time with the reſt of his Army, offered Battel unto the Chriſtians, ſo to buſie them, that they ſhould not be able to trouble them whom he had ſent to Alba-Regalis, or to relieve the City, if it ſhould chance to be by them diſtreſſed. When as the Duke, before informed of the baſeneſs of the Souldiers in the Baſſaes Army, and that although he were for number of men far above him, yet that for old, hardy, and expert Souldiers, he was ſtrong enough for him, valiantly went out and encountered him; and ſo even at the firſt onſet by plain Valour diſordering the formoſt Squadrons of the Turks Battel, inforced them to retire with the loſs of ſix thouſand men; among whom were the Baſſa of Buda, ſix Sanzacks, with divers other Captains and Commanders of good place and mark. At which time he alſo took from them divers pieces of great Artillery, and had undoubtedly with a notable ſlaughter overthrown all the reſt of the Baſſaes Army, had not a great Squadron of the Tartars, even at that inſtant, ſhewed themſelves at the backs of the Chriſtians, and ſo ſtaying them, given leiſure unto the Baſſa again to reſtore his diſordered Battel. Whereupon the Duke, contenting himſelf with the Victory he had already gotten, in good order retired again into his Trenches, having in this Conflict not loſt above three hundred of his People. But whilſt both Armies thus lay, and new Supplies ſtill repairing unto them, expecting but when they ſhould come to a general day of Battel; the Janizaries ſtill murmuring, that it was now no time of the year longer to keep the field, by their Importunity inforced the Baſſa to retire to Buda, and there to diſband his Army. In which his retreat many were by the Chriſtians cut off in the tail of his Army, and a number of Priſoners taken, and amongſt the reſt fifty of the french Mutineers of Pappa; whom the Archduke Matthias, at the inſtance of Duke Mercurie, afterwards pardoned. Neither ſped they much better, that were ſent by the Baſſa to have attempted the taking of Alba-Regalis; for being come near thereunto, they were ſo welcomed with great ſhot out of the City, and charged with often Sallies by the ſtrong Garriſon, that ſeeing no hope to prevail, they were glad to riſe and to return again unto the Baſſa that ſent them.

The Victory of the Chriſtians over the Turks.

Caniſia beſieged by Ferdinand the Arch-duke.

About the ſame time that the Duke began to beſiege Alba-Regalis, Ferdinand the Arch-duke, having received great Aid from the Pope, with the other Princes of Italy, and the King of Spain, and ſo now 30000 ſtrong, by the advice of the Duke of Mantua, his Lieutenant General, reſolved to beſiege Caniſia; which to have again recovered out of the hands of the Turks, concerned much, not them of Stiria and Auſtria only, but the other Provinces adjoyning, yea, and Italy it ſelf alſo; whereupon he with his Army in good order came the tenth of September and encamped before it; the Duke of Mantua, and Don John de Medices, with 2000 Harquebuſers, and two Cornets of Horſe being come the day before to take a view of the Town, at whom the Turks made divers ſhot, but without any harm doing. And albeit that the Turks there in Garriſon (in number not paſt a thouſand, accounting amongſt them three hundred of the Wallons, ſometime of the Garriſon of Pappa) with their often and gallant Sallies greatly troubled the Chriſtians, and that great bands of other Turks came many times out of the ſtrong Towns and Fortreſſes thereby, to skirmiſh with them, and to ſee if they could put any more Souldiers into the Town for the more aſſurance thereof; yet ſuch was the carefulneſs of the Chriſtian Commanders, and Valour of their Souldiers, that the Turks, both in the one place and in the other, were ſtill repulſed and put to flight, with the loſs alſo of ſome of their ſmall Caſtles and Forts thereabout. To approach this ſtrong Town, and to plant a battery againſt it, ſeemed to be a matter of great difficulty, for that it was (as we have elſewhere ſaid) environed round with a Mariſh; yet means was found to dry it a little, and to fill it up on the one ſide, and to come ſo near the Town, that having planted three tyre of Artillery againſt it, the Chriſtians began furiouſly to batter it, beating down both the Walls, the Houſes, and other Buildings therein. Yea, at length they had brought their approaches ſo near, that they were come with their Trenches even cloſe unto the Town Ditch, perſwading the Turks, now whilſt they might upon good Conditions, to ſurrender the Town, and ſo to ſave their Lives. Whereunto their fierce and inraged Minds were ſo far from hearkening, that braving the Chriſtians, they ſaid, That they would in deſpight of all their Forces keep the place for their Sultan, do what they could. Whereupon the Arch-duke, and the Duke of Mantua, by the Advice of Medices, and the reſt of the principal Captains and Commanders in the Army, reſolved to give a general aſſault unto the Town. In the mean time News was brought into the Camp of the winning of Alba-Regalis, which there made great rejoycing, in ſign whereof the Chriſtians (as their manner is) in Triumph, many times diſcharged their great Ordnance; and by fit men perſwaded the Garriſon Souldiers in Caniſia to yield, and not to caſt themſelves into ſuch danger as had their Fellows at Alba-Regalis; for that in ſo doing they ſhould not only ſave their Lives, but eaſily alſo obtained ſuch other Conditions as they could reaſonably deſire; whereas, otherwiſe they ſhould to their coſt find the Chriſtians ſtrong enough to conſtrain them, which muſt needs bring with it their utter Ruine and Deſtruction. Whereunto the Garriſon Souldiers (among whom the Renegade Wallons were the chief) contemptuouſly anſwered, That they little feared ſuch weak Aſſailants; and with great cry and ſcorn commanding the Meſſengers to depart, in token of their Confidence, as alſo not to ſeem inferiour unto the Chriſtians, oftentimes to ſmall purpoſe diſcharged their great Ordnance, as had the Chriſtians the day before. Now though the Walls of the Town were with continual Battery ſore ſhaken, and the breaches almoſt laid open; yet was the intended aſſault for a while delayed, until the Bridges might be made that were to be laid over the Town Ditch for the Chriſtians to paſs over upon. But all things (as was thought) now in readineſs, and the Florentines with ſome other of the Italians, (whoſe Lot it was to give the firſt Aſſault) being come forward, the Bridge whereby they were to paſs the Town Ditch, was found both too ſhort and too weak for them to get over unto the other ſide by; ſo that ſinking under them, not the Souldiers only, but even the Commanders themſelves (and namely Herberſtein) were in great danger to have been loſt. By which means they hindered, and the Enemies murthering pieces continually flanking them, and their Muſqueteers ſtill playing upon them afront, they were inforced to retire, leaving behind them three hundred of their men ſlain. Yet were not the Chriſtian Commanders any thing therewith diſcouraged, but being generally reſolved not to give over that they had taken in hand, until they had brought it to effect, began to make ſuch Proviſion as they knew to be needful to preſerve their Army under, againſt the Violence of the Winter Weather, as alſo to hinder that no Victual might be brought unto the Town, ſo by Famine, at length to inforce the Turks and Wallons to yield; who, although they were already pinched with Wants, inſomuch that Horſe-fleſh was dainty chear with them; yet for all that, they nothing abated of their wonted fierceneſs; but being again required to yield, vouchſafed not to anſwer them one word, but inſtead thereof ſhook their naked Swords afar off at them, in token of their undaunted Courage. But yet for all this Reſolution of the Commanders for the continuance of the ſiege, Aldobrandino, General of the Italians, being now a little before, dead of an old Infirmity that he had, the Italians began at the firſt, ſome few of them ſecretly to withdraw themſelves out of their quarter; but afterward by greater numbers to depart, and ſo to return again into their Country; alledging for their excuſe, want both of Pay and Victuals. But the reſt better minded, underſtanding that the Turks were riſen from before Alba Regalis, and the reſt of their Army disbanded, began to enter into new hope by ſome device or other, to paſs the Ditch, and ſo by force to take the Town; and the rather, for that they were by a French Fugitive informed both of the Weakneſs and Wants of the beſieged. Whereupon, they began afreſh to make new Engine for the approaching of the Walls, without danger of the Enemies Ordnance any more to flank them. At which time alſo, viz. the fourth of November, the Lord Ruſſworm came unto the Camp, ſent thither from Duke Mercury, with 8000 Souldiers, after that Haſſan Baſſa had broke up his Army; by whoſe coming they were alſo the more encouraged to proſecute that they had taken in hand. Neither failed the Turks in the mean time with often Sallies to trouble the Chriſtians; attempting above all things to have fired their Tents, for that ſo lying open in that ſo cold a ſeaſon of the year, they muſt thereby of Neceſſity be inforced to raiſe their Siege, and be gone. But the Succeſs of theſe their ſo great Deſigns was not anſwerable to their Hopes, being ſtill to their loſs beaten back into the Town by the Chriſtians; whom it behoved to look well about them, for that the beſieged deſperately ſet, and all reſolved rather to die than to yield, adventured themſelves to all Dangers, never ceaſing to do what they might to put the Chriſtians out of hope for winning the Town. But whilſt the Turks with doubtful, and as it were deſperate hope, ſo defend the Place, and the Chriſtians grown ſtronger by the coming of their Friends, lay in hope to win the ſame; lo, in the latter end of November, the North Wind, accompanied with a deep Snow, ſo furiouſly raged, that it overthrew the greateſt part of the Tents and Pavilions of the Chriſtians, and as it were, buried their whole Army in the Snow and Ice, in ſuch wiſe, as that in Ferdinand the Arch-duke's camp (being reaſonably well provided for) were 1500 men with 300 Horſes ſtarved and frozen to death. At which time the ſtate of them that came with the Lord Ruſſworm was moſt miſerable; who wearied with the ſiege of Alba-Regalis, and as it were, ſpent with the dirty Travel of the deep way, had not brought with them their Tents or other Proviſion, and were therefore inforced to lie abroad in ſo cold and unſeaſonable a time; with whoſe Miſeries, although their good General was much grieved, yet to do the Chriſtian Commonweal Service, he with them right patiently endured. In which ſo great an Extremity, the Arch-duke, with the reſt of the Commanders, upon view taken, well conſidering what ſmall hope there was in good time to take the Town, the unreaſonableneſs of the Winter-weather ſtill more and more increaſing; thought it better betime to riſe, than longer to expoſe their Army unto moſt certain Deſtruction, either of the Enemy or the Cold. Which was done with ſuch haſte and confuſed Tumult, as that their riſing ſeemed rather an haſty flight, than honourable departure; leaving behind them, for haſte, their great Ordnance, with their Tents and Baggage; a common Voice ſtill running, That they were well if they might but ſave themſelves; ſo that the Souldiers every man mindful but of himſelf, and in fear to be purſued by the Enemy, no man chaſing them, fled. but ſtill accompanied with ſuch furious Winds, Snow, and extream Cold, that with all the Labour they could take, they could get them no heat, but fell down to the Earth many of them frozen, and ſo once falling, never roſe more, being unable for want of heat to help themſelves; in which caſe they were not to expect for help from others, every man having enough to do to look unto himſelf; ſo that upon the way whereby the Army went thus diſperſed with the Weather, lay above five hundred dead of cold, beſide four hundred others left ſick in the forſaken Trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the Army, were thought to have been all put to the Sword by them of the Garriſon of Caniſia.

The Chriſtians by Tempeſt and Extremity of Weather enforced to give over the Siege of Caniſia.

But having thus paſſed through theſe Troubles of Hungary, it is time now alſo to look back again into the frontier Countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia; which to have kept in the Emperours Obeiſance, and ſo preſerved as a lively Member of the Chriſtian Common-weal, no leſs concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier Territories, which are many. Michael, the Vayvod of Valachia, the laſt year for his Cruelty, firſt driven out of Tranſilvania by Baſta, and afterwards out of Valachia by the great Chancellour of Polonia, Michael the Vayvod ſubmitteth himſelf unto the Emperour.

Sigiſmund overthrown by Baſta and the Vayvod, flyeth out of Tranſilvania.

(as is aforeſaid) and another placed in his ſtead; as a man forſaken even of his own better Fortunes, and not well knowing which way to turn himſelf, thought it beſt now at laſt to ſubmit himſelf unto the Emperour, if ſo happily by his means he might in ſome ſort repair his broken Eſtate, and ſo at leaſtwiſe recover his Government in Valachia. So reſolved, he ſet forward, and in the beginning of this year, viz. the three and twentieth of January, with five and thirty of his Followers, and ſix Coaches, arrived at Prague, where he was by the Emperours appointment honourably received, and his coſt at the Emperours charge defraied. Unto whom he excuſed himſelf of the Severity by him uſed in Tranſilvania (the cauſe of thoſe late Troubles in that Country) as inforced thereunto by the ſtubbornneſs of the Tranſilvanians themſelves, whom he found ſtill inclined to rebellion, and unwilling to be commanded by any but by themſelves. Which his excuſe (as true) was well admitted, and he with all Kindneſs uſed. Now at this ſame time Baſta lying alſo in Tranſilvania, as Governour for the Emperour, right ſlenderly accompanied (as is before alſo declared) the Parliament at Clauſenburg being ended, and all Controverſies (as was thought) well compoſed, now without fear, one night, the watch being ſet, went to bed to take his reſt; where he had not long lain, but that certain of the Tranſilvanian Lords, among whom the Chiaki was chief, came with their Followers, and ſurpriſing the Watch, and entering the Palace, brake into the Chamber where he lay, took him out of his Bed, and ſo kept him Priſoner all that Night. And the next morning going forth, about twelve miles off met with Sigiſmund Bator, their late Prince, before ſecretly by them called in, whom they honourably conducted to Clauſenburg, and there delivered unto him Baſta, the late Governour for the Emperour, whom he commanded to be caſt into Irons; and ſo going to the Palace, gave like order for the apprehending and ſafe keeping of the reſt of the Nobility alſo, ſuch as had taken part with Baſta in the behalf of the Emperour. For now the Tranſilvanians were divided into three parts; whereof the one ſtood for the Emperour, the ſecond for Iſtuan Bathor, (pretending, that unto him belonged the Soveraignty of that Province) but the third, and far the greateſt, for Sigiſmund, their antient Lord and Leader, who now by means of the King of Polonia, reconciled unto the great Turk, and in this troubleſome time by his Favourites called again into his Country, was by them joyfully received at Alba-Julia, Clauſenburg, and the reſt of the chief Cities of Tranſilvania. Who now thereof again poſſeſſed, for the better aſſuring of his Eſtate, forthwith writ unto the Emperour what had happened, requeſting him to content himſelf, that he was deſirous of his Love and Favour, promiſing to be always his good Friend and Neighbour, and for ever to keep good Amity with him; giving Baſta alſo (whom he had now at the Interceſſion of certain great Friends again enlarged) to underſtand, That he was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging unto his Principality, as alſo to ceaſe from further moleſting of his People, that were now voluntarily again returned unto his Obedience; which his requeſt was neither of the one nor of the other much regarded or hearkened unto; For the Emperour, upon the firſt Advertiſement of this ſo great an alteration in Tranſilvania, calling unto him Michael the Vayvod (not ſo much troubled with the ſtrangeneſs of the matter, as for that his Wife and Son, whom he had left as Hoſtages with Baſta, were now come into the Hands of the Tranſilvanians, his mortal Enemies) and ſatisfying him in many things that he had before requeſted, took order with him, That with all convenient ſpeed returning home again into Valachia, where he was now much longed for (the People generally diſliking of the ſimple Vayvod, by the great Chancellor ſet over them) and gathering together ſuch Power as he could, he ſhould joyn himſelf with Baſta, his Lieutenant General, unto whom he had already ſent great Companies both of Horſe and Foot for the expulſing of Sigiſmund out of Tranſilvania, and the reducing again of that Province under his Obeiſance. Whereupon the Vayvod forthwith returning into Valachia, and aſſembling about ten thouſand of his Friends, all good and expert Souldiers, went to ſeek for Baſta, as he had with the Emperour agreed; whom he found ready in the field with about twenty thouſand Foot, and eight thouſand Horſe, but newly departed from Veradinum; where, muſtering their Army, they with their united Forces entered into Tranſilvania, there to put in Execution what the Emperour had commanded. Where the Vayvod, in diſdain of the People which loved him not, with Fire and Sword waſted all the Country before him as he went; not without the great diſcontment of Baſta, to whom it ſeemed not good to make deſolate that Country which he was in good hope ſhould in ſhort time be his Lord and Maſters, the Emperours. But Sigiſmund, underſtanding both of the coming of his Enemies, and of the harm they did in his Country, riſe from Solnock, where he lay encamped with his Army, and ſo to hinder their further proceeding, went to meet them; howbeit, being come ſo near unto them as that he might well diſcover them, he would not come to the trial of a Battel with them, which was by them offered; but fortified himſelf in his Trenches, ſo ſeeking but to delay the time until the coming of the Tartars, which were to have come unto him from the Chancellour of Polonia, as alſo of ſix thouſand Turks to have been ſent him from the Baſſa of Belgrade. Where having afterward underſtood that the Paſſage of the Tartars to have been ſent him, was ſtayed by Don Ferrant Gonzaga, the Emperours Lieutenant in the upper Hungary; and that the Turks ſtaying at Giula, would come no farther except they had their Pay before hand; finding himſelf too weak with his own Power to encounter with his Enemies, he riſe with his Army, with purpoſe to have retired a little back, and to have taken certain ſtrait Paſſages whereby the Enemy muſt needs paſs, ſo by the Advantage of the place to have holpen his own weak ſtrength. But Baſta and the Vayvod, perceiving his riſing (whereunto they were ſtill attentive) followed him with ſuch ſpeed, that they overtook him before he could get thither, and ſo hardly preſſed him, that needs he muſt turn his Face and joyn Battel, or elſe ſuffer his People altogether like Beaſts to be ſlain. In which doing, albeit that neither he nor his failed to do what was by men to be done for the obtaining of a notable Victory; yet ſuch was the Valour of the Souldiers of Baſta, and the Vayvod, that in a great fight having diſordered his Foot-men, they put them to flight, and ſo cut them all in pieces. Which the Prince beholding, and not able to remedy the matter, betime fled with his Horſe-men from the Fury of his Enemies, and ſo retired to the uttermoſt Confines of Tranſilvania, having in this Battel loſt ten thouſand of his faithful Souldiers. Whereupon Claudiopolis, with divers other Cities and Towns of that Country, returned again unto the Emperours Obeiſance.

In the proſecuting of this Victory, the Vayvod, to ſatisfie the hatred he had of long borne againſt the Tranſilvanians, did what ſpoil he could, utterly waſting all the Places whereby he paſſed; which Baſta not liking, requeſted him to uſe his Victory with more Modeſty, and to have more reſpect to what he did, eſpecially unto ſuch Places or Perſons as of themſelves returned unto the Emperour's Obeiſance. Whereunto he proudly anſwered, That he would do what he thought good, without his Appointment or the Emperour's either, eſpecially in that Country, which he had now with his own Sword twice conquered: and that therefore Baſta might command them that were by him to be commanded; as for himſelf, he acknowledged no Sovereignty that either Baſta or the Emperour had over him. Unto which his ſo preſumptuous a Speech Baſta replied not, but yet much therewith diſcontented, began to enter into a great Suſpicion from what ground thoſe his haughty Conceits (eaſily by his Words to be gathered) might grow: and ſo from that time better obſerving his Proceedings, perceived him to have Intelligence with the Turks, with purpoſe to joyn hands with them, that ſo by their help, chaſing the Imperials out of Tranſilvania, he might hold it to himſelf, as tributary to the Othoman Emperour, of all others beſt able to defend him. Which to be true (beſide divers other ſtrong Preſumptions) he certainly underſtood by certain Letters of his written to that purpoſe, intercepted by his Souldiers and brought unto him; whereupon he became very penſive and heavy, for the great Power the Vayvod was of in thoſe Countries, as alſo for the great Strength he had even then preſent about him, and wherewith he was as it were then guarded. So conſulting with certain of his Collonels and chief Commanders of his Army, what were beſt to be done in that ſo dangerous a caſe whereof ſo much depended? A Wallon Captain offered himſelf to go into the Vayvod's Camp, and there in his own Tent to kill him as a Traitor. Which his Offer well liked of, and he as ready to perform as he was to promiſe, going into the Vayvod's Camp, accompanied with ſome threeſcore men, and finding him in his Tent, boldly ſtepping to him, willed him to yield himſelf the Emperour's Priſoner; whereat he being about to lay his hand upon his Scimitar, the Wallon Captain with an Halbard thruſt him into the Breaſt; at which very inſtant, another with a Sword at one Blow clave his Head down to the Shoulders: an unworthy Death for ſo worthy a Captain, had not Ambition (the torment of great Spirits) carried him too high with the Wings of immoderate deſire, beyond the bounds of Loyalty and Reaſon. But there he lieth now dead among his Friends, whom the great Turk ſometime more feared even in his Palace at Conſtantinople, than he did all the reſt of the Emperour's Commanders. Preſently upon his Death a great Tumult and Hurly-burly was raiſed by the Souldiers in his Camp; but Baſta forthwith ſhewing himſelf with all his Souldiers in Arms, and withal producing the Letters declaring the Treaſon by the Vayvod contrived with the Baſſa of Temeſwar againſt the Emperour, all was again appeaſed; but eſpecially for that his Souldiers now ſaw themſelves without an Head, and too weak alſo for the Imperials there preſent and already in Arms. In the Vayvod's Tent were alſo other Letters found, ſo plainly declaring his ſecret Colluſion with the Turk, and Treaſon againſt the Emperour, that the Valachians, who at the firſt were wonderfully moved with his Death, and hearing the ſame read, reſted not now only contented, but ſaid moreover, that he was worthily ſlain, and that if they had known him to have had any ſuch traiterous purpoſe, they would themſelves long before have taken of him deſerved Puniſhment. Now unto his Souldiers Baſta offered, at their choice, either to depart whither they would without danger, or elſe taking the Oath of Obedience unto the Emperour, to enter into his Pay, which moſt part of them did. The Tumult appeaſed, the dead Body of the Vayvod was laid out a whole day for the Souldiers to gaze upon, and ſo afterward buried. So lieth he, that but of late, and many times before, had ſo fortunately overthrown his Enemies; unhappy man himſelf now overthrown by his own Ambition and Unconſtancy.

The Tranſilvanians ſubmit themſelves unto Baſta.

Baſta, now delivered of the great fear he had before of the Vayvod, what by force, what by agreement, in ſhort time took in moſt part of the Country; for that the Tranſilvanians, ſeeing the ſmall Power of Sigiſmund, and well comforted with the death of Michael the Vayvod, ſo much of them hated; as alſo to avoid the dangers even preſently hanging over their Heads from the Imperials, if they ſhould in any thing ſhew themſelves obſtinate againſt them, ſubmitted themſelves wholly to the Courteſie of Baſta, ſo that the places were but few that yet held out for the Prince Sigiſmund; who in the mean time was doing what he might for the raiſing of a new Army (having not altogether with this late Overthrow forthwith alſo loſt his hope) by the help of the Turks, Tartars, and Polonians, to recover again the poſſeſſion of his State, and by force of Arms to chaſe out the Imperials. But he being brought to ſo low an ebb, and almoſt all the Country of Tranſilvania poſſeſſed by Baſta, who would not have thought but that now after ſo long Travels it would have remained wholly at the Emperour's Devotion? and ſo many, that thought themſelves to ſee much, ſaid aſſuredly it would. But ſee the change, and what ſmall aſſurance even the greateſt have of the Conſtancy of the vain multitude; never more like themſelves, than in diſliking to morrow what they beſt liked to day, fooliſh, ſenſeleſs, improvident, raſh, headſtrong, violent, and above all things, mutable, and unconſtant. So now for all that Baſta had done for the aſſurance of this Country unto the Emperour (being ſo much as moſt Men thought to have been ſufficient, and indeed as much as was poſſible for him to do) even in the winding up of this Year 1601, the Tranſilvanians, underſtanding that Sigiſmund, with a great Army of Polonians, Turks, and Tartars, was now coming againſt the Imperials, moſt part of them preſently took up Arms in his favour, ſaying, That their firſt Oath, voluntarily given unto him as their natural Prince and Governour, was more to be reſpected than any other afterwards by force extorted from them by a foreign Prince. Inſomuch that Baſta perceiving with what a Tempeſt he was like even preſently to be overwhelmed, to ſave himſelf and his People from the rage thereof, withdrew himſelf with his Followers unto a ſtrong Town in a corner of that Country; from whence he with all ſpeed ſent unto the Emperour for greater Aid, as well for the defence of the Place he yet held, as for the ſubduing again of that rebellious People. After whoſe departure, Sigiſmund, without reſiſtance, entring the Country, was of the People in general joyfully received, as their moſt lawful Prince and Sovereign, and all the Honour done unto him that was by them poſſible: in which his ſo princely, but dangerous eſtate, now twice in leſs than the ſpace of one Year by him regained, and yet thereof no whit aſſured, we will for a while leave him to joy therein with his Subjects.

Baſta flieth.

The Baſſa of Agria overthrown by Ferrant Gonzaga.

But whilſt the State thus turneth upſide down in Tranſilvania, the Baſſa of Agria going out with 10000 Turks in hope to have ſurpriſed Toccay (a ſtrong hold of the Chriſtians in the upper Hungary, was encountered by Ferrant Gonzaga, the Emperour's Lieutenant there, and by him overthrown, and with great ſlaughter of his Turks chaſed to the Gates of Agria.

Now was Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour this Year alſo no leſs troubled with the Proceedings of the Scrivano in Caramania and Natolia, than with the evil Succeſs of his Affairs in Tranſilvania and Hungary. For, the Scrivano by his laſt years Victory grown into great credit with the common People, and ſtill by them more and more followed; to maintain the reputation of his Credit, came now again this year with a great Power into the Field, to meet with Mahomet, the great Baſſa, and General of the Turks Army; who, with fifty thouſand good Souldiers (a Power thought ſufficient to have repreſſed him) was ready to encounter him: With whom the Scrivano joyning Battel, in a great Fight cut in ſunder a great part of the Baſſa's Army, and ſo became Maſter of the Field, forraged all the Countries adjoyning almoſt as far as Aleppo; ſtill calling the People unto Liberty, and cauſing himſelf to be proclaimed the true Defender of the Mahometan Faith, and of the Liberty of thoſe Countries with him combined; in ſuch ſort, as that it now ſtood the great Turk upon to ſend another great Army to the Aid of Mahomet the diſcomfited Baſſa. With whom alſo, the Scrivano (preſuming of his former Fortune) coming to a day of Battel, and overcharged with the multitude of his Enemies, was at the firſt Encounter, with his People, put to the worſe: but forthwith by his good direction having repaired his diſordered Battel, and thereby given as it were new Courage to his fainting Souldiers, he with a great Slaughter diſordered alſo the Baſſa's Army. Yet having not any other firm ſtate or ſtay to reſt upon, more than the Favour and Reputation he held with theſe his rebellious Followers, of whom he had now loſt a great many, he thought it not beſt to adventure too far (not knowing how preſently to repair his Loſſes) but contenting himſelf with what he had already done, retired with his Army into the ſtrength of the Mountains, there that Winter to live upon the Spoil of the Countries adjoyning, and the next Year to do more harm than ever he had done before.

The Janizaries in Mutiny at Conſtantinople.

Beſide all which former Troubles, the Plague alſo this year ſore raged in Conſtantinople and many other Places of the Turkiſh Empire. At which time alſo, the Janizaries at Conſtantinople having received ſome Diſgrace by ſome of the Great Sultan's Favourites, and with great Inſolency requiring to have their Heads, cauſed their Aga, well accompanied, preſumptuouſly to enter into the Seraglio to prefer this their Requeſt; whom Mahomet, to the terror of the reſt, cauſed for his Preſumption to be taken into the midſt of the Spahi, and ſo by them to be cut in pieces; which was not done without the great Slaughter of the Spahi themſelves alſo, ſlain by the Janizaries. Whereupon the other Janizaries ariſing up in Arms alſo, and even now ready to have revenged the Death of their Captain, were yet by the Wiſdom of Cicala Baſſa, beſtowing amongſt them a great Sum of Money, again appeaſed, without farther harm doing. Which their ſo great Inſolency Mahomet imputing unto their exceſſive drinking of Wine, contrary to their Law of the great Prophet; by the perſuaſion of the Mufti, commanded all ſuch as had any Wine in their Houſes in the City of Conſtantinople and Pera, upon pain of Death to bring it out and ſtave it, except the Ambaſſadors of the Queen's Majeſty of England, the French King, and of the State of Venice; ſo that as ſome report, Wine for a ſpace ran down the Channels of the Streets in Conſtantinople, as if it had been Water after a great ſhower of Rain.

Sigiſmund, the Tranſilvanian Prince, now of late again poſſeſſed of Tranſilvania (as is before declared) could not yet well aſſure himſelf of the keeping thereof; for that he, with the Tranſilvanians of his Faction alone, was not able to withſtand the force of Baſta; who ſtill ſtrengthened with new Supplies both of men and all things elſe neceſſary for the Wars, from the Emperour, was now with a great Power already entred into Tranſilvania; the Polonians buſied in the Wars of Suevia, and the Turks with their other greater Affairs, neither of them ſending him their promiſed Aid, the greateſt hope and ſtay of himſelf in that newneſs of his Eſtate. Wherefore ſeeing himſelf every day to loſe one place or other, and fearing alſo leſt his Souldiers for want of Pay ſhould in ſhort time quite forſake him, and go over to Baſta, he thought it beſt, betimes and whilſt he had yet ſomething left, and was not yet altogether become deſperate, otherwiſe to provide for his Eſtate, eſpecially having ſmall Truſt in the Turks, to whom he had been before ſo great an Enemy. Wherefore he dealt with Baſta for a Truce or Ceſſation from Arms, until Ambaſſadors might be ſent unto the Emperour, to intreat with him for ſome good Attonement. Wherewith Baſta being content, and the Ambaſſadors ſent, the matter was ſo handled with the Emperour, that Sigiſmund, to make an end of all theſe Troubles, was contented to the behoof of his Imperial Majeſty, to reſign unto Baſta his Lieutenant all ſuch places as he yet held in Tranſilvania, upon much like Conditions he had about three Years before made with him; and ſo in all, and for all, to ſubmit himſelf unto his Majeſty. Which intended Surrender of the Prince's being bruted in Tranſilvania, Zachel Moiſes his Lieutenant (and now in Field with the Prince's Forces) not able to endure or to hear that that noble Province ſhould again fall into the hands of the Germans; encouraging his Souldiers, went upon the ſudden to aſſail Baſta, in hope to have found him unprovided, and ſo diſcomfiting his Army, to have driven the Imperials quite out of Tranſilvania; but he an old and expert Commander, perceiving even the firſt moving of the Tranſilvanians, with great Celerity put his Army in good order, and ſo joyned Battel with them; wherein he with the loſs of ſome five hundred men overthrew Moiſes, with his Army of Tranſilvanians, Turks, and Tartars, having ſlain above three thouſand of them, and put the reſt to flight; Moiſes himſelf with ſome few others being now glad to take their Refuge into the Frontiers of the Turks Territories towards Temeſwar. But when Sigiſmund underſtood what his Lieutenant had, without his knowledge, done, he in token of his own Innocency went himſelf unto the Imperial Camp, accompanied only with certain of his Gentlemen, and thereunto Baſta excuſed himſelf of that which was by his Lieutenant againſt his Will, and without his Privity done; frankly offering to perform whatſoever was on his part to be performed, according to the Agreement made betwixt the Emperour and him. And ſo preſently calling his Garriſons out of all ſuch ſtrong Places as were yet for him holden, he ſurrendred them to Baſta; and ſo forthwith, honourably accompanied, put himſelf upon his way towards the Emperour. After whoſe Departure out of Tranſilvania, all that Province voluntarily, and without more ado, yielded to Baſta as to the Emperour's Lieutenant; who preſently called an Aſſembly of all the Nobility of the Country, taking of them an Oath for their Obedience and Loyalty unto the Emperour. Thus by the Wiſdom and Proweſs of this worthy Commander, is the Country of Tranſilvania once again brought under the Emperour's Obeiſance; a matter of far greater Importance than to have won the ſtrongeſt City the Turk holdeth in Hungary.

1602

Great Troubles in Valachia.

But whilſt theſe things thus paſſed in Tranſilvania, great troubles ariſe in Valachia (the Country next adjoyning) for that the People of that Province not able longer to endure the great Inſolency of the Turks (who after the Death of Michael had by their Power made one Jeremias Vayvod there) by a general conſent took up Arms, and proclaiming one Radoll (a favorite of the Emperours) Vayvod, chaſed Jeremias (before placed by the Turks) quite out of the Country; who flying unto Simon, Palatine of Moldavia, his Friend, by his means, and the help of the Turks, returning unto Valachia, drave out thence Radoll again; who being now at this preſent with Baſta, with about ten thouſand Valachians, his Followers, earneſtly requeſted of him (now that he was ſo quietly poſſeſſed of Tranſilvania) to help him with his Forces for the recovery of Valachia. And Baſta well conſidering how much it concerned the quiet and ſure keeping of the poſſeſſion of Tranſilvania, for the Emperour to have that ſo near a Province to friend, eaſily yielded to his requeſt; and gave him a great Regiment of his old approved Souldiers, and ſo ſent him away to recover his Eſtate: with whom (at his entrance into Valachia) the Moldavian meeting with a great Power both of his own, and of the Turks, come thither in the favour of Hieremias, there was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible and bloody Battel, the glory whereof fell unto Radoll, he carrying away the Victory. In which Battel, two of the Turks Baſſaes were there ſlain, with a great number of others, both of the Moldavians and Turks. After which Victory Radoll recovered again the Soveraignty of Valachia, for which he was beholding to Baſta; and ſhortly after with the ſame Aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were coming to have aided the Moldavian.

Troubles in Hungary.

Now in the mean time in Hungary alſo paſſed many an hot Skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, whoſe Garriſons at Buda, and in other places in the lower Hungary, attempting to have ſurpriſed Alba-Regalis, and diſcovered by the Chriſtians, were with great ſlaughter enforced to retire. At which time alſo, County Serinus underſtanding by his Eſpials, that the Turks with two hundred Waggons, with Munition and Victuals, were going to Caniſia, upon the ſudden ſet upon them, and having ſlain and put to flight the Convoy that guarded them, carried the Waggons, with all that was in them, away with him. And ſhortly after, the free Haiducks of Comara, in a great party going out towards Buda to ſeek after Booty, and having taken threeſcore Turks Priſoners, and ſo with them about to have returned home; underſtanding by the way, that Ali, ſometime the Baſſa of Buda, and now Governour of Peſth, was with a ſmall retinue about to come down the River Danubius from Buda, towards Belgrade, there to meet the Viſier Baſſa, but then coming into Hungary; they ſlew all the Priſoners, and having got two ſmall Boats, about fifteen miles beneath Buda, lay in wait for the Baſſa; who, according to their Expectation, coming down the River, was by theſe Adventurers fiercely aſſailed, and of his thirty followers having fourteen ſlain, being himſelf alſo ſhot in two places of his Body, was there with a great Booty taken, and ſo brought to Comara, and ſhortly after preſented unto Matthias the Arch-duke at Vienna; who amongſt other things, certainly enformed, that Haſſan Baſſa was with a great Army by the commandment of the great Sultan Mahomet, coming to beſiege Alba-Regalis, and that he was now upon his way as far as Belgrade; preſently ſent thither the County Tſolan, Governour thereof, who with much ado got into the City, the Turks having already taken all the Paſſages, to have hindered the Chriſtians from puting in either Men or Munition, more than was therein already. Howbeit, the County now got in there, and being no leſs good Engineer than a valiant Commander, cauſed all them in the City to labour upon the Rampiers; ſo that beſide the natural Scituation thereof, which was very ſtrong, he had in ſhort time ſo fortified it, as that in moſt mens Judgment it ſeemed a place almoſt impregnable. This Ali Baſſa was ſometime the great Turks Butler, but after the taking of Agria, made Baſſa of Buda; which great place he held but three Months, being by the Envy and Ambition of ſome, but eſpecially of Amurath Baſſa, removed thence, and made Governour of Peſth; from whence now going down the River to Belgrade, it was his Fortune to be thus taken by the Haiducks, unto whom he offered for his Ranſom three hundred thouſand Sultanies; and had with him when he was taken, ſeventy thouſand Duckats.

Ali Baſſa taken Priſoner.

A great Ranſom offered by Ali Baſſa.

Alba-Regalis beſieged by the Turks.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the loſs of Alba-Regalis (taken from him by the Chriſtians the laſt year) and now reſolved for the recovery of the ſame, to ingage, if need ſhould be, a great part of his Forces; had cauſed an Army of an hundred and fifty thouſand ſtrong, to meet at Hadrianople for that purpoſe, under the leading of Haſſan Baſſa, one of the chief Viſiers, to be ſent into Hungary. Who by the way of Belgrade coming to Buda, and from thence to Alba-Regalis, there the twelfth of Auguſt incamped (as he had oftentimes before threatned) with the multitude of his Tents covering all the Country round about, as if it had been a white Snow; where having well entrenched himſelf, and planted his Artillery, he began a moſt terrible and furious Battery, in ſuch ſort as if he had not meant to have made a breach only, but to have beaten the City even from the face of the Earth, which ſeemed now to tremble under his feet, and the Clouds to rend with the thundring of his great Ordnance; and for that the Mariſh and deep Ditches were a great let unto his Men for to come unto the aſſault, he cauſed them with the number of his Pioneers to be filled up (a work thought almoſt impoſſible) and ſo brought on his Men to aſſault the Counterſcarf, which the Governour had cauſed to be made before the City for better defence thereof; which aſſault coſt him much Blood, by reaſon of the wonderful Valour of the defendants; yet in the end the great number of the Turks prevailing, the Chriſtians were inforced to forſake it and retire into the City; but ſhortly after ſallying out again, they with ſuch force aſſailed the Turks now got within the Counterſcarf, that having ſlain moſt part of them that were entered, they forced the other out again; at the brute whereof, an alarm being raiſed throughout the Camp, infinite numbers of the barbarous Enemies came runing thither with ſuch ſavage Fury, that without regard of their Lives, they as deſperate men preſſing ſtill on, fell twice as many as before; inſomuch that the Chriſtians weary of that long and bloody fight, and on every ſide charged, or rather overwhelmed with the Enemies ſhot, were glad again, but not without great loſs, to abandon the place. With which Skirmiſhes, and divers others that they had, the number of the Defendants was greatly diminiſhed, to keep a weak City, ſhewing as yet the Ruins of the late Siege, when it was by the Chriſtians won; the breaches thereof being but evil repaired, and the Mines yet gaping, requiring great and ſtrong Fortification to hold out and endure any long Siege againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy. Yet was not the Courage of the valiant County Tſolan the Italian Governour, any whit therewith abated, but by his Letters gave the Arch-duke Matthias, to underſtand in what caſe things ſtood with them in the City: requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him relief, for that otherwiſe the City, ſo weakly both manned and fortified, would be in danger to be loſt; many of the Garriſon Souldiers being already ſlain in the defence thereof, and divers of the Hungarians forſaking the Walls, daily flying unto the Turks Camp; promiſing yet nevertheleſs himſelf to do the uttermoſt of his devoir. Upon the receit of which Letters, the Arch-duke gave order unto the Lord Ruſſworm (Maſter of the Camp) to go forthwith to Comara, and there with ſuch Forces as were from divers places come thither, to go forth and to prove if by any means the weak Garriſon of Alba-Regalis might ſo be relieved, by putting in ſome good ſupply of freſh Souldiers. According to which Command, Ruſſworm coming thither, without delay took the Field with 12000 men which he found there, to ſee if he might with them, put into the City the deſired relief. But whilſt the matter was in the performance thereof too long delaied, by diſcord ariſing betwixt him and the other Colonels, about the manner of relieving the Town, the Baſſa had time to effect his purpoſe; who, the twenty eighth of the ſame Month of Auguſt, after a long and terrible battery, cauſed a general aſſault to be given unto the City; which the Turks from time to time renewing, continued all that Day and the next Night, with ſome part of the day following alſo, without ceaſing; ſo that the Defendants, now much weakened, and they alſo that were left, ſo wearied or wounded, as that they were not well able to make any longer reſiſtance (and the County himſelf, who gave as it were life unto them all, being now alſo carried away dangerouſly hurt in the Thigh with a Musquet ſhot) there was a ſign of Parley given unto the Enemy; which the Baſſa granting, and the Fury of the aſſault ſtaid, certain of the chief Captains and Commanders in the City, going unto the Governour, put him in mind of the weakneſs of the place, of the force of the Enemy, of the number of his moſt valiant men ſlain, of the want of the Defendants. They had (as they ſaid) done enough for their Honour, having endured ſo many and ſo great Aſſaults, in a place not defencible; and enough to diſcharge their Fidelity, having holden it out to the uttermoſt of their Power. That they could do no more than they had done, being not relieved; and that the ſame Bond which bound them to defend the place, bound the Emperour alſo to relieve them, ſeeing that otherwiſe it was not in their Power to maintain it. That they had, with the loſs of their Lives and Blood, ſhewed their Fidelity unto the Emperour, no ſufficient Army appearing from him (according to his Promiſe) for their Succour. That to fight any longer was but to increaſe the Glory of their Enemies, and their own Loſſes; ſeeing that after they had done what they poſſibly could, expoſed to a thouſand dangers, they ſhould nevertheleſs be vanquiſhed, and the City taken. That the ſame Conſideration which carried valiant Minds unto the Effects of Honour, when they are relieved with hope, diſſuaded them being out of all hope of any happy end of their Troubles; and to loſe themſelves to no purpoſe, was as great a ſign of Folly, as to let ſlip a fair Opportunity, was a ſign of Cowardiſe. That they were to expect nothing but extream Miſery, if the Enemy ſhould again force them; the breaches being ſo broad, as whereby they might eaſily enter; and their own beſt men ſlain, that ſhould keep them out. And that therefore he ſhould do well, to come to ſome good Compoſition with the Enemy, whilſt they had yet ſomething to yield up unto him, and that he ſtood in ſome fear of them; and not to expect, whilſt they were ſpoiled of all means, either to reſiſt him by force, or to bind him by Courteſie; nothing remaining for them in the place, but death, if they ſhould obſtinately ſtand to the defence thereof; nor no way left to ſave their Lives, but by yielding.

With theſe Perſwaſions, the Governour moved, came to a Parley with the Baſſa, being right glad thereof; as well knowing that a Town beſieged coming to a Parley, is commonly more than half woon; and glad by any means to gain it, for that thereof depended the aſſurance both of his Head and Honour; where, after ſome ſhort talk, it was agreed, That the County ſhould yield the Town into the Hands of the Baſſa, with all the great Ordnance, and other warlike Munition therein; and that the County with his Garriſon, ſhould with Bag and Baggage in ſafety depart with their Arms, by the Suburbs leading toward Rab; and with a good Convoy in ſafety to be brought half way thither. This Capitulation agreed upon, and by the Baſſa and the County ſigned, every man aſſured himſelf of the Baſſaes Faith, and thereon reſted. But what Faith is to be expected from a faithleſs man? Upon the firſt brute of this Compoſition, yea and before it was altogether well concluded; whilſt the Merchants in the Town were ſeeking for Waggons to carry their Merchandiſe, and the Souldiers for Horſes to carry their Baggage, the ſcarceneſs thereof bred a great Confuſion and ſtir among the People; as commonly it falleth out in things done in haſte, but eſpecially where men, for ſafeguard of their Lives, in their flight for haſte fall into a thouſand Errors; ſo whilſt ſome in this hurly burly were quarreling about their Horſes and Carriages, and other ſome were opening the Gates to be gone; others were as buſie in robbing and pilfering the Baggages of their Captains and Companions; miſerable men, who all appointed for a Prey unto the greedy and merciless Turks, yet fell to preying one upon another: Which Diſorders encouraged the reſt of the Souldiers to fall to Pillage alſo, ſome loading themſelves with ſuch Goods as the Merchants had for lack of Carriages left behind them; and other ſome even with the Goods of their own Captains; which the Souldiers appointed for defence of the breaches ſeeing, left their charge, and came thronging into the Town, and thruſt themſelves in amongſt the Pilferers, as if the Pillage of the Town had been unto them by triumphant Victory aſſured, and that they themſelves had been Victors, and not men vanquiſhed. The Tartars, lodged at the foot of the breach, ſeeing it forſaken, and without any great ſtrength to defend it, let not this Opportunity ſlip, but preſſing on without any great reſiſtance, entred the ſame; and ſo in a trice full thirty thouſand of them thruſt into the Town, and there ſurpriſed the vanquiſhed Chriſtians, at once loaded with Prey, Fear, and Deſpair. After whom; even by the ſame Breach, the Turks entered alſo, to be Partakers of the ſpoil; ſo that in a moment the Town was full of Enemies, both Turks and Tartars. The Turks beſide the Booty they took themſelves, fell to quarrelling with the Tartars, for ſome part of theirs; and ſo long as there was any thing that might pleaſe their Eyes, or fill their Hands, they abſtained from ſlaughter and bloodſhed, buſying themſelves with that which for the preſent was more for their Profit; but the pillaging ceaſing, by reaſon there was no more to be had; then the perfidious Wretches fell to maſſacring of the miſerable Chriſtians, the Sword devouring all that they could light upon, ſo that all the City flowed with Blood. Neither was there any end thereof, until that by the coming in of the Baſſa the ſlaughter was ſtayed; by which means County Tſolan the late Governour, with ſome other Captains and Souldiers were ſaved, having eſcaped the Enemies Fury.

The Capitulation betwixt the Baſſa and the County, for the yielding up of the City of Alba-Regalis.

Great Diſorder and Confuſion among the beſieged.

Alba-Regalis taken by the Turks.

The Criſtians cruelly murdered in Alba-Regalis.

In this Maſſacre were ſlain 3000 Chriſtian Souldiers, beſide others of the Citizens, in number not few. The Captains that were ſpared, were led Priſoners to Conſtantinople, there to be fed with the Bread of Tribulation; and with them the County Tſolan, for his Valour and noble Courage, unworthy of ſo hard a Fortune. Howbeit, that he by County Tſolan carried away Priſoner to Conſtantinople.

1602 by lively and pregnant Reaſons ſhewed both himſelf and the reſt to be unjuſtly detained, as taken Priſoners contrary to the publick Faith unto them before given; within the aſſurance of the Capitulation agreed upon with the Baſſa, and out of the Actions of War. Whereunto it was again anſwered him, That the Town when it was taken, was yet ſtill in his Power, and he at choice whether he would deliver it or no. That if he would by the yielding up of the Town challenge his Liberty, according to the Articles of the Capitulation, he ought then to have delivered it as was agreed, and not to have ſuffered it to have been taken by force, according to the ordinary proceeding of War; the Laws whereof, do juſtly condemn to Death, or to Captivity, ſuch as are by force of Arms vanquiſhed. That every Town, which during the Treaty of Capitulation is by force taken, followeth the courſe of the latter condition and ſtate, and not of the former, ſeeing that it is conquered and not delivered. That this is the reaſon that they are puniſhed by the rigour of Arms, which have not been careful to preſerve themſelves by the ſweetneſs of Peace; for that a man is not to expect of his mortal Enemy any other Courteſie than that which neceſſity cauſed him to promiſe, which he may for his own good again violate, as he for the good of his Enemy againſt his Will hath granted. With which Quirks and Quillets the County deluded, ſay what he could, was carried away Priſoner to Conſtantinople, where we muſt for a while leave him. And ſo the Baſſa having in eighteen days taken Alba-Regalis, (now being eleven months poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians) cauſed the Breaches he had made to be again repaired, and the City well provided for both of Victuals and Munition, leaving therein a ſtrong Garriſon of 6000 Souldiers; and with his People having over-run all the Country as far as Strigonium, roſe with his Army and retired again to Buda; where, as he was making a Bridge of Boats over the Danubius betwixt Buda and Peſth, for the more eaſie tranſporting of Victual, and better relieving of the one the other, as need ſhould require; and having brought that work to paſs, and about to have gone to the Siege of Strigonium; Commandment came from the Great Sultan, That he ſhould with all ſpeed return to Conſtantinople, for that Mahomet, accounting of him as of a moſt valiant Man, was now minded to employ him in his Wars againſt the Rebels in Natolia, where things now went not well, as ſhall be hereafter declared. Upon which Commandment, the Baſſa gave leave to all ſuch in his Army as had charge of any place, forthwith to return to their ſeveral Places of Government; appointing ſome others, with thirty thouſand Souldiers, in the Company of Zachel Moiſes (but of late Prince Sigiſmund's Lieutenant) to go with him into Tranſilvania: who after the Overthrow he had there received by Baſta, was come unto this great Baſſa, offering unto him, with ſuch an Aid as was now appointed for him, and the help of ſuch other his Friends as he had in Tranſilvania, to chaſe Baſta with his Germans from out thence, and to reduce that Province again unto the Devotion of the Othoman Emperours, as it had in former time been. And ſo by the way of Belgrade, Haſſan Baſſa himſelf with the reſt of his Army haſted towards Conſtantinople: which he was thought the more willingly to do, for that the Great Sultan before his ſetting forth, had put him in good hope to marry one of his Aunts (a Woman of great Wealth and Honour) if by the winning again of Alba-Regalis he ſhould make himſelf worthy ſo honourable a Match, after which he now longed.

But long it was not after his Departure, but that the Imperials, now at laſt aſſembled together at Komara, to the number of about 30000 men, with twelve Naſſadies and two Gallies, ſome by Water, ſome by Land, marched down along the River to Strigonium; where were alſo twenty other Ships ready to receive them; and ſo all embarqued, were by the Lord Ruſſworm and other the Imperial Captains conducted to Buda, there with ſome notable Enterpriſe to redeem the Diſgrace by them before received in not relieving of Alba-Regalis. Whoſe coming was ſo ſudden and ſo unlooked for of the Turks there, as that they had not any time to take in any greater help or proviſion than was already in the City. And for as much as the Chriſtians knew the good Succeſs of this their Enterpriſe taken in hand, not ſo much to depend on their Strength as of their politick Proceeding and ſpeedy Diſpatch of the matter begun, they thought it not good to uſe any long delay, or to ſpare for any labour, but ſo ſoon as they might, by taking of the Water-City (or as ſome call it, the Jews Suburbs) ſo to cut off the Paſſage of them of Buda to Peſth, as alſo from thence to trouble them in the Caſtle and the upper City of Buda. Which their intended Exploit they happily attempted, and brought to paſs in this ſort: The City of Peſth ſtanding right over againſt Buda, is (as we have oftentimes before ſaid) divided from the ſame with the great and ſwift River of Danubius; over which the Turks upon Boats had with great Labour and Coſt of late built a moſt eaſie and commodious Bridge for Paſſage or Carriage of things from the one City to the other. This Bridge the Imperials thought neceſſary firſt to break, the more eaſie to beſiege either the one or other City; and for that purpoſe had by a ſtrange Device built a Ship, which by the force of the Stream carried down the River, and reſting upon the Bridge, ſhould by a wonderful Power break the ſame. Which Ship the Turks ſeeing coming down the River with the reſt of the Fleet after her, they ran by heaps, eſpecially out of the Water-City, to the Bridge, for the defence thereof; where, whilſt they were thus buſied, County Sultze on the other ſide, by Land, with a Petard blew up one of the Gates of the City; and ſo entering and killing all ſuch as he light upon, came unlooked for upon the backs of the Turks at the Bridge, of whom, ſome he ſlew, ſome he drave into the River, who there periſhed; the reſt, in number not many, by ſpeedy flight retiring themſelves into the City: whereupon he had now brought ſuch a general fear, that they all, as well the Souldiers as the Citizens, with the Chriſtians at their heels, with as much haſte as they could, took their Refuge into the upper City of Buda, much ſtronger and better fortified than was the lower City. At which time the Bridge was by them upon the River broken alſo, ſo that now the one City could no more thereby relieve the other as before.

1602 The Naſſadies are a certain kind of Boats which the Hungarians uſe upon the River of Danubius.

The lower City of Buda taken by the Chriſtians.

The Water-City thus won, and the Bridge broken, the next was for the Imperials to beſiege either the one or the other City. But for that they of Peſth might with their great Ordnance much annoy them in the beſieging of the Caſtle and the upper City of Buda, they thought beſt to begin with it firſt; which they did in much like ſort as they had before done at the lower City of Buda, the ſame Device again well proſpering in their hand. For the Lord Ruſſworm with the Fleet upon the River making a great ſhew as if he would even preſently on that ſide have entered, had with the ſtir by him raiſed, drawn down moſt part of the Garriſon Souldiers unto that ſide of the Town, where moſt ſhew of danger was; whilſt in the mean time County Sultze, with the Governour of Althem, (before undiſcovered) upon the ſudden by Land ſcaled the other ſide of the City, and gained the Walls, the Turks yet dreaming of no ſuch matter. But hereupon began a terrible Outcry, the Turks ſtanding as men aſtoniſhed, eſpecially now feeling the Chriſtians Weapons in their Bodies, before they knew they were got into the City. In this ſo great an Amazement, ſuch of them as could, fled into the ſtrongeſt Towers, the reſt hid themſelves in Cellars and other the moſt ſecret corners they could find, out of which they were afterwards by the Chriſtians drawn and ſlain. They which were retired alſo into the Towers and other ſtrong places of the City, ſeeing the great Ordnance bent upon them, and now out of all hope of Relief, offered to yield; requeſting only, that they might with their Wives and Children, with Life depart; promiſing for that favour ſo ſhewed them, to perſuade them of Buda alſo in like manner to yield. Upon which Promiſe, that their poor Requeſt was granted, and the Lord Nadaſti, with certain other Captains, ſent with ſome of theſe Citizens of Peſth, with their Wives and Children, to Buda; who coming thither, according to their Promiſe moſt earneſtly requeſted them of Buda to yield, for that they were not now to expect any farther help, and that by their fooliſh Obſtinacy they ſhould be the cauſe of the death of them, their Friends, their Wives, and Children. Unto whom alſo, to move them the more, the Lord Nadaſti promiſed in the Name of General, That they ſhould all, excepting ſome of their chief Commanders, in ſafety depart. Howbeit, they of Buda would not hearken thereunto, but ſtood ſtill upon their Guard. In this City of Peſth, well inhabited with Turkiſh Merchants, the Chriſtians found great ſtore of Wealth, which all became a Prey unto the Souldiers, with a thouſand Horſes for Service, many great Pieces of Artillery, and much other warlike Proviſion.

The upper City and Caſtle of Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Peſth thus won, and a ſtrong Garriſon left therein, they returned again over the River to beſiege the Caſtle and upper City of Buda, which they attempted by undermining the ſame, as alſo by Battery, having placed ſome of their great Ordnance ſo high, that they could at their pleaſure ſhoot into the midſt of the Streets of the City; wherewith they much troubled the Turks, not a little before diſcouraged with the loſs of Peſth; thundring alſo at the ſame time with their other Batteries in divers places of the Walls both of the Caſtle and of the City. Where underſtanding that the Turks Garriſons of the frontier Towns and Caſtles thereabouts (hearing of the Siege) were coming to the relief of their diſtreſſed Friends, they ſent out their Horſemen, with ſome part of their Foot-men againſt them; who meeting with them, gave them a great Overthrow, and ſo with Victory returned again unto the reſt of the Army lying at the Siege, being ſtill in hope either by Force or Compoſition to become Maſters of the City.

A notable Skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

But whilſt they lay in this hope, and having the twelfth of October brought their Approaches nearer unto the Walls, had there planted certain notable pieces of Battery, with purpoſe the next day with all their Power to have aſſaulted the City; behold, the Viſier Baſſa hearing (by the way as he was going to Belgrade, and ſo to Conſtantinople) that the City of Peſth was won, and Buda beſieged, changing his Mind, returned in haſte with ſuch Forces as he had yet left; and ſo unlooked for, came and ſat down before Peſth, being not then above five and twenty thouſand ſtrong, but thoſe all for the moſt part old and expert Souldiers. But whilſt the Baſſa thus lay at the Siege of Peſth on the one ſide of the River, and the Imperials at the Siege of Buda on the other, divers brave Attempts were in both Places given both on the one ſide and the other. The Chriſtians in Peſth beſieged by the Turks, having amongſt them divers brave Captains, and deſirous of Honour, one day under their Conduct ſallied out of the City to skirmiſh with the Turks; and coming with them to the Sword, by plain Valour diſordered them, and inforced them to fly, and ſo allured with the ſweetneſs of the Victory, purſued them even to the Trenches; from whence a great Squadron of the Turks Horſe-men and Harquebuſiers at the ſame inſtant iſſuing out, and with their Multitude overcharging the Imperials, conſtrained them of force to retire: in which Retreat, County Maximilian Martinengo (one of theſe Adventurers) doing what he might, both with his Valour and Direction, to have ſtayed the diſordered Retreat of the Chriſtians, was with many others ſlain: wherewith the reſt diſcouraged, took their Refuge towards the City. Which they of the Garriſon beholding, ſent out certain Companies to relieve them; by whoſe coming out, the fury of the Turks was not only repreſſed, but they alſo even unto their Trenches again repulſed. Shortly after which hot Skirmiſhes, the Lord Ruſſworm, with the other Chriſtian Captains on the other ſide of the River, having with continual Battery made ſuch a breach into the Caſtle, as that the ſame ſeemed to be now aſſaultable, in good order came on with certain Companies of their Foot-men appointed for that Service, and ſo courageouſly aſſailed the Breach; where the Turks, who before had expected this Aſſault, having in beſt ſort they could repaired the Breach, and on both ſides thereof placed divers murthering Pieces, with great ſtore of dangerous Fire-works; at ſuch time as the firſt Companies of the Chriſtians ſought courageouſly to have entred the breach, overwhelmed them with that deadly Fire, and ſo rent them with their murthering ſhot, that they no faſter entered, but that they were forthwith cut off and ſlain; with the ſight whereof, they which were appointed to ſecond them nothing diſcouraged, but ſeeking deſperately to have entered, and with the taking of the Caſtle, and ſlaughter of the Turks, to have requited the death of their Fellows, were themſelves in like ſort welcomed. So that now a thouſand of them being loſt, the Captains conſidering how much the loſs of ſo many brave Souldiers concerned the whole Enterpriſe taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the loſs of the greateſt part of them, they cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and ſo the Aſſault for that time to be given over.

The Viſier Baſſa raiſeth his Siege.

But long it was not that the Viſier Baſſa (thus retired as aforeſaid) had lain before Peſth, but that by reaſon of his ſudden Return great Wants began to ariſe in his Camp; his Souldiers for want of Food being glad to eat their dead Horſes, a pound of Bread being ſold for two Hungarian Duckats, and a buſhel of Oats for five, and yet hardly ſo to be gotten: which Wants in that ſo waſted a Country ſtill more and more increaſing, and many of his Souldiers ſecretly ſtealing away from him, he had much ado, by all the means he could uſe, to perſuade them there to ſtay eight days longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done than ſome few weak Attempts given, and ſome light Skirmiſhes made, rather for Faſhions-ſake than for any hope of prevailing, and the want of all things ſtill increaſing; he, with the reſt of the Commanders, fearing ſome ſudden miſchief to be done them by the hungry and diſcontented Souldiers, the ſecond of November, cauſing his Baggage to be truſſed up in the dead time of the dark and ſilent Night, riſe with his Army, and ſo in haſte retired directly to Belgrade, leaving behind him in his Camp three hundred dead Horſes, not yet eaten by his hunger-ſtarved Souldiers. Immediately after whoſe departure, the Lord Nadaſti, and ſome 1602 other of the Commanders in the Army with 5000 Souldiers and certain great Pieces of Artillery, ſome by Land, ſome by Water, went down along the River to Adom, a fair well built Town upon the Bank of Danubius, about four Hungarian miles from Buda, and ſerving as it were for a Store-houſe for the Garriſon there; which Town Nadaſti ſummoned by his Huſſars ſent before, requiring to have it delivered unto him: which they of the Town at the firſt refuſed to do; but afterwards ſeeing a far greater Power come, provided of great Ordnance and all things elſe requiſite for a Siege, they with the ſight thereof diſcouraged, without more ado offered to yield the Town, ſo that they might with Bag and Baggage in ſafety depart; which they did, the Chriſtians conducting them as far as Feldwar; which Caſtle was alſo at the firſt Summons, by the perſuaſion of them of Adom, delivered unto them; for they of the Caſtle, by them informed of the great Strength of the Chriſtians, and of the ſtore of great Ordnance they had brought with them, and that they ſtaid therewith but faſt by, were eaſily perſuaded to hearken to their Friends, and ſo yielded. Which done, the free Haiducks the ſame night ſurpriſed alſo the Caſtle of Pax; from whence the Chriſtians ſtill marching on along the River, took in alſo the City of Tolna.

But whilſt Nadaſti, with the reſt, were thus buſied in taking theſe Caſtles and Towns along the South-ſide of Danubius, they in the Camp at Buda were advertiſed of the new Deſigns of the Turks Lieutenants and Captains thereabout, for the relief of the Beſieged; as that the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Governours of Caniſia, Sigeth, and others, had aſſembled an Army of thirty thouſand for the raiſing of the Siege. Wherefore the Chriſtians doubting as they lay at the Siege diſperſed, to be by them oppreſſed; leaving their Tents in their Trenches, gathered themſelves together in the Water-City; which the Turks out of the upper City quickly perceiving, as feeling themſelves now at ſome more liberty, preſently ſallying out, took both the Trenches and the Tents ſo left, with no ſmall ſlaughter of ſuch as were left for the keeping of them; and ſo poſſeſſed of the Trenches and the Tents, held them by the ſpace of two hours, until they were by ſtrong hand by the Chriſtians beaten out, and ſo with ſome loſs inforced again to retire into the City. The Lord Nadaſti alſo, with the reſt that had taken the aforeſaid Caſtles and Towns upon the ſide of Danubius, making a Road towards Alba-Regalis, in their Return within a mile of Buda, light upon a thouſand Turks there gathered together, moſt part of whom they ſlew; and having put the reſt to flight, took ſome fifty of them Priſoners. At which time alſo another of the Imperial Collonels meeting with certain other Companies of the Turks coming to the relief of the beſieged, not far from Buda, ſlew moſt part of them, took an hundred and threeſcore of them Priſoners, with a number of Horſes, and much other rich Booty; all which he brought into the Camp. Neither were they at the Siege in the mean time idle, their great Artillery ſtill thundring againſt the Walls both of the Caſtle and the City: ſo that by the fury of the Cannon having beaten down a ſtrong Tower next unto the Danubius, not far from the Kings Stable, they were a little before Night about to have there entered, when ſuddenly ſuch a Tempeſt of Wind and Rain ariſe, as that they could not poſſibly uſe their Pieces, or well any other Weapon; ſo that the Heavens as it were then fighting for the Enemy, they were inforced for that time to give over the Aſſault begun. Which Storm was no ſooner ended, but that two thouſand of the Turks, both Horſe and Foot, to keep the Chriſtians otherwiſe buſied, ſuddenly iſſuing out of the City, charged upon the Stirian Horſe-men; who preſently relieved by the men at Arms, ſo welcomed them, that having loſt an hundred and threeſcore of their men, they were glad with more ſpeed to ritire than they came out. But ſeeing ſome of the Chriſtians that ſo hardly purſued them, ſome ſlain, and ſome hurt from the Walls; taking heart again, the next day (being the Eleventh of November) they ſallied out again; where albeit that a great number of them were ſlain, yet fell they out again the third day alſo, and were again by the County Thurne, with great loſs of their men, beaten back unto the City; where in purſuing of them, the Chriſtians were by certain Janizaries (laid cloſe for that purpoſe) ſuddenly aſſailed and dangerouſly gauled, the County himſelf being hurt in his left Arm, and ſome other Captains ſlain. In all which Sallies, although the Turks were ſtill put to the worſe, yet thereby they gained time in ſome good ſort to repair again their Breaches. 1602

The Siege of Buda, for fear of the Tartars given over by the Chriſtians.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the Siege, certainly informed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars, by the Incitement of the Turk, (having made themſelves way through Valachia) were coming as far as Temeſwar to relieve Buda; thought it not beſt (eſpecially now that Winter was come) to abide the coming of that ſo great a Northern Tempeſt, but betimes, whilſt they had yet ſpace, to raiſe their Siege and be gone; which they did the ſixteenth of November, leaving the Water-City, with all that they had got about Buda, again unto the Enemy; only Peſth they furniſhed with Victuals and all things elſe neceſſary, leaving therein almoſt ten thouſand Souldiers in Garriſon, for the defence thereof againſt the barbarous Enemy. As for Adom, it was ſtrengthened with a Garriſon of Hungarians only, with their Wages offered to be paid before-hand; which for all that, they refuſed to accept; alledging, that for the great danger this Place was expoſed to above others, they could not ſafely take their Oath for the defence thereof; yet offering withal, to undertake the Charge, and to do what beſeemed valiant Souldiers, in ſuch ſort, as that all men ſhould well underſtand, that nothing evil ſhould happen thereunto thro their default or negligence.

The Siege of Buda, for fear of the Tartars, thus given over, and the Imperials departed and gone, the Turks forthwith came down out of the higher City into the lower, declaring their Joy for the recovery thereof, by the often thundring of their great Ordnance, with divers other Signs of Triumph. But whilſt in their Jollity they ſpared not by the mouth of the Cannon to ſend commendation to them of Peſth, they from them again received the like; but in ſuch rude manner, that the Turks, wearied with ſuch Greetings, requeſted them to ſpare their Shot and Powder, and quietly to live by them as became Neighbours for that Winter until the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this Strife ſhould be ended by their Emperours, the weaker yielding unto the ſtronger either the one or the other City. Yet for all this their great Joy, their cheer in Buda was not great, Victuals by this Siege being become ſo ſcarce, that it was by the Turks feared, that if the Chriſtians had there longer lain, they ſhould for very want have been inforced to have yielded the City: of which their need their Friends not ignorant, and having made what Proviſion they were able for their Relief, were with a great Convoy bringing the ſame towards Buda; whereof the Garriſons of Komara and Strigonium having Intelligence, went preſently out, and meeting with the Turks in the mid-way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, overthrew the Convoy, and carried away all that Proviſion of Victuals; like unbidden Gueſts making themſelves merry with that which was never provided for them.

Mahomet much troubled with the Scrivano.

The Death of the Scrivano.

The Scrivano's younger Brother takes upon him the leading of the Rebels in his Brother's ſtead.

Haſſan Baſſa ſlain, and his Army overthrown by the Rebels.

Theſe doubtful Wars of Hungary, with the general Revolt of Tranſilvania, much troubled Mahomet the great Sultan; but nothing like unto the Wars he had in Aſia againſt the Scrivano and the Rebels his Followers; the evil Succeſs whereof (as moſt dangerous to his State) ſo much tormented his haughty mind, as that it would ſcarce ſuffer him to think of any thing elſe. For the Rebel, encouraged with the ſucceſs of the laſt years Wars, and ſtill growing ſtronger and ſtronger, (by reaſon of the great number which, allured with the ſweet name of Liberty, hope of Prey, or the good Entertainment by him given, daily more and more reſorted unto his Camp) had this Year over-run a great part of the Turks Dominions in Aſia, putting all to Fire and Sword that ſtood in his way, ranſacking alſo divers walled and fenced Cities by the way as he went. Which he might the more eaſily do, for that the Janizaries of Aleppo and Damaſco, with many other their Partakers and Favourites, which might greatly have hindered his Proceedings, were at the ſame time alſo up in Arms, and together by the Ears amongſt themſelves, to the great benefit of the Scrivano; who, in the midſt of the courſe of theſe his deſired Fortunes, fell ſick of a natural Diſeaſe, and ſo died. By whoſe Death the Rebellion was no whit appeaſed, (as commonly in like caſe it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in ſhort time grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before; for the Scrivano was no ſooner dead, but that a younger Brother of his, no leſs warlike and courageous than himſelf (to the great contentment of the Rebellious) ſtep'd up in his place, fiercely proſecuting the Wars his Brother had before him taken in hand. Againſt whom Haſſan Baſſa, by Commandment from the Grand Seignior, with a great Army ſetting forward, with hope in that newneſs of his Command to have oppreſſed him, and ſo to have quenched that ſo ſpreading a fire; at length met with him, that was eaſie enough to be found, and joyning Battel with him, was by him in a great and bloody Fight overthrown and ſlain, together with his whole Army, except ſuch as by ſpeedy flight ſaved themſelves from the fury of their fierce Enemies. So that Mahomet the Great Sultan, now inforced to employ his beſt Commanders and Souldiers into thoſe Parts for the ſubduing of him, for that cauſe called Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of Hungary to ſerve againſt this new Rebel; who in the mean time following the courſe of his Victory, made havock of all as he went, taking unto his own uſe all ſuch Tribute as was in thoſe Countries, and others alſo farther off, due unto the great Sultan; having of late exacted only of the City of Ancyra and the Country thereabout, 300000 Duckats; ſo by exacting of great ſums of Money from the Country People (ſuch as be his Enemies) heaping up great Treaſures for the maintenance of his Wars.

Divers Incurſions of the Tartars into the Frontiers of the Emperour's Territories, and much harm by them there done.

Now, tho Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour had called home Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of Hungary, to go againſt the Rebels in Aſia, (as is aforeſaid) yet had he before provided, that for the better aſſurance of his Towns and Territories in Hungary, the Tartar Han with a great Power of his Crim Tartars ſhould even againſt that time come down into that Country. Which rough and needy People, dwelling near unto the Fens of Meotis, for Pay or Prey always ready to do the Othoman Emperours Service, ſetting forward under the leading of their great Han himſelf, and of his two Sons, and by plain force breaking through Valachia, though not without great loſs of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free Haiducks a whole day) were now in the latter end of December with their huge Companies come into Hungary; the Han himſelf with forty thouſand to Quinque Eccleſiæ, and his Sons with twenty thouſand more into Poſſega (a fertile Country lying between the great Rivers Sauus and Drauus) where they ſpoiled all, as well the Turks as the other poor Chriſtians, pretending all that frontier Country, with the whole Command thereof, to be given unto them by Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, in reward of their good Service. But long they lay not there quiet, but that, to ſhew for what they came, they inforced the Chriſtians thereabout to victual Caniſia for the Turks; and ſo breaking into Stiria, not far from Caramant (the neareſt Fortreſs of the Chriſtians towards Caniſia) carried away above two thouſand Chriſtians Captives; and ſhortly after ſurpriſing Keſchemet, a great and populous Town, ſlew moſt part of the Inhabitants, and carried away the reſt Priſoners. Other ſome of them alſo at the ſame time making an Inroad to Sharvar, and having burnt twenty Villages down to the ground, carried away thence about a thouſand Souls into moſt miſerable Captivity and Thraldom. They alſo at their firſt coming relieved them of Buda, the Lord Nadaſti with his Huſſars, who before kept them from Victuals, not being able for the great number of them, now longer ſo to do. By them alſo the Turks encouraged, took and burnt certain places poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians near unto Buda, putting them all to the Sword that they found therein. So that the poor Country of Hungary (never to be ſufficiently pittied) with the reſt of the Countries and Provinces belonging unto the Houſe of Auſtria, and confining upon the Turk, were not ſo much eaſed by the calling home of the Viſier Baſſa with his Army, as they were now annoyed by the coming of theſe roguiſh Tartars, a People wholly, even from their Infancy, given to the ſpoil. Againſt whom, for all that, the Chriſtians, beſide their ordinary Garriſons, began now, even in the depth of Winter, to oppoſe ſome other of their Forces alſo; the Palatine of Rhine ſending ten Companies of Horſe-men to Poſſonium, from thence to be ſent to Sharvar for the defence of Stiria; and Collonitz (but lately knighted by the Emperour) for his part raiſing four hundred Horſe, a thouſand Huſſars, and three thouſand of the free Haiducks, for the repreſſing of thoſe Tartars; the Duke of Brunſwick alſo at that time, for the ſame Service, ſending thither a thouſand Horſe, with two thouſand Foot, againſt thoſe ſworn Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion.

A great Froſt.

An Army of the Turks raiſed out of their Garriſons.

The Troubles of this Year thus overpaſt, Alba-Regalis being by the Chriſtians loſt, Peſth with ſome other Places won, Tranſilvania recovered, Buda beſieged, the Viſier Baſſa returned, and the Tartars come into Hungary, January with a ſharp Froſt began to open the next Year; by force whereof, the Rivers in many places, but eſpecially in thoſe more eaſterly Countries, were not only frozen over, but ſeemed rather even wholly turned into Ice; Danubius, that great River (for all his ſwift courſe) being then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard frozen, that Men and Carts might ſafely paſs to and fro thereupon. Which ſo hard a Seaſon for all that did no whit freeze, but rather encreaſe the hot deſires of the greedy Turks, ſtill breathing after the utter Spoil and Ruine of the Chriſtians dwelling near unto them. For which purpoſe, they even in this dead time of the Year, and extremity of Nature (which commonly affordeth unto moſt mortal Enemies a Ceſſation from Arms) out of their Garriſons of Sigeth, Buda, Caniſia, Alba-Regalis, Babotz, and ſuch other Places, raiſed an Army of eighteen thouſand ſtrong, to have forraged and over-run the Chriſtians, with their Territories confining upon them; Quermany, with the Coun-

Coun-

Collonitz in Arms againſt the Turks.

Country thereabout, being the Places by them aſſigned to have felt the firſt force of their ſudden rage and fury. Of which their Deſigns, Collonitz, Governour for the Emperour in thoſe Parts, underſtanding; to prevent the ſame, and to meet with their Forces, with all ſpeed put into the Suburbs of Quermany a thouſand Reiſters, and two thouſand Lanſquenets; and in the Burroughs thereabouts laded the Regiment of the County Keingrave, with ſix Companies of the Coſſacks, four thouſand Haiducks, four hundred Carabins, French, and Wallons, two hundred Horſe of the Regiment of Collonitz; with whom was Collonitz himſelf, commanding over all theſe Troops; a man for his Worth every way anſwerable unto his charge. Who, for the more aſſurance of this Country, over which the Enemy now hovered, commanded all the Inhabitants thereabout to take up Arms; and withal, with good and ſtrong Barricadoes to ſtrengthen the ways, and ſtop up the Paſſages into their Country; which they right cheerfully performed, with their Weapons in one hand, and their Spades and Shovels in the other. Of which their ſo great Reſolution the Turks underſtanding, changed their purpoſe. For they, conſidering the aſſured danger they were to undergo, in forcing of theſe Troops, ſtanding upon the Walls of their Defence, and ſtrong in their Reſolution, changed their former deſign, for the invading of Quermany, (where they for the ſpace of five Weeks together had by the Chriſtians been expected) and upon a new Reſolution marched along by Roquesbourg, with purpoſe to have loaded themſelves with the ſpoil of the Country thereabout. Which their new Deſign, cauſed Collonitz to gather together his Forces to croſs and fruſtrate them therein; which he did by favour of the River, which both ſtrengthened him againſt their Incurſions, and was well to be defended. But the Turks, whoſe Purpoſe was not to fight, but to have robbed and ſpoiled the Country at their Pleaſure, finding now, contrary to their Expectation, ſuch ſtrong Reſiſtance, and their Deſigns diſturbed, in fine, gave over the Enterpriſe, and ſo again retired; contenting themſelves to gather a Convoy of Victuals to put into Caniſia, which then lay in great extremity for want thereof. Which Victuals they drew out of the Villages thereabout, and ſo came to Babotz, to march to Caniſia, a Town moſt commodious for ſuch an Aſſembly, and for the relieving of Caniſia. Of this their purpoſe Collonitz (who ſpared for no coſt) by his Eſpials advertiſed, even he which before was appointed as a Prey unto his Enemies, began now to plot with himſelf, that they ſhould become a Prey unto him: their Cowardiſe, by ſo many precedent Effects declared, had given him the means to adventure upon them, and the hope to overthrow them. A neceſſary Conſideration in Martial Affairs, for Commanders to put in execution their Deſigns, at what price ſoever; for that it is better to loſe in the performance of them, with the preſervation of their Reputation, than otherwiſe to gain with the loſs thereof; for that it preſerved, ſtill ſtriketh a fear of their Valour into the minds of their Enemies, oftentimes overcome even with this their apprehenſion thereof; whereas otherwiſe they might happily overcome, in the aſſurance by them conceived of their Enemies Cowardiſe.

The Turks for fear of the Chriſtians cowardly retire.

Collonitz lieth in Ambuſh for the Turks.

Upon which Reſolution, this brave Collonel, the four and twentieth of March with his Troops marched towards little Komara, about two Leagues from Caniſia, and lay with them cloſe in Ambuſh in the Woods near unto two Marſhes, over which the Turks had made two Bridges to paſs the great Artillery and Waggons upon; the Turks being well near 20000 ſtrong, and our men but 8200, whereof there were 2200 Horſe-men, and 6000 Foot, a ſmall number in compariſon of their Enemies. But whilſt that thoſe men lie thus cloſe in Ambuſh, with a purpoſe to do ſome notable Exploit, let us in the mean time run to Peſth, to ſee what there in the mean time paſſed.

The Turks, after the loſs of Peſth, much grieved to have this Impoſtume ſo near their Hearts, ſought to break it to our hurt, employing all their Treachery to gain our Garriſon Souldiers, and with their Forces to diſtreſs them of Victuals. And the Chriſtian Army was no ſooner riſen from before Buda, but that the Turks came down again into their baſe Town, which they found much ruinated and in evil eſtate. But the joy of their Conqueſt buried in it all the object of their Sorrow, and the feeling of their Grief; the leſſer Paſſions always giving place unto the greater, and Sorrow finding no place at all in the midſt of their immoderate Joy. Whereof they gave a number of Teſtimonies, by the thundring of their great Ordnance, by Fires of Joy and Vollies of ſmall Shot; all which their fury, they diſcharged upon them of Peſth; who with the like courteſie requited them, ſending them back again Bullets for Bullets. Which now became a common Exerciſe among the Canoneers, paſſing the time in theſe Actions, more upon a bravery than to any purpoſe, ſmall harm being done thereby either on the one ſide or on the other: in ſuch ſort, that in the end the Turks, better adviſed, requeſted our men to ceaſe from ſuch ſhooting, as they on their part would do likewiſe, and to expect the end of the Negotiation of Peace, of a certain begun (as they ſaid) betwixt their Princes; but meaning indeed by this means to ſpare their Powder, Shot, and Pains, and to reſerve them to their better uſes.

Buda diſtreſſed for want of Victuals.

And yet for all this triumphant Joy, the Turks in Buda were in great want of Victuals, the late Siege having devoured all their Proviſions, and no new ſupply thereof as yet come unto them; inſomuch, that their greateſt care was now how to come by Victuals, without which they muſt needs forſake their City. Of which their ſo great neceſſity, the other Garriſons in the places thereabout advertiſed, aſſembled themſelves to take order therefore; and having provided 200 Waggons, loaded with all manner of neceſſary Proviſions at Alba-Regalis, with a Convoy of 6000 Souldiers, put themſelves upon the way toward Buda. Of all which their Proceedings the Garriſon of Strigonium having got underſtanding, and joyning unto them the Garriſon of Komara, met with them upon the way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, and charged them; and ſo with great confidence on both ſides came to handy Blows, the Turks being in number ſtronger, and our men in Valour and Reſolution; the Waggons in the mean time ſtanding ſtill, as the motive of the Charge, and appointed for a Prey unto the Victors. But our Horſe-men, being for the moſt part Huſſars, well acquainted with ſuch charge, with their divers Courſes greatly troubled the Enemies, our Foot-men in the mean time charging them alſo with a number of Harquebuſſers; againſt whom the Turks, with the ſame Arms and like Courage defending themſelves, and many of them being ſlain, and the Waggons gained from them, gave place unto their Valour, and ſo were almoſt all cut in pieces. The Waggons thus ſurpriſed, were divided as a rich Booty among the Victors; forty whereof were ſent unto the Garriſon at Peſth; who were well content that the Enemies Travel and Wealth had been gathered for their good, and without their own Pains to ſolace themſelves with the fruit of their Enemies Labours.

The Turks in carrying a Convoy of Victuals to Buda overthrown by the Chriſtians.

But what ſhould we ſay? The moſt ſure Reſolutions are ſometimes by Chances croſſed, and Tempeſts otherwhiles overtake us, even in the entrance of the deſired Port. The Turks of Buda, underſtanding of the brute of this medley, and that it was for their Bread, poſted in haſte to have ſuccoured their Troops, and arrived at the ſame time that our men victoriouſly led along by the River of Danubius the Waggons they had before gained. At the ſight of which Object, they, animated with hunger after the Victuals, and with deſire to be revenged upon the men, charged them. But our men, who thought of nothing more, but that they were victorious, and Poſſeſſors of their Enemies Booty, ſeeing theſe new-come Enemies ſo furiouſly to charge them, daunted with the preſent Peril, and with the conſideration thereof only poſſeſſed, bethought themſelves of nothing elſe, but how to ſave themſelves, and to leave their Honour, Booty, and the Field, all as Spoils unto their Enemies. The furious Countenance of the Turks, and their number ſurmounting ours by 1500, ſo bereft them of their reſolution for to fight for their Lives and Waggons, as that they without more ado quite forſook them, accounting themſelves happy enough if they might but ſave themſelves. And the Turks without farther purſuing of them, contented to have recovered their Victuals, left them, and ſo returned homeward, driving their Waggons along the Bank of Danubius. But ſee the Wind, which by and by changed, and having as it were with a ſudden Tempeſt undertaken even at the entrance of the Port to ſwallow up both the one and the other, ſent the Garriſon of Peſth upon them of Buda, to ſtay them. Great changes of Fortune in one moment of time, which mocketh Men with ſhews, bringing forth effects quite contrary to their Expectation. Theſe Turks, ſtayed upon their Retreat by the coming of theſe new-come Adverſaries, did even as ours had done before. For, not willing to prefer their Goods before their Life, and more greedy of Victual than of Battel, they quitted their prize, and retired. For our men, in number two thouſand, were ſeiſed of a Foreſt about the midſt of the way whereby the Turks were to paſs, and which they could by no means ſhun; and, divided into two Companies, kept themſelves cloſe there in Ambuſh, reſolutely attending for the coming of their Enemies. Of which their Purpoſe the Turks not aware, and ſtill preſſing on forward, found themſelves hardly charged, before they could ſee them by whom they were ſo charged; one of our Companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks, incloſed betwixt them, and in ſo great and ſudden a fear not knowing againſt whom to defend themſelves, without any great Reſiſtance betook themſelves to flight, leaving their Waggons, and caſting away their Arms; yet ſo, that a number of them were left dead upon the place, ſome others of them taken Priſoners, and the reſt chaſed even unto the Gates of their City. But our men being Victors, with the Waggons, and a number of Priſoners, returned home, and by the mouth of their great Artillery gave a thouſand Teſtimonies of their Victory unto the ſorrowful Cowards: who themſelves alſo carried the heavy News thereof unto the reſt of their Fellows ſhut up within the City of Buda.

The Convoy of Victuals again recovered from the Chriſtians by the Garriſon of Buda.

The ſame Convoy of Victuals recovered from the Turks by the Garriſon of Peſth.

But ſee again the change of Fortune, conſtant only in Unconſtancy, as the Sequel ſhortly after ſhewed. Danubius, that great River, was then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard frozen, that Men and Carts might now ſafely paſs to and fro thereupon. In which ſo hard ſeaſon, the Turks in Garriſon at Buda, having once upon the frozen River braved the Chriſtians in Peſth, and the two and twentieth of January in like bravery coming out the ſecond time, were by the Garriſon Souldiers of Peſth put to flight, and by two hundred of the moſt forward and valiant Souldiers hardly purſued; upon whom, not only they which fled, but other of the Turks alſo out of Buda in greater number returning, chaſed them likewiſe back again even to the Bridge, whereby they were to have paſſed into the City; which now drawn up for fear of greater harm from ſuch a number of Turks as were now come out, and were ready to have entered at the heels of the flying Souldiers, the poor Souls ſo ſhut out, and too weak for ſuch a multitude as then had them in chaſe, were there even in their Friends ſight every man ſlain, the Turks themſelves with little harm returning to Buda.

The Garriſon Souldiers of Peſth overthrown by the Turks of Buda.

Neither long laſted the joy of this Victory; for within a few days after, one Lethner, a Captain of the Chriſtian Garriſon in Peſth, more grieved than the reſt with the loſs of ſo many valiant men, and ſome of them his Friends and Companions alſo; certainly underſtanding that certain of the chief of the Turks of Buda, with two of their greateſt Commanders, and a great Train of gallant Gentlewomen, were, for their Pleaſure, the next day about to go unto the hot Baths near unto Buda, and taking with him threeſcore Muſqueteers, the Night before ſecretly upon the Ice paſſed over the River, and ſo not far from the Baths lay cloſe in Ambuſh, expecting the coming of their deſired Prey. In which Expectance they lay not long, but that theſe Turks, caſting no Peril, came accordingly as they could have wiſhed, and in thoſe pleaſant Baths merrily bathed and ſolaced themſelves: Fools to ſeek after the Pleaſures of Peace amidſt the Gulf of the miſeries of War, and evil adviſed to aſſure themſelves of fair Weather in a Storm ſo near at hand. For in the midſt of all their Delights theſe reſolute men came ſuddenly upon them, not fearing any ſuch danger, and ſlew all the men, ſparing none but one Boy and the Gentlewomen; who in the time of the Conflict, naked as they were, ran as faſt as they could into the City, Fear having in them overcome the modeſty of their Sex. Which Exploit done, the Captain, leaving the Turks ſlain in the Bath (now become red with their Blood) returned with his Souldiers, laden with the rich Booty, and merrily ſporting at the naked Gentlewomen: with whoſe fearful Cry they of Buda ſtirred up, ſent out certain of their Garriſon after them, but to no purpoſe; for why, they were in ſafety before got home. By continuance of this Froſt, by reaſon whereof Victuals could not be ſent down the River, the Souldiers in Garriſon at Peſth were driven to ſuch wants, as that Dogs and Cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turks their Enemies ſtill roaming about in the Fields to keep them from Victuals, and to increaſe their Neceſſity.

The Turks in bathing themſelves at Buda by them of Peſth ſurpriſed and ſlain.

Great want of Victuals in Peſth.

Of theſe Neceſſities the Turks of Buda were Partakers alſo, hunger-ſtarved as were the other, but yet every day in the field to ſeek relief. They knew right well, that Hunger was hard to be deceived, being ſtill in Action and vigilant: and therefore they ſought ſome means how to deceive our men, ſtill attending upon them, and ſo to aſſure themſelves of Victuals. To which end they gave it out, and made ſhew as if they would have beſieged the Fort of Adom, diſtant about two Leagues from Buda: Under the colour whereof, they received into their City a Convoy of fifty Waggons laded with Victuals and Munition; which our men hindered not, for that they had no ſuſpicion of any ſuch purpoſe of theirs. With which Relief the Turks encouraged, gave knowledge thereof unto their overthwart Neighbours in Peſth by a thouſand great Shot, which they in thundering manner ſent over the River unto them, as from men of Courage, and devoid of fear. Howbeit, that this Action was more vain than profitable unto the Turks, who, for the diſpence of their Shot and Powder, gained not ſo much as the Life of one Souldier, not one Stone out of the Walls of Peſth. Upon this Jollity, theſe ſame Garriſon Souldiers of Buda ſhortly after thought to have upon the ſudden ſurpriſed Palotta, a ſmall Caſtle of the Chriſtians, by Night, but being in good time diſcovered, were deceived of their hope, and with the loſs of an hundred and twenty of their men, inforced to retire; unto whom Gaſpar Horwad, Captain of the Caſtle, by a Country Peaſant, before ſworn to do the Errand, ſent a little Pot full of Salt, and a Bottle of Wine, willing them (in deriſion) with that Salt to ſeaſon the Veniſon they had taken in their late hunting, and to empty that Bottle to quench their thirſt, and to chear them up after their late Conqueſt.

The Turks ſeeking to ſurpriſe Palotta, themſelves overthrown.

This Jeſt more provoked theſe Enemies, galled ſo to hear of their ſhame and loſs in ſuch ſort, that in revenge thereof, they diſcharged a ſhower of thundering great ſhot and ſmall Bullets upon the Garriſon of Peſth, which in great abundance fell out of the Cloud of their Rage. But all to ſmall purpoſe; for that their Cannons being evil levelled, overſhot the Town, carrying with their thundering Bullets more fear than they did hurt; yea, that worſe was, the Ruin made by their great Battery fell upon their own City. For while they were thus thundering, Fire, by Negligence of the Canoneers, fell into one of their Barrels of Powder, which taking hold of another, and ſo running along, as if it had been by a Train of purpoſe laid, burſt out with ſuch force, that it overthrew a long piece of the Wall of Buda, which in the fall thereof overwhelmed a great number of the Souldiers near unto it. The noiſe of this Thunder-clap was great, and the force thereof terrible, ſo that it revived them of Peſth with ſome good hope, by this Breach to force the Place, the Turks being from thence retired. Upon which Occaſion, the Governour of Peſth reſolved to give an aſſault unto the Place, and to make uſe of the means that Fortune, without his Pain or Travail, had put into his hand. Whereupon, taking with him a thouſand Almains, and three hundred Hungarians, he forthwith (in hope of good Succeſs) marched toward the Breach; and happily had prevailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a Company of Turks, who gave an Alarm unto them of the upper Town, who upon that brute of their approach, manned their Walls, and with great ſpeed repaired the Breach. Now all that they of Peſth could do, was to revenge themſelves upon theſe Turks whom they had met withal, who were there all ſlain, except ſome few, whom they ſaved, and carried Priſoners to Peſth, to be by them inſtructed of the Enemies Affairs.

A Breach made in the Walls of Buda by the Neglect of a Canoneer.

Siliſtria ſpoiled by the Vayvod of Valachia.

About this time, Radul Vayvod of Valachia advertiſed, that the Turks in Garriſon at Siliſtria were gone abroad into the Country to ſeek after Booty and Victuals, with his Souldiers paſſed forthwith over the River Danubius upon the Ice, to ſurpriſe the Town, now barred of the Garriſon; whoſe men, for the deſire of the Riches of the place, and for fear leſt the Garriſon Souldiers ſhould return before they had gained the place, with redoubled Force and Courage ſo aſſailed the Town, that the Turks diſmayed, and deeming the number of the Chriſtians that ſo furiouſly aſſailed them to be greater than indeed it was, by reaſon of the greatneſs of the Enterpriſe by them taken in hand; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, left the way open for them to enter, who forthwith over the dead Bodies of their Enemies thruſt into the Town, took the whole ſpoil thereof (which was both great and rich, as being a Town well peopled) and ſo ſet fire upon it, to the intent that it ſhould no more ſerve for a place for the Enemy to retire unto. The Vayvod thus victorious and rich, returned with his Souldiers laden with Spoyls of their Enemies, before that the Turks could gather themſelves together to hinder their retreat. And unto George Baſta, who was then in Tranſilvania in Arms againſt the Turks, for his part of the Booty he ſent him thirteen of the Enemies Enſigns.

But our Troops are now too long in their Ambuſh, where the valiant Collonitz holdeth them cloſe, attending the coming of the Turks, and of their Convoy to Caniſia; now we muſt draw them out of their Sentinels, and ſee what Effects their Deſigns ſhall bring forth. Theſe brave Souldiers had now lyen three days in their Ambuſhes without diſcovering of any Enemy, until that the ſixth of of March three Eſpies fell into their Hands, whom the Turks had ſent forth before, to diſcover what Enemies were then abroad in the field. But theſe faithful Infidels ſo taken, would not by any means diſcover any thing hurtful unto their Friends, or profitable for ours; So that in fine, the General, moved with their Obſtinacy, commanded one of their Heads to be ſtruck off, to terrifie the other two, and by force to draw from them that which fair Intreaty and Perſwaſion could not. The other two that were yet alive diſmayed with this Spectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at laſt conſtrained to confeſs, that they were the Enemies Spies, ſent forth to view the Country, to ſee if the Chriſtians had any forces there, able to let their Cannons and Wagons to enter into Caniſia; which not appearing, and they reporting unto their Companions, that the Country was clear, that then within two days after the Convoy was to paſs even by the ſame place where they then lay, to be put into Caniſia, ſetting forth from Babotz two hours before day. Our men thus informed of the Enemies Deſigns, forced their hope to defeat them, and again retired themſelves into their Ambuſcadoes, attending for their hoped Prey, in ſuch ſort, that our men in their Conceits held the Victory now as good as gained; howbeit, that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two hours after the taking of theſe Spies, the Haiducks layed without the principal Ambuſcado, and hidden in the thickets and buſhes, diſcovered a Cornet of Horſemen, with five Enſigns of the Turks, come out of Caniſia, marching to meet with the Convoy, in ſafety to conduct the ſame into the Town. At which overture the Hungarians awaked, gave knowledge unto the General of the arrival of the Enemy, to the end he might reſolve what was beſt in that caſe to be done. Which Opportunity Collonitz embracing, and making much of time, put his Horſemen in good order, to incloſe the Turks betwixt the Mariſh and the Wood, and to cut them ſo incloſed in pieces. The Turks having diſcovered nothing but the Mariſhes and the Woods, held on their way, and ſo as men having their Hands and Feet bound, fell into the Power of their Enemies. For being come into the danger, the Chriſtian Carabins charged them into the head of their Companies as they marched, and diſordered them; The Hungarians fell upon their flancks, which they opened; and the Horſe-men preſſed them at their backs. Theſe poor miſerable men ſo incloſed, not knowing againſt whom firſt to defend themſelves, and ſeeing death upon every ſide of them, became as beaſts to be ſacrificed unto the fury of the Chriſtians. The ſmall reſiſtance that they made deſerved not the name of a fight, being all ſlain, and having themſelves not ſlain one man; layed by heaps one upon another, not having overthrown ſo much as one of their Enemies; in ſuch ſort, that of ſix hundred men that were there there together, there were not four of them ſaved. Their Horſemen which followed them, ſeeing them ſurpriſed, inſtead of relieving them, ſhamefully fled; and thinking by flight to ſave themſelves, whilſt that their Companions were in maſſacring, preferred their Lives before their Honour; For if it be a ſhame for Souldiers in flight to flie with the ſafety of their Friends, it muſt needs be an irreparable diſhonour to flie and leave them to the ſlaughter. But our Carabins, taking the occaſion for their Advantage, no more ſpared their Horſes in the purſuit of theſe Infidels, than they had done their Hands in the defeating of their Fellows; but purſuing amain after theſe Fugitives, ſlew a number of ſuch of them as were worſt mounted, and purſued the reſt even to the Gates of Caniſia. Thoſe of the Town at this Tumult raiſed an Alarm, ſhot off their great Artillery, and diſcharged many Vollies of ſmall ſhot againſt our men, as well to ſtay the purſuit of our men, and to ſave their own, as to give warning unto them that were to bring the Convoy, that our men were in the Field, ready to ſurpriſe them. But during this fight, three of the Turks Horſemen paſſing well mounted, and exceeding hardy, adventured to paſs by our Troops, and upon the ſpur to meet with them which were bringing of the Convoy, and to give them warning of the overthrow, and that they ſhould again return to Babotz. Which their ſo brave an attempt Fortune favoured, as not willing to fruſtrate the deſert of ſo well deſerving Valour. And the Turks upon the way with the Convoy, now upon this Advertiſement returned, and retired themſelves again into the Caſtle from whence they came.

Three of the Turks Spies taken.

The Turks by Collonitz overthrown.

Babotz in vain beſieged by Collonitz.

But our men, advertiſed of this their retreat, and as it were deceived of the hope by them conceived for the intercepting of the Convoy, undertook an exploit much more haughty, brave, and dangerous; for forthwith they made head toward Babotz, with a Reſolution to carry the place; and though they were almoſt ſixteen miles from it, yet they reſolved to go thither, and to make themſelves Maſters thereof. And ſo marching chearfully on, therein uſed ſuch diligence, that about nine of the Clock at night they arrived at the place; whither they were no ſooner come, but that they did what they might to daunt their Enemies, to make their Conqueſt the more eaſie. The greatneſs of the attempt it ſelf ſerved well to that purpoſe, but yet the belief more, if they could drive into their Enemies Minds the ſufficiency of their Forces, for the performance of ſo great an Exploit. Which cauſed them to ſound their Trumpets, to ſtrike up their Drums, to remove their Artillery, to ruſſle with their Arms, to keep a ſtir with their Souldiers, and to make the noiſe, not of a ſmall, but of a puiſſant and great Army. But the Turks, in number twice ſo many as were our men, and within a good and ſtrong place, were not with ſuch a brute to be carried away, but ſtanding faſt upon their Guard and Reſolution, prepared themſelves for fight, and how to receive our men, if they ſhould attempt to aſſail them. Now whilſt the Alarm thus ſounded, our Companions advanced themſelves, repeating oftentimes the name of Jeſus, and making themſelves ready for to fight. This Skirmiſh began with a thouſand Cannon ſhot, which the Turks out of their Caſtle delivered upon the Troops of the Chriſtians, and their Muſquets ſtill playing from the Curtain of their Walls, ſo that the Caſtle ſeemed as if it had been a Mountain of Fire. All which Terrours no whit ſtayed the hope of our reſolute Foot-men, who paſſing thwart theſe flaming ſhowers, marched along the counterſcarp of the Ditch toward the Gate of the Town, to have broken open and forced the ſame. The Turks at the ſame time were come forth out of the Town, making ſhew as if they would have ſallied forth upon our men, and have fought with them. But at the ſame inſtant that they charged the front of our Foot-men, they were by them ſo encountered and beaten back, that having loſt ſome of their men, they were glad again to retire into the Town; where they did their indeavour to defend themſelves, not daring afterward to fight without the Favour of their Walls; within which it ſtood them upon to have both Courage and Power, being ſtill furiouſly aſſailed by our men, who, planted upon the Town Ditch, with their Muſquets and Harquebuſes ſo plyed the Turks upon their Walls, and in their holds, as that they durſt not ſhew themſelves, or look out for the ſhowers of Lead which they thundered upon them. And aſſuredly, if our men had then had Inſtruments wherewith to have opened the Gates or the Walls, as well as their Muſquets and Harquebuſes had made a breach into the Reſolution of the Turks, the Town had undoubtedly been ours; but this deſign being not before foreſeen, neither intended, wanted the means to put it in Execution; ſo that, for want of Petards and of ſcaling Ladders, the place remained ſtill the Turks, and ſaved it ſelf out of our hands. In fine, our men having been four hours in fight before it, both doing and receiving harm, and finding no means to enter the place, were inforced to ſound a retreat, and to leave it.

Collonitz retireth to Comara.

In which retreat, the Chriſtians burnt certain Villages of the Enemies, rather to ſhew that they had been there, than for any their Valour therein; ſeeing that things inſenſible, which follow the order of their Nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them without reaſon. This done, they of purpoſe retired to little Comara; for the long time they had kept the field, the divers Exploits by them done againſt the Enemies, and the common report of the vanquiſhed, had ſtirred up the Enemies, ſo that they began now on every ſide by heaps to flock together to ſwallow them up, and even now preſſed upon their retreat. So Collonitz, in deſpight of the Enemy, in ſafety brought back his Souldiers; and being entered into Comara, cauſed the Heads of the principal of the ſlain Enemies to be ſet upon the Pikes of the Paliſadoes, and upon a great Pine-tree ſtanding before the Gate, which for this purpoſe had almoſt all the Branches lopped off. An action learned from the Cruelty of the Turks, and now done by the Chriſtians, more to aſtoniſh and deterr them from this their cruel Cuſtom, than for any Glory or Profit enſuing thereby; ſeeing that to tyrannize upon a dead body, is but a ſign of Cowardiſe, and an Action altogether unprofitable.

This done, our men departed from this Caſtle, as men worn, and almoſt ſpent with Travel and Wearineſs, but yet more with Famine. For why, they, thinking to have executed but that deſign which had put them in Arms, and that in ſo ſhort a time alſo, had taken no Proviſion of Victuals with them; ſo that they were all pined with Hunger, overcome with Watching, and half dead with Labour. Their Horſes alſo in like ſort languiſhed, the Country being alike cruel both to the one and to the other. For beſide that it was unfruitful for ſuch as held the field (all the Fruits thereof being gathered together and carried into the Towns by the Men of War) it was not poſſible for our men to forrage, or to ſeek for Victual there, and to come to an happy end of their deſign, for that they had raiſed an alarm abroad in the Country, and ſo perhaps might themſelves have become a Prey unto them, whom they ought to prey upon. Which was the cauſe that our Souldiers had for the ſpace of three days eaten nothing but Crabs and Acorns, which they found in the Woods which covered their Ambuſhes; ſo that being now come unto this Caſtle, they devoured a world of Victuals, and requeſted every one of them to return again unto their Garriſons; their Bodies weakened with Hunger, being ſcarce able to bear their Arms. But that was not all; for departing from little Comara, they were advertiſed, that the Turks ſhut up the ways whereby they were to make their retreat home; in hope eaſily to overcome men already with hunger brought low, and to kill the Bodies which travel already had ſpent. Howbeit, the great Courage of our men fruſtrated this the Enemies Deſign, and ſaved themſelves. But ſo far off was it that this Advertiſement diſmayed Collonitz, that even to the contrary it the more increaſed his Courage, as appointed for his Glory; being glad to have ſuch an occaſion offered him for the ſhewing of his Valour, although it were through the midſt of Danger, Death, and Slaughter. So that inſtead of ſhunning the Combat, whereas it was reported, that the Turks with great aſſurance marched near unto a Caſtle of the Chriſtians, to make head upon a Paſſage whereby our men were to retire; he turned head toward the ſame place, with a firm Reſolution, with true Valour upon the ſudden to encounter the Enemy, which had thought to have ſurpriſed him by Cowardiſe. And the Souldiers, weakened with Hunger, although they well apprehended the Danger of this Deſign; yet, reſting upon the great Reſolution of their General, and conſidering the Neceſſity they had to go farther for their ſafety, upon a good Courage were content to follow whitherſoever their General would; who led them directly unto the aforeſaid Caſtle, where it was expected that the Turks ſhould have charged them. But being come thither, there was no body to be ſeen; and yet our men, as hungry as they were, ſtayed there one day in ambuſh, expecting the coming of their Enemies; who, for all that, having no mind to meet them, appeared not, but gave them Time and Liberty in ſafety to retire themſelves every man unto his own Garriſon, to refreſh themſelves, and to recover their Strength.

The notable Reſolution of Collonitz.

But now whilſt our Men of War, after theſe Troubles in Tranſilvania and Hungary, repoſe themſelves; let us in the mean time take our Journey to Conſtantinople, and go unto the Marriage of Haſſan Baſſa, one of the Viſiers of the Grand Seignior, and laſt year General of the Turks Army in Hungary.

Haſſan Baſſa after the winning of Alba-Regalis, honourably received at Conſtantinople.

At ſuch time as he departed from this great City, to goe unto the Conqueſt of Alba-Regalis, Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, reſolved to ſet all upon the regaining of this City, cauſed to be preſented unto him a Crown and a Sword, the one in reward of his Valour, if he returned with Victory from this exploit; and the other in Revenge of his Cowardiſe, if he failed in the performance thereof; promiſing him indeed his Siſter in Mariage, amongſt other the glorious Rewards and Trophies of his Victory; and threatning him with Death, as a Puniſhment amongſt the Griefs of his Diſhonour. But it came to paſs, that by the Cowardiſe of our men, he came unto the effect of his deſire (as is aforeſaid) and took the City, which promiſed unto him the glorious Triumph in Conſtantinople. And under the ſweet influence of this Planet he returned to Conſtantinople, where he found all things in readineſs for the ſatisfying of his Expectation, and the Advancement of his Glory. He is magnificently received of his Prince, courteouſly ſaluted by all the Nobility, and with greateſt reverence poſſible honoured of the People. And as he had happily diſcharged his Charge, he found in like manner all things prepared and in readineſs for the performance of the promiſe of the Grand Seignior, his Lord and Maſter, who had cauſed them to be in moſt ſumptuous manner provided for the ſolemnizing of the Marriage, and the contentment of the Baſſa. But nothing now wanting that he could have deſired or wiſhed, more than the very ſolemnizing of the Marriage it ſelf, and that alſo every day of all men expected; the Janizaries and Spahi, with the other Souldiers of the Court, to the number of five and twenty thouſand, even upon the ſudden, when as no ſuch thing was feared, came, and in Arms preſented themſelves before the Divano, or Tribunal, holden for the chief Adminiſtration of Juſtice in the Turks Palace, the firſt four days in every week; and having ſet Guards at the Court Gates, the more ſafely to execute what they were before reſolved upon, proudly demanded to have Audience for certain of the Spahi and Janizaries, of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all, to deliver unto the great Baſſaes their Grievances, and the Cauſes of that their Aſſembly. Who, as ſoon as they were entered into the Divano before the Baſſaes, (of whom the moſt courageous of them was not without fear, as looking for nothing but for preſent death) they at the firſt demanded to have Haſſan Baſſa delivered unto them; Who, thinking that his Head ſhould have ſerved for a Sacrifice to pacifie this their Fury; as a man altogether diſmayed, wan and pale, paſſed through this mutinous Multitude, to have gone unto the great Sultan, proteſting of his own Innocency, and calling upon his Prophet Mahomet, to diſcover unto them the truth of all things. But they, after a thouſand Injuries and Reproaches by them heaped upon him, rudely demanded of him, whence it proceeded, that whilſt he with a great part of the Forces of the Empire was buſied in Hungary, for the recovering of Alba-Regalis, there was in the mean time no good order taken for the repreſſing of the Rebel in Aſia; who by ſufferance was (as they ſaid) now grown ſo proud, as with Enſigns diſplayed to come within three or four days Journey of Conſtantinople, the Imperial ſeat of the Othoman Emperours. Whereunto he in ſo ſmall fear anſwered, That he for his part had done his Duty, as well while he had the charge of the Army in Aſia, as now of late, whilſt he had the like charge againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary, as even the Enemies themſelves could witneſs. But ſeeing himſelf even ready to die, he yet requeſted them, That his guiltleſs Death might be unto the State in general profitable; and in diſcharging of his Conſcience, to declare unto them the Cauſes of this Contempt and Neglect for the ſuppreſſing of the Aſian Rebel, which they were ſo deſirous to know. It proceeded (as he ſaid) only from the evil Government of the Grand Sultans Mother (who then all commanded) and from the negligent careleſneſs of the Capi-Aga. Which his ſpeech, although they with much impatience and ſtorming gave ear unto, yet hearing him ſo well to excuſe himſelf, and to lay the blame there where they were well content it ſhould reſt; they gave him leave to go to the great Sultan, to requeſt him that they might ſpeak with him; and further to deal with him, that they might have the Head of them who had been the cauſe of this diſhonourable Service; or otherwiſe cowardly behaved themſelves in the managing of the Wars againſt the Rebels in Aſia; Threatning him withall, That if he failed to perform this his charge, he ſhould not fail to feel the heavy Effects of their juſt Fury. An heavy charge, yet glad was the Baſſa to undergo the ſame, to rid himſelf out of their Hands, where he ſaw himſelf in great danger, amongſt them, moſt of whom had

The Spahi and Janizaries in mutiny, demand Audience of the great Baſſaes.

Haſſan Baſſa in great fear of his Life.

Haſſan Baſſa perſwadeth the Great Sultan to give way unto the Janizaries, and to grant them their Requeſt.

ſometimes ſerved under him, than amongſt ſo many his moſt mortal Enemies; but what Remedy? he muſt now ſo do or die therefore; for which he was the more to be excuſed. So in great fear coming unto the great Sultan, almoſt as fearful as himſelf, he ſhewed unto him the great danger like even preſently to enſue, by the Mutiny of his beſt Souldiers, and Guarders of his Perſon; perſwading him, betime to appeaſe their Fury, before they had embrued themſelves with Blood; for fear of further danger like enough to enſue, as well unto his own Perſon, as unto the reſt of his moſt faithful and truſty Counſellor, from ſuch furious headſtrong men, up in tumult with their Arms in their Hands. And although that a Prince ought not for the Greatneſs of his Eſtate to do any thing as thereunto forced by his Subjects, leſt in ſo doing he might breed in them a Contempt of himſelf, and increaſe their Inſolency; that yet nevertheleſs, in this Action, being altogether extraordinary, he was not to reſt upon that point; for that theſe mutinous Souldiers turned not their Weapons (as they pretended) againſt his Imperial Power and Soveraignty, but rather to the contrary, againſt the Contemners thereof, ſeeking to be revenged upon them that had done him ſuch evil Service for the maintenance of his Honour and Majeſty, and for the Puniſhment of the inſolent and diſloyal. And that therefore the Juſtice of the Cauſe requiring and covering the Malice of the Fact, he was of Opinion, That it were beſt for him to yield a little unto the Zeal of theſe his beſt Souldiers, and to ſatiſfie their juſt deſire, although they had by very evil and unlawful means ſought for the ſame. And therefore adviſed his Majeſty, in ſome ſort to ſatiſfie the juſt Complaints of theſe men, armed for the Revenge of his Honour; and to chaſtiſe the chief Commanders of his Aſian Forces, ſuch as by whoſe Treachery or Cowardiſe his Service being neglected, had armed theſe men againſt them; with the ſame hand puniſhing ſuch as had wronged his Majeſty in Honour, and appeaſing the diſcontented for the good of his Service. Mahomet thus by the Baſſa perſwaded, as alſo to ſhew himſelf in his Majeſty unto theſe his diſcontented Subjects, one part of their deſire; the Neceſſity of the Cauſe ſo requiring, in his Imperial Seat preſented himſelf unto them, accompanied with the Mufti, (the great Mahometan Prieſt) and ſome few others of the Reverend Doctors of their Law; who, by the Sultan commanded to ſit down, and the Baſſaes ſtanding up (ſo great the reſpect is to men of that ſort, even in a barbarous Nation of ſo ſmall reſpect) the chief of the ſeditious ſtepping forth, demanded leave to ſpeak both for himſelf and the reſt. Which being granted, he boldly thus began;

Mahomet by the perſwaſion of Haſſan Baſſa, ſheweth himſelf to the mutinous Souldiers of the Court.

The proud and rude Speech of one of the Mutineers unto Mahomet the Great Sultan.

Moſt happy and mighty Emperour, we the Spahies and Janizaries, thy obedient Slaves, full of Grief and Diſcontentment to ſee a great part of thine Empire in danger to be loſt; deſire to know of thee the cauſe why thy Greatneſs doth not remedy it, and imploy the means which God hath given thee. They ſuppoſe that the Rebels Courſes in Aſia are unto thee unknown, ſeeing they have been ſo hardy as to come in Arms ſo near unto thy Imperial City, the Place of thine abode, and that without any let or reſiſtance. They deſire to know if all this hath been made known unto thee, and whither thou wilt take upon thy ſelf the care of the Government of thy great Monarchy, or no; which through the negligent careleſneſs and evil Government of ſome by thee put in truſt, is like unto a body with great and well proportioned Members, but of little or no Strength or Power. Or elſe, that thou, void of care, canſt be content that all ſhould be diſmembred, and ſo every man to take unto himſelf what he can lay hands of, as the Rebels do in Aſia.

Now let no man marvel at this preſumptuous rude Speech of a proud Janizary, unto his Soveraign; for why, they are the men which may moſt boldly ſpeak in Turky, they are the ſtay of the Turk's Empire, the Great Sultans Children acknowledging no other Father but them; nay rather, the Great Turk himſelf is their Creature, for they raiſe him up and confirm him in the Empire; they are his greateſt Strength, and unto them he is moſt beholden. If Mahomet were with ſo inſolent a Speech much moved, he was not juſtly to be therefore blamed; howbeit, being beſet with ſuch a furious tumult with Weapons in their hands, and having no means to withſtand their Fury, he wiſely diſſembled his inward Choler, and with a fair Countenance, and a Majeſty full of Mildneſs, with the beſt and calmeſt words he could deviſe, ſought to appeaſe them; imputing the Diſorder and evil Succeſs of his Affairs unto the unfaithfulneſs of his Miniſters, and the concealing of the Truth thereof from him. Saying moreover, That before this their Complaint he had reſolved to reform theſe Matters, and to take from them all Occaſions of Diſcontentment, or for them to uſe any ſuch Speech as was not beſeeming them; whoſe Obedience and Reſpect of loyal Duty unto him their Soveraign, ſhould have been an Example unto the reſt of his Subjects. Upon which Speech, they fiercely demanded of Haſſan Baſſa, Why he had not given an account unto his Majeſty, of the Rebels proceeding in Aſia. Who anſwered, That he had never failed of his Duty therein, but that he had been always hindered ſo to do by the Capi-Aga; ſaying, That it was not needful to trouble him their Soveraign therewith, (having committed theſe Matters to others) but to reform and amend them as well as they might otherwiſe, without giving of him any ſuch diſtate concerning theſe Matters. And further, That the cauſe of all theſe Diſorders proceeded from the Empreſs his Mother, the Capi-Aga, and ſome few others, unto whom he had commended the managing of thoſe his Affairs. With which his anſwer the Mutineers more moved, furiouſly ſaid, That they were thither aſſembled to demand the heads of ſuch Offenders; being reſolved to take another courſe, if he ſhould refuſe to grant it them; [meaning thereby to make a new Emperour.] Whereunto for all that, the great Sultan anſwered, That it was no Reaſon, neither that he would for their Humours put ſuch as they demanded innocently to death; but willed them to reſt themſelves contented, until it might by order of Juſtice be tryed whether they had deſerved death or no, and that then he would give them even his own Son, if he were found culpable. But the Mutineers, conſtant in their Reſolution, again replyed, That he had not by Juſtice put his Brethren to death, but for the Preſervation of the State; and that thoſe whom they ſo demanded were ſo guilty of that wherewith they were charged, as that they deſerved not to have an orderly Tryal; That the Laws, how juſt ſoever, ſhould be unprofitable, and Juſtice Injury, if they were not by them to be puniſhed; and that therefore it muſt needs be ſo, or els that they would take therein a courſe themſelves. As for the Empreſs his Mother, they were contented that ſhe ſhould be confined unto ſome place farther off, and no more to meddle in Matters of State. A ſtrange thing it was, to ſee ſo great a Prince ſo to be forced by the Sedition and Mutiny of his Subjects, to deliver ſo great an Officer of his Court as was the Capi-Aga, with ſuch others as they required, to be uſed at their Diſcretion. But the violent Reſolution of theſe moſt inſolent men ſo up in Mutiny, made the Sultan Mahomet wiſely to yield to what they demanded; cauſing the Capi-Aga, and the others others to be brought forth; who preſented themſelves unto their fury as men already half dead. Mahomet did what he might to have ſaved them, but the Mutineers with a great and dreadful Clamour ſtill cried out to have them diſpatched; neither could they be appeaſed until they ſaw their Heads ſtruck from their Bodies. For the loſs of whom, ſo dear unto him, Mahomet inwardly grieved; to be in ſome part revenged, commanded the Executioner to proceed, and to do unto ſome other of the chief Baſſaes (whom he knew to be much beloved and reſpected of the Janizaries, and whom he could have been content to have been rid of) as he had done unto the Capi-Aga and the reſt; but then the murmuring and mutiny of the Janizaries was in ſuch ſort increaſed, and as it were redoubled, as that Mahomet was for fear forced with patience to temper his Choler, and by giving way ſo to appeaſe them. The Empreſs, the Sultan's Mother, for all that was not then confined, but reſerved to the farther troubling of the State.

Sultan Mahomet with mild Words ſeeketh to appeaſe the mutinous Souldiers of the Court.

Haſſan Baſſa excuſeth himſelf, and layeth the fault upon the Empreſs, Mahomet's Mother, and the Capi-Aga.

The Capi-Aga, with ſome others, executed.

Other Cruelties of Sultan Mahomet.

With like Tyranny, and no leſs Injuſtice, Mahomet but a few days before had cauſed Capin, one of his great Baſſaes, to be beheaded; but whether it were for the deſire he had of his Wealth and Riches, or for the envy of his Honour and Valour, was uncertain; howbeit, the former Cauſe ſeemed unto many to be the more probable, for that Mahomet, immediately after his death, took the whole Spoil of his Wealth, and ſeiſed upon all his Goods except 400000 Duckats, which Caly Baſſa, Father of the dead Baſſa, had detained for himſelf. Which his purloining, Mahomet having diſcovered (as the eye of the covetous man is always fixed upon his Prey) demanded one day of the Baſſa, If it were true that he had retained unto himſelf thoſe 400000 Duckats? Which Fact the Baſſa, partly for fear, and partly for Covetouſneſs, conſtantly denied, and ſwore himſelf to be guiltleſs from any ſuch Crime; whereupon, he was forthwith taken, and thinking by lying to have ſaved his Life, was for the Truth put to death, without any farther Examination of the matter, having his Head ſtruck off. Such is the ſmall aſſurance, even of the greateſt that live in Tyrants Courts. Neither reſted his greedy mind ſo contented with the Baſſa's Blood; for why, that ſerved but for a ſhew, it was his Wealth muſt work that cure, which was all forthwith ſeiſed upon, rifled, and carried away, to ſatisfie in effect the greedy Appetite of the hungry Tyrant, who changed the Dowry and Succeſſion of the Wife and Children of the dead Baſſa, into Bonds, Chains, Priſons, and Slaveries.

Mahomet Baſſa by the Janizaries ſlain.

Mahomet, another Baſſa, with theſe Cruelties diſmayed, and perceiving the like evil hap and danger to hang over his own Head that had overwhelmed Calil and his Son, reſolved to have provided for himſelf againſt this Miſchief, by flying unto the Rebels in Aſia. But this his purpoſe diſcovered by certain Spies (which ſerve as means to open a way unto the Turks cruelty) and he, with one of the chief Followers of Capin Baſſa, taken by the Janizaries, were both by them cut in pieces.

The Succeſs of the Rebels in Aſia.

But whilſt theſe things thus paſſed at Conſtantinople, the Rebels with all diligence proſecuted their Rebellion in Aſia, and bent their Forces againſt the great Towns there. Their Army was exceeding great, every man joyning himſelf unto the firſt Forces which were in good Eſtate, being not as yet by any greater Power repreſſed, and rich with the Spoils that they had taken. Theſe men had beſieged Angore, a great and ſtrong Town in Aſia, and ſeemed reſolutely ſet down for the carrying thereof. Whereof the Citizens being afraid, and out of hope of Relief, came to Parle, offering unto them a Sum of Mony to redeem themſelves and their City; and ſo in fine agreed to give them 200000 Duckats; upon the ready payment whereof, the Rebels, without more ado, preſently departed.

The Turks together by the ears amongſt themſelves.

Shortly after, the new Captains of Sultan Mahomet arrived there alſo, whom he had placed in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appeaſing of the Souldiers of the Court, who would needs make it Treaſon, and put to Death the Citizens, for having given ſuch Money as is aforeſaid, unto the Rebels, tho it were done for the Preſervation of their Lives: as if the Laws were to be reſpected in the horrors of Neceſſity, or that Life were to become a Slave unto Riches, and Riches not made for the uſe of Man's Life. Well, needs they would for this ſuppoſed Treaſon (as they pretended) have put them to death, and ſacked their City; but indeed all was in their greedy fury to have carried away that which the Rebels had in their Mercy left them. Theſe poor Citizens, with this ſo cruel a Reſolution diſmayed, and out of all hope of finding favour at ſuch mercileſs mens hands, reſolved now to hazard all, and ſo upon the ſudden taking up Arms, ſtood upon their own defence. Hereupon aroſe a great and cruel Fight betwixt theſe Souldiers and the Citizens, both the Subjects of one Prince, and all of them of one and the ſelf-ſame Superſtition; but the one ſide, armed with Pride and Covetouſneſs, and the other with Neceſſity and Deſpair: howbeit, at laſt the juſter Cauſe prevailing, the Citizens overcame theſe new-come Souldiers, and having ſlain a great number of them, chaſed the reſt out of the City. This evil Encounter of theſe new Captains even at the firſt entrance into their Charges, given them by the Subjects themſelves, increaſed the Rebels Courage; ſo that they, being in number forty thouſand, under the leading of one of the Tartar Han's Brethren, beſieged Burze, a great and rich City, being the Store-houſe for the warlike Proviſions of Aſia, and the Place whereunto the Turks Cuſtoms, Taxes, and Subſidies of Aſia were brought, and there kept. Theſe men, after certain days beſtowed in the Siege, and great Reſiſtance made by the beſieged, at length by force carried the Place, ſlew the Inhabitants, and ſacked the City. Which Exploit, gracing their Fortune with Honour and Booty, increaſed alſo their Power and Reputation; ſo that re-doubled on all ſides, and increaſed with Courage and Spoils, Mahomet diſmayed, reſolved by fair means to appeaſe them, and to entreat with them of Peace. This good Fortune had drawn unto their part the Governour of Babylon, either weary of the Service of the Turk, or deſirous by the Ruine of the State in general, to increaſe his own Power; whoſe Revolt greatly increaſed the Rebels Power, and diminiſhed the Grand Seignior's. Beſide theſe Miſhaps alſo, the great Shaugh of Perſia (commonly called the Sophi) thruſting himſelf into theſe Diſorders, to make his Gain, and to fiſh (as they ſay) in a troubled Water, had now taken Corbery, a ſtrong Town upon the Borders of the Turk's Empire, and was making himſelf ready for new Conqueſts. All which Tempeſts ariſing as it were in one together, cauſed Mahomet to ſtrike Sail, and maugre his Imperial Dignity and Honour, to ſeek for Peace; which indeed could not be great in ſuch weakneſs of his nature, neither brave in ſuch his great want of Courage. For great Dignities and Honours, without Valour to maintain them, are but like rich Garments which cover Bodies almoſt rotten, but heal them not. Mahomet, deſirous to come to ſome good agreement with his rebellious Subjects, at length (but not without his great diſhonour) obtained the ſame; granting to them all their Demands, diſarming them by yielding unto them, and not by Valour; and giving unto Zellalie, one of their Chieftains, the moſt honourable place of the Baſſa of Boſna, to content his Ambition, and to bind him therewith to do his Service. The ready way by ſufferance to increaſe the diſloyal Subjects Courage, inſtead of ſtopping their Fury by the ſeverity of Juſtice; for to grace a Rebel with Offices of Authority, is but to arm him with lawful Power, for him the better to undertake whatſoever ſhall beſt fit his Appetite and Deſire, upon the hope of his own private and certain Profit or Advancement.

The Captains and Souldiers murmur againſt their Sultan Mahomet.

Mahomet's other Captains and Men of War, ſeeing this diſhonourable Peace of their Prince, and Preferment of the Rebels, honoured with Honours and Dignities, inſtead of Pains and Puniſhments which they ſhould of right have for their Rebellion indured; began to enter into great Murmuring and Diſcontentment againſt their great Sultan. They conſidered his unjuſt dealing and baſe fear, in advancing the Rebels unto ſuch Honours and Dignities, as of right belonged unto his moſt faithful and loyal Officers and Servants, by ſuch their unworthy Preferments making them Slaves unto his Enemies, and Vaſſals unto the Rebels; they, to their diſhonour and loſs, by their Inſolency and Treachery, injoying the Honours and Preferments of right due unto their faithful and loyal Services. Which dangerous Perſwaſions tranſported them ſo far from their Allegiance and Duty, as to undertake a greater and more perillous matter againſt his Crown and Dignity, than had the Rebels before by taking up of Arms in the Field againſt him, whereunto the aſſured knowledge they had of his Cowardiſe encouraged them alſo; ſo that their Reſolution was to thruſt him out of his Imperial State, and to ſet up his eldeſt Son, called alſo Mahomet, in his Place. Theſe are the ordinary Effects of Injuſtice and Cowardiſe, the overthrow of Princes; their Injuſtice through Cruelty arming all Creatures againſt them; and their Cowardiſe through Contempt diſpenſing with every man for his Duty; ſo that he muſt be juſt, that will keep his Subjects in order; and valiant, that muſt hold them in awe.

Mahomet in danger to be depoſed from his Empire, and his eldeſt Son ſet up in his Place.

Unto theſe Diſcontentments theſe Mutineers joyned alſo (as I ſaid) the ſlothfulneſs, effeminateneſs, and ſufficiency of Mahomet, unfit to deal in matters of Eſtate, and altogether unable to manage Arms. He was too cowardly, as they thought, to repreſs their Valour by force, and too weak to croſs their Deſigns by Wiſdom; which not a little incouraged them in that their ſo deſperate and dangerous a Reſolution. They drew alſo into this their Plot the Sultaneſs Mahomet, his chief Wife, and Mother to the young Prince; who, blinded with Ambition (the bane of great Spirits) had not the hap to reject their Perſwaſions, as dangerous unto her and her Son, but ſhutting her Eyes againſt the due Conſideration of Loyalty and Duty, caſt both her ſelf and her Son headlong into the midſt of moſt deſperate Dangers.

This Project (of no leſs importance, than of the depoſing of one of the greateſt Monarchs of the World) reſolved upon, ſome of theſe men, according to the manner of the Turks, joining Superſtition unto their Deſigns, conſulted with an Aſtrologer, concerning the Succeſs of the Actions of the young Prince, whom they were about to inſtall in his Fathers Imperial Throne. This man, to be excuſed in his Trumperies, ſeeing that to deceive is the chief point of his Art, erected the figure of the Princes Nativity, conſulted with his Spirits, conſidered the cœleſtial Bodies, and in fine, arrived at the point of his Judgment, for the good and welfare of the Prince; and thereupon diſpatched an Eunuch towards the Sultaneſs, with theſe pleaſing Speeches, That ſhe ſhould be of good courage and in aſſured hope that the young Prince her Son, within a few days ſhould have the Imperial Crown ſet upon his Head, and the Royal Scepter put into his hand; his Art (as he ſaid) promiſing unto him theſe Honours, by the Favour of the Cœleſtial Bodies, of whom he had learned theſe News; and by the Conference with Spirits, from whom he had this aſſurance. But O the vain and fooliſh knowledge of Man againſt God! attributing unto the ſecond Cauſes, that which altogether belongeth unto his own Power; robbing him of his own Providence, which extendeth over all, to give the ſame unto Creatures, which neither have their own Being, neither are able of themſelves to bring forth, or to work any Effects at all without it! and that more is, to give certain credit unto the Enemy of all Faith and Belief, even to the Father of leaſing, who taketh as much Glory in falſhood, as God himſelf doth in truth; as being the proper mark of his Power. For it chanced that theſe Letters, ſent by the Eunuch to the Sultaneſs, were intercepted and brought unto Mahomet the Great Sultan, whom they moſt concerned; whereupon it ſo fell out, that he which took upon him to foretell the long Life and Empire to befall to another man, could not foreſee the end of his own Life, which followed him faſt, even at the heels, being himſelf by the Commandment of the great Sultan, with the young Prince, the Eunuch, and fifty others of the Conſpirators, and ſuch as were conſenting unto the Conſpiracy, moſt cruelly ſtrangled, and the Sultaneſs her ſelf drowned. Howbeit, ſome report this young Prince to have been ſtrangled upon ſuſpicion of conſpiring againſt his Father, with the Rebels of Aſia; which after his Death being found not to be ſo, the Baſſa which put that Suſpicion into Mahomets Head, to have been therefore worthily hanged. But with theſe Contentments taken from the Croſſes of our Enemies, let us again return unto Hungary.

The Polonian denieth the Tartars Paſſage through his Country, into Hungary.

The laſt year ended with the great brute of the coming of the Tartar Han, with a great Army into Hungary, and now he had diſpatched his Ambaſſadors towards the King of Polonia, to demand of him Tribute, and paſſage through his Country. Great and proud demands to be both at once required. But the King of Polonia requited him again with the like, denying him both the one and the other, roughly anſwering of his Threats. Which ſo reſolute and blunt a refuſal, cauſed the proud Tyrant to change his intended courſe, and for fear of being defeated by the Polonians in paſſing through their Country, (as the Tartars had often been) before he could come into Hungary, took another way, and turned with his Army toward Valachia. Of whoſe coming, Radul the Vayvod underſtanding, and that beſide the forraging of his Country, they had a purpoſe to diſplace him, and to ſet up another Vayvod in his ſtead; with great diligence gathered together the greateſt Power that he could, and ſo marched unto the Borders of his Country, there to attend the coming of theſe Tartars, and to ſtay them from entring. Which in effect fell out according to his deſire, for the barbarous People being arrived, and attempting with all their force to have entred, were by this little Army encountered; which, commanding the Country, took all the advantages of the ſtrait paſſages, and there notably repulſed the fierce Enemy. Two of the firſt encounters fell out fortunately unto the Valachians, who therein ſlew a-about 3000 of the Tartars; whoſe avantguard for all that ſtill came on, and at the third encounter ſo long maintained the fight, that their whole Army was now come in, and hardly charged the Valachians;

whoſe

1603 whoſe Fortune ſurcharged, began then to change, the hardy being conſtrained to bow under the multitude, and valor forced to yield unto number. Which was not done without a long and cruel fight, both Armies encountring with great Courage and Fury, the one for the defence of their Country, and the other for an entrance unto their Conqueſts. Howbeit, the ſtrong Enemy at length prevailed, and entring into Valachia, brought in with it Ruine, Death, and Deſtruction.

The Tartars in Hungary.

The Tartars having by force thus opened themſelves a way through Valachia, and grievouſly ſpoiled the Country, were come with their Army to Quinque Eccleſiæ, a Town in Hungary, to joyn their Forces with Haſſan Baſſa, now after his Marriage returned into this Country with a great Army to continue his Charge; who cauſed the Tartars to be muſtered in his Preſence, and found them to be forty thouſand ſtrong. Men of great Courage againſt the weak, but meer Cowards before the Courageous; who, inſtead of aſſaulting the Walls of any ſtrong Town, fell upon the Cottages of poor Country Villages, ranſacking and pillaging the poor Inhabitants, as well in the Villages of the Territories ſubject unto the Turks, as in the Territories of the Chriſtians; conſtraining the poor People, contrary to their Conſcience, and to the Prejudice of their Faith, to ſwear to ſerve the Turk; Beſides that, they inforced them to furniſh them with all warlike Proviſion and Munition, which they put into Caniſia, but a while after that, our men had defeated the Garriſon there. Neither were they ſo contented, all the Neighbours being thereabouts ſubject to this Tempeſt; for they paſſed into Stiria with their Families, and over-ran a part of that Province, ſpoiling it of Men, Cattel, and Goods; leaving inſtead of them, Deſtruction, Miſery, and Death; and carried away with them two thouſand poor Chriſtians for Slaves, whom they ſold unto the Turks, and made great profit of them. From thence they went into the Country of Shavary, embruing themſelves with the Blood of the Chriſtians, rifling their Villages, and after that burning them; carrying away with them a thouſand Chriſtian Captives into moſt miſerable Bondage and Slavery. Which cruel Outrages, afterward thruſt the valiant Colonel Collonitz into the Field, againſt theſe barbarous People, to ſtay their Incurſions, and to defeat them if he could.

Great ſpoil made by the Tartars in Hungary, Stiria, and Shavarie.

Collonitz oppoſeth his Forces againſt the Tartars.

This worthy Commander had but a few days before been troubled in appeaſing the French light Horſemen in Garriſon in the Villages about Roquesburg, riſen up in Mutiny for their Pay; whoſe hot and moved Spirits, he by his Wiſdom ſo calmed, as that they were content again to be ſworn to the Emperour, and ſo joyned themſelves unto the Army of Collonitz, which was then 10000 good men Strong.

In the mean time, the Tartars, greedy of Prey, and ſtill ſeeking after Booty, ranſack'd and ſpoiled five and twenty Country Villages about Veradin; all which they afterward burned alſo, carrying away with them a great Booty both of Men and Cattel; no man reſiſting them. At which time, other Companies of them alſo invaded the County Serin's Iſland as far as Rackenſpurge, made in it great ſpoil, as had their Fellows elſewhere; and beſide other Booty, carried away with them two thouſand Chriſtian Captives. Theſe outrages of the Tartars armed the County on the one ſide, and Collonitz on the other; who courageouſly oppoſing themſelves againſt theſe Barbarians, for a time ſtay'd their Incurſions, they not daring to abide the force of this little Army, ſufficient enough, for the Valour thereof, to have overthrown that of their Enemies, for number dreadful. This made them to turn their courſe another way into Sclavonia, being in number five and thirty thouſand men, leaving nothing behind them there but Death and Deſolation, for the number of Priſoners and great Booties which they carried from thence. Amongſt other their ſpoils, it was their Fortune by the way to meet with ſix hundred of the Chriſtian Souldiers, of whom not one eſcaped their hands, but were ſlain every Mothers Son. At length it ſo fortuned, that certain of their Troops in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of the County Serin, who with his Followers ſtill hovered aloof off, for fear to be of their great Multitude overwhelmed; a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his Souldiers overthrown and all cut in pieces, and a number of Chriſtian Captives by them taken, delivered out of Chains, and ſet at Liberty. Which Exploit, was greater for the fear it brought upon the Enemy, than for the ſlaughter there made. For the Tartars, ſtill in doubt to meet again with the Chriſtian Troops (who left not one of them alive that they could light on) were glad now to keep themſelves cloſer together, and ſo did a great deal the leſs harm than when they, without fear roamed up and down at their Pleaſure; ſo that even by this little Victory the Country received ſome Comfort, and the Earl greater Honour; ſmall helps being infinite Treaſures in time of Neceſſity, which out of it would not be to be reckoned of. 1603

The Tartars repreſſed by County Serin.

The Garriſon Souldiers of Caniſia, of late defeated by Collonitz, in going to meet the Convoy coming towards them with Victuals (as is before declared) the reſt of the Garriſon, deſirous to be revenged were conſulting of the means how to bring the ſame to paſs. It fortuned, that at the ſame time there was a fugitive Chriſtian Souldier in the Town, who made ſhew of a man male-content, deſirous to turn Turk; of whom the Turks made much reckoning, for that he ſeemed to know much of the Deſigns of the Chriſtians, and the means how to croſs them; whereof he ſo aſſured them, as if the matter had been now already done; promiſing to bring them even into the midſt of the Chriſtian Camp, and to deliver it into their Hands and Power. Howbeit, his meaning was nothing leſs; for ſeeing the Turks much buſied with carrying in of Victuals into the Caſtle, brought into the Town after the overthrow of their Fellows before ſent forth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intentive to that Buſineſs; knowing the place in the Caſtle where the Powder and Munition lay, he at the ſame time, by a Train lay'd Fire thereunto, and afterward, amidſt the tumult and the ſtir, by a loop-hole in the Wall, got himſelf out of the Town, and came to Collonitz, who with his Troops lay near thereby in ambuſh, expecting the Opportunity to perform ſome notable exploit upon the Succeſs of ſo dangerous an adventure, whereunto he had before been made privy. Neither failed the fire any thing of the accuſtomed violence thereof, but ſeemed rather to redouble the ſame, it had ſo ſuddenly conſumed the Buildings, Munitions, and Perſons. All the place felt the Fury thereof; the Cannons, Canoneers, Souldiers, and whatſoever elſe, was ſubject unto this dreadful blaſt; all was ſhaken and turned upſide down, yea the fire burſt out of the Caſtle, and burnt the greateſt part of the Town alſo. There was a Confuſion of fear, miſhap, and miſery together, the Terror whereof cauſed many of the Turks to caſt themſelves over the Walls, in hope ſo to have ſaved their Lives; but whilſt they thought ſo to have eſcaped the Danger of the Fire, they preſently fell upon the edge of the Sword; for, meeting with the Souldiers of Collonitz, (who lying in ambuſh near thereby, awaited the opportunity in that ſo confuſed a Tumult, to have ſeiſed upon the place) they were all either taken Priſoners, or ſlain. But ſee the hap, how one croſs chance of Fortune overthrew this ſo notable a Deſign, as had it been well followed, might in one moment have recovered that ſtrong Place, which had before for the ſpace of many days indured the greateſt Forces of the Othoman Emperour; neither yet was then ſo loſt, but through the infamous Treachery of our own men.

A notable Exploit done by a fugitive Chriſtian.

A fair Opportunity for the recovery of Caniſia, overſlip'd through the diſloyalty of the French and Wallons.

You have heard before, how that Collonitz had by fair Perſwaſions, rather than by true Effects, appeaſed the French-men and Wallons, up in mutiny for their Pay; ſo that by him perſwaded, they had again given their Oath of Fidelity unto the Emperour, and to follow his Army. But now, when occaſion ſerved, and held out as it were both her Arms unto the Chriſtians, for the regaining and conqueſt of Caniſia, theſe French-men and Wallons, the greateſt part of Collonitz's ſtrength, injuriouſly refuſed her ſo fair an offer; and at ſuch time as they ſhould rather have fought naked, then have failed in their Duty, (it being to have gained a moſt great and rich Conqueſt) for want of Pay (as they pretended) turned their backs, and being by no great intreaty or perſuaſions to be moved, to the Diſcouragement of the reſt, who were better minded, and their own eternal Infamy, withdrew themſelves from the Army: So that Collonitz, rather by the wicked unfaithfulneſs of his own diſloyal Souldiers, than by the Valour of his Enemies, diſappointed of his purpoſe, was to his great Diſcontentment, contrary to that he hoped, inforced to retire without any thing more doing.

The Tartars defeated by the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti.

While this Exploit, ſo well begun, but evil performed, was in hand, the Turks and Tartars aſſembled together, made a cruel ſpoil in the Country about Rab, even almoſt unto the Gates of the Town, carrying away with them a great number both of Men and Beaſts. In fine, it chanced that the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti came that way, who underſtanding what had happened, with all ſpeed made after theſe Robbers, overtook them in their retreat near unto Alba-Regalis, ſlew a great number of them, and inforced the reſt to leave a great part of their Prey behind them. With which Booty, recovered even out of the Lyons Mouth, they returned to Rab; of whom, the poor Inhabitants and Country People, with Tears ſtanding in their Eyes, requeſted to have again their own Goods. But War, the enemy of Charity, and nurſe of barbarous Cruelty, had ſo hardned the Hearts of theſe men of War, as that they were not to be moved to reſtore them their Cattel again, but that they muſt redeem them for preſent Money, which they did and ſo received them.

2000 Turks defeated by Collonitz.

Now the Noble Collonitz, ſeeing himſelf ſo ſhamefully forſaken of his own Souldiers, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, and the Turks and Tartars in great numbers coming to the relief and repairing of this ſo ſore ſhaken a Town; and out of hope to do any good thereon, full of Grief and Indignation returned towards Comora: And howbeit, that evil hap had cruelly fruſtrated the glory of his Enterpriſe, yet the Heavens, in deſpight of Fortunes frown, left not this noble and valiant Captain altogether without Honour, but, as amorous of his Vertues and Valour, preſented unto him in this Winter of Fortunes diſpleaſure, ſome Trophies of Glory. For upon the way, as he was returning home, he met with 2000 Turks, whom, after ſome ſmall reſiſtance he cut all in pieces; miſerable Sacrifices, appointed unto the fury of his wrath. In this fight their Enſigns were all taken, and a number of Priſoners, the chief of whom, together with their Enſigns, he ſent to Prague, as a Preſent for the Emperour, and a token of his good Service.

The report then was, That the Turks and Tartars, with their united Forces, had forraged Sclavonia, taken divers ſtrong Holds, burnt a number of Villages, and carried away eight thouſand Chriſtians Priſoners, beſide a great number more ſlain with the Sword, or conſumed with Fire, and all the Cattel of the Country driven away; and that being with this booty come to Quinque Eccleſiæ, they had there received Command with Mahomet Baſſa, to beſiege Comora, and that all the Commanders of the Turks Army were thereupon reſolved. All which reports no whit diſmayed the Valiant Collonitz, or any thing altered his Deſigns; but having fortified Comora, againſt the intended Siege of the Turks, and taken from thence four Culverins, according to a former purpoſe by himſelf intended, reſolved now to take from the Turks the Caſtle of Loqua and Boulouvenar, the Garriſons whereof greatly annoyed the Territories of the Chriſtians, and hindred the Deſigns of this great Captain. Theſe two Caſtles are ſcituate upon a great Mariſh which ſeparateth Hungary from Raſcia, and are therefore as Bounders of Hungary, and ſtrong enough to be defended againſt a ſmall Army.

The Caſtle of Loqua beſieged by Collonitz.

Upon which Reſolution he ſet forward with his ſmall and valiant Power, and the fourth day arrived within the ſight of Loqua, a Caſtle well manned, and furniſhed with all things neceſſary for the defence thereof. The Army lodged, Collonitz with a Drum ſummoned the beſieged to yield up the Place, with Promiſes of Courteſie if they ſhould now accept of the ſame whilſt it was offered them; which they ſtoutly refuſed to do, ſwearing to the contrary, That they would die and live within thoſe their Walls. Collonitz ſeeing them ſo reſolved, firſt cauſed a Mill to be aſſaulted, which, placed over againſt the Caſtle, and well fortified, ſerved it inſtead of a Bulwark, and ſeemed hard to be taken; howbeit his men, loth to have their good Fortune even in the beginning checked, gave thereunto ſo brave an aſſault, that after the Enemy had done what he could for the defence thereof, they became Maſters of the Place, carried it, and therein lodged; but finding it dangerous to be kept, and to ſtand them in ſmall ſtead, they ſet it on fire, and afterward planted four Culverins in battery before the Caſtle. But as they were thus buſied, the Turks couragiouſly ſallied out upon them, not doubting to adventure themſelves, for the hope they had to be in ſhort time by their great Army relieved. In this ſally they met afront with the Haiducks, whom they fiercely charged, and ſo gauled them, that having ſlain thirty of them, they retired without any loſs; forthwith diſcharging ſo many thundering Shot and Arrows upon our men, as that they well knew not how to ſave themſelves from the danger of them, in ſuch ſort, that all the ways to approach the place being ſtopped, they began to deviſe how to ſet the Caſtle on fire; which they by certain Fire-works attempted, but to ſmall purpoſe, the fire being no ſooner kindled, but that it was forthwith by the Turks quenched. This done, and our men diſappointed of their hope, they deviſed to ſet fire upon the timber which joyned the Paliſado to the Caſtle ſtretching toward the Port. Which their attempt ſorted but to ſmall effect alſo, the fire burning but ſlowly to do the Enemies any great harm. All which Devices failing, they reſolved by plain force to aſſault the Caſtle, and to ſcale the ſame; which Enterpriſe reſolved upon, the Haiducks carrying before them certain ſtrong and thick Planks of Wood, inſtead of Targuets, to defend them from the ſmall Shot and Arrows of their Enemies; by this Device gained the Paliſado placed upon the Ditch; and being there in ſome ſafety, with their Muſquets and Harquebuzes ſo applyed the beſieged, that they drave them from their Curtains, and made that they durſt no more ſhew themſelves upon the Walls. And immediately after, two Companies of the Haiducks placed ten Ladders againſt one of the Towers of the Caſtle, and ſo with their Enſigns in their hands courageouſly mounted the Ladders, in hope to have gained the Place; but the Turks, as men reſolved to live and dye in their Caſtle, valiantly repulſed thoſe Haiducks, and by force drew in unto them from off the Ladders, the two Enſign-bearers of the Haiducks, whoſe Heads they cut off, and caſt them down unto their Fellows, which were yet coming up the Ladders; and the two Enſigns ſo gained upon the Walls, they placed in the mid'ſt of their own, as the Trophies of the Spoils of them who would have ſpoiled them. With which ſo great Courage of the Enemies, and death of their Fellows, our men not a little diſmayed, kept themſelves cloſe at the foot of the Wall, as afraid any farther to force the Place, which to their loſs they ſaw ſtored with ſuch valiant men to defend it.

Notable reſiſtance made by the beſieged Turks.

Collonitz, perceiving this diſcomfiture of theſe men, and well aſſured that the Caſtle was not but by Valour to be won, immediately drew out of every Company of the County Ringrave, certain of the beſt and moſt reſolute Souldiers to renew the Aſſault: Which ſo honourable a Charge they cheerfully undertook, and as men of Courage, began forthwith to mount the Ladders. Which the Haiducks beholding, again took courage, and partly aſhamed of themſelves, and partly to be partakers of the Spoil and Prey, if they ſhould prevail, did what they might for the winning of the Place, ſtriving now who ſhould do beſt. Which Aſſault was with ſuch fury and preaſe of men maintained, that the Turks, not able longer to withſtand ſo great Forces, were conſtrained to yield both themſelves and their Caſtle unto the fury of their angry Enemies. Which Caſtle indeed coſt much Chriſtian Blood, but yet more of the Turks; for the Haiducks, armed with rage and revenge, ſlew almoſt all in the Caſtle, as well Raſcians as Turks, and took the reſt Priſoners. Among others, there was an Hungarian Renegade there taken, whom for haſte they beheaded, being not at leiſure to impale him, the ordinary puniſhment for ſuch faithleſs Miſcreants. But during this ſpoil, made by men chafed with fury, the Wind and Fire were on their part exerciſing of their rage alſo. For the Fire which they had caſt upon the Paliſado, and which they had before neglected, as of little or no force, now increaſed with the Wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, having burnt the Paliſado, got hold of the Caſtle alſo; whereunto the Souldiers (loaded with Prey and Booty, the things they moſt deſired) had no regard at all; ſo that the Fire utterly conſumed the Caſtle, with whatſoever elſe had eſcaped their greedy hands.

The Caſtle of Loqua by the Chriſtians taken and ſacked.

The Turks in Garriſon at Boulouvenar (a Fortreſs but a League diſtant from this burnt Caſtle) ſeeing theſe Flames of Fire, and doubting what might betide themſelves, began to conſult what courſe were beſt for them to take, as either to attend the coming of the Enemy, and ſo to abide the chance of War, or elſe betimes to provide for themſelves by flight; the Conſideration of their Honour and Duty perſwaded them to ſtay, but the ruine of their Neighbours, as ſtrong and valiant as themſelves, perſwaded them otherwiſe. In fine, the care of the Preſervation of their Lives prevailed, and the Reſolution was, that they ſhould fly. And ſo puting all their Houſhold-ſtuff and Goods into certain Boats, there ready upon the Lake, they by the midſt thereof fled; fooliſhly perſwading themſelves, that our men coming thither, and finding nothing there, would not long there ſtay, but be gon; after whoſe departure they might, as they thought, return again unto their old dwellings, and in the mean time hide themſelves in the Mariſh, until that the Enemy were paſt. But our men coming thither, and finding no man in the Caſtle, neither yet any thing elſe that could well be carried away, wondered to ſee that there were any men ſo cowardly, as for fear to abandon ſuch a Place, as for the ſtrength thereof might have been an Example to others to ſtand upon their Guard and defence, they ſought out every Corner thereabout, to find out whither the Turks were fled. At laſt, after much diligent ſearch, they found certain Boats which the Turks had ſunk in the Channel near unto the Caſtle Gate, which cauſed them to think that they were fled by Water, and happily were in ſome place not far off. Theſe Boats were forthwith drawn up out of the Water, and found furniſhed with Oars and ſuch other things as belonged unto them. Which done, Collonitz choſe out certain of the moſt valiant and reſolute of the Haiducks, whom he commanded in thoſe Boats to follow after the Turks in the Lake. Who, accuſtomed to ſuch Exploits, and not ignorant of the Places and Secrets of their Country, went aboard and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gon paſt two Leagues upon the Lake, but that they diſcovered a party of the fugitives hid in a little Iſland, awaiting the end of this Tempeſt, to recover again that which they had forſaken. The Turks, diſmayed with the ſight of theſe men, and forced by neceſſity to ſtand upon their Guard, welcomed them with certain little faulcon ſhot, which they brought with them in their Boats, thinking to have hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with ſuch Muſick to be moved therewith; beſides that, the deſire of the Booty, which was by the Turks brought out of the Caſtle into the Iſle, exceedingly animated them for the gaining thereof; ſo that all fear of Danger ſet apart, they landed in the Iſle. Whom ſo landing, the Turks with great Courage received; ſo that betwixt them was ſought a greater fight than is for ſo ſmall a number on both ſides to be believed, only Valour and not number holding the Balance of the Victory. But in the end, the chief of the Turks, and he which was their Governour in Boulouvenar, ſlain, the reſt diſcouraged, came to Parley, yielding themſelves, with their Wives and Children, and all that they had, as a Prey unto the Victors. The Priſoners were brought back again unto the Caſtle, until the next day, that our men having put a good and ſtrong Garriſon of four hundred Haiducks, and two hundred Huſſars into Boulouvenar, with their Priſoners and their Booty returned toward Comara; where they, notwithſtanding divers Reports of the aſſembly of the Turks Garriſons for the ſurpriſing of them upon the way, in ſafety arrived, with a rich Booty, and a number of Wagons loaded with the Spoils of their Enemies. The Emperour had for his part thirteen Enſigns, beſide the Places won; which being nigh unto Caniſia, much bridled the Spoylings and Incurſions of that Garriſon.

The Turks for fear forſake the Caſtle of Boulouvenar.

The Turks fled out of the Caſtle of Boulouvenar, ſurpriſed and overthrown.

But leaving theſe endleſs Troubles of Hungary for a while, let us now again look into Tranſilvania, to ſee what they there do. Moyſes the Rebel, by Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant (as we have before ſaid) overthrown, and diſappointed of his hope, betook himſelf unto a ſtrong Caſtle of his own, called Solomoſe, there in fear attending the final Succeſs of his Affairs. Baſta in the mean time being as wiſe to make uſe of his Victory, as he was valiant to obtain the ſame, ſubdued the reſt of the Country, repreſſed the Rebels, ſtopped the way of Sedition, and put Moiſes in deſpair of all Safety. Who ſeeing himſelf brought unto ſuch Extremity, offered to yield his Caſtle unto the Turks, and ſo without farther acquainting of any man with his purpoſe, thruſt himſelf, with his Wife and Family, and all the reſt of his Subſtance, into Temeſwar, a ſtrong City of the Turks not far off: whom the Baſſa in ſhew moſt courteouſly received, and the rather, for that he was in good hope to make a Prey of the great Wealth of this new-come Fugitive; who had not there long ſtayed, but that he had perſuaded the Captain of Givaſgar, a ſtrong frontier Caſtle thereby, to deliver the ſame to the Turks, and that without the Privity of the Garriſon Souldiers, for that he doubted that they would hardly be thereunto drawn; who yet getting knowledge thereof, put their Captain in remembrance of his Duty, beſeeching him not to draw ſuch an Infamy both upon himſelf and them, by committing ſo foul a Fact. But afterward finding him reſolutely ſet down for the betraying of the Caſtle, they ſuddenly laid hands upon him, and ſtruck off his Head; and ſo with the Blood of their traiterous Captain having averted the eminent danger, with great Honour held the Place.

He with his Wife and Family flieth unto the Turks.

Baſta beſiegeth the Turks in the Caſtle Solomoſe.

Moiſes now, as he thought, in ſafety at Temeſwar, was yet ſtill plotting how to trouble the State of Tranſilvania, and raiſe new Stirs therein; and to that end ſent a number of Spies with Letters of Credence unto the principal men of that Country, aſſuring them of great and ſufficient Aid from the great Turk, if they would but take up Arms for their Liberty (as he termed it) and ſhew themſelves in Field againſt the Imperials. Neither was Baſta in the mean time careleſs of him, or negligent in his ſo weighty Affairs; but knowing that he, as a notorious Rebel, had yielded his Caſtle unto the Turks, and was himſelf retired unto Temeſwar, forthwith made choice of ſix thouſand of the beſt Souldiers in his whole Army, and ſo ſet forward to beſiege it; whom, at his Arrival, the Turks there in Garriſon derided, in hope to fruſtrate his Deſigns. For why, they thought that their Caſtle, ſeated upon a ſteep high Hill, fortified with good and ſtrong Walls, environed with a broad and deep Ditch, and not ſubject unto Battery, could not, but with much labour, great danger, and long time, be gained out of their hands, it being impoſſible (as they ſuppoſed) for their Enemies to make a breach, or find an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men ſeeing the Strength of the Place, and the difficulty to force it, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmayed at the foot of the Hill where the Caſtle ſtood; yet more diſcouraged with the impregnableneſs of the place, than with the Valour of the Defendants. But what cannot Induſtry and Valour do? In ſeeking about to find ſome means to make ſhew of their Courage and Valour, they diſcovered a little ſharp ſteep Hill over againſt the Caſtle, from the top whereof the Caſtle was to be battered, and the beſieged diſtreſſed; but to bring the Cannon thither, and eſpecially with Horſes, was impoſſible, by reaſon of the ſteep roughneſs of the Aſcent thereunto, with broken and hanging Rocks, over-grown with Trees and Buſhes, as if it had been another Alps, not but with Fire and Vinegar to be opened: yet in fine, our men reſolving to gain the Place, did themſelves that which their Horſes ſhould have done but could not, and by force of hand drew their Cannon up to the top of the Hill; and having planted it over againſt the midſt of their Enemies great Ordnance, began to batter the Caſtle: which done, they day and night made their Approaches, fortified their Forts and Trenches, brought on their warlike Munitions, and put all things in ſuch order, as if they would even by plain force have carried the Place. But the Turks more admiring the valourous Reſolution of our men, than reſolving themſelves upon their Reſiſtance, being not many in number within the place, and ſeeing themſelves to have to do with men of invincible Courage, laying aſide both their Hope and Weapons, craved to come to a Parle. Which granted, it was at length agreed, That they ſhould deliver up the Caſtle, leaving behind them their great Ordnance, their Munition and Enſigns, and ſo with their Arms and Lives only ſaved, to depart. A great and glorious Conqueſt got with ſmall charge; only by Reſolution gained by our men, without peril: thoſe being indeed the true Victories, which neither draw Blood out of the Veins, nor Tears out of the Eyes.

The Caſtle of Solomoſe by the Turks yielded up to Baſta.

Baſta's Admonitions to them of Tranſilvania.

This ſtrong Place ſo gained, contrary to the common Opinion conceived thereof, led the whole Province as it were by the hand unto the Obeiſance of the Emperour; in ſuch ſort, that Baſta having called together all the principal men of Tranſilvania, declared unto them the Juſtice of his Cauſe, the Right of the Emperour, with the Malice and Treachery of the Turks and Rebels; how they might live in aſſurance with the one, and become miſerable with the others; That the Emperour was always armed for their Defence and Health, deſiring nothing but their Welfare and Preſervation; whereas their Enemies to the contrary, ſought altogether their Ruine and Decay; That as they were not to expect light flames of Fire out of the Sea, no more they were to look for Aid from thoſe their mortal Enemies, whom they knew to have before decreed to have put them all to death, and to have given their Country unto the Tartars their Enemies; That this Diſaſter had not now been to fall upon them, either ever have been by them perceived, without the Aid of the Emperour; who oppoſing himſelf againſt this Fire, had quenched it and put it out; preſerving them with his great charge, and ſaving them even in the midſt of their greateſt Perils and Dangers. That they ſhould therefore remember theſe his ſo great Benefits, to the intent to make him recompence according to the publick Faith, which bindeth us to the reward of good Deſerts; and that all the recompence that the Emperour deſired, was the welfare of the eſtate as concerning their own good; inſomuch, that he deſired nothing of them but their Obeiſance, for being bound to defend them and preſerve them to his Power; whereby it ſhould come to paſs, that he ſhould be ſatisfied for his Travels, and they preſerved from their Enemies; the Prince and the Subjects together jointly working their mutual Health and Welfare; each of them according unto their Proportion, for that this mutual performance of Duty preſerved the Scepter for the good government of their Eſtate. Whereunto their Anſwer was, That they beſought him that their Country might be relieved from the croud and cruelty of the men of War, and delivered from the intolerable Burthens of Tributes, which ſo heavily oppreſſed it; that theſe Objects and Inconveniences could not keep them conſtant in their Obedience, ſeeing that they both felt them, and received them from the hand of them, to whom they had yielded their Obedience, in hope to have been by them relieved; that the new feeling of the Wound did continually renew in them the hatred, and the Object of their Harms ſtill kept both their Eyes and their Minds occupied upon them, who were the cauſes thereof; ſo that they could not well, either look upon them or make reckoning of them;

them; That therefore it would pleaſe him to eaſe them of their Grievances, in recompence whereof they would pay him 15000 Hungarian Duckats yearly for to pay his men of War, and would farther furniſh them with all Proviſions neceſſary; it being a thing more honourable and profitable alſo unto a Prince moderately to uſe his Subjects means to keep his State in perpetuity, than through Covetouſneſs to devour them in one day, in their loſs to undo himſelf for ever. This their Offer was by Baſta accepted, and the minds of theſe People, by this Contentment given them, kept in their dutiful Allegiance and Loyalty unto the Emperour.

New Enterpriſes by the Rebel Moiſes in Tranſilvania.

He with Enſigns diſplay'd entreth into Tranſilvania.

But whilſt Baſta thus travelled for the quieting of Tranſilvania, Moiſes the Rebel, in the mean time, was for his part no leſs buſied for the diſturbing thereof again; inſomuch, that having by the appointment of the Viſier Baſſa received ten thouſand Tartars in his Aid, and aſſiſted with a great number of Turks, he, with Enſigns diſplay'd, entred into Tranſilvania, proteſting there to dye, or to be revenged of Baſta, who had before chaſed him out thence. And the better to effect this troubleſome Deſign, he now had made choice of a moſt fit time for the Performance thereof. Baſta, upon the Truſt he had of the publick Faith which he came to take of the Tranſilvanians, for their Allegiance unto the Emperour, which aſſured him from all Stirs and Tumults in that Province, being with a ſmall Power come from Claudiopolis in Hungary, and then lying at Wiſcebourg, upon the Confines of Hungary: Which his Journey, and the neceſſity of his Preſence in Hungary for the defence thereof, had cauſed the Tranſilvanians to believe, that he ſhould for that Year ſtay in Hungary, as General of the Emperour's Army there. Upon which Perſuaſion of his Abſence, many of them began again to hold up their heads, and to entertain high Conceits of new Stirs, whereunto Moiſes by his Eſpials had prepared them, and now by his Preſence not a little encouraged; inſomuch, that many, as well of the Nobility as others, joyned themſelves unto him, and his increaſed Army, againſt the Imperials.

Wiſcebourg beſieged by Moiſes.

Wiſcebourg yielded to Moiſes.

Moiſes with his Power being come into the Province, firſt forced a Caſtle, about three Leagues diſtant from Wiſcebourg, and ſlew all the Garriſon therein. Which Exploit encouraged him farther, full of hope in the abſence of Baſta; and ſeeing himſelf now the abſolute Maſter of the Field, which he at his Pleaſure, without reſiſtance, forraged, robbed, and ſpoiled, with his men loaded with Booty, beſieged Wiſcebourg, a little Town upon the Confines of Hungary and Tranſilvania, neither by Art nor by Nature ſtrong, but expoſed as a Prey unto him that is in the Field ſtrongeſt, if Succours be not at hand to relieve it. Howbeit, weak as it was, it held out three Weeks Siege, and having a breach made in the Walls, endured two Aſſaults againſt all the Forces of the Rebel. After which, the beſieged, thinking themſelves to have ſufficiently diſcharged their Duty in holding out ſo long, and enduring of ſo much, and out of hope to be relieved by the weak Forces of Baſta, came to parle with the Enemy, and their Lives and Goods ſaved, yielded unto him the Town, and ſo departed themſelves to Varadin.

Moiſes in great favour with Mahomet.

Now albeit that there were no great Forces of the Emperour's on foot in Tranſilvania, yet the hungry Haiducks for all that failed not to follow theſe Wars, even amidſt the great Clouds of their Enemies, and were ever taking of ſome Prey or Booty from the Enemy, the chiefeſt and almoſt the only means whereby they live. In which doing, as they benefited themſelves (the chief Motives of their Adventures) ſo they not a little eaſed the Country, by repreſſing the Excurſions and Pillages of the Turks, whereof the Country had endured the fury. Where, amongſt other Priſoners by them taken, it was their Fortune to light upon a Chiaus of the Turks come from Conſtantinople, going toward the Rebel Moiſes from the great Sultan Mahomet: Who, by them examined, confeſſed, That Moiſes was a man in great Grace and Reputation with his Lord and Maſter the Grand Seignior; and that he was ſent to aſſure him thereof; as alſo of all the needful Aſſiſtance of his Prince, if he ſhould faithfully and effectually ſerve him in Tranſilvania, and bring it under his Subjection and Power, as he had promiſed and ſworn. In which doing, he ſhould not only gain the credit of a noble and faithful Servant towards him, but ſhould farther obtain thereby the honour to be the Lieutenant General of his Army in this Province; the great Sultan (as he ſaid) having means as eaſie as words to advance his faithful Servitors, who might draw more good Fortunes in one hour out of this infinite ſource of Felicity and Greatneſs, than they could in a thouſand years out of the poverty of the Princes of Europe. He ſaid alſo, That the great Sultan had on foot an Army of a hundred and fifty thouſand men ſtrong, for the Conqueſt of Peſth and Strigonium, furniſhed with all things neceſſary, which had now already turned head toward Hungary, had it not been for the Rebellion of ſome of his diſloyal Subjects, whom for all that he would in ſhort time chaſtiſe, and ſo turn his whole Forces upon the Emperour.

A General beſieged loſeth his Reputation.

Baſta prayeth Aid of the Governour of Caſſovia.

Moiſes, proud of his late Conqueſt, and having found a great deal of great Ordnance in Wiſcebourg, reſolved to proſecute his Victory, and to beſiege Baſta in Somoſinnar, whereinto he had thruſt himſelf, with the reſt of his ſmall Forces: but Baſta, better acquainted with martial Affairs than he, and knowing that a General, departed from his Charge, and brought to the mercy of a Wall for his chief Defence, hath loſt his Credit and Reputation with his Friends, and they alſo in hope of Safety from him thought it beſt firſt to take order for the ſtrengthening of the Place, ſo to put Moiſes out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterward, as he might to provide for the ſafety of himſelf and his. Wherefore he in good time advertiſed the Governour of Caſſovia (who was neareſt unto him) of Moiſes's Deſigns, and of the neceſſity wherewith he was himſelf incloſed. Who forthwith conceiving the conſequence of ſo great an Exploit, as concerned both the loſs of the Place, and of ſo great a Commander as was Baſta, a loſs irreparable; preſently commanded ſix Companies of Horſe-men to thruſt themſelves into the Place, for the better defence thereof. Theſe Horſe-men, either afraid of the Rebels Army, or elſe favouring his Proceedings, without reſpect of that they had in charge, or of their Honour (things dearer unto men of Worth than their Lives) without any Attempt at all given, returned again to Caſſovia; having with their Pilfering and Outrages by the way much offended and provoked the Minds of the Country People by him ſpoiled. But being now better adviſed, and repenting themſelves of their Faults, and craving Pardon of their Governour, who was about with the reſt of his Power to have cut them in pieces, they offered him for ſatisfaction ſix of the principal Authors of their Diſloyalty; who were all forthwith executed, and their Quarters (to the terror of others) hanged up upon Gibbets by the High-ways ſide. But Baſta, by their Treachery, lay in the mean time without ſuccour, forſaken by his Friends, and the Place wherein he lay in danger to be taken: when the Tranſilvanians, dwelling near thereby, reſolved to relieve him, as well for fear of the Turks Bondage, as for the Tyranny of Moiſes; one of whoſe Secretaries, with Letters of Credence then threatned all the Country with Fire and Sword, and all kind of Miſeries, if the Inhabitants helped not with all their Power to force the Place and to win it. Which Threats by Moiſes, publiſhed before he had any abſolute Power, diſmayed every man; for why, they could not hope for any Moderation or Kindneſs in the Proſperity of him, who in the time of his Adverſity gave ſuch apparent Teſtimonies of his Cruelty. So that the People, doubting this angry man, reſolved to prevent his ſo grievous Threats by relieving of Baſta, who only was able to ſtop him. Amongſt others, Radul, Vayvod of Valachia, mindful of the Aid that Baſta had given him againſt the Tartars, and willing now as a Friend to reach his hand in time of his ſo hard diſtreſs, immediately raiſed a Power of eight thouſand Valachians, which he preſently ſent to the relief of Baſta. Moiſes advertiſed of their coming, and farther underſtanding, that Baſta having well fortified the place, was departed thence, having before his Departure aſſuredly promiſed his men there left to relieve them, and that he was now in the midſt of the Field gathering together his Army, changed both his Reſolution and Purpoſe, of himſelf raiſed his Siege, and ſo departed. After which, miſhaps began to fall upon him by heaps. The Turks forthwith forſook him, taking their way to Temeſwar, whither they were by the Baſſa called back to repreſs the Haiducks, who were now every day even at the Gates of the City. Theſe active and courageous men, for their profit attending upon all occaſions, knowing that the better part of the Garriſon of Temeſwar was gone to aid Moiſes, upon the ſudden had deſperately aſſailed the Suburbs of that ſtrong City, ſlain all that they found there, rifled them and burnt them; and ſo, loaded with a great and rich Prey, both of Cattel and other things, returned to Veradin, no man purſuing of them: and not ſo contented, were every day abroad ſeeking after new Booty; which was the Cauſe that the Baſſa now called back the Turks from Moiſes home again into their Garriſons.

The Vayvod of Valachia ſendeth Aid to the Relief of Baſta.

Moiſes raiſeth his Siege.

The Baſſa of Temeſwar calleth home his Turks out of Tranſilvania, for the repreſſing of the Haiducks.

Claudinople beſieged by Moiſes.

Claudinople yielded to Moiſes.

Moiſes, notwithſtanding this departure of the Garriſon Turks of Temeſwar, was yet Maſter of the Field, Baſta with his ſmall Forces not daring to oppoſe himſelf againſt him, yet by far too ſtrong for him, the Succours from the Vayvod of Valachia being not yet come, which he daily expected, howbeit that many hot Skirmiſhes paſſed between the ſtragling Souldiers on both ſides, as they by chance met together roaming abroad in the Country ſeeking after Booty. Moiſes therefore, ſeeing not any ſufficient Enemy to appear in Field able to ſtay him, laid Siege to Claudinople, a great, but weak City, and not very well manned; for that it was thought a place fitter, by the Weakneſs thereof, to weaken and deſtroy ſuch as ſhould undertake the Defence thereof, than ſufficient to be maintained by their Valour. Nevertheleſs, the Garriſon Souldiers and the Inhabitants (more to make a ſhew of their Fidelity and Allegiance toward the Emperour, than for any hope they had to maintain the Place) ſtanding upon their Guard and Defence, Moiſes was conſtrained to plant his great Ordnance againſt it, and to batter it; which he did, and in a very ſhort time, with the fury of the Cannon, had beaten down the Bulwarks and Slankers thereof, and made a fair breach in the Wall, ready now to have given thereunto an Aſſault, and to have entred. Whereupon, the beſieged, not ignorant of their own weakneſs, came to Parle, and agreed to give up the City, the Citizens having their Lives, Goods, Liberty, and Religion ſaved, to ſtay there ſtill, and the Souldiers with their Arms and Baggage to be in ſafety brought over the Mountains into ſome place of Surety. The taking of this City much encouraged the Rebel, reſolved there to make his Reſiſtance, and the Seat of his Principality. Full ears of Corn draw Birds to pick upon them; and the good Fortunes of Generals, Souldiers to follow them: they forſake none but ſuch as are before forſaken of their better Fortunes; to become Slaves unto Gain, and Enemies unto Honour. The Turks and Tartars, thirſting after theſe Commodities, and allured with the ſmell of Riches, repaired thither on every ſide, in ſuch ſort, that the Army of Moiſes increaſed in Number, his Mind with Hope, and his Fortune with Power. Armed with theſe Aſſurances, he ſent for his Wife and Family, then at Temeſwar, to come unto him to Claudinople, to be Partakers with him of his good hap. And for that purpoſe ſent a Convoy of 400 Turks to conduct them on the way thither: who being come to Temeſwar, and about to have led the Wife and Family of Moiſes out of the City, were not ſuffered by the Janizaries that had the guarding of the Town, ſo to do; who told them, That the great Sultan had in former times found ſo many Diſloyalties, Treacheries, and Treaſons, in the Hungarians, Tranſilvanians, and Valachians, to the great hurt and hinderance of his Eſtate, that he could no more aſſure himſelf of them: and that doubting of the Fidelity of Moiſes, being a Tranſilvanian, he was reſolved to keep this gage for his more aſſurance; aſſuring him withal, That his Wife and Family being in his Power, ſhould receive nothing from him but Favour and Grace, ſo long as he received from him the effects of his Loyalty; but, that he ſhould never hope to enjoy them but in Temeſwar, or ſome other ſuch-like place aſſured for his Service. Moiſes aſtoniſhed at this Anſwer, was much moved againſt the great Sultan, complained in his Soul, that having ruinated his Faith, his Honour, and the Welfare of his Country, to aſſure him of his Fidelity towards him, he yet doubted of his Conſtancy, as if all theſe Crimes did not bind him to ſerve him with his Perſon for ever, were it even but for fear of Puniſhment from them whom he had ſo grievouſly offended.

Moiſes ſendeth for his Wife and Family to Temeſwar.

The Janizaries of Temeſwar refuſe to deliver Moiſes's Wife and Family.

The Valachians by Moiſes put to flight.

In the mean time, the Succours ſent from the Vayvod of Valachia were upon the Borders of Tranſilvania, under the Conduct of Marſa the Vayvod's Lieutenant, and Baſta was gathering together his Forces, to recover again his former State; expecting every hour the coming of two thouſand Horſe-men out of Sileſia, with which united Power he was in good hope to diſcomfit the Rebel, and to recover his former Loſſes. All which, Moiſes by his Eſpials knew right well, and for the Remedy thereof reſolved to march with thirty thouſand men to meet with the Valachians, and to cut them off before they could come far into Tranſilvania, or joyn their Forces with Baſta. For the furthering of which his Purpoſe, he had learned the Place whereby they were to enter, their Number, and the way they were to hold, the better to conduct his Army againſt them; and being in number more than three to one, already aſſured himſelf of the Victory. All which fell out according to his Deſire: for, the Valachians coming on, being in number but eight thouſand, fell as it were a Prey into his Mouth. For needs fight they muſt, or die therefore, altho the Number were unequal; for that to fly was more dangerous to the Valachians (having the Turks and Tartarian Horſe-men at their Backs) than manfully to fight it out. Neceſſity gave Courage unto the weaker ſide, and Fear cauſed them to perform more than they would have done, had they had liberty to have fled; yet for all that, the greater number at length prevailed againſt the leſs: ſo that after a great and mortal Fight, wherein a great number of the Turks and Tartars were ſlain, the Valachians in the end were inforced to leave their dead Companions, their Honour, and their Tents, with all their Baggage, in the Field, and to betake themſelves to flight; but not all in rout as freſh-water Souldiers, but with often making ſtands, as men diſdaining by true Valour, but only with Number oppreſſed, to be overcome. The Rebels, proud of their Victory, and now fearing no more harm, forthwith gave themſelves to the rifling of the Enemies Camp, divided the Spoil, and filling the Heavens with the noiſe of their Trumpets, publiſhing thereby the Trophies of their Victory. Which Diſorder the Valachians perceiving, and thereof conceiving hope of ſome good to be done, turned head, and ſerred cloſe together, courageouſly thruſt themſelves into the midſt of theſe proud and triumphant Victors. Which unexpected thunderclap ſo diſmayed them and troubled their Wits, that, ſurpriſed in diſorder, with their hands full of Spoils inſtead of Weapons, they could neither recover their Courage, nor put themſelves again in order. Such Confuſion maketh men oftentimes to feel the blows of Death, before they are aware of the Army that giveth the ſame; ſo, of theſe men ſo confounded, ſome ſtood as men amazed, otherſome ran away to ſave themſelves, and otherſome ſtood upon their defence, but all were alike ſlain; ſo that in fine, this great Army was for the moſt part cut in pieces, and the reſt put to flight. Moyſes himſelf was there among the reſt ſlain, worthy for his Treaſon to have been reſerved to a more ſhameful Death.

Moiſes with his Army by the Valachians overthrown, and himſelf ſlain.

Of this Victory, the Vayvod, by Letters, certified Baſta, to whom he ſent five and twenty of the Enemies Enſigns for an honourable Preſent, with this joyful news of the Death and Overthrow of the Rebel; whoſe Body, as the Vayvod writ, was found dead among the midſt of the dead, ſlain even at the firſt Charge, wherein his Gaurd was overthrown. And for that it was commonly believed, that he was not yet dead, neither preſent at that Battel, as ſome had given it out; to manifeſt the contrary unto the World, and by his Example to terrifie others, his Head was upon a Lance ſet up at Carolſtad for all men to behold; a Preferment well beſeeming ſuch an ambitious Head, as had made ſo great Troubles, and been the death of ſo many Chriſtians.

Moiſes's Head upon a Lance ſet up at Carolſtad.

This Rebel ſuppreſſed, another by and by ſtart up, called Albert Nage, who, gathering together the Rebels of Tranſilvania, mingled with certain Turks, Tartars, Coſſacks, and Moldavians, all together amounting to the number of ſix thouſand, made head towards Lippa. Againſt whom, Baſta with all ſpeed ſent forth three thouſand Haiducks, well acquainted with the Country, which ſometimes ſerved them to better purpoſe than their Arms, for that the Rebels ſought not ſo much to come to a ſet Battel, and to try the matter by true Valour, as by taking the Advantages of Places, to delay the time and gain Purchaſe, the chief end of their Rebellion. Theſe Rebels the Haiducks ſurpriſed, near unto a Caſtle called Ferre, where they meant to have lodged, and charged them. Who ſo upon the ſudden overtaken, and ignorant of their Enemies Power, ſuppoſing them to have been more in number than indeed they were, made ſmall Reſiſtance, but as a many of Raſcals, gathered by Villany, and without truſting of one another, by flight provided every man for himſelf as he might. In which Flight, the greateſt number of them were ſlain, and their Chieftain with much ado ſaved, to be at another time for his evil Deſerts juſtly executed.

New Rebels in Tranſilvania diſcomfited.

Baſta, by theſe good haps, and the aid of the Vayvod of Valachia, being again become Maſter of the Field, in very ſhort time after had again reduced all Tranſilvania under the Emperour's Obeiſance; unto whom, he, together with the Vayvod, for an honourable Preſent and a Teſtimony of their good Service, ſent to Vienna, and from thence to Prague, an hundred Enſigns gained from the Rebels. All which, with ſome other rich Spoils, the Maſter of the Ceremonies in great pomp and triumph led, together with Moyſes the late Rebels Horſe, exceeding richly furniſhed with Furniture of pure Gold; and was for his Pains by the Emperour rewarded with a Chain of Gold, ſent unto him by the County Fuſtenberg.

An honourable Preſent by the L. Baſta ſent unto the Emperour.

The Troubles of Tranſilvania thus once again quieted, Baſta, reſolving again to beſiege Temeſwar, with his Power marched towards Lippa, there to meet with the Forces of the Vayvod of Valachia, the better to undertake and perform the intended Exploit. His Army conſiſted of twenty thouſand men ſtrong, carrying with them five and twenty Pieces of great Ordnance, furniſhed with all things neceſſary. And of the Enterpriſe it ſelf every man had good hope, as well for the ſufficiency of him, the General that had undertaken it, as for the want of Relief, that was not any way like to be brought unto the beſieged. But while he ſo lay at the Siege thereof, his Souldiers, too greedily and exceſſively feeding upon Fruit, (whereof there was that Year great ſtore) fell ſo into the bloody Flux, and thereof in ſuch number died, (although he had given moſt ſtrait Command, That none ſhould be eaten, or upon great Penalties be brought into the Camp) that he was glad to riſe with his Army and be gone.

Whilſt this was in doing, the County Solmes, lying in Garriſon at Carolſtad, took upon him to ſurpriſe Wiſcenbourg, and ſetting forth but with four hundred Souldiers of his Garriſon, with wonderful Diligence ſurpriſed the Place, and without any great Reſiſtance became Maſters thereof. But the Citizens, over-grieved with the inſolent Outrages of theſe men of War, opened the Gates of their Town unto the Rebels of Tranſilvania, even then fled from the late Overthrow; who, full of Revenge, took the Place, and being too ſtrong for the County and his Souldiers, made ſuch ſlaughter of them in the Streets (they of the Town out of their Windows, and from the tops of their Houſes, helping them) that of all thoſe which the County brought with him, there were but ſixty left alive; who, all taken, were, together with the County, thruſt into a ſtrong and loathſome Priſon.

County Solmes ſurpriſing Wiſcenbourg, is himſelf taken Priſoner.

Now the bruit of the coming of the Turks great Army into Hungary, had awaked the Chriſtian Forces to aſſemble themſelves together, and to do their endeavour to withſtand the ſame; ſo that a number of Companies were raiſed in Germany, who came into Hungary marching towards Strigonium, where the Army was to be aſſembled. The good ſucceſs of things paſt, the Opinion men had of the Turks Troubles with his Rebels, and the great Promiſes of the Emperour, drew many into theſe Liſts of Honour; in ſuch ſort, that there were come together an Army of five and twenty thouſand Foot, and ten thouſand Horſe, all good and brave Companies, well appointed and well conducted. Of this brave and gallant Army the Lord Ruſſworm was for this Year appointed General; who therewith marched within the ſight of Strigonium, to aſſure the Inhabitants of Relief, if the Enemy ſhould chance to beſiege them, as the News then went: About three Weeks this Army lay thereby incamped, attending the coming of the reſt of the Forces, which were to ſtrengthen and make up the ſame, during which time the General diſpoſed of all things neceſſary for the keeping of Strigonium, and put into the Fort of Saint Andrew, near unto it, three thouſand Lanſquenets, for relief of the City; which done, he removed with his Army toward Peſth, and incamped within a League thereof toward the Weſt, reſolved ſo to croſs the Deſigns of the Enemy, if he ſhould attempt to beſiege this Place; (as it was doubted he would) and in hope that the Preſervation thereof might in time be a cauſe for the winning of Buda, and a means to impeach the Enemies Forces.

The Turks Army of 100000 men in Field.

The ſhameful flight of certain of the Garriſon Souldiers of Peſth unto the Turks at Buda.

The Turks Army, within a few days after, upon a contrary Deſign, conducted for the winning of Peſth, (and reſolved to raiſe the Chriſtians Camp) in number an hundred thouſand men, came, and face to face incamped within the ſight of the Chriſtian Army on the other ſide of the River Danubius. In the mean time, whilſt they ſo lay, certain cowardly Souldiers of Peſth, more in love with their Bellies than with their Honour, by ſtealth fled out of their Garriſon in Peſth, to the Turks over againſt them in Buda, ſhamefully craving of them Victuals; whom, the Turks themſelves, being almoſt in as great want, yet bounteouſly relieved. Beſides that, the Baſſa of Buda, to corrupt the reſt of their Fellows, cauſed theſe renegade Fugitives to be entertained with double pay; who therefore gave the Baſſa a thouſand thanks, extolling his Bounty unto the Heavens, and from the Walls invited their Companions to do as they had done, and ſo to become Partakers of ſuch Bounty and Pleaſure as they were. Howbeit, theſe Fugitives nothing profited the Baſſa, either by their Perſwaſion or Example; for albeit that they from the Mouth of the Baſſa promiſed unto their Companions plenty of Victuals, good Entertainment, and four Months pay more, yet was there not any of them which hearkened or gave Ear unto their Allurements; but rather, the more to aſſure their Commanders of their Fidelity, of themſelves offered to be ſworn again unto their Allegiance unto the Emperour, and to dye in the place rather than to forſake it. Yet was the want of Victuals then in Peſth great, and the Garriſon therewith extreamly pinched, fed almoſt as much with hope, as with that little which was left them. Neither was it long after, but that according to their deſires, the fifteenth of May, a great Ship arrived there, laden with Wine and Victuals ſufficient for the relief of their preſent Neceſſities. Of the coming of which Ship, the Turk having heard, attended the Paſſage thereof in the Iſle, to have intercepted it. Of which their purpoſe the Garriſon Souldiers of Peſth having knowledge, and armed with Neceſſity, ſallied out upon them, and killing a number of them, inforced the reſt to quit the Place. This Ship was but the fore-runner of greater Succours; for ſhortly after followed a number of other Ships, which arriving at Peſth, laden with Victuals and other Neceſſaries, filled the Place with as great plenty, as there had been want before. Which ſupply was conducted unto Peſth by 500 Harquebuſiers of Strigonium, the Turks from Buda looking on, but not daring, or not able to ſtay the ſame.

Peſth victualled.

The Suburbs of Alba-Regalis by the Chriſtians ſacked and burnt.

It fortuned at the ſelf ſame time, that a Captain of the Turks, fled from Alba-Regalis to Rab, ſhewed unto the Chriſtians there the way and the means how they might come to the Suburbs of Alba-Regalis, and take the ſpoil of the ſame; yea, and happily, as things might fall out, find occaſion to ſurpriſe the Town it ſelf alſo; offering himſelf to be the Guide in the ſame Action. And albeit that this Turk was an Enemy to be feared and diſtruſted, yet the Chriſtian Souldiers, as men deſirous both of Honour and Prey, and induced alſo with the Probability of the attempt, gave credit unto him, and imbraced the ſame. Neither failed he of his Promiſe, neither the Chriſtians of their Devoir in performance of the Exploit. For the two Garriſons of Rab and Strigonium aſſembled together, by the leading of this Turk ſurpriſed the Suburbs of Alba-Regalis, ſlew all them that made reſiſtance, rifled them on all hands, ſet them on fire, and ſo laden with Riches and Spoil, returned home again in ſafety.

Another Convoy of Victuals by Land put into Peſth.

At the ſame time alſo, the Chriſtians on the other ſide Danubius gathered an head together to conduct another Convoy of Victuals into Peſth, with a Reſolution to march with the ſame through the plain field at noon time of the day, even in the Eye of the Enemy, ſo to brave him. And to this purpoſe, the Lord Nadaſti was there preſent with a good number of Hungarians, Collonel Meſbourg with a Regiment of Almaines, and the County Thurn with a number of Huſſars, all good Souldiers and Men of Courage, deſirous to have made proof thereof upon their Enemies. This Convoy, with the Trumpets gallantly ſounding, bravely marched over the Plain at mid Day, the Turks from the Walls of Buda beholding the ſame, but not daring to adventure upon it. And ſo Peſth, for want of Victuals before diſtreſſed, was now both by Water and by Land plentifully relieved.

The Caſtle of Adom upon a vain fear forſaken by the Haiducks, who had the keeping thereof.

The Chriſtians, the laſt year having left the ſiege of Buda for the Reaſons before written, in their return took the Caſtle of Adom, ſeated upon the Bank of Danubius, about two Leagues from Buda, and for the keeping thereof, left therein a Garriſon of Haiducks. This Caſtle was commodious for the annoying of the Turks in Buda, and for the relief of the Chriſtians in Peſth, for that it impeacheth the bringing of Victuals unto the one, and favoured the victualling of the other. The good and faithful defence of which Place, theſe Haiducks undertook to the uttermoſt of their Power, upon their Honour and Credit, as they would be accounted valiant and couragious men; but yet refuſed to be bound by Oath to render an account of the Place, whatſoever might befall; a thing (as they truly ſaid) above their Forces, and more than was in their Power to perform. Theſe men now, upon the brute of the coming of the Turks great Army, afraid of their Shadows, having before truſſed up their Baggage, ſet fire on the Caſtle, and ſo departed, retiring themſelves to Strigonium; where, examined by the Governour Althem of the cauſe of their flight, and what Enemies had chaſed them thence, and being not able to make therefore any excuſe, neither to yield thereof any reaſon more than their imaginary fear, were by his commandment impriſoned, there to remain until order were taken by the General of the Army for their further Puniſhment.

Sultan Mahomet among his greateſt Pleaſures perplexed.

Sultan Mahomet now wallowing amidſt his ſenſual Delights in Conſtantinople, yet found not therein ſo full Contentment, but that his Pleaſures had alſo their Griefs fully mixt with them. In Conſtantinople, the ſtrong Seat of his mighty Empire, he was in the midſt of the Inſolencies and Mutinies of his proud Baſſaes and tumultuous Janizaries; and abroad he was in Wars both againſt his rebellious Subjects in Aſia, and the Chriſtians in Europe. Unto all which Troubles he ſaw not how to give Remedy at once, and therefore reſolved (if it were poſſible) firſt to appeaſe the Troubles abroad with his rebellious Subjects in Aſia, as more deſirous to be at peace with his own Subjects than with Strangers; howbeit, that the puniſhing of Rebellion is more neceſſary in a Prince for the maintenance of his State, than is War againſt a Stranger for the conquering of a new Country or Kingdom; the one preventing the danger hanging over his Head, the other ſerving but his vain and ambitious deſire; ſo he, preferring Peace with the Rebels his Subjects, before Peace with the Chriſtians his Enemies, reſolved (as I ſaid) to pacifie the firſt, the more eaſily to ruinate the other. But whether he upon good Faith, or upon Policy, entered into this Reſolution, and whether indeed he meant plainly with theſe Rebels, or but only to deceive them, is hard to ſay. Howbeit, as the ſequel of the matter ſhewed, Falſhood and Treachery was the ground of all this Buſineſs both on the one ſide and the other. For theſe men, reſpecting only the ſafety and aſſurance of their Eſtate, held all other Actions to them indifferent, whether they were good or bad, ſo that they ſerved to that effect; and nouriſhed with the ſame Milk of Infidelity that their Prince was, trained up in the ſame School, and foſtered with the ſame Air, feared in him againſt them, that which they felt in themſelves againſt him. An hard matter it is to aſſure minds fraught with like Craft, Subtilty, and Deceit, and poſſeſſed with like diſtruſt one of another. Howbeit, Mahomet ſpared no kind of cunning to deceive theſe crafty and ſubtil men; offering unto them, together with his gracious Pardon, great Preferments, Dignities, and Honours, ſo that they would but yield to him their due Obedience, lay down their Arms, and no more take up the ſame but in his Service. But theſe wily Foxes knew right well, that the Promiſes of faithleſs Princes coſt them nothing but Words, the honour and credit whereof they regarded not, ſo that thereby they might attain unto the effect of their deſires, which they eſteemed above all other things; ſo that for them to truſt unto a thing of ſo ſmall Value, with him that was ſo prodigal thereof, and for the ſame ſo eaſily to yield up their Lives and Fortunes, which they eſteemed as their only Treaſure, they thought right worthily to deſerve all ſhame and miſhap that might betide them. So that they not only refuſed to lay down Arms, and to yield their Obedience unto him, as he deſired, but even to have Peace with him upon any Conditions whatſoever, ſeeing them dangerous unto themſelves, and good only for him their Enemy.

Mahomet in vain ſeeketh to make Peace with the Rebels in Aſia.

Mahomet, finding the Rebels ſo reſolutely ſet down, as not by any means but by force to be appeaſed, thought it now beſt to turn his purpoſe unto the Chriſtians, and to offer them that which the other had refuſed, in hope that Peace made with the one, ſhould be the Ruine and Deſtruction of the other. Upon which Point he being in himſelf reſolved, ſought now but ſome honeſt means, not unbeſeeming his Greatneſs, to joyn unto this his Project, to give him a way thereunto. For the eaſing him of which care, the French Ambaſſador, then Lieger at Conſtantinople, was very fitly then entreating with the Viſier Baſſaes for the Deliverance of the County Iſolan, taken at Alba-Regalis the laſt Year, and againſt all Law of Arms detained Priſoner at Conſtantinople. This noble Gentleman Mahomet thought fit, as well for the Sufficiency of himſelf, as with Inſtructions, to deal with the Emperour concerning an entreaty of Peace to be had. Whereupon, he commanded him to be ſet at liberty, with Charge, That he ſhould both diſcreetly and faithfully deal with the Emperour concerning this matter of Peace; which, if he ſhould by his Induſtry effect, to the good liking and contentment of Mahomet the great Sultan, that then he ſhould become and remain free, otherwiſe to return again into his former Captivity and Bondage; for whom the French Ambaſſador gave his Word, and became Pledge. Upon which barbarous Conditions the Earl was forthwith delivered, who by the Law of Arms ſhould not at all have been detained. Beſides this Plot laid for the Negotiation of this Peace, Achmet Baſſa to this purpoſe writ to Collonitz, then Commander of the Emperour's Army in Hungary. But ſee the Copy of the Letters themſelves.

Mahomet, ſeeing his Offers rejected by the Rebels of Aſia, covertly ſeeketh for Peace with the Chriſtians.

The Letters of Achmet Baſſa to Collonitz, concerning a Treaty of Peace to be had.

TO thee our Friend Collonitz, Health and Greeting. I ſuppoſe that you yet remember the Propoſitions concerning Peace, which our Sovereign and moſt mighty Monarch not long ago cauſed to be opened and propounded unto you by certain of his Baſſaes near unto Strigonium, which as then remained not reſolved. But if now it ſhall ſeem unto you good, that we ſhould aſſemble our ſelves together into ſome place of Aſſurance both to the one ſide and to the other, we may again conferr about that Buſineſs, as having on my part full Power and Commandment from my Prince ſo to do; yet with Charge, That before all other things, Strigonium ſhould be again delivered unto us, Which being done, we may eaſily afterward determine the other Difficulties, and conclude a good and wholſome Peace. God which reigneth alone in the Heavens above, is witneſs of our faithful and juſt deſire, to aſſure a quiet and firm Peace betwixt us, and that to avert theſe floods of War from the poor People, and to give them ſome Repoſe and Reſt after ſo great Troubles. This is our Intent and Purpoſe, which God knoweth to be void of all Fraud and Guile; which we now declare unto you, in hope to underſtand yours alſo. But if you be not reſolved to render to us Strigonium before we begin to intreat of any other Matter, it is not needful for you to trouble your ſelf to give any Anſwer to theſe our Letters. But if you ſhall reſolve to the contrary, to deliver the ſame, with as much ſpeed as you can let us in few Words underſtand your Reſolution, the Time and the Place fit for our Aſſembly and Meeting, to the intent fully to determine of theſe Affairs. You know alſo, that you have been of long time accuſtomed to pay Tribute unto our Prince; which, if you ſhall continue to pay for the time to come, and diſcharge the Arrearages for the time paſt, it ſhall be commodious for us, and honourable for you, ſeeing that it is an Honour unto you to be Tributaries unto the Grand Seignior, it having always in times paſt been for your Good and Profit. Beſides that, Peace ſhall likewiſe be entreated of with the Great Cham of Tartary, who, as commanded by our moſt mighty and gracious Emperour, upon juſt and reaſonable Conditions to entertain the ſame, and never more, but in peaceable manner, to come into Hungary. Now if that you ſhall neglect or reject this Treaty for Peace, it is certain that you ſhall be the Author of the Miſery and Ruine of the whole Country, it being impoſſible that the Towns and Villages conſumed with Fire ſhould ever recover their former Beauty or Felicity. God which reigneth in Heaven is there witneſs unto me, and my dread Emperour upon Earth, that I ſpeak frankly with you, and without Diſſimulation concerning this matter. Now on your part, let us underſtand if you have a deſire to attend unto this Treaty of Peace, according to the purport of our Letters: for if you ſhall reſolve to the contrary, we proteſt unto you to write no more concerning theſe Affairs.

The Emperour advertiſed of the Turks motion for Peace, giveth order to Collonitz for the entertaining thereof.

Collonitz having received theſe Letters, ſent them forthwith unto the Emperour, requeſting his Majeſty to conſider what Anſwer he would have given unto them. Whom the Emperour, deſirous of a good Peace, commanded to embrace the occaſion, and by Proof to learn whether the Turks deſire were indeed conformable to their Words or not. Whereupon, Collonitz taking unto him certain of the beſt Commanders in the Army, undertook the Buſineſs, and entered into the Treaty of Peace with the Turks; wherein he found the unreaſonableneſs of their Demands to tend ſo much unto the hurt and diſhonour of the Emperour, as that they even at the firſt Entrance ſhut up the way to all farther or reaſonable Conference; it being altogether impoſſible to bring to any Conformity Minds ſet down upon Reſolutions ſo far different. For the Turks (as if the Emperour would have been glad of Peace upon any Condition) after their proud manner, unreaſonably demanded to have Tranſilvania, Strigonium, and Peſth reſtored unto them; for which they offered to deliver unto the Emperour, Agria and Caniſia, Peble for Pearls. So that upon Propoſitions ſo far different, being able to conclude nothing, they departed on both ſides as they came, to try by Arms that which by Talk and Conference they could not agree upon. But as all the Turks Treaties of Peace with the Chriſtians are indeed but falſe ſhews to abuſe the Facility of the Chriſtians by, even ſo now alſo it was known, that they in the mean time, whilſt this Treaty of Peace was in hand, gathered together great ſtore both of Men and Munition at Belgrade, wherewith to arm a great Convoy of Victuals, which they had thought during this Interparley for Peace to have put into Buda. But Collonitz underſtanding thereof, ceaſed further to intreat of Peace, which with the falſe ſhew thereof did but hurt and deceive the Chriſtians, and betook himſelf again to his Arms (his and their ſafeſt and ſureſt refuge) reſolving with the other Captains and Commanders of the Army to do what they might for the croſſing and hindering of the Turks in their purpoſe for the putting of Victuals into Buda; whereof there was now ſuch want, that the Turks in Garriſon there having already eaten all their Horſes, and for Victuals rifled the Governours Houſe, were reſolved to abandon the City, if they ſhould not be within ſome few days relieved.

Now upon this Reſolution for the keeping of the Turks from the victualling of Buda, the Chriſtians, for the more aſſurance of their purpoſe, prepared therefore both by Water and by Land, embarking their Foot-men upon the River, under the Conduct of Collonel Altmeine and Sultze, the one Governour of Strigonium, and the other of Peſth; whilſt that Collonitz with the Horſemen, ſcouring along the Banks of the River of Danubius, took the charge by Land. And ſo it fortuned, that upon the two and twentieth day of Auguſt, he with his Horſemen, near unto the Village of Mohatſch, (famous for the death of King Lewis) fell upon the head of the Turks Army, led by the Baſſa Murat, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Turks, two thouſand of them being Janizaries; who altogether lay encamped upon an even plain, very commodious for our Horſemen, who let ſlip neither the Time nor the Opportunity of ſo great an advantage offered them, but forthwith charged them; where, after a number of notable Charges both given and received, which ſtill abated both the Number and Courage of the Turks, they at laſt retired toward the Body of their Army, and that in ſuch haſte, as that their retreat little differed from a ſpeedy flight. After whom Collonitz followed, with like heat as he had charged them; but evil followed by his Friends, who evil performed their charge, ſeeking after the Spoil inſtead of purſuing of their Enemies; the Turks perceiving the ſmall number that purſued them, turned upon them, and ſo began again not only to make ſtrong reſiſtance, but even right hardly to charge them. Who ſo by them preſſed with no leſs Courage than Power, were now glad themſelves to retire inſtead of purſuing of the Victory; but yet ſo, as that the retreat was made without any great loſs therein received. Howbeit, the Turks not a little incouraged with this change of Fortune, and perceiving themſelves too ſtrong for their Enemies that charged them, came on ſo faſt and ſo couragiouſly, as that in fine they had defeated the Chriſtians, had not the Haiducks out of their Boats from the River in good time come reſolutely to their relief. Which Cloud the Turks perceiving, ready to pour forth a great Tempeſt upon their Heads, and not daring to abide the ſame, again retired, leaving the Chriſtians Victors both in the firſt and laſt charge; who, not content with the retreat of the Turks, furiouſly charged them, and purſued them even unto their great Camp, and ſo returned, carrying back with them both the Glory of the Field, and the Spoil of their Enemies.

A notable Enterpriſe of Collonitz upon the Avauntguard of the Turks Army.

Collonitz in good time relieved by the Haiducks.

The Turks Affairs and Deſigns made known unto the Chriſtians by Saxar Beg, by them taken Priſoner.

In this Conflict, the red Cornet of Murat Baſſa, the Cogniſance of his great Command, was taken, with two Field-pieces, ſeven hundred Turks were left dead upon the Place, and ſixſcore more taken Priſoners; amongſt whom was Saxar Beg; who being a man of underſtanding, and by the Chriſtians examined, confeſſed, That Haſſan Baſſa, the day before this Conflict, came into the Camp, and there honourably dined with the great Cham; with whom, after their great chear, he entering into Diſcourſe of many great Matters, and among the reſt, concerning his return into his Country; was much againſt the ſame, until ſuch time as they had new victualled Buda, whereunto he was (as he ſaid) both in Honour and in Duty bound to give his aſſiſtance, the loſs of this good place being of ſo great importance unto the great Sultan. That otherwiſe his Aid had been to him rather hurtful than profitable, his People having devoured ſo much Victuals and performed nothing, if he ſhould now at this time fail to do his Prince Service, who could never think either Valour or Fidelity to be in him, if he ſhould fail in ſuch Actions as wherein his Valour and Fidelity ſhould appear; all things having no other Credit and Reputation, but according unto their Effects. And that therefore he ſhould reſolve to ſee the end of this Exploit, which required every mans helping hand for the Performance thereof, conſidering the Forces of the Enemy in readineſs to hinder the ſame. Moreover, he aſſured them, that the Baſſaes purpoſe was to new fortify Haſwar, Pax, and Kaletſch, frontier Caſtles, and neceſſary for this Action, and ſo to go to the ſiege of Peſth; and that done, to beſiege Strigonium; which for all that he doubted to win this year, as well by reaſon of the approach of Winter, as for that a great part of his Forces were far off, and not eaſily in a little time to be aſſembled together. That the Tartars were yet a great way from the Camp, where the Baſſaes of Aſia and Caramania were within a few days expected; the one of them leading with him the reconciled Rebels of Aſia, and the other ſix thouſand Janizaries. Which his Confeſſion, although it were not altogether true, yet it carried ſhew of ſome Probability, as time by proof afterward declared.

The Negligence of certain Chriſtian Souldiers, forgetful of divers Duties.

Some of our men were in this charge ſlain alſo, but few in compariſon of the Turks, who there loſt ſome of their beſt men. It was noted, that in this Conflict the Souldiers of Collonel Sultze, had ill behaved themſelves, refuſing to purſue the Enemy being in flight, whether it were for that they feared ſome ambuſh laid for them, or for that they diſdained to follow the General Collonitz; the reaſons perhaps for which their Collonel ſtayed them from the purſuit of the Enemy, but to evil purpoſe; for, being out of order at ſuch a time as the Turks turning back, renewed the fight, they had been all ſlain and cut in pieces, had not the Haiducks in good time (as we ſaid) come on to their reſcue. As for Collonitz, he moſt bravely bare himſelf in this Conflict, ſo much as in him was, urging his good Fortune, for the obtaining of a full Victory; ſometime performing the part of a good Captain, and ſometime of a valiant Souldier; ſometime forcing the charge, and again ſtaying his men in their retreat; inſomuch, that oftentimes loſt amongſt his Enemies, and again returning by the

The great and brave Indeavour of Collonitz to have obtained the Victory over the Turks.

Grace of God, he eſcaped Death, as it were by Miracle, and from being taken Priſoner, by chance. Into neither of which dangers he could have fallen without the danger of the whole Army; which, next unto God, was for the Safety thereof beholding unto the Valour of him their ſo brave a Leader. But God in his Wiſdom createth not ſuch worthy men, but by his Providence alſo to preſerve them; wonder it were otherwiſe, that ever ſuch worthy men ſhould return from amongſt the midſt of ſo many deſperate Dangers, Death as it were envying at their Lives, and their Enemies for their Glory chuſing them out to triumph of their Spoils and Overthrow. And without doubt, had the reſt of the Chriſtians after his Example proſecuted their good Fortune, and done what good Souldiers ſhould of Duty have done, their Enemies had been quite overthrown, and they themſelves had been both victorious and rich; where now for lack of good Reſolution, the Victory was almoſt equal. For beſide the Spoils by them gotten, they might have carried away with them a whole Years Pay, due to the Garriſon of Buda, which the Turks (put into a fear, and careful only of their Lives) had left in their Camp; which they afterward again recovered, upon the recovery of their Force and Courage. This Money, with much more, was all appointed as a Prey unto the good Fortune of our Men, had their Valour had the Courage to have gone to fetch it; but failing of their endeavour in ſo glorious an Action, Fortune failed them alſo of her Bounty.

A great and rich Booty loſt through the negligence of the Chriſtians.

Now at length the Army of the Chriſtians was met together, about the fourth of September, wherein the Lord Ruſſworm commanded as General; who, deſirous to underſtand of the Turks Affairs and Deſigns, ſent forth two of his moſt truſty and expert Souldiers to perform that piece of Service; who in Turks Apparel being got into the Turks Army, were there eight days undiſcovered or ſuſpected of any. Where, after that, they roaming up and down, had taken a full view of the Turks Army, and in what they might diſcovered their Deſigns, they returning back, declared unto the General what they had both there heard and ſeen; as, That the Turks Army was very great, but yet not ſuch as that which the laſt Year had beſieged Peſth; That the Turks lay incamped at large, and not cloſe together, which cauſed their Army to ſeem the greater, taking up for the lodgment thereof half a League, being well provided of Cannon and other Field-pieces; That Haſſan Baſſa commanded therein as General, having brought with him twelve thouſand Janizaries, beſide his Horſemen, and the reconciled Rebels of Aſia, which were daily looked for, the Leader of whom was not known; ſome thinking it to be him who had always commanded them, being a moſt valiant Man, and expert Commander; but ſome other deeming him to be but one of his Captains that had forſaken him, (as indeed he was) a right valiant man alſo, but not of ſo great Experience as he: That the great Tartar Han, come to aid the Turks in their Wars in Hungary, was (to the great diſcontentment of Haſſan Baſſa the Turks General) now already returned towards his own Country (with ſuch Booty and Priſoners as he had got from the poor Chriſtians) to appeaſe a Rebellion there raiſed by a young Tartar Prince, his Nephew, who, by his Uncle the great Han, given in Hoſtage unto Sultan Mahomet, and kept at Conſtantinople as in Priſon, having found means to make an Eſcape, and to return into Tartary, was about to trouble his Uncles Affairs, in hope now in his Abſence to mount unto the Throne of his Eſtate: and that the Tartar, being come to the Bank of Danubius, and by the Turks denied Boats to paſs over the River in, and with many railing and opprobrious Speeches, by them charged for his departure as a Coward, had found means to make a floating Bridge of great Faggots, whereby he paſſed his Foot-men over the River, his Horſe-men ſwimming over the ſame; and ſo was by great Journeys returning home, boaſting by the way as he went, that he had rejected and troden under foot all the Prayers and Requeſts of Haſſan Baſſa, entreating him yet to ſtay a while in Hungary for the Service of the great Sultan his Maſter. Beſides that, That they had ſeen ſix great Veſſels upon the River of Danubius, with ten leſſer Veſſels following of them, manned wiah three thouſand Souldiers well armed, and men of good ſort, three hundred of them being Janizaries, appointed to ſafe Conduct the Munition to be brought up the River, and to ſerve for a Convoy unto the other Veſſels that were to follow them with Victuals, if happily the Chriſtians ſhould attempt to do any thing againſt them. And in fine, That the Turks Army could not this Year poſſibly be great, by reaſon of many great Lets wherewith the great Sultan was this Year troubled; which much abated both the Courage and Hope of his Captains, who, hanging their Heads, came unwillingly to theſe Wars, accounting themſelves happy if they might in this Expedition but take Peſth, that they might not return ſo much diſhonoured, as they came daunted and diſcouraged. With which News the Chriſtians were ſo much encouraged to encounter with the Turks, as if they had been aſſured to fight with men already diſcouraged and out of Heart.

The Lord Ruſſworm, General of the Chriſtian Army, by his Eſpials certainly informed of the eſtate of the Turks Army.

The Turks overthrown by the Garriſon of Strigonium.

In the mean time, the Huſſars of Strigonium, always ready for Fight, by good fortune going forth, met with four hundred Turks ſeeking for Forrage; who encountering together, at the firſt made a moſt brave and gallant Fight, every one of them wiſhing, That their private Succeſs might be the beginning of their general Victory. But the Huſſars, being both more ſkilful in that manner of skirmiſhing and ſudden Encounter, and alſo of greater Courage, at length brake the Turks Ranks, of whom, ſix ſcore lay dead upon the ground, moſt of the reſt were taken Priſoners, with an hundred and thirty good and ſerviceable Horſes, wherewith both the glory and the profit of their Victory was increaſed. Collonel Sultze alſo, with three hundred men, marching out from the Camp, chanced to diſcover an hundred of thoſe brave Horſe-men which but newly came out of Aſia with Zellaly the Rebel; who having never ſeen the Army of the Chriſtians, nor yet felt of their Forces, were, with three hundred Janizaries, upon a Bravery, come over the River of Danubius, to take a view of the Chriſtian Camp; for the drawing on of whom, the politick Collonel had ſent forth fifty of his Horſemen a great way from the reſt of his Troop, as it were to diſcover the Country thereabout. Theſe Fore-runners failed not to meet with the Turks, as if it had been by chance, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking to have had a great hand over that ſo ſmall a number; when upon the ſudden, Sultze, with the reſt of his Company coming on, and hotly charging them, encouraged his own men, and diſcouraged the Turks; who, ſurpriſed with fear, thinking the Chriſtians to be more in number than indeed they were, having left ſome fifty of their men dead upon the place, as men diſmayed and void of Underſtanding, fled. In which Flight, ſuch as were not by the Chriſtians ſlain, were in the River of Danubius drowned, whereinto, they for fear all headlong plunged themſelves.

The Turks defeated by Collonel Sultze.

All theſe little Conflicts ſerved but as Sparks to kindle the great Fire by the Baſſa intended; his firſt Purpoſe being to put a Convoy of Victuals into Buda, which the Chriſtians thought by all means to hinder; which ſo contrary Intentions were not but by Force and Policy to be decided. The Chriſtian General, wiſely doubting leſt the Baſſa ſhould come and lodge his Army betwixt Vicegrade and Buda, and ſo victual the City at his Pleaſure, raiſed a ſtrong Fort of an old Church betwixt the ſaid two Places, and therein lodged a Regiment of Lanſquenets. Beſide which Fort, called the Fort of Saint Andrew, he built another at the head thereof in the Iſle of Vicegrade, in ſuch order and proportion, that theſe two Forts might one of them defend the other, and annoy them that ſhould attempt to force either of them. Together with this commodiouſneſs, the Fort in the Iſle kept the Paſſage upon Danubius free and open for the bringing of Victuals and other Neceſſaries to the Camp of the Chriſtians; and was but a League and an half from Buda; into which Fort was put a Regiment of four thouſand Italians, being all very well armed. Which done, he made a Bridge of Boats upon the River, which began in the Camp, and ended at the Iſle, for the relieving of the Fort; and ſo from thence paſſed quite over the River to Vacia, a little Town, which it was needful for the Chriſtians to keep.

The Turks aſſailing one of the Forts of the Chriſtians, with loſs repulſed.

The Turks made a Bridge over the River of Danubius.

A great Ambuſh laid for the intercepting of the Turks.

Theſe Forts finiſhed, according to the Neceſſity of the time, it was not long after, but that the Baſſa ſent ten thouſand Turks both Horſe and Foot to take the firſt of them, which they ſuppoſed to have been but weakly fortified. Who coming thither, were with ſuch Courage received by the Lanſquenets with their Harquebuſes, as that the whole Fort ſeemed to have been on fire. Wherewith the Turks diſmayed, as men in their Expectation deceived, and in approaching of the ſame having ſome of their Men ſlain, and more hurt, they ſounded a retreat, and having done nothing, but loſt a number of their men, returned to their Camp from whence they came. In which Enterpriſe they failing, they reſolved upon another, and began to make a Bridge over Danubius, in hope thereby to paſs over, and to annoy the Chriſtians on the other ſide of the River. Whereof the General of the Chriſtians underſtanding, ſuffered them without any Interruption to ſpend the time in performing of the ſame. But certainly informed by his Eſpials, both of the Day and Hour wherein they were about to paſs over, he laid an Ambuſh of four thouſand Lanſquenets and two thouſand Reiſters for them, in ſuch Place as from whence they might without danger do great harm unto the Enemy, and aſſure the body of the Chriſtian Army. The River of Danubius had growing upon the Banks thereof, and eſpecially in the deſolate and unfrequented places, great ſtore of Flags and Reeds, which were now thick, and high enough to cover theſe Foot-men in, having with them four Culverins ready charged. Behind this ambuſh lay Collonel Collonitz, with his Regiment, and in the head of it the Prince Joinville, with a certain number of French Gentlemen, who, upon a brave Courage, and a deſire they had to ſee Service, had followed him into thoſe Wars. There was alſo the Lord of Baſſomperre, another French Lord, with his own private Followers, in Number few, but in Valour great. Upon the flanks lay four Troops of Carabins, French-men, Loranoiſes, and Wallons, moſt expert and reſolute Souldiers.

The Turks falling into the Ambuſh laid for them by the Chriſtians, receive a notable overthrow.

The Turks having made their Bridge, began now to paſs over the ſame, being charged by ſome few ſtragling and looſe fore-runners of the Chriſtians, ſent before for that purpoſe; whom the Turks not much regarding, ſtill preſſed on, in hope to overtake them, and to cut them in pieces, not aware of the ambuſh laid for them, nor of their Enemies Counter-deſigns. The Foot-men in the mean time lying ſtill cloſe in the Reeds in Ambuſh, beholding how and in what order they paſſed, and expecting but the time when they were to begin their charge. But having perceived ten thouſand of the Turks to be now come over, and making head toward them, the Wallons, upon the Bank of the River (as was before appointed) firſt diſcharged their Pieces upon them, and ſlew ſome few of them. Nevertheleſs, the Turks ſtill paſſing on by them, ſlew of them alſo about four and twenty, and ſo keeping their way, marched directly toward the Chriſtians. But this their forwardneſs was quickly ſtayed, and their Courage abated; for in paſſing by they were upon the ſudden aſſailed by the Lanſquenets and Reiſters, now riſen out of Ambuſh, and by them hardly laid unto on every ſide; as alſo by the Horſe-men, who now come in, had put them into ſome diſorder before they were well aware of them. The Wallons alſo, at the firſt by the Turks ſcattered, but now again rallied, and deſirous to revenge the Death of their Friends and Fellows, now played their parts, and on another ſide right furiouſly charged their Enemies. During all which fight the Culverins ceaſed not to open the flanks of the Turks Battel, with the loſs of a number of their men by the fury of them rent in pieces. Neither did Collonitz foreſlow ſo fair an Opportunity, but afront charging this diſmayed Company, by plain force cauſed them to give Ground; the Carabins in the mean time charging them upon their flanks, and the Wallons behind. Who thus on every ſide beſet and hardly laid unto, as men diſcouraged, and out of hope to be relieved, turned their Backs and fled amain, to have recovered the Bridge whereby they came over. In which fight and flight two thouſand of them being ſlain, and the reſt not able to recover the Bridge, driven headlong into the River, were therein drowned and ſlain, to the number of five thouſand of them, thoſe which remained alive, being all taken Priſoners. Amongſt the reſt, one of the Baſſaes, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, was ſlain, with many other Captains and Commanders of great note, and fifteen hundred Janizaries. There were alſo four Field-pieces taken, with thirty Enſigns and two Cornets, beſide a very rich Prey of brave and couragious Horſes, with much fair Armour, rich Apparel, and good Scimitars, Weapons of no ſmall account and price among the Turks. This overthrow much abated the Courage and Hope of the reſt of the Turks for coming to the effect of their Deſigns; and increaſed the Courage and Hope of the Chriſtians, reaſonably well hereby aſſured of the good Succeſs of their Affairs for this year in Hungary.

Sultan Mahomet much troubled in his Affairs.

The doings of the Rebels in Aſia.

About this time, Sultan Mahomet, having put a Fleet of Gallies to Sea, to have gone againſt the King of Fez, was certainly informed, how that the ſame, with Tempeſt ſore beaten, to avoid Shipwrack, was again returned unto the ſame Port from whence it looſed, bringing back with it nothing for all his great Charges, but Sickneſs and great Loſſes at Sea received. The like evil hap or worſe, having at the ſame time alſo betided another Fleet, by him ſet out into the Euxine or black Sea, to defend thoſe Sea Coaſts from being rifled and ſpoiled by the Rebels in Aſia, who with their daily Incurſions did there ſtill great harm. For albeit that Zellaly, one of the Captains of the Rebels, allured with Mahomet's fair Promiſes, was by the ſtreight of the Dardanelli (called in antient time the ſtreight of Helleſpont) come with twelve thouſand good Souldiers out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo marching through Macedonia, was come into Hungary, there to do his Lord and Maſter Service; yet the chief Rebel held ſtill out, and both now, and for divers years after, maintained a moſt cruel and dangedange-

dangerous War, to the great trouble of the Grand Seignior, and the hindering of his Affairs. And even now the crafty Rebel having made ſhew as if he would have ſubmitted himſelf, and come over into Europe as Zellaly did; and had therefore certain Gallies ſent unto him from Mahomet, to have tranſported him and his Souldiers in; he, now of them poſſeſſed, ſlew all them that were ſent therein, and kept the Gallies to himſelf. So that ſo far from was it, that the Rebellion was extinguiſhed in Aſia, and the Rebels ſuppreſſed, as that they were now up in greater number than ever, and ſo did alſo more harm. Whereunto they were alſo the more incouraged by the example of Haſſan Baſſa, (not him the General in Hungary, but another Baſſa of the ſame Name) who, by the Great Sultan ſent againſt theſe Rebels, had for a time kept them under, and ſomewhat repreſſed their inſolency; but now by Mahomet diſplaced, and another being ſent to ſucceed him; he therewith diſcontented, ſo animated and incenſed his Souldiers againſt him, as that coming to have taken upon him his charge, he found moſt part of the Souldiers ready to turn their Weapons upon him; ſo that at length they fell together by the Ears about the matter, ſome taking part with the old General, and ſome with the new. In which tumultuous quarrel a number of Souldiers were ſlain, all they of the richer ſort ſpoiled, and the great Sultans Service and Authority neglected. But the new General, armed with his Princes Authority, and ſome of the old Souldiers alſo taking his part, at laſt prevailing, Haſſan, the old General, with his partakers, were glad to fly and ſhift for themſelves; who for all that, having afterward gathered together the diſperſed Souldiers, and joyning with the reſt of the Rebels, held ſtill the Body of a good Army on foot; by his Example ſtirring up the People to Rebellion, croſſing the Service of his Sovereign, and doing what harm he could, ſo to ſeem unto his Followers the more valiant. The Perſian King on the other ſide taking the Advantage of theſe the Turks Troubles at home, as alſo of his Wars with the Chriſtians; at the ſame time with a great Army beſieged the great City of Tauris, as then kept by the Turks with a moſt ſtrong Garriſon. In which ſiege he for Battery uſed the help of the Cannon, an Engine of long time by the Perſians ſcorned, as not beſeeming valiant men; until that by their own harms taught, he was now content to uſe it; being with the ſame, as alſo with skilful Cannoneers, furniſhed by the Portugals; by which means he in ſhort time after again recovered this great City from the Turks, being before by Sultan Amurath taken from Mahomet the Perſian King, but now again reſtored unto the Perſian Kingdom.

The great City of Tauris beſieged and taken by the Perſian King.

Sultan Mahomet perplexed with the evil Succeſs of his Affairs, falleth to his ſuperſtitious Devotions.

Sultan Mahomet thus on every ſide beſet with Troubles, and not well knowing which way to turn himſelf for to remedy the ſame, being in mind much troubled and perplexed, began to enter into Conſideration of the Vanity of theſe Earthly things, and of the Frailty of his Eſtate; and ſo ſtruck as it were with a Remorſe of Conſcience, and a firm belief that God did thus chaſtiſe and puniſh him for his Offences, conſidering that his Anceſtors had never been troubled with any ſuch Attaints or Diſgraces, he converted all his Thoughts unto Prayers towards God; and therefore gave Commandment for publick Prayers to be continually ſaid in all the Moſquies or Churches throughout all his Dominions, giving himſelf wholly alſo unto ſuch devout Exerciſes and Works of Charity; and withal ſent two of his moſt reverend Prieſts bare-headed and bare-footed, on Pilgrimage to Mecha (where the chief Temple of their great Prophet is, and wherein they vainly believe their ſuperſtitious Prayers to be of him moſt ſpeedily heard) there to pray unto him for the Health and Proſperity of him their Prince and Sovereign.

A great fight of a Flemiſh Ship with the Gallies of Amurat Rais.

At the ſame time, Amurat Rais, an old Pyrat, the Turks Admiral for the Weſt part of the Mediterranian, roaming there up and down, and doing what harm he could, chanced to light upon a great Flemiſh Ship, which he with his Gallies forthwith incloſed, the calmneſs of the Weather then ſavouring him, and hindering the Flemins, their Ship being able to make no way. Who, ſo beſet, and having made a great fight againſt the whole Fleet, and ſlain a number of the Turks, and ſore rent divers of their Gallies, though not without loſs of many of their own men alſo; being not able longer to fight, and now ſeeing themſelves boarded by as many Turks as could well ſtand upon the Hatches of the Ship, and their Gallies hanging round about her; as men of invincible Courage, and reſolved to die, and yet to ſell their Lives at as dear a rate as they could, laid all the Powder they had left in the Ship on an heap together, and thereunto upon the ſudden put fire, by force whereof, the Turks with the Hatches were all blown up, the Flemings with their Ships rent in pieces, together with divers of the Gallies that were faſt grapled unto her, and an incredible harm done unto ſuch other of the Gallies as were near unto her. Men worthy always to vanquiſh, ſeeing that they fear nothing more than to be themſelves vanquiſhed; and more worthy to have lived for the Glory of Men, than by their Cruelty to have periſhed to the diſhonour of Men. The old Pyrat aſtoniſhed at ſo great and deſperate a Reſolution, having in this Exploit loſt much, and gained nothing, haſted to the ſhore to repair his rent Gallies, and ſo put to Sea again; where he had not long been, but that he by chance (and that full ſore againſt his will) met with the great Duke of Florence's Gallies, accounted the beſt Gallies in the World, and ſuch as now at this preſent moſt troubled the Turks Deſigns. At which meeting, after many a thundering Cannon-ſhot on both ſides diſcharged, not without the apparent loſs on the Turks behalf, when they ſhould have come to have grapled together, and to have fought hand to hand, a thing which the Florentines moſt deſired, as in hope to have made that famous Pyrat the prize of their Victory; he not willing ſo to do, ſuddenly turned about and fled; after whom the Florentines followed amain, and in the chaſe ſunk ſome of his Gallies, and took other ſome full of great Riches; and ſo brake the Credit of this old and renowned Pyrat, as that for a great while after he was little by the Chriſtians feared upon that Coaſt. But leaving Mahomet to his Devotions, and the old Pyrat to bewail his loſſes, let us again return to ſee what the great Armies of the Turks and of the Chriſtians did more in Hungary.

The Turks in a Skirmiſh by the Chriſtians overthrown.

While theſe Armies lay incamped the one attending upon the other, many an hot Skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them, moſt whereof ſorted unto the hurt and loſs of the Turks. Among others it fortuned, that a Troop of Adventurers going out of the Chriſtian Army to ſeek after Booty, fell upon a like Troop of the Turks, come out for the like purpoſe; where, after a ſharp encounter on both ſides given and received, the Turks at length put to the worſe and defeated, betook themſelves to flight, having left a number of their Fellows dead upon the place, and loſt two of their Enſigns, with an hundred and thirty Horſes of Service. In which Chace, the Chriſtians hardly purſuing them, drave a number more of them into the Danubius, wherein they moſt miſerably periſhed; and took a great many more Priſoners, amongſt whom were found above fourſcore Italian Renegades, who, brought into the Camp, were, as Enemies unto God, in a Martial Court all condemned to be hanged, and ſo accordingly executed, ſaving the Captain himſelf, who, for the regard of his Place, was beheaded.

The Turks Army greatly diminiſhed and diſcouraged.

Shortly after, the great Baſſa ariſing with his Army, came in the beginning of October and incamped near Buda, both for the Preſervation of the Place, and the ſafety of his Army, now greatly diminiſhed both in Number and Courage. For it was certainly known by divers Fugitives from the Turks, that in theſe many Conflicts they had loſt a number of their beſt Souldiers, but eſpecially of their Janizaries. So that the Baſſa, for the ſupplying of that Defect, was glad to make choice of 6000 of his beſt Souldiers, whom, armed with Muſquets and Scimitars, the proper Arms of the Janizaries, he entertained into the Rooms and Pay of the Janizaries that were dead and ſlain; the reſt of his Army for the moſt part conſiſting of bare and feeble, baſe raw Souldiers. Beſides this, that all the Army was full of Mourning and Lamentation, the Souldiers in all Places bewailing the loſs of their Brethren, their Friends and Companions; ſo that inſtead of their wonted Threats and bravery, nothing was to be heard but ſighing and complaining. And moreover, that the general Opinion conceived of the greatneſs of the Chriſtian Army, (imagined to be much greater and ſtronger than indeed it was) had ſtruck ſuch a fear into the minds of the Turks, as that they were reſolved, Buda being once victualled, to return home, all their other proud Deſigns for this year ſet apart; which was the cauſe that they had diſlodged with their Army, and drawn near unto the City, the better to attend to the new victualling thereof, and ſo to be gone; accounting themſelves right happy, if they might but perform that good piece of Service and ſave themſelves.

The Chriſtians with their Army follow the Turks.

The Chriſtians, before in doubt leſt the Turks ſhould have beſieged Peſth, as they had before given it forth they would, and ſeeing them now to be riſen with their Army and incamped near unto Buda, reſolved to follow them, and in what they might to croſs their Deſigns; and thereupon leaving Peſth, as now out of danger, they roſe alſo, and came and incamped before the Fort in the Iſle of Vicegrade, betwixt the ſaid Fort and Vachta; where they ſtayed four days, and then by a Bridge which they made upon the Danuby, whereby to paſs from the Iſle where the Italians lay in Garriſon, unto the Fort of Saint Andrew, kept by the Lanſquenets, they with the whole Army paſſed the River, and ſo came and incamped before the Fort of Saint Andrew, in the face of the Enemy. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two Armies was plain and open, without Woods, Buſhes, or Rivers, to hinder the joyning of a ſet Battel. In which ſo fit a Place, the Chriſtians incouraged, with the fear of their Enemies, and the diminiſhing of their Number and Courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous riſing, as by other Advertiſements) were deſirous in ſo favourable Occaſions to have given them Battel; and for the deſire they had thereof, were come thither to ſeek it; which the Turks on the other ſide ſought as much to ſhun, not daring to adventure themſelves unto the Fortune of a general Battel, for all the brags they had made. Nevertheleſs, very ſhame arming them with ſome Reſolution, they put forth into the field a Battalion of five thouſand men, five days after that the Chriſtians were incamped on that ſide of the River. This Battel of the Turks came marching on, within half a quarter of a League of the Chriſtians; which they would not have done but upon the Confidence of a greater number following of them, having behind them ten thouſand men both Horſe and Foot, laid as cloſe as they poſſibly could a little out of the way.

The Chriſtians reſolve to give the Turks Battel.

Now the Chriſtians, thinking of no other Forces ready to fight, but thoſe which appeared in their ſight, ſent forth 12 hundred men againſt theſe five thouſand Turks, to skirmiſh with them, until the whole Army were put into order, even for a general Battel that day to have been fought, if the Turks ſhould accept thereof; whereunto the General, the Collonels, Captains, and Souldiers in general, were fully inclined, the whole Army with great Chearfulneſs marching on foot at this loud alarm of their common deſire. Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turks been likewiſe diſpoſed for the producing of the ſame. But they be the extraordinary favours of Fortune, when fit Occaſions joyn themſelves with brave Reſolutions, and ſuch Reſolutions with means to effect the ſame. This is the let of many moſt noble Trophies, which moſt commonly fail, either for lack of fit Occaſion, or for lack of good Reſolution for the performance of them. But as moſt men judge of other mens Conceits by their own Inclination, ſo the Chriſtians themſelves, reſolved to give Battel, thought the Turks their Enemies to have been of the ſame Reſolution; and thoſe five thouſand men to have been the head of the avaunt-guard, followed with the whole Army, coming to draw them out to skirmiſh until the coming on of the reſt of their Forces.

The Turks ſeek to draw the Chriſtians into the danger of their Ambuſh.

Howbeit their deſign was quite contrary to this the Chriſtians hope, for their purpoſe was only to train them out into their Ambuſhes, ſo without danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpoſe they gave ſufficient Teſtimony, and cauſe of ſuſpect; for that the Skirmiſh having continued three hours, with ſome loſs on both ſides, the Turks Army appeared not; and theſe five thouſand Turks now in Skirmiſh, by little and little retiring, ſought ſo to have drawn the Chriſtians into the danger of their Ambuſh. Which their manner of fight cauſed the Chriſtians to ſuſpect the matter; for it was not like, that five thouſand men ſhould give ground to twelve hundred, if they had not had ſome ſecret meaning therein, which they ſought to effect to their more advantage. Which cauſed the Chriſtian Carabins which followed them, not to be too earneſt in purſuing of them, and more cloſely to ſerre themſelves together, the better to indure the ſhock of their Enemies, if they ſhould charge them. Neither were they in that their provident fear deceived; for the Turks, ſeeing their purpoſe diſcovered, and themſelves now out of hope to effect the ſame, upon the ſudden made a ſtand, and ſo preſently coming on, hardly charged the formoſt of our Carabins; who, as men half ſurpriſed, to ſee themſelves ſo readily and reſolutely charged, by men who but now made ſhew as if they would have fled, were not able ſo valiantly to receive the charge (conſidering the great number of them by whom they were charged) but that ſome few of them were overthrown and ſlain, with ſome of the Hungarians amongſt them.

A Conflict betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

Howbeit they made good reſiſtance, and right valiantly repulſed their Enemies, of whom they ſlew a good number alſo. The preaſe in this Conflict was great, every one deſiring to ſhew himſelf brave and couragious in the head of his own Army. But new Supplies ſtill coming in, the Turks in fine ſhrunk back and retired, having left three hundred of their Fellows dead upon the Place, accompanied with an hundred of the Chriſtians there ſlain likewiſe. Now upon the retreat on both ſides, every man in his conceit appointed the next day for the general day of Battel; the bragging ging Speeches of the Turks giving the Chriſtians occaſion ſo to think; for why, they ſeldom or never refuſe Battel,being offered them by the Chriſtians, as well for the Confidence they commonly have in their multitude, as for the fooliſh opinion they have of the inevitable Predeſtination of men to Life or Death; accounting it amongſt them an eternal infamy, to refuſe any Combat againſt the Chriſtians; which, howſoever it fall out, ſhould ſort to their Advantage, by vanquiſhing, gaining the Fruits of their Victory; and by loſing their Lives in Battel, to gain the Joys of Heaven; being vainly perſwaded, no mens Souls do go more readily unto Heaven, than the Souls of ſuch as dye in Battel againſt the Chriſtians. Such Effects old ſuperſtitious Opinions are able to work in the Minds of men, even to the deſperate adventuring and ſpending of their Lives. Howbeit, that this Effect for this time witneſſeth, that theſe men, with all theſe Advantages, as much feared the danger as any other poor faint-hearted men; and that a ſtrong apprehenſion of fear is able to prevail againſt all Cuſtoms and Perſwaſions, be they never ſo old, as alſo againſt all other Accidents whatſoever. For why, the Turks, contenting themſelves with their great Braggs and vain Threats, came not forth according to their Promiſe, neither could by any means be drawn to adventure themſelves unto the hazard of a general Battel. The loſs of their great and choiceſt men diſcouraged and deterred them from adventuring all to the hazard of ſo great a Peril. For (as I have ſaid) almoſt all their Janizaries and moſt valiant Souldiers were dead or ſlain, and the reſt, men of ſmall Spirit or Courage, reſerved that little which was in them, for the ſafeguard of themſelves, and not for the gaining of any notable Victory. They had alſo in theſe often Conflicts loſt all their Eraſbles, which are a deſperate kind of Souldiers fighting on Horſeback, without Saddles, having only a little piece of Tapeſtry upon their Horſes Backs, and by the readineſs of their Horſes, do for a long time in one ſort maintain their fight. They carry light Darts made of ſtrait and fair Canes, excellently well made, and ſtrongly armed; and their handy Weapons are good Sables, or broad and ſharp Curtleaſſes. Theſe men a great while fought moſt valiantly in the laſt Combats, but in fine, were all ſlain, except ſome few which caſt themſelves into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loſs of which men much diſcouraged the Turks; for why, their Service ſtood them in great ſtead in receiving the Enemies Charges, and with their Bodies covering of the Turks Squadrons in their greateſt Perils and Combats. Howbeit the Turks received not theſe Loſſes without returning of ſome part thereof to us again; for Collonitz had a little before fallen into great danger of his Perſon, and loſt ſome of his Followers in an Enterpriſe of great Moment, had the Effect anſwered unto the Project thereof. While the Turks yet lodged in the Iſle of Vicegrade, he cauſed eight great field-pieces to be ſo placed, as that therewith he ſo much annoyed the Turks, that they were about to have forſaken the Place. And the more to force them ſo to do, the ſecond of October he embarqued himſelf with ſix hundred Haiducks upon the Danubius, and ſo by Night with great ſilence landed near unto the Enemies, thinking ſo upon the ſudden to have ſurpriſed them. Which for all that, could not ſo ſecretly be done, by reaſon of the coming on of the day, but that the Turks were thereof aware; who thereupon with great preaſe iſſued out of their Trenches, and with all their Force and Power charged him. Againſt whom he made head, rather upon a brave and conſtant Reſolution, than upon any Confidence he had in his own Forces, not having men enow to withſtand the leaſt part of his Enemies. Which his ſo great Reſolution ſo abated the Turks Fury, as that they ſtood a good while in doubt to charge men ſo reſolved. The Field-pieces which he had brought over with him into the Iſle, then ſerved him to good purpoſe, beating them back with their murthering Bullets, who with their number thought to have overwhelmed him. Which good help,oppoſed againſt the number of the Enemies, for a time balanced the Victory, and wrought the death of many on both ſides. This manner of fight indured the ſpace of two hours, maintained more by Reſolution, than by Strength and Power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number prevailing, the Chriſtians therewith rather oppreſſed than vanquiſhed, forſaking their Field-pieces, diſorderly retired toward their Boats: After whom the Turks eagerly following, in that purſuit ſlew 400 of the Haiducks, the reſt with much ado recovering their Boats, carrying with them their General, by them hardly defended from the Fury of their Enemy. Which loſs hapned not ſo unto the Chriſtians, but that it was mingled with ſome loſs of the Turks alſo, of whom, the moſt forward and couragious were in that fight ſlain, as was afterwards known by certain Priſoners of theirs afterward taken, who made report of the Loſſes by them there received. The Turks, by this ſo deſperate and dangerous an attempt warned,to prevent the like for the time to come, caſt up great Trenches in the Iſle along the Bank of Danubius, therein placing certain Janizaries and other their beſt Souldiers,who there lay until the diſlodgement of the Camp, to go to lie before Buda.

The Turks refuſe to come to a general Battel with the Chriſtians.

Collonitz in governing about to ſurpriſe the Turks, with loſs repulſed, and himſelf indangered.

The Turks had before built a Bridge of Boats at Lamaſcin, which gave them Paſſage into Stiria, where they did great harm; for the ſtrengthning whereof, they had built at both ends thereof a ſtrong Fort, well furniſhed both with Men and Munition. This Bridge, ſo commodious for the Turks, and hurtful to the Chriſtians, Trantmeſtorf, Governour of Stiria, and a great Commander in thoſe parts, with his Stirian Troops, and ſome good Aid brought unto him by the County Serin, undertook to break. Upon which Reſolution he upon the ſudden approached one of the aforeſaid Forts, and ſo right furiouſly aſſailed the ſame, before they in the Fort were well aware of his coming. In which doing, he cauſed the greateſt noiſe and ſtir that was poſſible to be made with Trumpets, Drums, and clattering of Armour, as if it had been ſome great Army imployed in that Action, the more to terrifie the beſieged. Which ſo great and dreadful a noiſe, joyned unto ſo brave an attempt, with ſo great Courage begun, ſtruck ſuch a Terror into the Minds of the Turks, that they without any great reſiſtance quitted the place, and fled over the Bridge to the other Fort. Of which forſaken Fort the Chriſtians became Maſters, and with all ſpeed proſecuting their good Fortune, preſently drew out thereof three Cannons, and therewith battered the other Fort. In which the Turks, having no other place of Refuge to fly unto, nor hope of ſafety but in their laſt Valour, ſo well behaved themſelves, as that the Chriſtians had much ado to force them. Howbeit, a breach being made by the Fury of the Cannon, and ſcaling-ladders ſet up, the Fort was on every ſide aſſaulted; which the Turks for the ſpace of five hours ſo valiantly endured, as that it was hard to ſay who ſhould prevail or have the better. In this Aſſault were many on both ſides ſlain, the Turks not being to be overcome but with the loſs both of their Lives and Honour; nor the Chriſtians able to retire without loſing the fruit of that their ſo great and rich an Enterpriſe; ſo that the aſſault was with great Reſolution on both ſides maintained, the Turks fighting for their Lives, and the Chriſtians for their Honour; until that at laſt, the Turks, with much ſlaughter overcome, the Fort was by the Chriſtians taken, and moſt of the Turks therein being ſlain, and the reſt taken Priſoners, both the Forts were forthwith razed, and the Bridge broken, which before had ſerved for an ordinary paſſage for the Turks to forrage and ſpoil the Chriſtian Territories by. The Boats whereof the Bridge was made were all burnt, and ſome great Ordnance therein found broken in pieces and caſt into the River.

Lugaze, a ſtrong Place delivered to Baſta.

At the ſame time Lugaze, a Place of great Importance for the Service of the Emperour, and ſo near unto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing thereabouts, but that it might from thence be diſcovered and known, was by the Tranſilvanians delivered to Baſta, General for the Emperour in that Country. From which place, he ſending out certain Scouts toward Belgrade, they brought in with them certain Priſoners; who being examined, ſaid, that Haſſan Baſſa, the Turks General in Hungary, had writ to Giaffer Baſſa, the Governour of Temeſwar, That he ſhould only attend to the Preſervation of his own, without attempting any thing further againſt the Chriſtians, the preſent eſtate of their Affairs ſo requiring; and that having revictualled Buda, his purpoſe was for this year to return, in hope of ſome good Peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour.

The Chriſtians offer the Turks Battel.

The Turks refuſe to accept of Battel offered them by the Chriſtians.

The two Armies of the Turks and the Chriſtians lay ſtill near the one of them unto the other, the Turks, careful for the revictualling of Buda, and the Chriſtians ſtill intentive to their doings, and deſirous in what they might to hinder and fruſtrate the ſame. Which, becauſe they could no way better do, than by offering of them Battel; they thereupon generally reſolved, upon a Friday, being the ſeventeenth of October, the day by them aſſigned for the Battel (having by the ſhooting off of three great Cannons, given warning unto the Souldiers throughout the Camp, for the preparing of themſelves firſt toward God, and then to the Service of their Prince) after they had well refreſhed themſelves, in good order took the field, and ſo ſtood ready ranged there, either to give or accept of Battel. Before whom, the County Ringrave was ſent forth with his Regiment, about half the way betwixt the two Armies, to diſcover the moving of the Enemy, and to receive his firſt charge if occaſion ſhould ſo require. Whoſe Scouts before ſent forth, about Noon diſcovered a Troop of Horſe-men come out of the Turks Camp, about ſome buſineſs they had to do, but to them unknown; whom the Scouts ſuppoſing to have been the fore-runners of the Turks Army, and by them almoſt ſurpriſed, haſtily retired back again, and by their haſty retreat put the whole Army in an alarm, which came bravely marching on, in hope now to have come to try the matter by true Valour, and by the Fortune of a general Battel to have made that day for ever famous by their Victory and the overthrow of their proud Enemies. And in the heat of their ſo great Courage, like enough it was for them to have performed the ſame, had the Turks had but ſo much Courage in them as to have met them in the Field, as was well hoped they now would. But they, with their former Loſſes diſcouraged, and reſolved only upon the ſafeguard of themſelves, and the victualling of Buda, had no mind to enter into theſe honourable Liſts, but kept themſelves cloſe within the covert of their Tents, and the ſtrength of their Trenches. And ſo the Chriſtians, with a falſe alarm moved, and having for the moſt part of the day in vain expected the coming forth of their Enemies, returned into their Camp deceived of their Expectation.

The great Baſſa having victualled Buda, ſecretly by Night riſeth with his Army, and retireth out of Hungary.

The ſame day there was an Eſpie taken, whom they which took him thought to have been a Turk, howbeit he was found to be one of their own men; by whom they were better informed of the Cowardiſe of the Turks, of their purpoſe for the ſhunning of Battel, and of their Reſolution for the keeping of themſelves within the ſafeguard of their Trenches; and that they ſo did, as well for the loſſes they had before received, as for divers other unlucky accidents, which cauſed them to miſdoubt ſome evil ſucceſs in the end and winding up of this their Expedition. Nevertheleſs, the Chriſtians, not greatly truſting to theſe Reports, ſtill kept their Army in readineſs, to give their Enemies Battel upon the leaſt occaſion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cauſe of fear, the Turks having no deſire at all to come to a general Battel; ſo that inſtead of great Effects that were expected, the time paſſed but in light Skirmiſhes and vain Alarms betwixt the two Armies, until that at length the Turks, having by the River ſufficiently ſtored the City of Buda with Victuals, the great Baſſa ſecretly by Night roſe with his Army, and ſo retired toward Belgrade. Which ſo baſe a retreat differed not much from a cowardly flight, being with ſuch ſilence made under the dark covert of the Night, as that the Chriſtians had thereof no perceiving until they were quite departed and gone. This victualling of Buda, and ſome other few places of the Turks in Hungary, was all that the great Baſſa did this year with his great Army; whereas at his firſt coming it was given out, that he would therewith take both Strigonium and Peſth from the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtians after the departure of the Turks, reſolve to beſiege Hatwan.

The next day, the haſty and ſudden departure of the Enemy being perceived, the General of the Chriſtians called together the Collonels and other great Commanders of the Army, to conſult with them, what were beſt to be done in ſo unexpected an occurrent? Of whom, ſome were of Opinion, That it was beſt forthwith in all haſte to purſue their fearful Enemies; others, for many Reaſons diſſuading the ſame, and others withal, propounding ſome other notable Exploits to be taken in hand. But in Concluſion, the ſafeſt point was reſolved upon, which was, not to hazard any of their Troops in purſuing of their flying Enemies, who were hardly to be overtaken; but now immediately after their departure to attempt the taking in of ſome one of their ſtrong holds; where, amongſt others that were propounded, Hatwan was thought to be the moſt neceſſary Place, being ſo ſeated, as that beſide the great harm it did to the Chriſtians thereabout, it much hindered both Advertiſements and Victuals to be brought unto Peſth. Which Exploit reſolved upon, they forthwith razed the Fort of St. Andrew, and the Fort by them built in the Iſle of Vicegrade, becauſe they ſhould not ſtand the Turks in any ſtead after their departure, and ſo with all their Power ſet forward toward Hatwan. This Town is ſeated beyond the River of Danubius toward the North, about eight Leagues from Buda, croſſing the way to Tranſilvania and Caſſovia, upon a fair and even Plain, near unto a great and deep Mariſh, and was ſometime defended with good and ſtrong Walls, with a Caſtle, and three large and deep Ditches, for a long time in the Power of the Turks, and which, without loſs, a great while held out againſt the valiant Baron Teuffenbach, by whom it was moſt ſtraitly in vain beſieged; until that afterward it was again beſieged by Maximilian the Arch-duke, the Emperours

Brother, then General of his Army in Hungary, in the year 1594, unto whom it was by Compoſition ſurrendred, after it had for a certain ſpace been by the Turks notably defended; who, conſidering the harm this place did unto the Emperours Territories, by reaſon of the ſcituation thereof, wherein a great and ſtrong Garriſon of the Turks always lying, forraged all the Chriſtian Territories as far as the River Vague, yea, and oftentimes took Booties as far as Strigonium, and by ſpoiling of all that ſide of Hungary, cauſed the Country to pay Contribution as far as Ternavie, ſtanding within four Leagues of the Mountains which ſeperate Hungary and Moravia; all irreparable Loſſes to the Chriſtians, and hardly to be avoided; for which Reaſons he cauſed it then to be diſmantled, and to be made unſerviceable for the Wars. After which time for all that, the Turks, for the commodiouſneſs of the Place, had with great Labour again new fortified the ſame, with Walls made with great Piles of Wood and Faggots, with Earth rammed in betwixt them; a ſtronger kind of Fortification, and better able to withſtand the Fury of the Cannon, than are Walls of Stone; in which ſort the Turks uſe moſt commonly to fortifie ſuch Places as they mean to defend, and which oftentimes coſt much for the Chriſtians to gain the ſame from them.

Hatwan again fortified by the Turks.

This Place thus fortified, and both with Men and Munition well furniſhed, and with all things needful ſtored, was able to indure a great and long Siege; whereunto the Garriſon therein was as reſolutely ſet down, as were the Chriſtians to attempt it; where now, at their firſt coming unto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, aſſiſted with three hundred Lanſquenets, under the leading of County Sultze, and Graſold, General of the Italians, were appointed to go before the reſt of the Army, and to begin to make the Approaches; which they did by forcing of a Water-mill, driven by the Water of the Mariſh, not paſt a Muſquet ſhot from the Town. Wherein while they were buſied, the Turks ſallying out of the Town, came to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians, and had with them a ſharp Combat, the Turks fighting for the defending of the Place, and of their Lives, and the Chriſtians for the gaining of the ſame, and for their Honour. Which ſo contrary a Reſolution in that Conflict, coſt the Lives of many; and amongſt others, the Life of Graſold, General of the Italians, there ſlain with a Harquebuſe ſhot, unto the great hurt of the whole Army, but eſpecially of the Italians, now deprived of ſo great and expert a Commander. At laſt, for all that, the Turks were inforced confuſedly to retire again into the Town, having in this ſally loſt a number of their men alſo. The Chriſtians nevertheleſs, having driven the Turks back into the Town, went forward with their Buſineſs in making their Approaches, and placing their Gabions to cover their Cannon; wherein the Turks with their great and ſmall ſhot did them great harm, but eſpecially with their murthering pieces, charged with Nails and other ſmall pieces of Iron. Howbeit, by the coming of the Lord Ruſſworm with the reſt of the Army, the Approaches were the next day brought on, and the Battery planted ſo near unto the Town, as that the Turks could not without moſt manifeſt danger and loſs, any more ſally out to trouble the Chriſtians in their Works. The firſt Inconveniency the beſieged felt, was the want of Water, which through the diligence of our men was ſoon taken from them, the Cannon right furiouſly battering the Walls in the mean ſpace. Wherewith the Turks diſcouraged, and now out of hope to be relieved, thought it not beſt for them to expect either whilſt a Breach were made, or an Aſſault given, but by Parly to prevent theſe Dangers, in hope ſo to come to ſome eaſier Compoſition, while yet they ſtood in their whole ſtrength. And ſo Parly by the Turks demanded, and by the Chriſtians granted, and Hoſtages for the ſurety thereof on both ſides given, they ſent two of the chief men amongſt them to intreat of the ſame; who at the firſt demanded, That their Lives and Liberty ſaved, they might with Bag and Baggage depart. Whereunto anſwer was given them, That they ſhould only with their Lives and Liberty be gone, with ſome few hundreds of their worſt Horſes, of Courteſie given them, to carry them to ſuch place as they meant to retire themſelves unto, and to deliver into the hands of the Chriſtians all ſuch Renegades as were in Town.

Hatwan beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Graſold, General of the Italians, ſlain.

The Turks in Hatwan crave Parley.

Now the beſieged Turks, carrying yet the marks of the Cruelty by the Wallons exerciſed upon them in the former Siege, when as the ſame Town was by force taken, and filled with dead Bodies of all Ages and Sexes, and doubting now this ſecond Shipwrack, with like miſery threatned unto them by the Chriſtian General, if they ſhould expect the dreadful event of a general aſſault; accepted of theſe hard Conditions, ſeeing no better could be obtained; and ſo covenanting, that they with their Families, their Lives and Liberties ſaved, might with a ſafe Convoy be conducted unto ſome place of ſurety within their own Territory, they promiſed to give up the Town. Which Agreement, on both parties reſolved upon, they full of Sorrow and Heavineſs, with their Families departing out of the Town the 29*th* of November, were by Collonel Andaſt, with certain Huſſars, ſafely conducted to Solnoc. The Chriſtians entring the Town, found therein great ſtore of Victuals and Munition, the Houſes full of Corn and other Neceſſaries, and the Shops ſtored with Weapons, Shot, and Powder, with 24 pieces of great Ordnance ready mounted, which might have well ſufficed for the defence of the place. But all theſe things are but Acceſſories unto one principal, that is to ſay, to Reſolution, without which they are but of ſmall force, and with which they are able to do much. Beſide that, the place it ſelf thus furniſhed well conſidered, ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to have been forced; but eſpecially now that Winter was come on, which might have brought a thouſand Storms and Difficulties, by the Chriſtians not to have been indured; ſo that every man beholding the ſame, with his Eyes caſt up towards heaven, gave God the Praiſe, for taking away the Turks Courages in their ſo great Advantages, and increaſing of the Chriſtians in their no leſs Difficulties; unto whom the glory of this Victory was wholly attributed, ſeeing that contrary to all appearance and mans forces, he had given to the Chriſtians the Victory, no way able by their own forces to have been gained. But God, which in his Providence from Heaven beholdeth all things upon Earth, diſpoſeth of the ſame as he ſeeth beſt for his Glory, and the welfare of his; ſo that in this Action he was the only Pilot which brought this our Ship into the Haven of Health; for the Hairs of our Head are of him numbred, and even the leaſt Creatures upon Earth are by him regarded.

Hatwan* yielded unto the Chriſtians.

Into this new gained Town the Chriſtian General put a good and ſtrong Garriſon of a thouſand Lanſquenets, and 500 Hungarians, part Horſe-men, and part Foot-men, for the keeping of the Place and of the Country thereabout; which done, he retired with his Army toward Peſth, which he relieved with Victuals, and ſtrengthned with the Troops of the Collonels, Collonitz, Geiberg, and Rouer, who were there billited to paſs the Winter, and to preſerve the place againſt the Devices and Enterpriſes of the Turks of Buda, who were ſtill deviſing and practiſing for the regaining thereof.

The Lord Ruſſworm breaks up his Army, and ſendeth the Enſigns gained from the Turks for a preſent to the Archduke Matthias.

The time of the Year for Souldiers any longer to keep the Field now paſt, and the great Army of the Turks riſen and gone, the Lord Ruſſworm breaking up his Army near unto Strigonium, cauſed all the Enſigns by him this Year gained from the Turks, even ſixty four in number, to be gathered together, all very brave and gallant; all which he ſent with great Pomp and Triumph to Vienna, for a Preſent to the Arch-duke Matthias; who received them with great Thanks, given both unto the General that ſent them, and the Souldiers that had gained them; and bountifully rewarding them that had brought them. They of Vienna at the ſame time highly commending the General, and not a little rejoycing to ſee thoſe ſame Enſigns now in their Power within the City, which not long before had proudly braved them in the Field.

Inſolent Souldiers juſtly puniſhed.

Now after the breaking up of the Chriſtian Army, a great number of inſolent and ſeditious Souldiers, eſpecially of the Regiment of Collonel Altmein, roaming up and down the Country to ſeek for Booty, moſt cruelly rifled and ſpoiled the Country Villages, with the Inhabitants therein, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, ſparing no more the one than the other: whoſe Outrage not otherwiſe to be ſtayed, they were by Commandment from the Emperour, by force charged at Widhof, and two hundred and thirty of them being brought in Priſoners to Vienna, four and thirty of them were there for Example hanged, and the reſt, as men not worthy of Entertainment, caſhiered.

The Souldiers of the Regiment of the Reingrave evil billited, by Extremities driven to provide for themſelves.

The time of the Year having (as we ſaid) broken up the Army of the Chriſtians, the Regiment of the County Reingrave was put in Garriſon into the Villages of Chiante and Ternavy, always at hand with the Enemies, as fitteſt to repulſe them. Theſe Souldiers were always kept in doing, ſtill fighting whilſt others were at Peace, and managing their Arms, whilſt others hanged theirs by the Walls. For, beſide the Troubles they had with the Turks, their nigh, but bad Neighbours, the very Inhabitants of the Country (who held all that might hurt them for Enemies, were they never ſo much their Friends) oftentimes, and that for little or no occaſion at all, took up Arms, and right furiouſly charged them as their mortal Enemies. Of which Combats there was no end, the Country Peaſants ſtill ſtriving to rid themſelves of ſuch Gueſts. So that theſe valiant men, ſtill inforced to buy their Bread with the price of their Blood, as men become deſperate, uſed the Chriſtians as they did the Turks, dividing all things with them by the Sword. But in theſe ſmall and often Fights more men were ſlain and loſt than would have been in a general Battel, ſome good number, either on the one ſide or the other being every day ſlain; which daily Inconveniences cauſed theſe Souldiers to reſolve to go to ſeek their living elſewhere, rather than in the midſt of the Graves of their Fellows. Whereunto they were the rather induced, for that but a little before, the Troop of Captain Clinchampe, the beſt and braveſt of the whole Regiment, was one night furiouſly aſſailed, and almoſt ſurpriſed by the Country Peaſants. Wherefore they departed out of Hungary into Auſtria without Victuals, Apparel, or Money, their Pay due unto them for ſeventeen Months being kept from them. A Cruelty full of Covetouſneſs, and a Covetouſneſs full of Cruelty, by wrong and hard dealing to leave thoſe men to the deſperate extremity of Hunger, who for our Safety had expoſed themſelves to all manner of danger. For if the Prince (as he may of right) demand the Lives of his Subjects in his Service, as bound unto their Loyalty; they may alſo of Right require due Proviſion for their Maintenance: of which two Offices, where one faileth, the whole State muſt needs fall. For providing wherefore, great was the Wiſdom of Auguſtus, who laid up the publick Revenue apart by it ſelf, to defray the publick Charge; and that which was his own private, to ſerve his own private Uſes.

The Peaſants of Auſtria ſeek by force to ſtay the Paſſage of the Souldiers of the Reingraves Regiment into their Country.

The Churles of Auſtria overthrown.

Theſe poor Souldiers thus reſolved, craved leave of the Biſhop of Presbourg to paſs by the Suburbs of his Town, without doing therein any harm: which their Requeſt he courteouſly granted; and ſo, according to their Word, they indeed paſſed, not ſo much as once wiſhing for that they durſt not once touch. Which their ſo quiet Paſſage, cauſed the Biſhop to furniſh them with Boats, whereby to paſs over the River which divideth Hungary from Auſtria. Which once known unto the Peaſants of Auſtria, they aſſembled themſelves together, to the number of 1500 men, and caſt up a Fort upon the Bank of the River, with three Faulconets in it, reſolutely ſet down to keep them from coming over into their Country. Which their ſo forward a Reſolution for a while ſtaid theſe men of War; who, to avoid farther trouble, courteouſly requeſted Paſſage of theſe men, promiſing all their good Behaviour in paſſing quietly through their Country; which the Carles in moſt churliſh manner refuſed to grant, with proud Threats of the danger of their Lives, if they ſhould by force attempt the Paſſage, and not with quietneſs return. With which Bravadoes of the Country Churles theſe Troops of martial men provoked, reſolved by force to remove theſe lets, and by the Sword to open themſelves a way; ſo turning the Head of their Baggages toward the Fort, as if they would have there paſſed; while the Peaſants ſtood gazing upon them, Camgaillard with his Troop of Horſemen, unperceived of them took the River a little higher up, and by ſwimming gained the farther Bank; after whom Captain Clinchamp with his Troops immediately followed alſo. In which Paſſage, they were much troubled with great flakes of Ice, with the great deepneſs of the River, with the ſteepneſs of the Banks where they were to land, and many other Difficulties: all which they regarded not, to be revenged of their Enemies. Theſe valiant men being got over, upon the ſudden ſurpriſing theſe rude Country Churles, and furiouſly charging of them, quickly overthrew them, and cut them in pieces; of whom, 300 were left dead upon the Place, as many more hurt, and the reſt put to flight. Which was no ſooner done, but that the reſt of the Troops of the Regiment without let paſſed the River, and ſo joyned themſelves unto their victorious Companions. Seven Weeks this Regiment ſtayed in Auſtria; and ſo longer had, but that upon the Complaint and Requeſt of the Nobility and of the People of the Country, they having for ſeventeen Months Pay due unto them received nine Months Pay, were licenſed to depart. Which was a great Overſight in them that had to do therewith, at once to disband ſo many good Men, as had not their like amongſt all the reſt of the Emperour's Garriſons; and who, being ſtaid with a little money, might with their good Service have ſtood the Emperour in great ſtead; as by proof afterward appeared; when as the Emperour, by neceſſity forced to call them together again, could not of all that ſtrong Regiment raiſe but three Companies; the reſt being ſome of them returned into their own Countries, other ſome of them gone to ſerve in other places, or elſe otherwiſe diſperſed. Of which three Companies, the firſt was given to Camgaillard, the ſecond to Baltazar Marades, a Spaniard, and the laſt to John Paul, an Italian: Which three Captains had before commanded in the Reingraves Regiment, and done the Emperour good Service as they did afterward alſo.

Divers happy Conflicts of the Chriſtians with the Turks and Tartars.

The reſt of this year ended in Hungary, with divers other Encounters and Combats, Fortune therein ſtill favouring the Chriſtians. As three hundred Haiducks, going forth to ſeek for Booty, by good hap chanced to meet with a Company of the Turks, being very rich, and divers of them men of good account; amongſt whom, the Governour of Mohatz was one; all whom theſe Haiducks cut in pieces: to be borne withal, for ſhewing no favour unto them, who moſt cruelly had before ſpoiled them of their Parents, Lands, and Goods. Beſides that, they took the Governour of Copan, with his Son, and twenty four other very rich Turks, with 170 Horſes of Service, and eight fat Oxen prepared for their Proviſion. Which fat Booties drew forth other Souldiers alſo to ſeek out for the like; of whom, certain Troops of the Chriſtians going forth toward Batſwar, a Town of the Enemies, met the Governour of the Town and of the Territory thereabout, come out with his Garriſon againſt them; where betwixt them was made a right hot and ſharp fight; wherein, at the firſt encounter the Turks ſeemed to have the better, but in the end the Chriſtians taking Courage, overthrew them, and cut them in pieces. In this conflict divers Priſoners were taken, with three Enſigns, and many other rich Spoils. This happy Exploit was ſeconded with News agreeable thereunto out of Moldavia, whereof the Vayvod by a Curror ſent of purpoſe, gave our men to underſtand of the great and general overthrow of the Tartars; who, having with all manner of Cruelty waſted the Country, had in the end made the Inhabitants ſo deſperate, that repoſing more Comfort in a ſpeedy death (the end of all Miſeries) than in a lingring Life, turmoiled with ſo many intolerable Calamities, they generally arming themſelves, joyned themſelves with their Vayvod, ſo to try their laſt Fortune. With which Reſolution, they in Battel encountering with the Tartars, gave them a great overthrow, a number of them being left dead upon the Field, and the reſt put to flight, and chaſed out of the Country, the Moldavians notably revenging their former Loſſes, and in their own Territories burying their Enemies.

Beged Baſſa thinking to have ſurpriſed the Lord Baſta, is himſelf by him ſurpriſed and overthrown.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the year on their parts idle, but ſtill plotting of their great and notable Deſigns, even through the midſt of the Froſt and Snow to have been performed. The Baſſa Beged, hearing that the Lord Baſta lay with his Troops diſperſed in the Country about Lippa, in great ſecurity, by reaſon of the Extremity of the time, altogether unfit for men to keep the field; and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, now amidſt the Froſt and the Snow to ſurpriſe him; acquainted three other of the Turks Captains and Commanders thereabout with the matter; who liking well thereof, with five thouſand men altogether ſet forward, in hope to have upon the ſudden ſurpriſed him. But he, an old expert Captain, and not ſo careleſs as they ſuppoſed, had his ſecret Spies ſtill abroad among them; by whom, he, advertiſed both of their purpoſe and of their coming, reſolved in both to prevent them; and to that end having called together his Forces, ſet forward to meet them in the mid way, and ſo before they were aware to intercept them; neither failed he of his purpoſe; for, meeting with the Turks, fearing no ſuch matter in place of diſadvantage, and upon the ſudden charging them round, they, deceived of their Expectation for the eaſineſs of the Victory promiſed them, as men diſmayed, after ſome ſmall reſiſtance fled; above eleven hundred of them being in this conflict ſlain, and the reſt put in rout, and driven into the River Maruze, there periſhing; ſome few only by ſpeedy flight with the Baſſa eſcaping. Twenty of the Turks Captains were here taken, with ſome few other Priſoners, and a great and rich Booty.

Much about the ſame time George Barbel, one of the chief of the Rebels in Tranſilvania, acknowledging his fault, came to Claudianople, to take the Oath for his Allegiance unto the Emperour; by whoſe Example a great number of others moved, came in and ſubmitted themſelves alſo; and happily he, being a good and valiant Captain, had done much more for the Service of the Emperour, had he not been by death prevented; for ſhortly after he ſuddenly died. The other Rebels, moved neither by his Example, nor by the coming in of ſome others of their Companions, made choice of one Bethlin Habor (a moſt renowned Captain, and of great Reputation amongſt the Souldiers) for their Chieftain; who, proud of ſuch a choice, immediately after ſent an Herauld unto Baſta, to will him forthwith to deliver unto him all the Country of Tranſilvania, as to him that was of late choſen Prince thereof, or elſe to denounce unto him moſt cruel War; and to tell him further, That if he refuſed ſo to do, he was in good hope by his own Forces, without any Aid from the Turk, to drive him out, being well aſſured of the faithful devoir of the Tranſilvanians. At whoſe proud Threats Baſta ſmiling, only ſhewed him his open Hand in ſign that he accepted of his proud Threats, not vouchſafing him any other anſwer at all. This glorious Boaſter bare himſelf the higher, for that he had married the Widdow of Moiſes the chief Rebel, whereby he had gained both great Riches, and much Credit and Reputation among the common People; both which he enjoyed but a while, for the fourth day after he was married, he died, and ſo was buried. Baſta nevertheleſs, for the better aſſuring of the ſtrong Places of Tranſilvania, put into them Garriſons of his moſt faithful Germans, and diſpatched Crauſenich away toward the Emperour, to requeſt of him a ſupply of a thouſand Horſe-men, and four thouſand Foot, without which he thought it impoſſible to preſerve and keep the Province, troubled with ſo great Factions, and ſo earneſtly ſought after by the Turks; and further to certifie him, That the little Forces he had left, was not ſufficient for the keeping of the Places beſet with ſo many Enemies, and all lying as it were in their Mouths; That the Province ſwarmed with ſeditious People, one thruſting another forward in Miſchief and Rebellion, as the Ears of Wheat, driven with the Wind, do one another in the Field; that the Turks were always making of new Incurſions, which he was not able to repreſs without greater Forces, which he expected from his Majeſty with all ſpeed poſſible; proteſting, for want of ſuch ſupply to be in time ſent unto him, to lay the loſs of the Province upon the Negligence of them which might and ought to have ſent the ſame; acquitting himſelf for the loſs thereof, ſeeing that he durſt not to repoſe any Truſt or Confidence in the Faith of the Citizens and Inhabitants of the Towns, although they were diſarmed, for having ſo often falſified their Faith, and put their Province in danger of utter Ruine and Deſtruction. But leaving theſe Troubles of Tranſilvania and Hungary, let us a little ſtep back to ſee what hapned among the Turks themſelves, after the departure of the great Baſſa with his Army out of Hungary.

Bethlin Habor choſen chief of the Rebels in Tranſilvania.

Baſta's ſcornful Anſwer to the Meſſenger of Bethlin.

Baſta ſendeth for new Supplies unto the Emperour for the keeping of Tranſilvania.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great Promiſes made unto his Rebels, ſought to appeaſe the Rebellion in Aſia, and by that means drawn Zellaly, one of the chief Rebels, with twelve thouſand good Souldiers, out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo into his Wars in Hungary, upon an aſſured promiſe made unto him of the Government of Boſna; the hope whereof, as it had drawn him

1603 him into theſe late Wars, ſo had it alſo encouraged him with his gallant Troops of moſt brave Horſe-men to do the beſt Service he could, ſo to ſhew himſelf worthy of ſo honourable a Preferment: which he right notably performed during all the time of the Baſſaes Abode in Hungary, to his own great Commendation, and the furthering of his Lord and Maſter's Service. But the Baſſa with his weak Army retired out of Hungary, and the Baſſa himſelf returned toward Conſtantinople; Zellaly, with three thouſand Horſe, withdrew himſelf into his promiſed Government of Boſna, to poſſeſs himſelf thereof: and being come near to Bagvalue, the chief Town of that Province, he there encamped in a fair large Meadow, within ſight of the City. Now Zeffer Baſſa, then Governour of the Province, and not as yet thereof diſcharged, ſeeing this Rebel thus to incroach upon his Charge, as if he would even by force intrude himſelf thereinto; with all ſpeed called together his Garriſons and men of War (ever ready at his beck) and ſo went forth againſt Zellaly, with a purpoſe to have quickly, and without any great Trouble, cut him, with his ſo ſmall a Company, all in pieces. But the old Rebel, not ignorant either of his own weakneſs, or of the Baſſa's ſtrength, having himſelf loſt the beſt part of his Forces before in Hungary, as he was a man of no leſs Wiſdom than Courage, reſolved now to attempt by Policy that which he well knew he could not by force effect. Wherefore he, as a great Prince, upon ſome brave Reſolution, began to incamp himſelf, as if he had meant there to have lain, when as immediately after, upon a fair Night, having cauſed divers great Fires to be made in his Tents, as if it had been to beguile the Enemy with, he ſuddenly roſe and departed. Of whoſe Flight (for ſo it was like) the Baſſa underſtanding, and that he had forſaken his Camp, haſted thither with all ſpeed with his Souldiers to take and pillage the ſame; not making any other account of him that was ſo fled and gone, but as of a baſe and faint-hearted Coward, who for Fear, and want of Courage, had left both his Camp and Honour as a Prey unto his Enemies; the Spoil whereof, the Baſſa (being poſſeſſed of the Camp) gave unto his Souldiers; who, glad of ſuch a Morſel, greedily ſwallowed it up, which by and by after became their bane and utter deſtruction: for, whilſt that they were charging themſelves with Booties, and every man was thinking of his Prey, nothing careful of their common Safety, Zellaly, with his three thouſand Horſe, all valiant and reſolute men, ſuddenly the ſame Night returning, ſurpriſed the Turks being faſt on ſleep, as buried in Security, and cut them in pieces. Some, of greater Courage than the reſt, began to make head, and to give ſome ſhew of their Valour; but, overcome with the general Fear, out of order, and not reſolved what to do, they were quickly with the reſt forced, overthrown, and ſlain. In this ſurpriſe there were of the Baſſa's men ſix thouſand found dead upon the Place; a very great ſlaughter to be made by ſo few men. But what cannot valiant Reſolution do againſt careleſneſs, lulled aſleep in the lap of Security? The Baſſa himſelf eſcaped by Flight, with ſuch as could get out of the Camp to follow him.

Zellaly cometh into Boſna.

By Policy overthroweth Zeffer Baſſa the Governour, and poſſeſſeth it himſelf.

Now Zellaly, well knowing how to uſe his Victory, marched in haſte to all the chief places of the Province, and with his Forces, more feared for their Victory than their Number, cauſed all the Inhabitants of thoſe Places, with moſt part of the reſt of the People of the Country, to ſwear unto him their Obedience and Fidelity. In which doing, he gathered together great ſtore of Wealth, with a great number of brave Horſes for Service; all which he put into Balnaluc, a ſtrong Town, whereinto he in triumphant manner entred, with a Crown of Lawrel upon his Head, and his Souldiers ſinging his Praiſes amidſt the ſmoak of a thouſand Pieces of great Ordnance, which he cauſed inceſſantly to be ſhot off for the ſpace of two days together; giving it out withal (amongſt all the joyful Feaſts and Triumphs, made for the magnifying and ſetting forth of his Praiſe and Glory) That his Reſolution was, to take part with the Chriſtian Emperour, if the great Baſſaes, or other his Enemies in great place in Court, ſhould ſeek to croſs his Deſires, or to formalize his Actions or Proceedings in this manner of the obtaining of his Government.

Now Mahomet, doubting what this Man, ſo well acquainted with Rebellion, would do, had by divers Meſſengers ſent for him to Conſtantinople, after the breaking up of the Army in Hungary, there of his Imperial and Infinite Bounty, to receive the honourable Rewards of his good Service and Valour, the greatneſs whereof he had (as he ſaid) already underſtood by Haſſan Baſſa the General; which ſo bound him to the Reward thereof, as that his Deſire and Pleaſure was, to grace him in Court with his own hands, for the greater Teſtimony of the Love he bare him, and of the eſteem he had of him. But the crafty and miſtruſtful Rebel, doubting that theſe fair Words were all but baits to draw him into his Power, to the endangering or aſſured loſs both of his Life and Liberty, ſhut his Ears againſt theſe ſo ſweet Charms, and, as a Man well adviſed, and one which knew that the hand of a Prince juſtly offended, is always open for to puniſh his rebellious Subjects, being once in his Power, with as great Juſtice in puniſhing him, as he with Wrong and Diſloyalty offended him, would in no wiſe accept of the offer; but civilly anſwered, That he moſt humbly thanked the Great Sultan for his ſo great and honourable Offers, and that he was ſo mindful of him; but that he for his part deſired not any greater reward for the Services by him done, more than the Government which his Majeſty had before promiſed him, whereof (according to which Promiſe, which he could not think but to be agreeable to his good liking) he was now poſſeſſed, with a reſolution to hold and keep the ſame for his Majeſties Service. Which was as much in effect, as for a diſloyal Subject to talk with his angry Sovereign with his hand upon his Sword: but with this ſly Anſwer, ſuch as it was, Sultan Mahomet, for all his Greatneſs, muſt as yet content himſelf, for fear leſt if he ſhould have ſought to have by force removed him, he might ſo have raiſed a more dangerous Rebellion in Europe, than was already in Aſia. Zellaly, ſo politick and reſolute a man, and not to ſeek what to do in ſuch matters, being poſſeſſed of ſo great a Government, and the Chriſtian Emperour at hand ready to have backed him, if he ſhould upon any Diſcontentment have revolted.

Sultan Mahomet ſendeth for Zellaly to come unto him to Conſtantinople.

Zellaly refuſeth to come to Conſtantinople at the great Sultan's ſending for.

1604 The Troubles of this Year 1603 thus overpaſt, the beginning of the next was like unto a fair blooming Tree, which promiſing great ſtore of Fruit, but afterward blaſted with the Extremity of the Weather, proveth in effect as barren, as it before ſeemed in hope fruitful: for, beginning with the ſweet Weſtern Winds of Peace, it ended with the ſtern Northern Blaſts of War. The Turks had oftentimes the laſt Year made motion of Peace, but eſpecially toward the end thereof; outwardly making ſhew of a great deſire and forwardneſs in themſelves thereunto. Which buſineſs the laſt Year begun, was even with the beginning of this Year alſo effectually continued, that Commiſſioners were on both ſides appointed to conferr and conclude upon the ſame. Among theſe Commiſſioners, Collonel Althem was one; who, to perform his Charge, ha-

Commiſſioners appointed to confer upon a Peace to be made betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

having taken with him the other Commiſſioners deputed with him for this purpoſe, with certain other Captains, embarqued himſelf with them in thirteen Ships from Strigonium, and from thence ſailing down the River, landed with his Train in the Iſland betwixt Buda and Peſth. Of whoſe Arrival there, the Turks of Buda advertiſed, and on their part ready, came forthwith thither alſo, with all the outward ſhews that might be of their moſt earneſt deſire for the concluding of Peace; whereas our Men, who by a thouſand effects were aſſured of the unfaithfulneſs of the Turks, and that Neceſſity, and not the deſire of any Quietneſs, had drawn them to ſeek for Peace, to the contrary ſhewed themſelves very backward in this Buſineſs.

The Cauſes which moved the Turks to encline to Peace.

For why, they knew right well, that the Turks had not taken this matter in hand, but to overtake them, and by this time of Peace to gain a time of War more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruel Deſigns. They had the year before made ſufficient Proof of our Forces, accompanied with good Fortune, which cauſed them to deſpair by ſtrong hand to vanquiſh and overcome us; beſides that, they ſtill every hour in one place or other received a thouſand Loſſes and Croſſes from our Garriſons, who diſtreſſed and annoyed them both with their Forces, and with driving of them unto the extremity of Wants. Our men knew moreover alſo, that the Troubles of Aſia, as well from the Rebels as from the Perſian, which lay ſo heavy upon the Great Sultan, drew them to this neceſſity, to ſeek for a breathing time of Peace, wherein to repair that which was in their Forces and Strength by Wars impaired. And even yet alſo, the manner of the Turks demeaning of themſelves in this Action, their Delays, their Excuſes, and deferring from day to day to conclude upon ſome Point of this Treaty, gave our men good cauſe to ſuſpect them of evil meaning, as men reſpecting their Profit more than their Faith; and more ſubtil and cruel in all their Actions, than honourable and valorous.

The Baſſa of Buda faileth to meet the Chriſtian Commiſſioners according to his Promiſe.

The Fifth of January was the day by our men expected for the Treaty; for as then the Baſſa of Buda had appointed with the reſt of the Commiſſioners to come into the Iſle, to hear what our Commiſſioners ſhould demand, and to intreat of the Peace. But he was too true an Infidel to fail of his Infidelity, and ſo came not at all, but deceived our Men both of their Hope and Expectation. At length, inſtead of himſelf, Letters were brought from him to Collonel Althem, whereby he excuſed himſelf for not coming, requeſting him, with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, to come over the River to Buda, the more commodiouſly for them to conferr together, and ſo the better to conclude their Negotiation. Now though Almain, for the Majeſty of his Prince, and the Honour of the State, ought not at the Requeſt of theſe his Enemies to have put himſelf into their Power, but to have ſtood faſt upon the Terms of Honour, yet to the end that the Country of Hungary, ſo miſerably ſpoiled with Wars, ſhould not take occaſion to complain of his negligence in this Negotiation of Peace, he reſolved to go to Buda, as the Baſſa had requeſted; deeming every Action tending to the hinderance of the common Good, to be but in ſhew honourable, and in deed hurtful.

An evil Preſage of the future Peace.

Upon which Reſolution, he ſent before the Gentleman of his Stable, and his Cook, with a Gentleman of the Turks, ſent but the day before from the Baſſa: which men going aboard together, were aſſailed with ſuch a cruel Tempeſt upon the River, that neither the Skill of the Water-men, nor Goodneſs of the Veſſel, was able to reſiſt the force thereof; ſo that the Boat was ſunk, and the men drowned: an evil Preſage of the Peace to be made, the raging Water as it were foreſhewing the Troubles to come. But this Tempeſt, by the ſacrifice of thoſe poor drowned men, appeaſed, Althem and Geisberg, two of the chief Commiſſioners, embarqued themſelves, and ſo paſſed over the River to Buda.

The Chriſtian Commiſſioners courteouſly entertained at Buda.

At whoſe Arrival, the Turks gave in ſhew a thouſand Teſtimonies of their Joy for their coming. Neither did the Germans refuſe their kind offered Courteſies, but largely fed of the good cheer, and filled themſelves with the good Wines, whereof the Turks had given them Plenty; and they again uſing them as kindly as if they had been their Brethren, and converſing with them as with their own Countrymen. Amidſt this carouſing and Platters full of good cheer, the Propoſition of Peace, which the Turks meant to demand, were ſerved in alſo, and a Truce for twelve days demanded to conſider of the matter; during which time, it ſhould be lawful for every man, without let, freely to come and go whither they would; which was forthwith on both ſides agreed upon.

A Truce for twelve days agreed upon betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

And for better Teſtimony of the Turks true meaning in this their Negotiation of Peace, the Baſſa, in the preſence of our Commiſſioners, diſpatched a Courrier toward the great Sultan, to advertiſe him of this buſineſs, and of the proceeding therein, according to the Commandment by him before given. Which he did, to cauſe our men to believe, that the great Sultan himſelf was deſirous of Peace, and that his Captains, well affected thereunto, were willing to further the ſame.

Preſents by the Turks given to the Chriſtian Commiſſioners.

Which done, the Baſſa preſented unto Collonel Althem two Caſes full of Turks Arms, of all manner of Faſhions, very rich, and cunningly wrought; both carried by a Mule, with Furniture for an Horſe, embroidered with Gold and Pearl, very ſumptuous and rich, as a Preſent from the great Sultan, his Lord and Maſter, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Matthias, he preſented unto the Collonel, a Robe of purple Velvet, with Sleeves cunningly embroidered with Gold and Pearl, emboſſed with fine and curious Figures cunningly wrought with the Needle; for the rareneſs thereof as admirable to behold, as for the richneſs thereof to have been deſired: which was by every man wondered at, when as ſhortly after it was by Althem preſented unto the Arch-duke, together with other Preſents from the Turks. Beſides that, the ſame Baſſa, in token of Friendſhip, preſented unto Althem himſelf another very fair and rich Robe; all the reſt of the Commiſſioners receiving alſo from the Baſſa other Robes of leſs Value, but yet all very rich and ſumptuous.

This buſineſs for this time thus ended, and the Truce for twelve days concluded, the Chriſtian Commiſſioners, loaded with Preſents, took their leave of the Turks, with the ſhews of their good Wills, and ſo returned back again to Peſth. Howbeit, theſe the Enemies fair Preſents ſtill ſavoured but of Enmity, being indeed but like to the Preſents of Hector and Ajax, tending rather to War than to Peace.

The true and juſt Commendation of the Lord Nadaſti.

Now the Death of the moſt valiant and renowned Lord Nadaſti, which at this time happened, was another evil Preſage of the bad Succeſs of this Treaty of Peace now at hand; who, having of long been a bar unto the Turks Rage in that part of Hungary where he dwelt, they now after his Death, with the violence of their Forces, as with an heady ſtream, bare down before them all our good Fortune in that Province. This worthy man, of great Fame and Deſert, had ſpent both his Years and Fortune in the moſt honourable Wars againſt the Turks; wherein he was ſo ſkilful and expert, that he was of them feared as another Huniades, and of the Chriſtians honoured as another Matthias. He had a thouſand times moſt valiantly fought againſt theſe Miſcreants, and as many times foiled them, to the great benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweal, the advancement of the Emperour's Service, and the relief of his diſtreſſed Country. Theſe his heroical deeds of Arms were engraven upon the Gates of the Towns and Cities of Hungary, and within the Rocks of Tranſilvania, having both in the one Country and the other right happily defeated theſe Infidels. He had the Honour to have received the firſt Incurſions and Attempts of the Turks, at ſuch time as Amurath the Third, having perfidiouſly broken the League made with Maximilian the Emperour, with his Forces invaded Hungary; and was the firſt of all the Chriſtian Chieftains that made head againſt them; and being by their ſudden coming in by them almoſt ſurpriſed, performed yet great and worthy Exploits and Service againſt theſe faithleſs men. It ſhould ſeem that good Fortune favoured the Country of Hungary, but only in reſpect of him; for he being dead, it died alſo, burying it ſelf as it were in his Grave, and him in Glory; not ſuffering him to grow old, and ſo to languiſh in the Ruines of his native Country. He died of a natural Death, about fifty and four Years old, moſt part whereof he lived in Arms, ſtill charged with the burthen of his Armour, and even at the yielding up of the Ghoſt yet breathing Wars againſt theſe the Enemies of the Chriſtian Faith. His Death was much lamented of many faithful Chriſtians, but eſpecially of his own Tenants and Subjects, whom he had always kept and preſerved in Safety, and ſtill maintained them in all Peace and Tranquility during all theſe former Wars, the Turks not daring once to aſſail them, nor to enter into their Territory, being ſtaid from ſo doing by the Bulwark of his Valour, right dreadful to their Attempts. Never Turk was buried in his Territory, no more than were the Barbarians upon the Banks of the River Eurotas, his Wiſdom had ſo wiſely provided for the Preſervation of his People; and his Valour ſo worthily aſſured them of their Health and Safety. He was for his Country another Epaminondas, who made his Town not only free from the Arms and Invaſions of their Enemies, but alſo dreadful to their Forces ſo long as he lived. The Turks on the contrary part no leſs rejoyced for his Death; but accounting his Country now rich and plentiful (for that it had never been by them ſpoiled) for their moſt aſſured Prey came now thither on all ſides, to have taken the Spoil thereof, and therewith to have enriched themſelves. But as they were about ſo to have done, the valiant Collonitz, honouring the Remembrance of the Lord Nadaſti, his late Fellow and Companion in Arms, and holding that for his own which he had left, oppoſed himſelf with his Forces againſt theſe ravening Wolves: ſo that they were no ſooner entered into this his Territory, but that, contrary to their Expectation, they were encountered by this new Nadaſti, and by him ſo overthrown and cut in pieces, that for a good while after they durſt no more attempt the like.

The Death of the Lord Nadaſti.

This ſo great a loſs of ſo worthy a man, was a little eaſed, by the Victory about the ſame time gained by the Vayvod of Valachia againſt the Turks, ſpoiling of his Country. This valiant Champion not able longer to endure the proud Inſolency and Tyranny of thoſe barbarous People, gathered together his Troops of Horſe-men, with ſuch other ſmall Forces as he had; whereof, the Turks having made ſmall reckoning, and therefore without order pillaging and ranſacking his Country, were, when they leaſt feared, by him upon the ſudden ſurpriſed and overthrown, many of them being cut in pieces, a number more taken Priſoners, with all the Spoils they had got, and the reſt with ſuch fear chaſed out of his Country, as that being glad to have eſcaped, they took no pleaſure for a great while after to look into that his Province again.

The Turks overthrown by the Vayvod of Valachia.

But to return again to the Commiſſioners for the Peace to be made betwixt the Great Sultan and the Emperour; The Baſſa of Buda, to the end that the Captains and Governours of the Turks, and Caſtles belonging to the Turks, being ignorant of the Truce, ſhould not continue their warlike Actions, to the prejudice of his Faith given; immediately after the departure of the Chriſtian Commiſſioners from Buda, diſpatched divers Courriers towards them, to give them knowledge thereof, and eſpecially the Governour of Agria, commanding them from thenceforth to abſtain from their ordinary Incurſions into their Enemies Territories, and from all other Actions of Hoſtility, and ſo to keep themſelves quiet until they were from him otherwiſe commanded. This little time of reſpite and breathing from War, gave great Contentment unto the poor Country People, now with Wars almoſt exhauſted and ſpent. And now our Souldiers, during this time of Truce, laying their Arms aſide, ran by heaps with Spades and Shovels unto the places where our Armies had ſometime lain incamped, there to delve and ſearch to find ſuch things as the Armies riſing in haſte had haply left there buried. In which Action they ſo buſied themſelves as if they had been Labourers in Harveſt, ſo that nothing was in the Fields to be ſeen, but Men digging and removing of Stones and Earth. A right fooliſh Buſineſs, and yet ſo exceedingly pleaſing the greedy Minds of theſe covetous men, as that amidſt their ſuch moiling labour they accounted themſelves at great eaſe. The Turks alſo did the like, mingled together with our Men, and our Men with them, without any injury doing one to another, either by word or Deed. And no doubt it is, but that there they found more Travel than Wealth, the greedy deſire which drew them into this Work deceiving them in effect. And in this mad Labour both the Parties ſpent many days without any let or injury doing either on the one ſide or the other. The Chriſtians of Peſth alſo paſſing over the Danuby, went into the victualling Houſes of the Turks at Buda, whereinto they were ſuffered to enter, and at liberty to walk up and down the Town at their Pleaſure. And ſo the Turks of Buda likewiſe came over the River unto Peſth, and there walked at their pleaſure, no man letting of them. Which manner of living was very commodious and pleaſing both for the one ſide and the other, the Chriſtians buying of the Turks ſuch things as they needed, and the Turks of them likewiſe. Through which quiet and peaceable Intercourſe and Traffick, the People in general ſeemed even in that ſhort time to have forgotten a great part of their forepaſſed Miſeries, this little time of Peace, joyned with ſecurity, having well aſſwaged the ſame. But while theſe mutual and unwonted Courteſies thus paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, and the minds of moſt men were filled with the expectation of an aſſured Peace to have been forthwith concluded, the Great Sultan Mahomet, in the midſt of all his Pleaſures and Delights, died in his Imperial Palace at Conſtantinople: the News whereof, being in the Evening brought to Buda by a Courrier of purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople, the Baſſa forthwith ſent the Captain of the Sentinels of Buda, to Collonel Geisberg at Peſth, to aſſure him of the Death of the Great Sultan Mahomet, and of the Succeſſion of his young Son Achmat into his Empire, now already both at Conſtantinople and other Places thereabout proclaimed Emperour. By which Meſſenger he alſo wrote unto Collonel Althem, to certifie him both of the Death of the Great Sultan, and of the Succeſſion of his Son, as alſo that he was by him commanded to continue the Negotiation of the Peace, and ſo if he could to conclude the ſame. For the more evidence whereof, behold the Copy of the Letters themſelves.

The Letters of the Baſſa of Buda to Collonel Althem.

OUR due Commendations remembred, noble Lord Governour, our dear Friend and right honourable Neighbour. We have thought good to advertiſe you, that the fourth day after your departure from this City, we received Letters from Conſtantinople, giving us certainly to underſtand of the Death of our Moſt Mighty Emperour Mahomet, and of the Succeſſion of his Son Sultan Achmat, into all his Dominions and Empires: whereby we were, as his moſt humble Subjects, ſummoned to yield unto him our Oath of faithful Obedience, as unto our rightful Lord, and lawful Succeſſor of his Father into all his Eſtates and Dominions. Moreover, he particularly commandeth us, to give him certain Advice and Knowledge concerning the Negotiation of the Peace begun betwixt Us and You, by the Commandment of his deceaſed Father; promiſing to confirm and ratifie all whatſoever he ſhall find done and agreed upon concerning that Buſineſs, without any Qualification at all. And that if the Treaty be not yet concluded and ended, that his Will and Deſire was, that it ſhould be ſo, according to the juſt Means and Aſſurances that we ſhould faithfully and carefully together deviſe. Whereof I ſhould readily give him Advice and Anſwer; which I have deferred to do, until I have received your Anſwer, which may inſtruct me what to reſolve upon. Which your Anſwer I attending, have ſtayed the Courrier of Conſtantinople, to the intent he may carry backward unto our Emperour, what he is to hope for concerning this Buſineſs, by the Anſwer that you ſhall give us. Theſe are now therefore to adviſe you, as our dear Friend, and a moſt valiant Governour, to ſet down that which you ſhall think to be moſt fit and neceſſary in this Buſineſs; giving you withal to underſtand, that our new Emperour is a man of Reſolution, even in theſe his young Years, wherein he now flouriſheth, hating Idleneſs, deeming no loſs greater, and altogether irreparable, than the loſs of time. If then you be ſtill deſirous, that the Peace betwixt our Emperours ſhould be made and confirmed, I hope you will employ your whole endeavour with ſpeed to determine this moſt happy Negotiation, and ſo neceſſary for every mans good; as alſo to avert far from our own Heads the Curſes of the common People, for whom it is moſt needful that the Peace ſhould for their good and quietneſs be concluded, ſeeing that the Fruit thereof is expected to be unto them happy, and the Glory thereof for ever ours, for having by our diligence and true endeavour concluded the ſame. Which maketh me to hope, that when you ſhall find your ſelf ready to conclude this Treaty, you will not bring with you Men Enemies unto Peace, or ſuch as ſhall diſſuade the ſame; but rather, wiſe and grave men, which to the uttermoſt of their Power may advance the ſame, and find out good and reaſonable means to aſſure an eternal and faithful Peace betwixt our Emperours, unto which ſo general a good every one of us is in duty bound to imploy the uttermoſt of his Sufficiency and Power. And this is that I have of Truth to write unto you at this time: and ſo I bid you farewel.

Now theſe Letters, although they moſt concerned the Continuation of the Treaty of Peace already begun, and were too friendly from an Enemy to have in them any good meaning, yet did they well aſſure the Collonel, to whom they were written, of the Death of the great and late Sultan Mahomet, and of the Succeſſion of his Son Achmat into his Empire, to which end they are here ſet down.

This late mighty Monarch, and now nothing but a loathſome lump of dead Fleſh, the great Sultan Mahomet, departed this Life about the latter end of January, in the Year of Grace 1604, (according to their Computation which begin the year at Chriſtmas) when he had lived about 44 years, and thereof reigned eight. He was a man of no great Spirit, and yet exceeding proud; which was the cauſe that he was both the leſs beloved and feared of his Subjects in general, but eſpecially of the Janizaries, and other his Souldiers and men of War, who, ſcorning his looſe Government, and griev'd to ſee even the greateſt Affairs of his State not only imparted to Women, but by them managed and over-ruled alſo (as by his Mother, the Sultaneſs his Wife, and others) not only rebelled againſt him, but were oftentimes in their Rages about to have depoſed him. He was altogether given to ſenſuality and voluptuous pleaſure, the marks whereof he ſtill carried about with him, a foul, ſwoln, unwealdy, and overgrown Body, unfit for any Princely Office or Function; and a Mind thereto anſwerable, wholly given over unto Idleneſs, Pleaſure, and Exceſs, no ſmall means for the ſhortning of his days, which he ended with Obloquy, unregarded of his Subjects, and but of few or none of them lamented.

Mahomet, why he was not regarded of his men of War.

He had Iſſue four Sons, and three Daughters married unto three of the great Baſſaes.

Mahomet's Iſſue.

His firſt and eldeſt Son was called Mahomet (after his own Name) whom he cauſed to be ſtrangled in his own ſight, upon ſuſpicion of aſpiring to the Empire, and conſpiring with the Rebels in Aſia: but afterward finding him guiltleſs, cauſed his Body to be buried in his own Sepulchre, and hanged the Baſſa that had miſinformed him.

His ſecond Son died a natural Death, being yet very young.

His third Son was Sultan Achmat, who ſucceeded his Father, and came to the Empire by the untimely Death of Mahomet his eldeſt Brother.

His fourth Son, being then a Youth of about ſixteen Years old, was carefully kept within the Seraglio, with ſuch a ſtrait Guard ſet over him, as that his Name was not to be learned, even by a good underſtanding Friend of mine, of late lying above three Months together at Conſtantinople, who moſt curiouſly enquired after the ſame, having very good means to have learned it. He was reported to have been long ſince murthered, howbeit that he of late lived, but looking every day to be by his Brothers cruel Commandment ſtrangled, which is accounted but a matter of courſe, and a Death hereditary to all the younger male Children of the Othoman Emperours; the Policy for the maintenance of their great Empire entire and whole, ſo requiring.

His dead Body lieth buried at Conſtantinople, in a fair Chappel of white Marble (near unto the moſt famous and beautiful Church of S. Sophia) for that only purpoſe by himſelf moſt ſumptuouſly built, about fifty foot ſquare, with four high ſmall round Towers, about the which are certain ſmall round Galleries of Stone; from which the Turkiſh Prieſts and Church-men, at certain hours, uſe to call the People every day to Church; for they uſe no Bells themſelves, neither will they ſuffer the Chriſtians to uſe any. But the top of this Chappel is built round, like unto the ancient Temples of the Heathen Gods in Rome. In the midſt of this Chappel (being indeed nothing elſe but this great Sultan's Sepulchre) ſtandeth his Tomb, which is nothing elſe but a great Urn or Coffin of fair white Marble, wherein lieth his Body, covered with a great covering of the ſame Stone over it, made Mahomet, how he lieth buried at Conſtantinople.

1604 riſing in the midſt, and ſtooping on each ſide; not much unlike to the Coffins of the ancient Tombs of the Saxon Kings, which are to be ſeen on the North ſide of the Quire of S. Paul's Church and in other Places of this Land; but that this Coffin of the Great Sultan is much greater, and more ſtately than are thoſe of the Saxon Kings; it being above five foot high at the end thereof, and by little and little falling toward the feet, covered with a rich Hearſe of Cloth of Gold down to the ground; his Turbant ſtanding at his Head, and two exceeding great Candles of white Wax, about three or four Yards long, ſtanding in great braſs or ſilver Candleſticks gilded, the one at his Head, the other at his Feet, which never burn, but there ſtand for ſhew only: all the Floor of the Chappel being covered with Mats, and fair Turky Carpets upon them. And round about this his Tomb, even in the ſame Chappel, are the like Tombs for his Wives and Children, but nothing ſo great and fair. Into this Chappel, or any other the Turks Churches or Chappels, it is not lawful for either Turk or Christian to enter, but firſt he muſt put off his Shoes, leaving them at the Church or Chappel Gate, or carrying them in his hand. Near unto this Chappel, and the great Temple of Sophia, are divers other Chappels of the other great Turks; as of Sultan Selim, this Man's Grand father, with his ſeven and thirty Children about him; of Sultan Amurath, this Man's Father, with his five and forty Children entombed about him. And in other places, not far from them, are the Chappels and Sepulchres of the reſt of the Great Sultans; as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Bajazet, Sultan Selim the firſt, Sultan Solyman; all by theſe great Mahometan Emperours built, whoſe Names they bear. And being all of almoſt one form and faſhion, have every one of them a fair Hoſpital adjoyning unto them, wherein a great multitude of poor People are daily ſtill relieved. 1604

Some others of the great Baſſaes have their Chappels and Sepulchres, with their great and ſtately Alms-houſes alſo, not much inferiour unto thoſe of the great Sultans; as namely, Ibrahim Baſſa, of all the Baſſaes that ever were amongſt the Turks the moſt magnificent, hath his ſtately Chappel, Sepulchre, and Alms-Houſes, near, both in Place and Beauty unto that of Solyman's. The Turks bury not at all within their Churches, neither are any at all buried within the Walls of the City, but the great Turkiſh Emperours themſelves, with their Wives and Children about them, and ſome few other of their great Baſſaes, and thoſe only in Chappels by themſelves built for that purpoſe. All the reſt of the Turks are buried in the Fields; ſome of the better ſort in Tombs of Marble, but the reſt with Tomb-ſtones laid upon them, or with two great Stones, the one ſet up at the head, and the other at the feet of every Grave; the greateſt part of them being of white Marble, brought from the Iſle of Marmora. They will not bury any man where another hath been buried, accounting it Impiety to dig up another man's Bones: by reaſon whereof, they cover all the beſt Ground about the City with ſuch great white Stones: which, for the infinite number of them, are thought ſufficient to make another Wall about the City. But not to ſtand longer upon the manner of the Turks Burials, leaving this great Sultan to reſt with his Anceſtors, let us now proſecute the courſe of our Hiſtory.

The Turks bury not in their Churches, neither within the Walls of their Cities, but in the Fields.

THE LIFE OF ACHMAT,

The Firſt of that Name, Eighth Emperour of the Turks.

1604

Achmat, by exceſſive bounty procureth the favour of his great Courtiers and men of War.

Achmat Crowned Emperour of the Turks at Conſtantinople.

The Turks diverſly conceited of their new Emperour.

MAhomet, the late Sultan, in the midſt of his exceſſive Pleaſures, by untimely Death taken away, Achmat, the elder of his two Sons yet living, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire, to prevent the uſual and inſolent Tumults of the Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court at the change of the Emperours, and to take from them all Occaſions of diſcontentment; by the Counſel of the great Baſſaes (before he took upon him the Government) cauſed an exceeding great ſum of Money (viz. two millions and an half) as a token of his Bounty, to be diſtributed amongſt them; the Spahi and Silictars, his chief Horſe-men, receiving thereof ten Crowns a man, with five Aſpers a day more to increaſe their Pay; and the Janizaries thirty Crowns a man, and one Aſper a day more of ordinary pay; they of his Court, but eſpecially the chief Officers, taſting of this his bounteous Liberality alſo. With which ſo great a largeſs all men well contented, he, in a moſt rich and ſtately Chariot, ſo placed as that all men might well ſee him, was in great Majeſty carried through all the chief Streets of Conſtantinople, the People on every ſide gazing upon him, and ſtill as he paſſed by them, proſecuting him with their moſt joyful and happy Acclamations. Some wiſhing, that he being but young, might as another Solyman begin his Reign with the Conqueſt of Malta, as had the other with the Conqueſt of the Rhodes; and other ſome as heartily praying, that with glorious and victorious Conqueſts he might be like unto Mahomet the Great, whom he was then reported much to reſemble. In which ſo great and publick Magnificence, he, being about fifteen years old, was with all the accuſtomed Solemnities openly crowned, every man wiſhing unto him a moſt long and happy Reign. And albeit that no great fruit was for the preſent from ſo young and tender a Plant to be expected, yet nevertheleſs, by his Authority, and in his Name, many good Orders were taken for the relief of his Subjects, with moſt heavy Grievances generally oppreſſed, during the looſe and careleſs Reign of his Father. His Grandmother alſo, a moſt proud, ambitious, and imperious Woman, and withal exceeding rich, who, with great Authority, at her Pleaſure, over-ruled all in the time of the Reign of her Son Mahomet, he now removed from the State, as not fit for her to have to do therein, and ſo deprived her of all her former Power and Command. The Perſian Ambaſſadour, whom his Father in his diſpleaſure had cloſe ſhut up, he ſet at liberty, and with him ſent the Baſſa of Aleppo, to intreat of Peace with the great Shaugh of Perſia, who not long before (as was reported) had recovered the great City of Tauris, and was then preparing himſelf for new Conqueſts. Which Report for the motion of Peace with the Perſian, diſcovered in his Subjects their divers opinions concerning himſelf; ſome condemning his Patience, as not beſeeming the Othoman Emperours, unto whom Fury and Rage had always made them a way unto their great and dreadful Conqueſts, even againſt the moſt puiſſant Armies, and ſtrongeſt Towns and Fortreſſes of their Enemies; and ſome others to the contrary praiſing therein his Wiſdom, in ſeeking by fair means (now in the beginning of his Reign) to diſarm his Enemies when they might moſt hurt him; at his better opportunity, in his ſettled eſtate, to oppreſs them for ever. So the Actions of Princes are like unto ſtrange Lights appearing by Night in the Air, which hold mens Eyes buſied with the intentive beholding of them, ſome thereof divining well, and ſome others evil, according to the diverſity of the beholders conceits and humours.
